Opportunities were given to the novice from time to time of reconsidering his determination. On first entering the monastery, before being stripped of the outer garments which he had worn in the world, he was questioned whether, indeed, renouncing all other things, he would obey implicitly his new rule of life (Pachom. Reg. c. 49). By the rule of Aurelian, bishop of Arles in the 7th century, he was to listen in the waiting-room, or "salutatorium," while the rule was read over to him (Reg. c. 1). He was then to be led into the chapter-house, where, after laying aside his arms, if he carried any, he was again to make a profession of his intention in presence of the father-abbat and the brethren. He might, if he pleased, send back a farewell message to the friends left behind (Mab. Praef. iv. viii. 150). At the end of two months again at the end of eight months, and once again at the end of the year, the "senior" to whose charge he had been committed was to read over the rule to him, bidding him go back at once to the world if he wished (Bened. Reg. c. 58). Finally, in the oratory or chapel, during divine service (Pachom. Reg. c. 49), after laying on the altar with his own hand his written petition for admission, and invoking the saints whose relics were there enshrined, in witness of his sincerity, he was formally admitted by the abbat into the order (Bened. Reg. v. s.; Mabill. Praef. v. s.). If, as might often happen, he could not write, he was to put his mark to the petition in place of signature (Isidor. Reg. c. 5). He was to kneel before the abbat, repeating the verse, "Suscipe me," from the Psalter; and after admission, he was to prostrate himself at the feet of each of the brethren, kissing their hands and begging their prayers (Reg. Bened. Comment. c. 58; Reg. Magist. c. 88). His secular dress was to be laid by in a wardrobe in case of his ever unhappily needing it again by being expelled (Reg. Bened. ib.). Abbats were forbidden, under penalty of excommunication, to take any bribe for admission (Conc. Nicaen. II. A.D. 787, c. 19; Capitul. Francofurt. A.D. 794, c. 16). In the later developments of monachism, the consent of the brethren in chapter became necessary (Hospin. Hist. Mon. v. s.).

4. The monastic dress was not usually assumed till the noviciate was over (Cassian, Instit. iv. 5; Gregor. Magn. Epp. iv. 44). Originally, indeed, the dress of a monk differed little from that of ordinary people, except so far as it resembled the dress of the philosophers of the Roman empire, or was distinguished by a Quaker-like simplicity from the fashions of the day. When, however, the monastic life began to be organised more systematically, the dress became a not unimportant part of the rite of initiation. In the same way monks at first were only required to keep the hair short, as a protest against luxury and effeminacy; and the tonsure was for them a thing of later date (Bingham, Orig. Eccles. vii. iii.). By the rule, so-called, of "Magister," the novice becoming a monk was to receive the tonsure from the abbat's hands, while the brethren stood round singing psalms (Reg. Magist. c. 90). The congregation of Clugny, at a later period, ordered their novices to have the tonsure as well as all the monastic attire, with the exception of the hood or cowl. But this was a deviation from the old Benedictine rule, which reserved the tonsure with the outer robe for the expiration of the noviciate (Bened. Reg. cc. 55, 58; Mabill. Acta Sanctor. O. S. B. tom. i. p. 7, not. a).

5. The novice was in every instance required to divest himself absolutely of all his worldly possessions. He was to be examined very particularly on this point, lest by keeping back a single coin for himself he should incur the guilt of Ananias (Cass. Inst. iv. 4; Aurelian, Reg. c. 1). Even the clothes on his back ceased to be his own (Cass. ib. c. 5). But in the earliest and purest days of monachism, the monastery was not to be the gainer by the novice's liberality, but his own relatives or the poor (Cass. ib.; Fruct. Reg. c. 4). Afterwards he was allowed to choose how his property should be disposed of, provided always that he retained nothing for himself. By the rule of Aurelian he might give it away as he pleased (Reg. c. 1). By the rule of "Magister," the abbat was to exhort him to intrust his worldly goods to the monastery for the use of the poor, or, if he preferred it, for the common fund of the monastery (Reg. Mag. c. 87). There was a curious regulation of the monastery of Ternay in Burgundy (Mabill. Ann. O. S. B. i. 30, 71, 73), that property "in kind" was to be converted at once into money, in order, probably, to facilitate the distribution of it. Thus, if a novice brought a flock of sheep, the abbat was first to buy it for the monastery, or to sell it by the agency of the prior, and then to hand over the proceeds to the novice, to be applied by his direction (Reg. Tarnat. c. 5). It is easy to understand how, in course of time, as monasteries vied with one another in opulence and magnificence, they absorbed the larger share of what a novice was renouncing. Once theirs, it was sacrilege to deprive them of it in any way. But these acquisitions were not always an unalloyed advantage. Sometimes a novice, presuming on his munificence, made himself troublesome to his brethren and his abbat (Fruct. Reg. c. 18). Sometimes, if faithless to his profession, he would reclaim his property by litigation or by arms (ib.). It was important, therefore, that, whatever he gave to the monastery, he should give by his own act and deed ("ipse suâ manu," ib.). And though none might so much as enter the monastery as a postulant, bringing with him anything of his own, the formal and complete renunciation of all that he had in the world was to be made, solemnly, publicly, in writing, before the abbat and chapter, at a later stage of his noviciate (Reg. Mag. c. 87). It was even provided in the rule just quoted that the abbat should record the names of the donor and of the subscribing witnesses in his own last will and testament, lest at any future time the validity of the gift should be called in question (ib. c. 89). In the case of a minor, his parents were to lay his hand, wrapped in the folds of the altar cloth, on the altar, and might either vow away his property from him absolutely, or reserve the life interest till he should come of age (Bened. Reg. Comm. c. 59). When old enough, the novice was bound to execute this promise of renunciation (Aurel. Reg. c. 46). By the rule of "Magister" the parents might either promise all the boy's fortune to the monastery or might divide it in three equal portions between the monastery, the poor, and his own relatives. In either case they swore on the Gospels to bequeath him nothing (Reg. Mag. c. 91).

6. The rules of disqualification for admission varied continually in different countries and at different periods, especially as to the limitations of age. The conflicting decrees of councils and popes on these points testify to the difficulty of a compromise between the conflicting claims of the home or the state on the one side and of asceticism on the other. Basil, in the East, without defining more precisely, allowed children to be received very young to be trained in the monastery (Reg. c. 15); but they might go back to their homes, if they wished, before being finally admitted. Once in the monastery, by Benedict's rule, they could not abandon their vocation (Mabill. Annal. iii. 37; cf. Praeff. AA. O. S. B.). Cassian speaks of young boys occasionally among the Egyptian monks (Collat. ii. 11). Gregory the Great forbade them to be received before eighteen years of age; but the prohibition has been explained as applying only to the islands in the Tuscan Sea, where the discipline was peculiarly trying (Epp. i. 50). The emperor Leo fixed sixteen as the limit (Novell. 6). The rule of Aurelianus, bishop of Arles in the 6th century, excludes children under ten or twelve as thoughtless and as requiring a nurse (Reg. c. 47). A canon to the same effect was passed by the Trullan council at Constantinople, A.D. 692 (Conc. C. P. iii. c. 40). Leo IX., towards the close of the 11th century, prohibited novices before they have arrived at years of discretion; Urban II., rather later, forbade them under twenty. After the beginning of the 9th century they were seldom admitted under seventeen years of age (Hospinian, de Orig. Monach. iii. 23). Boys intended for the priesthood were by a decree of the second council of Toledo, A.D. 531, to be trained in the house of the bishop till they were eighteen years old (Conc. Tolet. ii. c. 1).

7. There is the same uncertainty, and there are similar contradictions, as to the right of the parents to devote a child to the noviciate, and of a child to present himself without the consent of his parents. Basil, in the earliest days of monasticism, forbade children to be admitted unless brought by their parents (Reg. c. 15). At a later date the civil law not only discountenanced parents keeping back their children from the noviciate, but even allowed children to be admitted against or without the consent of their natural guardians (Novell. cxiii. 41). Jerome, in a more than usually declamatory passage, upbraids Heliodorus for permitting his affection for his parents to keep him back from the life of a monk (Hieron. Epp. 14, § 2). The council of Gangra (Kiangari, in Anatolia), A.D. 525, a council not very favourably disposed to monasticism, condemned strongly sons retiring from the world without their parents' leave, anathematising all so doing (Conc. Gangr. c. 16). Alteserra contends, without, however, much shew of reason, that this and similar canons of the council of Gangra were intended only against monks tainted with heresy (Asceticon, iv. 1). But two councils during the 7th century in Spain, already distinguished among the countries of Europe by its monastic sympathies, decided that children under age were bound by the act of their parents devoting them to the monastery, and must abide by that promise, however unwillingly, in after years (Conc. Tolet. iv. A.D. 633, c. 49; Conc. Tolet. x. A.D. 656, c. 6). The former of these councils of Toledo, according to Bingham, is the first council that sanctions this perversion of parental responsibilities and of filial obedience (Orig. Eccles. vii. iii.). The latter enacts that up to ten years of age the child may be devoted by the parents; that on attaining that tender age the child has full power to devote himself, with or without their approval; and that, if parents have so much as tacitly allowed a child under ten to wear the monastic dress, he may never return to the world under penalty of excommunication (v. s.).

The marriage tie was another source of perplexity. Basil dissuades married persons from entering the monastic life, unless together, lest the husband or wife left alone in the world should be guilty of adultery (Reg. c. 12). Cassian, relating how Theonas, an Egyptian monk, persisted in becoming a monk in spite of his wife's entreaties, seems by his silence to disapprove (Collat. xxi. 8, 9). The council of Gangra, already quoted, condemns any such disregard of domestic duties on the part of wives or parents (v. s. cc. 14, 15). In the same spirit Gregory the Great cautions husbands against forsaking their wives even for the life of a monk (Gregor. M. Epp. vi. 48). But these salutary cautions were in practice too often neglected in the fervour of monastic propagandism.

The case of slaves was different. There the monastery was interposing to rescue men from degradation. Yet there, too, was danger of a collision between the monastery and social obligations. Canons and decrees give an uncertain sound, and it could hardly be otherwise, on this point. The council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, and the council of Gangra, A.D. 525, forbade slaves to be admitted without their masters' leave (Conc. Chalced. c. 4; Conc. Gangr. c. 3). Justinian ordered them to be kept three years, and then allowed them, if not reclaimed, to become monks (Novell. cxxiii. 35; cf. Valentinian. III. Novell. iii.). Basil makes reference to Onesimus, the runaway slave, sent back to his owner by St. Paul (Reg. c. 11). The great Gregory has frequent occasion in his correspondence to advise on this knotty point. Slaves are not to be taken in rashly (Greg. M. App. ad Epist. Decret. v. 6), but if they behave well in the monastery, they may stay (Epp. v. 34); if not, they must be sent back to their masters (ib. ix. 37); a subdeacon, to whom Gregory is writing, is told to pay the money to redeem a slave longing to become a monk (ib. iii. 40). On the whole, without doubt, the influence of the monasteries was often exercised wisely as well as benevolently for the alleviation and gradual extinction of the evils of slavery. For example, a master desiring to become a monk, and bringing a slave with him, found within the walls of the monastery that he had with him "no longer a slave, but a brother in the Lord" (Reg. Serapion. c. 7; Reg. Turnat. c. 5, &c.).

The profession of the monk clashed not infrequently with the duties of the citizen. By a decree of Valentinian and Valens, in the latter part of the 4th century, all persons in monasteries liable to serve in the local senates of the empire ("curiales")[a] were ordered either to return to public life or to sell their estates to others of a more public spirit (Cod. Theod. xii. 1; Bingh. Orig. Eccles. vii. iii.). The council of Chalcedon, in the same century, protested against monks serving in the army or navy (Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, c. 7). Gregory wisely discouraged public officers from becoming monks, unless they had first passed their accounts, and so cleared themselves of their civic responsibilities (Greg. M. Epp. iii. 65; viii. 5). Again, the admission of criminals involved questions of some difficulty. There was, on the one hand, the danger of interrupting the course of justice, by preventing the sentence of the law from being carried into effect, and of bringing down on the monastery harbouring criminals the strong arm of the law, as well as the danger, which Dr. Arnold felt so keenly at Rugby, of the moral contagion that might spread itself from an evil example. On the other hand, it might fairly be asked, was not the reformation of offenders one great purpose of the monastery? Cassian speaks of reclaimed robbers and even murderers among the monks of Egypt in his day (Collat. iii. 5). The rule of Fructuosus provides that novices of this character may only be received where the abbat is a man of more than ordinary experience and gravity, and that they must always be subjected to a discipline of more than usual rigour (Fruct. Reg. c. 19). For a somewhat similar reason, as well as not to interfere with a sister institution, monks, by a decree of the council of Agde, in the 6th century, were not to be admitted from one monastery into another (Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 58). Old age was sometimes a bar to admission, in the earlier days of monasticism. Cassian says of some who desired to become monks that they were too old to learn (Instit. iv. 30; cf. Pallad. Hist. Laus. cc. 20, 28). Poverty was never a disqualification. The poorest outcast, craving to be let in, with no possessions of any kind to renounce, either for the monastery or for the poor, had simply to vow, like the rest, that he would be obedient, and that he would never go away without leave of the abbat and of the brethren; if naked, he was to be clothed (Reg. Magist. c. 87). The following list of impediments to becoming a novice in some orders is given by Martene; but a good deal was always left to the discretion of the abbat and chapter. Immature age, heresy, schism, need of a dispensation, illegitimacy, debt, evil notoriety, gross wickedness, bodily infirmity, and, in case of a novice aspiring to the diaconate or priesthood, ignorance of Latin (Reg. Bened. Comment. c. 58).

8. In the earliest ages there was no vow of perpetuity, in so many words; only a tacit understanding on both sides that the novice would persevere in his vocation (Bingham, Orig. Eccles. vii. iii.). If, after making his profession, he turned back to the world, he was to forfeit what he had promised to the monastery, and was to be left to make his peace with God as he could (Justinian, Novell. v.). Short, however, of an irrevocable vow, everything was done to insure his perseverance. Should there, after all, be necessity for his expulsion, his old secular dress was to be given back to him (Bened. Reg. c. 58); and he was either to be ejected ignominiously in the daytime or allowed to steal away under the shadow of night (Cass. Instit. iv. 6). The mediaeval treatment of such offenders was more severe; they were to be immured for life (Hospinian, de Orig. Monach. ad loc. cit.; Bened. Reg.). During the noviciate egress was comparatively easy. After two months of it, the novice might, if he wished, depart in peace, with staff, wallet of provisions, and the abbat's benediction (Reg. Mag. c. 88). If, even at the last moment, just before solemnly assuming the monk's habit, he wished to retract, he was free to do so, but under sentence of penance for levity of purpose, and as a man still in God's sight dedicated to the life of a priest, if not to the higher life, as it was regarded, of a monk (Mabill. Praef. iv. vii. 150). A novice receding within the year was, by the rules of the Benedictine order of "Grandimontenses," never to be allowed to try again (Reg. Comment. c. 29).

Novices generally enjoyed, during this probation, the civil exemptions and immunities of monks (Alteser. Asceticon, iv. 4). Degradation

[a] The "curiales," or "curiae subjecti," may in some ways be compared to our aldermen or town-councilmen. When summoned to the office, they could not refuse, and if they endeavoured to evade it, they were compelled to return. They were responsible for the full payment of the impost due from their locality. The office being burdensome was invested with some dignity as a compensation, but came notwithstanding to be regarded as a kind of servitude. (See Ortolan's History of common Law, translated by Richard and Nasmyth, 1841. See particularly Justiniani Codex, i. iii. 12; xxxi. 39; vii. xxix. 5.)

to the noviciate was sometimes a punishment for monks who were disobedient (Du Cange, Glossar. Lat. s. v.). Benedict ordered the younger monks, just out of their noviciate, to be corrected for their faults by extraordinary fastings (Reg. 30).

In all these carefully devised regulations about novices shew that the founders and reformers of monastic orders regarded the noviciate, and rightly, as a very important part of their system. If the authority of the abbat was the keystone of the arch, the rigorous probation before becoming a monk was the cornerstone of the edifice. Thus the admission of a novice ("susceptio novitii") was one of the five principal duties of the abbat and chapter ("praecipua agenda monasterii"); the other four being the expulsion of renegades, the penances for misconduct, the acceptance of donations or bequests, and any proposition for changing any of the rules of the society (Reg. Bened. Commentat. c. 3). Benedict himself lays down the principle, that, while the discipline of novices must not go beyond their power of endurance, still, so far as it goes it must be adhered to strictly (Reg. Prolog.). It was a sagacious remark of Eutropius, a Spanish abbat (Serbitanus or Sirbitanus) towards the end of the 6th century, "we do not want quantity, but quality in our novices"—"non quantos [quot] sed quales" (Mabill. Ann. O. S. B. vii. 21). Yet the noviciate and the framing of regulations about it seem to have been left generally to the monastic bodies themselves. The canons of councils, though continually relating to the monks and monasteries, are comparatively silent about the noviciate. It was considered probably an integral part of the internal administration of the monasteries. It may be observed that, while in the commencement of monasticism the age for admission was earlier, and the probation longer, the inverse practice prevailed in course of time. Obviously the younger the novice, the greater the need of long and elaborate preparation.

(1) Among the various designations used by ancient Christian writers for nuns, the most noticeable are these. "Nonna" (Hieron. Epp. 22 ad Eustochium), a term of filial reverence, signifying an aged woman, a mother, or nurse, just as the older monks were called "nonni" by their younger brethren (Bened. Reg. c. 63; Benedict. Anian. Concord. Regul. c. 70; Menard. ad loc.). The word is perhaps from Egypt, and occurs in the form of νόννις in some editions of Palladius. "Sanctimonialis," or "Castimonialis," expressing the holiness of the vocation; the latter syllables of these words become in later writers the substantive word "monialis." "Monastria," a less usual word, signifying seclusion from the world. "Sponsa Christi," or spouse of Christ. "Ancilla Dei," handmaid of God. "Velata," veiled. "Ascetica," ascetic (Altester. Asceticon. III. ii.). The names "agapetae," beloved, and "sorores," sisters, degenerated into terms of reproach, as implying familiarity with monks (Bingh. Orig. Eccles. VI. ii. 13; cf. Conc. Ancyr. A.D. 314. c. 18).

(2) There were precedents in paganism for an institution of this kind. The Roman vestals held a very high place in the Roman constitution. Usually admitted very young, between the ages of six and ten, they were bound to fulfil a term of thirty years after admission; ten as novices, ten in the worship of the temple, ten as teachers of those who were to take their places. After the expiration of these thirty years, they were free to marry, but availed themselves of this liberty very rarely (Preller, Les Dieux de l'ancienne Rome). Among the Pythagoreans, also, women consecrating themselves to virginity might attain a very exalted rank in the hierarchy (Maury, Histoire des Religions de la Grèce Antique). Ambrose seeks a precedent in the sacred observances of the Jews (De Virginibus). But the passage in the book of Maccabees is a very slight foundation to build upon (II. Macc. iii. 19).

(3) In one sense the profession of a nun dates from an earlier period than the corresponding profession of a monk. Before the custom of addicting themselves for religious purposes to an unmarried life had made much progress in the Christian church among men, it was already in vogue among women. They had no public duties to renounce; it was easier for them to exchange their ordinary employments for those of charity and devotion; perhaps, too, they were predisposed to understand the exhortations to purity, which are so prominent in the Gospel, as exhortations to virginity, and to take such words about marriage as those of St. Paul to the Corinthians in the most literal sense (1 Cor. vii. 35). The "sacred virgins," or "ecclesiastical virgins," were an important part of the organisation of the church in its first three centuries, and their names were enrolled on the list ("canon" or "matricula") of church officials (Bingham, Origin. Eccles. vii. 4; Hospinian, de Orig. Monachatûs, i. 10). The empress Helena, mother of Constantine the Great, shewed especial respect for these devoted women (Socrat. Hist. Eccles. i. 17). But these "asceticae" were not living together in communities, nor bound by vows (Cyprian, Epp. 4, 62; cf. De Habitu Virg.). Even so late as the close of the 4th century, a canon of the council of Carthage speaks of these virgins as dwelling with their parents (Conc. Carthag. III. A.D. 397, c. 33; Gregor. M. Dialog. ii. 7, 14). If orphans, they were to be placed by the bishop in a building set apart for them. Probably the persecutions of the "sacred virgins" by Julian (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. v. 3), by that reaction which inevitably follows persecution, helped to make their vocation at once more popular and more systematic. Some of the Roman ladies, who were induced by Jerome's influence to devote themselves to it, continued in their homes. Others left their homes to give themselves more completely, as they believed, to a life of devotion (Epp. ad Eustoch.; ad Demetriad.; Ambrose, Epp. ad Marcell.). The civil law of the later empire exempted from the capitation tax (à plebeiae capitationis injuriâ) these ecclesiastical virgins, and grants them especial protection from insults, making it a capital offence to offer violence to any one of their number, or even to propose marriage to them (Cod. Theodos. xiii. x. 4, ix. xiv.; Cod. Justinian. I. iii. 5).

(4) Very early in the 5th century Palladius describes several communities of virgins living together in the Scetic desert, in Egypt, and in Tabennae, an island on the Nile. Some of these communities were apparently not under a very careful discipline. Dorotheus, the superintendent of one of them, used to sit at an upper window, looking down on the inmates, to stop their quarrellings (Pallad. Hist. Laus. cc. 34, 36, 38, 137). Chrysostom mentions crowds or associations of virgins (coetus virginum) in Egypt, in those days pre-eminently fertile in asceticism (Homil. in Matt. c. 8). Ruffinus speaks of them in Oxyrinchus (Behnesch) in Egypt. Ambrose says that they abounded in Alexandria, in the East, in Italy, and were esteemed very highly (De Virginit. 7, De Virginibus, 10, De Lapsu Virg.). Jerome complains that parents were apt then, as in later years, to get rid of their sickly or ill-favoured daughters in this way (Hieron. Ep. ad Demetriad.). Augustine mentions nuns, in buildings apart [illegible] monasteries, making woollen garments for [illegible]ks (De Mor. Eccles. c. 31). In his pro- against the excesses of Donatists, he rebukes [illegible]ently the indecent behaviour of the virgins, unworthy of the name, who accompanied the roving bands of the "Circumcelliones" (Cont. Parmenian. iii. 3; De Bono Viduitat. c. 15). In the last year of the 6th century the pope, Gregory the Great, attributes the preservation of Rome from the Lombards to the prayers of the nuns, about three thousand in number, within its walls (Gregor. M. Epp. vi. 42, vii. 26).

(5) At first, as was the case with monks, and especially in the East, youth was hardly considered a hindrance to self-dedication. Basil draws the line at sixteen or seventeen (Reg. c. 7; Ep. ad Amphiloch. c. 18). Asella and Paula devoted themselves, or were devoted, even earlier (Hieron. Epp.). Ambrose advises that it must not depend on the number of years, but on the maturity of character (De Virginitate, c. 7). The Council of Saragossa, in the close of the 4th century, and the Council of Agde, a little more than a century later, forbid the veil to be assumed before the age of forty (Conc. Caesaraug. A.D. 381, c. 8; Conc. Agathens. A.D. 506, c. 19); and the third Council of Carthage, about the same date as that of Saragossa, before twenty-five (Conc. Carthag. III. A.D. 397, c. 4). Gregory the Great writes that nuns may not be veiled before sixty years of age, but the profession might be made sooner (Epp. iv. 11; cf. Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. viii. 47). Charlemagne, in order to discourage the practice of taking the veil prematurely, re-enacted the old African canon already quoted, fixing twenty-five years f age as the earliest age for it (Capitul. A.D. 789, c. 46; A.D. 805, c. 14). The Council of Frankfort allows an earlier age in exceptional cases (Conc. Francof. A.D. 793, c. 46). The Council of Aachen, twenty-two years later, forbids young women to become nuns without the consent of their parents or guardians (Conc. Aquisgr. A.D. 817, c. 20). As to the length of time necessary for probation, a Council of Orleans in the 6th century, draws a distinction between convents where the inmates are to stay for ever, and those where they only sojourn for a time. In the latter case the probation is to last three years; in the former, one year is enough (Conc. Aurelian. V. A.D. 549, c. 19). [NOVICE.]

(6) From the first it was understood on all hands that a woman consecrating herself to the profession of virginity ought not to marry; and in accordance, as it was thought, with apostolic precepts (1 Cor. vii.; 1 Tit. ii.), anyone going back from this profession was gravely censured as falling from a higher vocation (Conc. Ancyr. A.D. 315, c. 19). But it was not till the Benedictine rule had been established in Europe that the vow of virginity was regarded as absolutely irrevocable.[a] At first in some cases, if not in all, the distinction was recognised between lawful wedlock and incontinency. In course of time the same stigma of infamy was branded on a nun marrying, as on one guilty of gross immorality, just as a monk was condemned alike for marriage and fornication. The Council of Elvira in Spain, early in the 4th century, allowed nuns forsaking their profession to be restored to communion, if penitent, after offending once, but not in case of the offence being repeated (Conc. Eliberitan. A.D. c. 324, c. 13). Basil ordered a penance of one or two years before restoration to communion; in his eyes, the marriage of one who is already the spouse of Christ is adultery (Ep. ad Amphiloch. c. 18). The Council of Valence, in Southern

[a] See H. C. Lea's History of Celibacy, Philadelphia, 1867.

France, about the same date, sentenced nuns marrying to a long, but not perpetual, excommunication (Conc. Valent. A.D. 374, c. 2). The Theodosian code allowed them to return to the world at any time before attaining forty years of age, especially if they had been compelled in the first instance by their parents to become nuns (Cod. Theodos. Nov. viii. et ix.). Pope Innocent I., in the commencement of the 5th century, forbids a nun after marrying or being seduced to be restored to communion, unless the partner in her transgression has retired into the cloister ("de sæculo recesserit," understood by Hospinian as if it were "decesserit") (Innoc. I. Ep. 2 ad Victric. Rotomagens.). Epiphanius draws very strongly the distinction, obliterated in later ages, between the marriage of a nun and profligacy; in the former case, after penance done, the ban of excommunication is to be taken off from her (Epiphan. Haeres. lxi.). Leo I., in the middle of the century, only allows nuns who have broken their vow before taking the veil to be received after penance to communion; for those who so offend after taking the veil there is no restoration (Ep. 90). Rather earlier in the century Augustine, with characteristic largeness of thought, admits that marriage in these cases, though very culpable, is not invalidated (De Bono Viduitat. 8, 9, 10). Jerome, as characteristically, writes more inexorably (Ep. ad Demetriad.). The Council of Chalcedon, prescribing a period of penance varying in duration according to the discretion of the bishop, recommends the offending sister to mercy (Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, c. 16). The second Council of Arles, in the year following, re-enacts the decree, already cited, of the Council of Valence, adding the limitation, "if the offender is over twenty-five years of age" (Conc. Arelat. ii. A.D. 452, c. 33). The decree of the Council of Orange, a few years before this, is of the same purport (Conc. Arausican. A.D. 441, c. 28). A century later the sentences pronounced are more severe. The fifth Council of Orleans excommunicates both parties in the event of a nun marrying after her fourth year in the convent (Conc. Aurelian. V. A.D. 549, c. 19); and the Council of Mâcon makes this an excommunication for ever, except by special dispensation from the bishop in mortal sickness (Conc. Matiscon. A.D. c. 581, c. 12). The third Council of Paris pronounces anathema against any one presuming to tempt a nun to marry (Conc. Paris, A.D 557, c. 5). Gregory the Great censures in gravest terms the marriage of a nun, as a great wickedness (Ep. v. 24). Nuns otherwise breaking their vow of chastity he orders to be transferred to a stricter monastery for penance (Epp. iv. 9).

(7) The Consecration of a nun was a solemn rite, only to be administered by a bishop, or, at least, by his authorisation. The third Council of Carthage, in the end of the 4th century, forbade priests so to officiate, except by the bishop's order; the Council of Paris, under the successor of Charlemagne, forbade abbesses to usurp this function (Conc. Carthag. III. A.D. 390, c. 3; Syn. Hippon. A.D. 393, c. 34; Syn. Carthag. A.D. 419, c. 6; Conc. Paris, A.D. 825, cc. 41, 43). Ambrose, in the 4th century, cautions women against assuming the veil precipitately and without due consideration (De Virginitate, c. 7). His sister Marcellina was formally admitted in the great basilica of St. Peter at Rome by pope Liberius, and part of the ceremony was her receiving from his hands the robe of virginity (Ep. ad Marcellin.; Innoc. Ep. ad Victr. c. 13. He relates elsewhere how young women came to him at Milan from other parts of Italy and from other countries to be veiled (De Virginibus, i. c. 10; cf. Conc. Carthag. iv. A.D. 398). Hospinian (De Orig. Monach. u. s.) contends that there was no such ceremony before Constantine the Great, and that Tertullian (De Virginibus Velandis) speaks only of the modesty in dress and deportment which becomes Christian maidens generally. The favourite seasons for this ceremony were Epiphany, Easter, and the festivals of Apostles (Gelasius. Ep. 9, ad Episc. Lucan. c. 12). The veil was a sign of belonging to Christ alone (Athanas. Exhortat. ad Spons. Dei). The fillet or riband (vitta), with its gleam of purple or gold, represented the crown of victory (Optatus, de Schismat. Donat. vii. 4), and the tresses gathered up and tied together marked the difference between the bride of Christ and the bride of an earthly bridegroom with her tresses loosened according to the old Roman custom. The ring and bracelet, symbolic also of the betrothal to Christ, as well as the use of a special office for the occasion, were, Bingham argues, of a comparatively modern date (Orig. Eccles. VII. iv.). The Council of Gangra, while correcting several laxities of the day, condemned the practice of nuns dressing like monks (Conc. Gangr. A.D. 365, cc. 13, 30). The same council forbade nuns to have their heads shaven (ib. c. 17; cf. Cod. Theodos. XVI. ii. 27); and so decreed two Gallic councils in the 6th and 7th centuries (M. Pl. Annal. O. S. B. vii. 52, xiii. 7). Ambrose and Optatus write to the same effect (Ambr. de Laps. Virgin. c. 8; Optat. de Schismat. Donatist. vi. 4). On the other hand, Jerome and Augustine imply that the custom in their experience was otherwise (Hieron. Ep. ad Sabinian. August.; Ep. 211). In Egypt and Syria the custom of shaving the head seems to have been adopted for cleanliness, nuns having infrequent opportunities of washing the head (Hieron. u. s.; cf. Sozom. Hist. Eccl. v. 10). The uncertainty of rule, and the diversity of practice on this point arose, perhaps, in part from the apostolic injunctions to the Christian women at Corinth (1 Cor. xi.) conflicting with the monastic tonsure; and partly from the twofold aspect of the vocation of a nun, as, on the one hand, pledged to virginity, and, on the other, betrothed to the Redeemer. Another objection against the tonsure of nuns in Europe was the circumstance that this was an ancient punishment for adulteresses among the Teutonic tribes.

(8) The rules of the conventual life for women resemble closely those for men (Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. i. 52). Scholastica, sister of the great Benedict, was esteemed in Europe the foundress of nunneries, according to the legendary tradition (Mabill. Praefl. I. iii.). The nuns were to obey their abbess implicitly (e.g. August. Ep. 211). By the rule of Caesarius, bishop of Arles, in the 6th century, they were never to go out of the convent; were to have nothing of their own; were to be allowed the luxury of a bath only in sickness (Caesar. Arelat. Reg. cc. 1, 4, 29). The rule of Aurelian, his successor in the see, orders that they may never receive letters without the cognisance of the abbess, and that if anyone brings a maid with her into the convent, the servant by the very act, becomes free and in all things her equal (Aurelian. Arelat. Reg. cc. 4, 13). The rigorous rule called "Cujusdam," not unreasonably ascribed by some to Columba of Iona, prescribes for nuns continual silence, frequent confessions, a very spare diet, very hard labour, under penalty of excommunication (Reg. Cujusd. cc. 6, 9, 10, 12, 18, 19). The rule of Donatus, bishop of Besançon, in the middle of the 7th century, makes mention of female officers corresponding to the abbat, friar, hebdomadarius or septimanarius in a monastery; it allows wives, who have left their husbands, to be admitted (cf. Syn. Carthag. M. A.D. 309, c. 1); it forbids the nuns to keep anything under lock and key; it orders small delinquencies to be punished by slappings (Donat. Vesontionens. Reg. cc. 4, 5, 7, 11, 32, 67). Gregory the Great, in his life of Benedict of Nursia, gives a curious legend, how two nuns were punished grievously for their silly chatterings (Gregor. M. Vit. S. Bened. c. 23).

(9) Nunneries were generally, as might be anticipated, more amenable than monasteries to the control of their bishop. But the occurrence from time to time of a canon on this point shews that they, too, could sometimes be insubordinate (e.g. Conc. Arelat. A.D. 554, c. 5; Conc. Forojul. A.D. 791, c. 47; Conc. Francofurt. A.D. 793, c. 47; Conc. Aquisgran. A.D. 816, c. 68; Conc. Paris, A.D. 829, c. 13). Again, another council insists that they must account to their bishop for all immunities from episcopal dues (Conc. Vernens. A.D. 755, c. 20). Gregory blames a bishop for not having hindered a nun from leaving her convent (Gregor. M. Epp. ix. 114). He orders the bishops to install new abbesses; to prevent nunneries being founded without sufficient endowment; to keep lay-women out of them (Epp. iii. 9, iv. 4, v. 12, vii. 7). The power of abbesses, like that of abbats, was checked by certain limitations both from within and without. By the rule of Donatus the abbess must take counsel with her nuns (u. s. c. 2). By the decree of an English council in the 8th century the abbess is to be elected by the nuns, either from their own number or from elsewhere, with the advice of the bishop (Conc. Chalcyth. [Chelsea ?], A.D. 787, c. 5). Gregory the Great in his day disapproved of young abbesses, and of abbesses from another convent (Epp. iv. 11, vi. 12). By a council near Paris in the 8th century it is ordered that the bishop, as well as the abbess, may send a nun misbehaving herself to a penitentiary; that no [illegible] to superintend more than one monas[illegible] quit the precincts, except once a year [illegible]moned by her sovereign; and that the [illegible] must do penance in the monastery for her [illegible]ts by the bishop's direction (cum consilio [illegible]opi, Conc. Vernens. A.D. 735, c. 6). Charlemagne enacted that the bishop must report to the Crown any abbess guilty of misconduct, in order that she might be deposed (Conc. Francof. A.D. 795, c. 47). Abbesses were forbidden, [illegible]ign of his successor, to walk alone, and thus were placed in some degree under the surveillance of the sisterhood (Conc. Mogunt n. ii. A.D. 847, c. 16). Charlemagne prohibited abbesses from laying hands on any one, or pronouncing the blessing (Capitul. Carol. M. A.D. 798, c. 76; Conc. Francofurt. A.D. 798, c. 46). Hospinian alleges that some abbesses claimed to ordain, but this can only be understood in the sense of admitting into minor orders or into the sisterhood (Hospinian, u. s.). Bingham states that abbesses are first mentioned as taking part in the proceedings of a synod at the Council of Becanfield (Becanceldae), in Kent, A.D. 694 (Bing. Origin. Eccles. VII. iii.; cf. Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. xviii. 28). In the feudal system abbesses were liable, like his other vassals, to the king's service, but by proxy, because of their sex and vow of seclusion. They of course exercised lordship over the fiefs belonging to their convents. In each province the convents were under the supreme authority of the abbess of the central convent of that order, just as the monasteries were subject to a "provincial" and "general" of the order.

(10) The routine in a nunnery corresponded very nearly with that of a monastery. There was the same periodical rotation, hour by hour, of sacred services, varied by work, chiefly manual, of one sort or another, with brief intervals at stated times for rest or refection. The usual occupation, in the way of working, was from the first in wool. Jerome, urging nuns to make their vocation real by strenuous diligence, advises them to have the wool ever in their hands (Ep. ad Eustoch.). The passage in Augustine's writings, where he speaks of them handing through the door of the convent the dresses which they have made for the aged monks waiting there with food for the nuns in exchange (August. de Morib. Eccles. c. 31), recalls the ancient epitaph on the Roman housewife in the simple days of the republic, "domi mansit, lanam fecit." But this primitive employment was apt to degenerate into a preference for fancy-work, which was discouraged as frivolous and vain, except when it was made useful, in ecclesiastical embroidery, &c., for the adornment of the sanctuary (Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. xvi. 24). The rule of Caesarius enjoins working in wool, but forbids fancy-work (u. s. cc. 14, 42). The rule of Aurelian orders the nuns all to learn reading and writing (literas discant omnes, u. s. c. 26). In the revival of education under Charlemagne, the nunneries did good service. Hitherto monastic schools had been used chiefly for training monks and clergy only. The great legislator extended the advantages of education to the laity also, instituting for them the "scholae exteriores," and leaving the "scholae interiores" for the others. The schools in the nunneries were already useful for girls in this larger sphere, the training of the young being naturally congenial to the nuns. Their course of lessons differed of course from the "trivium" and "quadrivium" of the monastic system, being confined to an elementary sort of catechism in religious knowledge, music, housework, and, more rarely, Latin (Alteser. Ascetic. v. 10; Herzog, Kloster-Schulen). Nuns were also employed frequently in transcribing and illuminating sacred books, and in the arts of medicine and painting (Mabill. Acta Sanctor. O. S. B. i. p. 646; Praef. ii. 3, iii. 4). Boniface, during his missionary labours in Germany, sent to his old home in England for a supply of nuns to assist in civilising and Christianising the wild hordes whom he was converting (Othlon. Vit. S. Bonifacii, c. 25; Mabill. Praef. iii. 2, 4). Hospinian says that he made use of them not for teaching only, but also for the purpose of preaching (u. s.; cf. Mabill. Praef. ii.).

(11) Great care was necessary from the first to prevent a too close proximity of nunneries and monasteries, as well as any intercourse between the nuns and the other sex generally. Augustine, Jerome, and other fathers of the church reiterate their cautions against these dangers. The Council of Ancyra forbade the consecrated virgins to associate with men even as sisters (Conc. Ancyr. A.D. 314, c. 18; cf. Conc. Carth. A.D. 312, c. 3). Justinian forbade women to enter the conventual buildings of men (Novell. cxxxiii.). In the 5th century canons were made strictly prohibiting any more monasteries to be founded for monks and nuns together, and ordering those already in existence to be partitioned between the sexes (Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. v. 23; cf. Herzog, Kloster). The rule of Caesarius allows no other man than the bishop, the clergy officiating, and the steward (provisor) of the convent to enter within its walls (u. s.). The nuns were to make their confession to the bishop through their abbess (Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. xii. 32). Some nuns were censured in the 6th century for having nursed through his illness a monk of the venerable age of 80 (Mabill. u. s.). The Council of Seville, a little later, forbids a nunnery to be placed too near the monastery to which it is attached for protection; enacts that this arrangement must have the sanction of the bishop or council; that no communication is to pass from the one establishment to the other, except through the abbat and abbess; and, while allowing the nuns to work with their fingers on dresses for the monks, and the monks to minister spiritually to the nuns, precludes all other intercourse whatever (Conc. Hispal. A.D. 619, c. 11). The letters of Gregory the Great abound with precautions and directions on this delicate subject. The person acting for the nunnery in its temporal affairs must always be either a monk or a cleric, of high repute and of long experience; he must save them all occasion for going out of the precincts; nuns are never on any pretext to lodge under the roof of a monastery. He denounces severely the custom of nuns being "commatres" with monks (Gregor. M. Epp. iv. 9, 42, viii. 21, 22). The danger, indeed, was one of constant recurrence, and required unceasing vigilance (Syn. Carthag. c. A.D. 346, cc. 3, 4; Conc. Toletan. I. A.D. 400, cc. 6, 9). The second council of Nicaea condemned the double or mixed monasteries already mentioned, and, even in cases of consanguinity, forbade a nun to see a monk, except in the presence of an abbess (Conc. Nicaen. ii. A.D. 787, c. 20). The council of Fréjus forbade the abbat of the protecting monastery to visit the nunnery without the bishop's leave (Conc. Forisjul. A.D. 794, c. 12). Still, in spite of every precaution, the insidious temptation baffled only too often the edicts of councils and reformers. In the 8th century nuns gained admission into monasteries on the ground of being necessary in sickness and similar emergencies, and secular women, on the same excuse, were harboured in convents (Mabill. Praef. III. i.). In the monastery of St. Maurice (Agaunense), in the Valais, women were in the habit of frequenting the basilica or chapel of the monastery (Mabill. Annal. O. S. B. i. 74). In the 10th century the archbishop of Sens, in Champagne, destroyed the separate cells (aediculae), then becoming common, in which nuns lived apart from the restraints of the convent (Mabill. O. S. B. Praeff. V. vi.). The "canonicae" of the 8th and subsequent centuries differed from nuns in retaining more of their secular character. They were not bound by a vow of perpetuity; they repudiated the titles of monachae and matres; and, though engaged, like nuns, in the work of education, they confined their teaching chiefly to the children of the nobles [CANONICI; SCHOOLS]. The "widows," who devoted themselves to the service of the church from its earliest days, belong in many respects to the same category as the "sacred virgins." Like them, they were exempted by the Code of Theodosius from the ordinary capitation tax; but it was expressly provided that this exemption should only be granted to those widows whose advanced age and sobriety of demeanour gave a guarantee that they would not marry again (Cod. Theodos. u. s.). The so-called "Apostolical Constitutions," after saying that a widow does not receive the imposition of hands (οὐ χειροτονεῖται, cf. Gelasius, Ep. 9, c. 13) enact that only those may be admitted into the order who are altogether beyond suspicion of levity or inconstancy (Apostol. Constitut. viii. 25). Similar precautions occur repeatedly in later ages, for instance, in the decrees of the Council of Orange in the 5th century, and of the Frankish kingdom in the 9th century (Conc. Arausican. A.D. 441, c. 27; Conc. Tolet. x. cc. 4, 5; Capitul. A.D. 817, c. 21). NUPTIAL CONTRACT. Tabulae nuptiales (Tertullian ad Uxorem, ii 3) were the "deeds" by which dowry was conferred in marriage. In many ancient representations of wedded couples a scroll is represented either in the hand of one of the persons or in some part of the picture, which is commonly supposed to be the nuptial contract. See MARRIAGE, p. 1114. Two are sometimes found in representations on glass. (Buonarruoti, tav. xxiii. 3.) (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v. Tabulae Nuptiales). [C.]

NUT. In the symbolism of the Fathers the nut bears various interpretations, the essential idea being the same in all, viz., a hidden treasure concealed beneath an unpromising exterior. From this point of view it became a very appropriate emblem of Jesus Christ, in whom the Godhead was hidden beneath the veil of the manhood. We find it so employed by St. Augustine (Sermm. de temp.; Dominic. ante Nativitatem). In this passage he divides the nut into three parts, the husk, the shell, and the kernel, and finds something corresponding to each in the Person of the Saviour. First, he sees in them the Flesh, Bones, and Soul of Christ; and then refining still further, he regards the husk as the symbol of our Lord's Body; the kernel of the Deity within affording both food and light to the soul; and the shell of the wood of the Cross, which at the same time divides the outward and inward in man, and also by the wood of the Atonement unites the earthly and the heavenly. St. Augustine's friend and correspondent Paulinus of Nola expresses the same conceit in one of his poems (Poems xxvii. In Nat. S. Felic. ix. 277–287). He finds a deep mystery in Jacob's peeled rods, especially in the one which was of hazel (Gen. xxx. 37), on which he thus comments:—

"In nuce Christus,

. . . . . .

Virga nucis Christus quoniam in nucibus cibus intus
Testa foris, et amara super viridi cute cortex.
Cerne Deum nostro velatum corpore Christum,
Qui fragilis carne est, verbo cibus, et cruce amarus.
Dura superficies verbum crucis, et crucis esca est.
Coelestem Christi claudens in carne medullam."

Another slightly different line of interpretation regarded the nut as the emblem of the Christian bearing about with him the divine Wisdom in a fleshy body. Thus St. Gregory the Great writes (exp. vi. Cant.): "Quid per nucem nisi perfectos quosque intelligimus, qui dum Divinam Sapientiam intra corpora sua retinent, quasi nucleum in fragili testa portant? Quid isti nisi nuces existunt, qui nuclei dulcedinem intus ferunt; exterius vero carnis utilitatem praetendunt?" We find a similar symbolism in Philo (de Vit. Mos. lib. iii.). Boldetti describes and gives a representation of a nut of amber found by him in a Christian tomb. It opened down the middle, and contained a cameo of the sacrifice of Isaac (Osservaz. p. 298; tav. 1, No. 10, 11; De Rossi, Rom. Sott. vol. iii. p. 595). [E. V.]

NYMPHAEUM, a name for the fountain or cistern usually found in the centre of the atrium before the door of a church, called also "Cantharus" and "Phiala" (FOUNTAINS AT THE ENTRANCE OF CHURCHES, p. 685). Anastasius records that a "Nymphaeum," surrounded by a triple arcade, was erected by pope Hilary in front of the basilica of St. Cross in Rome (Anastas. 69). In Paciaudi (de Sacr. Christian. Balneis, p. 145 sq.) we find an account with an engraving of an oblong marble cistern, found near the site of Pisaurum, ornamented with symbolical bas-reliefs of the 7th century, which he considers to have been a "Nymphaeum" in the atrium of a church. The word is used for ordinary fountains and tanks by Ammianus Marcellinus (lib. xv. p. 324), and Capitolinus (in Gordiano, iii.), "Opera Gordiani Romae nulla extant praeter quaedam nymphaea et balnea." Cedrenus and Zonaras (xiv. 1) used the word for a hall for the public celebration of marriages. Mabillon strangely interprets the passage from Anastasius of the place set apart for females. (Ducange, Constantinop. Christiana, lib. i. c. 26, p. 86 sq.). [E. V.]

NYMPHIA, male or female saint of Laodicea, martyr with Eubulus of Rome in the first century; commemorated Feb. 28 (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 719). [C. H.]

NYMPHODORA, martyr, with Menodora and Metrodora; commemorated Sept. 10 (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 265). [C. H.]

NYMPODORA, martyr; commemorated at Nicaea, Mar. 13 (Hieron. Mart.); NIMPODORA (Usuard. Mart.). [C. H.]

NYSSA, COUNCIL OF, on the confines of Cappadocia, where a council was held A.D. 375, at the instigation of Demosthenes, the civil vicar, in which St. Gregory, brother of St. Basil and bishop of Nyssa, was condemned. (Basil, Ep. 237; Mansi, iii. 502.) [E. S. Ff.]

O

OAK, THE, SYNOD OF. [CHALCEDON (1) p. 333.]

OATHS on formal and solemn occasions, or for the purpose of legal attestation, were not prohibited among the early Christians. There were considerable scruples, doubtless, in using them, and their use was regarded with jealousy by more than one of the great church writers. The ground of the aversion to them, as to other practices which have since been held to be generally lawful among Christian people, was the prevalence of idolatry. All adjurations in common use naturally invoked the name of a heathen deity, or were cast in some form which a Christian could not utter without a tacit compliance with heathenism. Tertullian has one passage (De Idololat. c. 11) where, after speaking of lying being the servant of covetousness, he proceeds: "Of false swearing I say nothing, since it is not lawful to swear at all"—a passage which would seem to forbid the use of an oath under any circumstances. It is manifest, however, that Tertullian is not discussing the lawfulness of oaths, but is repeating in a general way the prohibition of our Lord (St. Matt. v. 34) against introducing adjurations into common conversation. Nevertheless, the feeling of that age was strong against the indiscriminate use of oaths. Thus Clement of Alexandria (Stromat. vii. 8, p. 861, ed. Potter) says that no true Christian will ever perjure himself, for he will not even swear; it is an indignity for him to be put upon his oath. And even a century later, Lactantius (Epitome, c. 6) disapproves of the use of oaths on the same ground, lest from constraint or carelessness a man should slip into perjury. The unlawfulness of swearing was one of the views set forth by Pelagius. Augustine (Ep. clvii.) shewed, in reply, that there is scriptural ground for the lawfulness of an oath, but, in common with many of the fathers, he viewed its use with suspicion and distavour.

2. Coming to the direct evidence that oaths were employed and sanctioned in the early church, Tertullian (Apolog. c. 32) repudiates the charge that Christians could swear by the genius of Caesar, for the genii are nothing else than demons; but, he adds, they do swear by the emperor's safety; and he defends the oath, on the ground that in kings men reverence the appointment of God, and he holds that to be a great oath which involves the safety of what God hath willed. The same oath, "ὑπὲρ τῆς σωτηρίας τοῦ ἐυσεβεστάτου Αὐγούστου Κωνσταντίου," is mentioned by Athanasius (Ep. ad Monachos, t. i. p. 866, ed. Colon.). Compare the oath of Joseph (Gen. xlii. 15), "By the life of Pharaoh" (νὴ τὴν ὑγίειαν Φαραὼ, Septuagint). This form of oath, which was probably adopted as an indirect answer to the charge of disloyalty, so freely cast at the early Christians, was evidently subject to abuse. So the fourth council of Carthage, A.D. 398, c. 61, orders a clergyman swearing by any creature (per creaturas) to be severely reprimanded, and, if obdurate, to be excommunicated. Athanasius required of Constantius (Apolog. ad Constant. t. i. p. 678) that his accusers should be put upon oath. In Vegetius, who lived at the close of the 4th century, there is a form (Institt. rei Militar. i. 5) of the oath required of Christian soldiers. They swear by God, by Christ, by the Holy Spirit, and by the majesty of the emperor. Other illustrations of the use of oaths, cited by Bingham, will be found in Aug. (Ep. cliv.) ad Publicol.; Id. Serm. xxx. De Verbis Apost.; Greg. Naz. (Ep. ccxix.) ad Theodor.; Basil, in Psalm. xiv. t. i. p. 133; Hieron. in Matt. v. The laws of the Christian emperors contain frequent mention of oaths. Constantine confirms (Cod. Theod. IX. i. 4) a promise of reward to those who will inform against the corrupt practices of his ministers by the adjuration, "So may the Almighty be ever merciful to me, and keep me safe." One of the statutes of Arcadius (Cod. Theod. ii. ix. 8), shews that contracts were usually confirmed by an oath, either by the name of God or the emperor's safety. In the conference between the Catholics and Donatists in the time of Honorius (Collat. Carthag. die i. c. 5; Hard. Conc. i. 1052), the emperor's delegate swore to judge impartially "by the marvellous mystery of the Trinity, by the sacrament of the Incarnation, and by the emperor's safety." And indeed, whatever may have been the scruples of individual fathers, there can be no doubt that oaths were invariably required both in civil and criminal causes under the Christian emperors. Constantine laid down a general law (Cod. Theod. II. xxxix. 3) that all witnesses before a court were to bind themselves by an oath before giving evidence. The Justinian Code not only confirmed this law (ibid. IV. xx. 9) but added a clause to it (ibid. IV. lix. 1), that both plaintiff and defendant must swear upon the Gospels; the one, that he brought his action not for the purpose of calumny, but on legitimate grounds; the other, that he had a just defence. By a further enactment, the parties to a cause swore (Justin. Novel. cxxiv. 1) that no bribe had been or would be given to the judge or any other person. Nor was the obligation of an oath confined to lay causes. To check simony in cases of ecclesiastical preferment, the electors were required (Justin. Novel. cxxiii. 1) to take an oath that they did not select their nominee from any improper motive. Also, at the time of ordination, the candidate swore upon the Gospels (Justin. Novel. cxxxvii. 2) that he had given no money to the bishop ordaining him. Among the privileges of the bishops was an exemption from appearing in person to give evidence in the public courts. It is not quite clear whether the privilege, as originally conferred by Theodosius, extended so far as this. It was, however, distinctly granted by Justinian (Novel. cxxiii. 7); and the same law enacted, that whenever bishops were examined in private their testimony should be taken not upon oath, but upon their word in presence of the holy Gospels, as becomes priests. With the exception of some of the Spanish synods, scarcely any mention is found of oaths in decrees of councils. In the decree which concludes the acts of the fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633, the oath of allegiance to kings is insisted upon; and the eighth council of Toledo, A.D. 653, c. 2, has a long dissertation on the sanctity of oaths, and insists upon the necessity of an oath in making treaties, in the reconciliation of friends, and in giving evidence; and adds, that if no evidence is forthcoming against an accused, then his oath is sufficient to establish his innocence.

3. Profane swearing was not in itself an offence subject to canonical punishment. It was a vice against which preachers frequently inveighed, but amendment was left to each one's conscience. (Tertull. de Pudicit. c. 19.) Its prevalence at Antioch called forth strong remonstrances from Chrysostom; and in one of his sermons (Hom. 22, ad Pop. Ant. t. i. p. 294) he threatened to exclude all swearers from partaking of the Holy Mysteries. A form of oath which the idolatrous adulation of the heathen emperors had brought into vogue was, "By the genius of Caesar," τὴν καίσαρος τυχὴν, Per genium Caesaris. It had such a hold upon the people that Tertullian declares (Apolog. c. 28) that men would more readily swear falsely by all the gods than by the single genius of Caesar. In the early centuries this oath was one of the tests of recantation. Polycarp was frequently asked by the proconsul (Euseb. H. E. v. 15) to swear by the fortune of Caesar. A similar temptation was put before some African martyrs: "Only swear by the genius of the king, and you will be safe." (Acta Mart. Scyllitan. ap. Baron. an. 202, n. 2.) And for a Christian to utter it was a recognised lapse into idolatry. (Tertull. Apolog. c. 32; Origen, contr. Cels. viii p. 421.) The form of an oath in common use is an indirect evidence of the soundness of doctrine.

Thus it was urged as a special charge against Donatus (Optatus, iii. p. 65) that he encouraged his followers in swearing by himself, or by the martyrs of his party. The oath of allegiance exacted by Justinian from governors of provinces is a fair indication of the development of the observance paid to the Virgin and to angels: "I swear by Almighty God, and His only-begotten Son our Lord Jesus Christ, and by the Holy Spirit, and by Mary, the holy, glorious, and ever-Virgin Mother of God, and by the four Gospels which I hold in my hands, and by the holy archangels, Michael and Gabriel, to pay due allegiance," &c. (Cave, Prim. Christian. III. i. 212; Bingham, Antiq. XVI. vii. 4; Suicer, s. v. ὅρκος.)

4. Oaths of purgation entered largely into the administration of justice in the middle ages. The ordinary term expressing this oath was "sacramentum." "Juramentum, quod mutato nomine appellatur sacramentum, quia in eo id oculis fidei pervidetur, quod corporis oculis non conspicitur." (Hincmar, de Divortio Lothar. et Tetbery, interrog. 6.) The formality was technically called "purgatio canonica," that is to say, a mode of purging approved by the canons, as distinguished from "purgatio vulgaris," such as a duel, or hot iron, or any other ordeal, all of which the church discountenanced. In cases where the evidence was conclusive, an oath of purgation was of no avail; but in all petty causes, in which the evidence was conflicting or insufficient, or was not admitted by the judge, or in which the plaintiff or accuser was absent, the defendant was allowed to purge himself from the charge by a solemn oath. It is obvious that this right might open the road to perjury, but the oath was surrounded with such circumstances of awe and solemnity that it was believed that no one would dare to swear falsely, or that, if he did, the vengeance of God would overtake him. That such interpositions were held to have actually taken place at the shrines where the perjury had been committed, see Gregory of Tours, Miracula, i. 20, 33, 53; and the Life of St. Eloy by Audoen or Owen, bishop of Rouen, A.D. 640, cc. 56, 59, 77. If the cause was sufficiently grave, the accused or the defendant did not swear alone, solâ manu suâ, but others supported him in the oath, the number depending on the gravity of the case. These supporters were variously named. In the laws of the German and Frisian tribes (Leg. Aleman. vi. 2; Leg. Frision. i. 2, 6, 8) they are termed sacramentales. In the Capitularies of Charles the Great (iii. 58), consacramentales; and again (ibid. iii. 64) juratores; and (ibid. iv. 26) conjuratores. Care was taken that they should be people of good report, whose evidence would be trustworthy, and of the same rank and condition as the accused. So that if a priest was under the necessity of purging himself from a charge, his compurgators must be priests also. (Capitular. Aquisgr. A.D. 803, c. 7; Capitular. Carol. Mag. v. 34.) An old Welsh law has an enactment (Leg. Hoëli boni Princip. Walliæ, c. 14), that if a woman is exposed to a charge which cannot be proved, she may clear herself by seven female compurgators, septimâ manu inalienum expurgat; if she is accused a second time, she will require fourteen; but if a third, and there is any probability in the charge, she will need fifty women to join with her in attesting her innocence. The sacramentales or compurgatores were selected partly by the accused, when they were termed advocati; partly by the plaintiff, in which case they were called nominati or denominati. Nominati also expressed the nominees of either side. When a person whose case was in dispute swore alone, he was said jurare sud manu. If with one witness, unicâ manu, or cum uno sacramentali, or in manu proximi; and so with any number up to a hundred. The third council of Valence, A.D. 855, c. 13, has an instance of an oath, septimæ sesind quartâ manu. The compurgatores at the time of swearing were required to be fasting. (Capitular. Aquisgr. A.D. 787, c. 62.) The mode of conducting the formality is given in Leg. Aleman. vi. 7. The witnesses were to place their hands upon the chest containing the relics, and the principal in the cause alone was to utter the words, and lay his hand upon their hands, and swear that he had right on his side. To add solemnity to the oath, it was always to be taken in a church, either on the cross, or the altar, or the Gospels, or the relics. All the English Penitentials refer (Theodor. I. vi. 4; Bedae, v. 2; Egbert, vi. 2) to an oath thus taken, at the hand of a bishop, or on the altar, or on the cross. An instance of a father swearing, with his hands raised over the altar, to the innocence of his daughter, is given by Gregory of Tours. (Hist. iii. 33.) In the Capitulary of Charles the Great, v. 34, a suspected priest is ordered to purge himself with an oath taken on the Gospels in presence of the people. The practice, however, of requiring an oath from the clergy was not uniform. Thus, the council of Meaux, A.D. 845, c. 48, prohibited bishops from swearing upon any sacred object; it was sufficient, apparently, that the oath was taken in presence of the object. And, prior to this, the Capitular. Episcop. A.D. 801, c. 20, had appointed that a priest should not swear at all, but simply make his declaration with gravity and truth. And the Instit. Eccles. p. 92, apud Ducange, s. v. Juramentum, which bears the name of Egbert, puts a special valuation on the oaths of the clergy. In criminal cases the oath of a priest was worth that of 120 serfs; of a deacon, 60; of a monk, 30. In disputes about property the oath of a priest could transfer the land of one serf to the church. In swearing by the Gospels, the ordinary formality was to lay the hands upon the sacred volume, but sometimes the book was held. Thus Pelagius, afterwards pope, A.D. 555–560, when charged by the Roman people of factious conduct towards his predecessor Vigilius, ascended the pulpit of St. Peter's, holding the Gospels and the cross above his head, and swore that he was innocent. Oaths over the tombs and relics of saints were of frequent occurrence. One of the Capitularies (Carol. Magn. vi. 209) required all sacramenta to be administered in a church and over relics, invoking the name of God, and those saints whose remains were below. The hands were to be placed on the relic chest (Leg. Aleman. vi. 7), or on the tomb of the saint (Greg. Turon. de Glor. Confess. c. 93), or were to be extended towards the sacred spot. (Greg. Turon. Miracul. i. 20.) All these oaths, for the confirmation of which some sacred object was beheld or touched, were called corporal oaths, juramenta corporalia, ὅρκοι σωματικοί. For further varieties of such oaths, and details of their use, see Ducange, s. v. Juramentum. They were sometimes mixed up with pagan superstitions. The fourth council of Orleans, A.D. 541, c. 16, condemns oaths taken on the head of a wild or domestic animal. And the council in Trullo, A.D. 692, c. 94, prohibits generally, ὅρκοι Ἑλληνικοί. [G. OBADIAH, prophet, commemorated Nov. 19. (Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 274.) [C. H.]

OBEDIENCE. [DISCIPLINE; ORDERS, HOLY.]

OBITUARY. [NECROLOGIUM.]

OBLATE, (oblata, oblatio; barb. oblada, oblagia, oblia). "Oblata" is a late equivalent to "oblatio" (as proba=probatio, confessa=confessio, missa=missio, &c.). When oblatio was understood of the provision for the Eucharist it generally included both elements, e.g. "Populus dat oblationes suas; id est, panem et vinum" (Ord. Rom. ii. 6 in Mus. Ital. ii. 46); "Oblationem, i.e. panem et vinum, viri et foeminae ad missas offerunt" (Allocutio Episc. 89 in Regino; de Eccl. Discipl. ii. 5; so Amalarius, de Eccl. Off. iii. 19). The offering of bread alone was, however, also called "oblatio," as by Germanus of Paris, 555; "Dum sacerdos oblationem confrangeret" (Expos. Missae Brev. in Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. 12, Ord. i.); in a Gregorian rubric in one ancient MS., "Offeruntur a populo oblationes et vinum;" and by Amalarius, "Cum oblatione calix Domini auferatur de altari" (Ecloga, 22). But "oblata" was the far more common form when the bread only was intended, and from the frequency of its use, when men spoke of sacramental bread, it came at length to be applied to smaller loaves or cakes of bread for ordinary uses. Thus a writer in the 9th century speaks of "rolls of bread which are commonly called oblatae" (Iso, de Mirac. S. Othmari, ii. 3, in Surius, Nov. 16). In Quinquagesima the monks of Clugny received at supper cakes "which by men of the Roman tongue are called nebulae, by our people oblatae" (Consuet. Cluniac. i. 49 in Spicil. Dach. i. 667, ed. 2). Similarly the customs of Evesham allowed in Lent a certain quantity of wheat from the granary "ad oblatas ad caenam," and half as much on Maundy Thursday (Dugdale, Monast. i. 149, ed. 2). At length, when the Eucharistic bread was made very small and thin, wafers for sealing were called oblatae, whence the French oublie and the Spanish oblea.

Oblata was more commonly applied to the unconsecrated loaf, hostia to the consecrated. Thus in the Ordo Romanus, before the consecration, "Pontifex . . . suscipit oblatas de manu presbyteri," "Archidiaconus suscipit oblatas Pontificis" (Ord. i. 15, &c.; Sim. § 48; Ord. ii. 9, 10, iii. 13, 14, v. 8, 10), while "hostia" [HOST] is only used after (as in i. 19, ii. 13; iii. 16), of the "fraction of the hosts." Yet until "hostia" entirely superseded it, "oblata" was also occasionally used of the consecrated element. Thus in the 8th century, when the usage was quite unsettled, "Pontifex autem tangit a latere calicem cum oblata," "Rumpit oblatam ex latere dextro" (Ord. Rom. i. 16, 19). Amalarius: "Fractio oblatarum" (Ecloga, 25).

For particulars respecting the preparation and the form of oblates, see ELEMENTS, vol. i. pp. 601–604. [W. E. S.]

OBLATI (MONASTICI). Like the terms "conversus" and "donatus," the word "oblatus" in connexion with the monastic system has several meanings, which must be carefully distinguished, as expressing different ideas belonging to different periods in the history of monasticism. In every sense the "oblati" were a link between the world and the monastery.

In the first instance the "oblati" were children brought by their parents to the monastery and there dedicated to the monastic life. In this sense the "oblati" were distinct from the "conversi," persons of mature age taking on themselves the vows. [CONVERSI; NOVICE.]

When monks, in course of time, ceased to be regarded as laymen, and began, by the very fact of their profession, to be ranked with the clergy, and as the original simplicity of the monastic life began to disappear, the need came to be felt of a class of persons in every monastery who should assist the monks in some of their more ordinary occupations, and so leave them more free for the services of their chapel and the meditations of their cells. At the same time these assistants were useful for purposes outside the walls of the monastery, and could be sent by the abbat or prior on various errands of a secular kind without the monks being disturbed from their devotions (Fructuosi Reg. c. 13; Isidori Reg. c. 20). In this sense the oblati were "lay-brothers," or, as Ménard explains (Commentar. ad Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. lxx. 5), the servants or domestics of the monastery (servi vel famuli, ib.), receiving their food and a distinctive dress from the abbat, but not bound by the same vows as their brethren in the monastery (Du Cange, Glossar. Lat. s. v.). The third council of Arles (A.D. 455) speaks of a "lay multitude subject to the abbat, but not owing any subjection to the bishop of the diocese" (Conc. Arelat. iii. App.). Sometimes from humility a novice, it might be of high rank, of great learning, or already in sacred orders, chose to be admitted into a monastery on this humbler footing (Alteserrae Asceticon, iii. 5; Du Cange, Gloss. Lat. s. v.). Monasteries gradually enlarged their possessions; and the services of laymen were requisite not merely within the precincts, but to superintend and cultivate the land belonging to the monastery (Du Cange, ib.).

At a later period a class of "oblati" came into existence, not so closely attached to the monastic system of which they claimed to be members. In some cases persons, without assuming a distinctive dress, or residing within the monastic precincts, devoted their property to the monastery, reserving to themselves the life interest only; in others they bound themselves and their descendants to be its servants or retainers (Du Cange, Gloss. Lat. s. v.). Of course in cases such as these there was no probation. The promise itself sufficed. These "oblati" or "donati" are described by Alteserra as the associates and deputies of the monks (adjuvae et vicarii conversorum), or as their servants (servi monachorum), because they dedicated themselves and their possessions to the monastery without taking on themselves the outward garb either of a cleric or of a monk (Altes.

Ascet. iii. 5). If, however, the oblate assumed the dress, he then became entitled to enjoy the privileges and immunities of the order (ib.). These associates, having been objected to in some quarters, were formally approved by pope Urban II., A.D. 1091 (ib.). Single, and even married, women were sometimes admitted on these conditions (ib.). Mabillon speaks of these "oblati" or "donati" as not in any true sense monks (nequâquam monachi), though not uncommonly termed monks of the second order (monachi secundi ordinis). He quotes a passage from Alcuin, in the 8th century, about a number of lay brothers attached to monasteries (grex devotorum), but the term "oblatus" in this sense is of a later century (Mabill. Ann. O. S. B. xv. 49).

From an early period, indeed as soon as the monastic life began to command the reverence of secular potentates, these, in return for their benefactions, not infrequently sought and obtained admission into the fraternity, as outmembers, in order to have their names inscribed on the roll, and mentioned in the conventual prayers. Thus Maurus, a disciple of the great Benedict, received Theodebert, king of the Franks, into the monastery afterwards called "St. Maur sur le Loire" (monasterium Glannafoliense) in the close of the 6th century, 584. (A.D. 584, Mabill. AA. O. S. B. Vita Sti. Mauri, cc. 40, 50, 51.) Similarly, many kings, nobles, and prelates during the middle ages, for instance the German emperor Frederic II., and the Greek emperor Emanuel Comnenus, claimed the honours of monkhood, without formally subjecting themselves to its discipline. In some instances grandees were admitted as oblates during sickness, or at the point of death. (Altes. Asceticon, iii. 7.) [I. G. S.]

OBLATION, THE (oblatio, sacrificium, ἀναφορά, προσφορά, θυσία, προσαγωγή, προσκομιδή). Under this name the Eucharist, the Christian thank-offering, was understood at a very early period. Thus Irenaeus, 167, referring to its institution, says that Christ taught His disciples "the new oblation of the new covenant" (Haer. iv. 17, § 5). The sacrament is with him "The oblation of the church, which the Lord taught should be offered over the whole world" (18, § 7). The Apostolical Canons speak of "the time of the holy oblation" (c. 3. comp. 8).

I. In the mind of Christians of the first liturgical period there was a much closer connexion between the oblation of bread and wine and the commemorative sacrifice than would be likely to survive the expansion and rearrangement of the original form of the ANAPHORA. For the memorial of the sacrifice of Christ appears to have been made at first by the simple offering of the bread and cup by the priest with thanksgiving (Eucharist), the account of the institution, and the Lord's Prayer. This hypothesis satisfies all the phenomena. It explains language in the fathers (see CANON OF THE LITURGY, vol. i. p. 268) which otherwise would seem ambiguous or confused; it harmonises with the fact that in the Gallican liturgies, which have admitted no changes since the 8th century, that which we should now call the canon consisted to the last of the narrative of the institution only; it accounts both for the statement of Gregory I. that the canon was the composition of a scholastic, and that it was the custom of the apostles to consecrate the host of oblation "ad ipsam solummodo orationem" (Dominicam) (Epist. vii. 64), and for those anticipatory references to the effect of consecration, which occur in the prayers of oblation of so many ancient liturgies. See after, OBLATIONS, § x.

II. The Prayer of Commemorative Oblation.—By the repetition of our Lord's words at the institution, the bread and wine were declared to be thenceforth His body that was wounded, and His blood that was shed on the cross. From this point, therefore, the liturgical rite became the complete representation of His sacrifice. This was expressed in a prayer (called by modern writers from one or the other of its two elements, the Memorial or the Prayer of Oblation), in which after mention of the atoning passion (if not also, as afterwards, of the great events that followed in its train), a verbal offering of the present eucharistic sacrifice was made with prayer for its acceptance and for remission of sins, and all other benefits of that sacrifice which was commemorated by it. See, for instance, the Liturgy of St. James, or of Jerusalem, in which the priest says, "We sinners, therefore, also bearing in mind His life-giving sufferings, salutary cross and death, and resurrection from the dead on the third day, and ascension into heaven and session on Thy right hand, the God and Father, and His second, glorious, and fearful coming . . . . do offer unto Thee, O Lord, this awful and unbloody sacrifice, praying that Thou deal not with us after our sins," &c. (Assem. Codex Liturg. v. 37). Similarly St. Chrysostom and St. Basil (Euchol. Goar, 77, 163); the Armenian has, "In behalf of all, and for all, we offer Thee Thine own of Thine own" (Neale, Hist. East. Church, Introd. 558). The form in St. Mark greatly resembles this (Renaud. Coll. Liturg. Orient. i. 156), as do those in the Egyptian liturgies of St. Basil and St. Gregory, both Coptic and Greek (ibid. 15, 31, 68, 105). The Coptic St. Cyril has no oblation, but the memorial of the death, &c. only (47). The Ethiopian oblation, though part of an office derived from the Coptic Jacobites, is peculiar in naming the elements, "Now also, O Lord, commemorating Thy death and resurrection, we offer unto Thee this bread and this cup," &c. (519). In all the Greek and Oriental liturgies, the prayer before us, whether beginning with the oblation or the memorial, starts from the words of institution, and is followed, properly, at once by the invocation (EPICLESIS).

It is probable that the oblation in connexion with the memorial was thought unnecessary by those who set the example of omitting it, because of the similar form which introduced the intercessions after the invocation.

In the West the prayer of oblation appeared sometimes as part of the canon, sometimes as a distinct form. It follows immediately the words of institution in the Gelasian and Gregorian canon: "Unde et memores, Domine, nos tui servi, sed et plebs tua sancta, Christi filii tui Domini Dei nostri tam beatae passionis, necnon et ab inferis resurrectionis, sed et in caelos gloriosae ascensionis, offerimus praeclarae majestati tuae de tuis donis ac datis hostiam puram, hostiam sanctam, hostiam immaculatam, panem sanctum vitae aeternae et calicem salutis perpetuae" (Murat. Liturg. Lat. Vet. i. 697; ii. 4). Similarly in the Romanising Missale Francorum and the Sacramentary of Besançon (ibid. ii. 694, 778). The Spanish and Gallican canons were very short, and the commemoration and oblation found their place in a prayer which came immediately after it, the Post Pridie of the Spanish and Post Mysterium, or Post Secreta, of the Gallican liturgies, which embraced the invocation as well. Very few, however, of those extant contain these three set forth with any distinctness, and some of those of later composition lose sight of them all. The following example from the Mozarabic Missal is complete: "Facimus, Domine, filii tui nostri Jesu Christi commemorationem, quod veniens ad nos humanam formam assumsit, quod pro hominibus quos creaverat redimendis passionem crucis perpessus est. . . . Per ipsum te ergo, summe Pater, exposcimus, ut hanc tuae placationis hostiam, quam Tibi offerimus, e manibus nostris placatus accipias, eamque de caelis a sede placato vultu respiciens benedicas," &c. (Miss. Mox. Leslie, 15). From the Gothico-Gallican Missal we may select this: "Memores gloriosissimi Domini passionis et ab inferis resurrectionis, offerimus tibi, Domine, hanc immaculatam hostiam, rationalem hostiam, incruentam hostiam, hunc panem sanctum et calicem salutarem, obsecrantes ut infundere digneris Spiritum tuum sanctum edentibus nobis, vitam aeternam requiemque perpetuam conlatura potantibus" (Lit. Gall. Mabill. 298). This collect is of great interest, as down to the word "calicem" inclusive it agrees with a quotation by Pseudo-Ambrose (de Sacramentis, iv. 6), who was probably a Gallican bishop, Ambrose of Cahors, of the age of Charlemagne (Oudin, de Script. Eccl. i. 1827). As the Gallican books were at that time being suppressed in favour of the Roman, we probably have in this prayer a part of the Roman canon above cited varied with a view to conform it to a familiar Gallican formulary. This is made more probable by the fact that the prayer in Pseudo-Ambrose continues to resemble the Roman canon from the point indicated, while it becomes wholly unlike the Gallican Post Mysterium. There is no express prayer of oblation in the old canon of Milan, which after the words of institution proceeds thus: "Haec facimus, haec celebramus, tua, Domine, praecepta servantes, et ad communionem inviolabilem hoc ipsum, quod corpus Domini, sumimus, mortem Dominicam nuntiamus. Tuum vero est, Omnipotens Pater, mittere nunc nobis unigenitum Filium tuum, quem inquaerentibus sponte misisti" (Murat. Lit. Lat. Vet. Dissert. i. 133).

[W. E. S.]

OBLATIONS (oblationes, munera, dona, δῶρα, προσφοραί). The presentation of offerings of various kinds and under several names is recognised by the earliest Christian writers as one of the proper functions of bishops and priests. Thus, Clement of Rome, "It will be no small sin in us, if we cast out of the overseership (ἐπισκοπῆς) those who have offered the gifts blamelessly and holily" (Epist. ad Cor. 44). This passage may be illustrated from the so-called Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 5; see Bunsen, Analecta Ante-Nicaena, ii. 379). Laymen were also said to offer. Here we need only quote a remark of Hilary the Deacon, who wrote about 360: "Quamvis enim proprio sacerdos fungatur officio, ille tamen offerre dicitur cujus nomine agit sacerdos. Ipsi enim imputatur cujus munera offeruntur" (Quaest. ex Vet. Test. 46; in App. 3 ad Opp. S. Aug. ed. Ben.). Hence, frequently in the Roman secretae, or prayers super oblata, such expressions as these, "Munera populi Tui" (Vig. S. Joh. Bapt.); "Oblationes famulorum famularumque Tuarum" (Dom. 7 post Pent.); "Oblationes populi Tui" (S. Jac. Ap. Nat.), &c.

The present article treats of the gifts or oblations above mentioned, and of the rules and usages that prevailed with regard to them. On the anthem sung during the reception of the altar oblations, see OFFERTORIUM.

I. Oblations of Bread and Wine.—A part of the oblation of the people from the first were bread and wine. Thus St. Irenaeus, 167, tells us that, as God "gave to the people (of the Jews) a precept that they should make oblations, ... so does He now will that we also should offer on the altar often, without ceasing" (Haer. iv. 18, § 6). The 3rd apostolical canon forbids bishops or priests to "offer on the altar" (with some exceptions named) "anything beyond what was appointed by the Lord to be offered at the sacrifice." The council of Carthage, 397, renewing this prohibition, adds, in explanation, "that is, bread and wine mixed with water" (can. 24; in Cod. Afric. 37). In the Acta of Theodotus, the martyr of Ancyra, 303, we read that the governor of Galatia ordered all bread and wine to be polluted by contact with things offered to idols, "so that not even to God, the Lord of all, could a pure oblation be presented" (Bolland, May 18, p. 152; Ruinart, Acta Sinc. Mart. vii. 298). Martin of Bracara, 569, in his collection from the Greek canons, inserts a prohibition like that of Carthage, but makes no exception: "It is not lawful for anything to be offered in the sanctuary but bread and wine and water" (55; Conc. Hard. iii. 397). The council of Mâcon, 585, finding the ancient rite neglected, "decreed that on every Lord's day an oblation of the altar should be offered by all, men and women, both of bread and wine" (can. 4; comp. Pseudo-Fabian, Hard. Conc. i. 1797). The council of Nantes, assigned by Pagi to the year 660, speaks of the "oblations which are offered by the people" for the sacrament, and "of the loaves which the faithful offer at the church," and directs their use (can. ix.). According to the Ordo Romanus, "the people give their offerings, that is, bread and wine" (Ord. ii. 6; Mus. Ital. ii. 46). So a rubric in the Gregorian Sacramentary printed by Pamelius: "After that the offertory is sung, and the oblations and wine are offered by the people" (Liturgicon, ii. 178). After the 8th century, at least, bishops inquired at their visitation, "if men and women offered an oblation, that is, bread and wine, at masses; and if the men did not, whether their wives did it for them, for themselves, and all belonging to them, as it is contained in the canon" (Regino, de Discipl. Eccl. ii. v. 89; see Conc. Matisc. A.D. 585, can. 4). Amalarius of Metz, 827: "The people make their oblations, i.e. bread and wine, after the order of Melchizedec" (De Eccl. Off. iii. 19).

II. Similar Oblations offered for the Dead.—(1) These were primitive, but the motive changed after the 3rd century. At first the eucharist was celebrated at the funeral, or at some other time after the death of a person in full communion as an act of thanksgiving for his victory. Oblations were brought to these celebrations by the friends of the deceased; but we do not find that any thought of benefit to him from these offerings was then entertained. See for information connected with the subject of this section, OBSEQUIES, §§ xxix.–xxxv.

We must distinguish between these oblations, a part of which served to the celebration of the sacrament, and those which were designed for the feast of the commemoration. It is to the latter that St. Augustine refers, when he says, "Oblationes pro spiritibus dormientium quas vere aliquid adjuvare credendum est, super ipsas memorias non sint sumtuosae," &c. (Epist. 22 ad Aurel. 6). These were of the nature of alms, being given to the poor on behalf of the deceased. See OBSEQUIES, § xxvi.

(2) Among the prayers of oblation to be said privately at the offertory in the collection of eucharistic prayers known as the Missa Illyrici are three to be said "pro defunctis," and one both for living and dead. They begin thus, "Suscipe, Sancta Trinitas, hanc oblationem quam tibi offero pro anima," &c. (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. 12, ord. 4). The MS. is not older than the 10th century, but the prayers may be earlier. None of them have been adopted for open use in the Missae Defunctorum of the church of Rome. The same prayer occurs in the Codex Ratoldi (who died 986), before the Super oblata (Ménard, in Sacram. Greg. Opp. Greg. Ben. iii. 486).

There was evidently at a somewhat early period a temptation to defraud the dead of their oblations. The council of Carthage, 398, implies that the surviving friends were sometimes guilty of this: "Let them who either refuse to the churches the oblations of the departed or give them with difficulty be excommunicated, as persons who starve the needy" (can. 95). The 4th canon of Vaison, 442, dwells on this crime at some length, and orders the offenders to be "cast out of the church as unbelievers." The 47th of the council of Arles, 452, adopts by name the decree of Vaison. See to the same effect Conc. Matiscon. 581, can. 4. It is probable that many of those who withheld the usual offerings were influenced by the teaching of Aërius, who rejected all prayer and offerings for the departed (Epiphan. adv. Haer. lxxv. 3).

(3) The very nature of the sacrament implies that many might be commemorated under one oblation. Yet we are told of some who doubted this (Walafr. Strabo, de Reb. Eccl. 22). A similar error seems to have required correction in the East; for a canon of Nicephorus of Constantinople declares that "he does not sin who offers one oblation for three persons" (can. 11; Monum. Graec. Cotel. iii. 446).

III. From whom and for whom received.—(1) Epiphanius, 368, tells us generally that the church "receives oblations from those who commit no injustice, and are not transgressors of the law, but live in righteousness" (De Fide, 24). The bishop was to decide on the fitness of an offerer. Constit. Apost. iv. 6: "It behoves the bishop to know whose oblations he ought to receive and whose not." Disqualifications for baptism would also be disqualifications for offering. Among these were the professions of the actor, charioteer, gladiator, racer, fencing-master, olympic, piper, harper, lyrist, dancer, astrologer, &c. (Const. Ap. viii. 32; Coptic, vi. 78; Tattam. 167).

The oblations of all non-communicants were rejected. "Bishops ought not to receive gifts from him who does not communicate" (Conc. Illib. 313, can. 28). In fact, with one exception, they were not present when the offerings were made (Conc. Valent. 524, can. 1). The consistentes [PENITENCE] formed the one exception. They were present, but could not offer.

Persons not in charity were forbidden to offer as well as to receive. See Optatus (De Schism. Donat. vi. 1); the council of Carthage, 398 (can. 93); the council of Toledo, 675 (can. 4; and Capit. Reg. Fr. vii. 242); Gregory II. A.D. 715 (Capitulare, 11).

By the 94th canon of Carthage, 398, the priests are to reject the oblations of those who oppress the poor. It was for an act of tyranny that the offering of Valens at Caesarea, 393, was not received by St. Basil (Greg. Naz. Orat. 43 and 52).

(2) With regard to the oblations of the dead, the general principle is thus stated by Leo, A.D. 440: "Horum causa Dei judicio reservanda est... Nos autem quibus viventibus non communicavimus, mortuis communicare non possumus" (Epist. ii. ad Rust. 8; comp. Ep. lxxxiii. ad Theod. 3). St. Cyprian ordered that "no oblations should be made for the falling asleep" of one who had, in contravention of the canons, made a presbyter his executor, and he says that this was in accordance with the practice of his predecessors (Epist. i. ad Furnit.). See OBSEQUIES, § xl.

IV. The Sacramental Bread and Wine taken out of these Oblations.—St. Cyprian, reproving a rich woman who brought no offering herself, says that she "took part of the sacrifice which a poor person offered" (De Opere et Eleemos.) St. Augustine: "The priest receives from thee that which he may offer for thee" (Enarr. in Psalmos, 129, § 7). St. Caesarius, 506: "Offer oblations to be consecrated on the altar. A man able to afford it ought to blush, if he has communicated from the oblation of another" (Serm. 66, § 2). In John the Deacon's Life of Gregory the Great is the story of a woman who was corrected by a miracle for smiling in disbelief, when she heard the oblation, which she recognised as made by herself, called "the body of the Lord" (ii. 41). In the Ordo Romanus of the 9th century, the archdeacon takes from the whole mass of oblations, "et ponit tantas (oblatas) super altare quantae possint populo sufficere" (Ord. iii. § 13; Mus. Ital. ii. 57). And somewhat later: "Accipiat (diaconus) ex ipsis oblatis quantum ei videtur; et ponat desuper altare" (v. 8; ibid. 67). Compare Pseudo-Clement, Ep. ad Jacob. in Hard. Conc. i. 50. Hincmar of Rheims, 852, provides for the use of those "oblates which are offered by the people, and are more than are required for the consecration" (Capit. i. c. 7).

V. In what Vessels offered and received.—In the West the bread was presented by the offerer in a fanon of white linen, and received in a vessel or cloth called offertorium (see FANON (3), vol. i. p. 661, and OFFERTORIUM, (2) (3)). The wine was brought in amulae [AMA, vol. i.

p. 71], and poured into a "calix major" [CHALICE, ib. p. 340]; whence, if the offerings were large, it was transferred, if necessary, to a SCYPHUS.

VI. Where these Oblations were received.—It is probable that at first all who offered bread and wine, and perhaps oblations of various other kinds, drew near to the altar and there presented their gifts to the deacons. Thus, in the East, Dionysius of Alexandria, A.D. 254, speaks of a layman "going to" and "standing at the table" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 9). The same writer implies that, except at certain times, even women "went up to the holy table" (Epist. ad Basil. 2). In the 4th century, however, we find a different rule. The council of Laodicea, probably in 365 (can. 19), after settling the time at which the laity shall "give the peace, and so the oblation be celebrated," adds, "And it is lawful for those in holy orders alone to enter the altar-place" (θυσιαστήριον; see Voigtius, de Altaribus, ii. 28). Another canon (44) of the same council forbids women to enter it. The council in Trullo, 691: "Let it not be permitted to any one whomsoever among the laity to go into the sacred altar-place" (can. 69). There was an exception, however, "in accordance with a very old tradition," in favour of the emperor, "when he should desire to offer gifts to the Creator" (ibid.). Evidence of the alleged tradition occurs in the story of Theodosius, 390, who at Constantinople not only "brought his gifts to the holy table," but was expected to remain within the inclosure (Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. v. 18). Theodosius the Younger, in 431, says of himself: "We draw near to the most holy altar for the oblation of the gifts only" (Edict. Labb. Conc. iii. 1237). Turning to the West, we find Theodosius at Milan, 390, "when the time summoned to offer the gifts for the holy table, rising up and going on to the sacrarium" (τῶν ἀνακτόρων; Theodoret, u. s.). In France, in the 6th century, the laity communicated in the chancel, and therefore, we infer, offered there. Thus the council of Tours, 567: "Let the holy of holies be open to laymen and women, that they may pray there and communicate, as the custom is" (can. 4). Theodulf of Orleans, 797, says: "Let not women on any account draw near to the altar when the priest is celebrating mass, but stand in their places, and let the priest receive their oblations there to offer them to God" (Capitu ad Presbyt. 6). Laymen are only cautioned lest they provoke the fate of Uzzah (ibid.). In the fifth book of the Capitularies of the French Kings (collected about 845) is a law, not traced to any earlier source, which orders that "notice shall be given to the people that they offer oblations to God every Lord's day, and that the said oblations will be received outside of the inclosure of the altar" (c. 371). Similarly, Herard of Tours, 858, cap. 72. At Rome, 730, at a pontifical mass, we find the oblations of the nobles received in the senatorium ("quod est locus principum"; Ord. Rom. iii. 12), those of the rest of the people in the body of the church, the receivers going first to the men's side and then to the women's (Ord. Rom. i. 13; comp. ii. 9; iii. 12; v. 8). The priests and deacons offered last, and "before the altar" (ii. 9). "They alone," says Amalarius, "approach the altar whose ministry is about the altar" (Ecloga, 19). Somewhat later the laity seem to have gone all to one place to present their offerings; for the revised Ordo says: "Let him (the bishop) be led by a presbyter and the archdeacon to the place where the oblations are offered by the faithful laity, whether men or women" (Ord. v. 9).

VII. Prayer of the Offerer.—It is to be supposed that a devout worshipper would always say a silent prayer when presenting his gift. In the collection known as the Missa Illyrici some short forms are suggested for use at this time (Martene, Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. 12, ord. iv.).

VIII. By whom received from the Offerers.—In general the oblations were taken, not by the celebrant, but by a deacon or sub-deacon, if present. None of the ministers of Basil, we are told, came forward to receive the oblations of Valens, because they did not know his mind about them (Greg. Naz. Orat. 43, § 52); from which it is clear that it was at that time no part of the bishop's duty to take them even from the hand of the emperor. Isidore of Seville, A.D. 610: "The sub-deacons receive the oblations from the faithful in the temple of God" (Etymol. vii. xii. 25; De Eccl. Off. ii. 10; Amalar. de Eccl. Off. ii. 11; Raban. Maur. de Institt. Cler. i. 8; Conc. Aquisgr. A.D. 816, i. 6). In an "Allocutio ad Subdiaconum Ordinandum," in the missal of the Franks, it appears to be implied that the sub-deacon not only received the oblations, but separated at his discretion as much as would be required for the communicants (Liturg. Gall. Mabill. 303). Pseudo-Clement, in the 8th or 9th century, speaks of the "minister of the altar," i.e. in strictness, the deacon, as "taking the oblation of the holocaust from the offerers" (Epist. ad Jacob. Hard. Conc. i. 50). In a pontifical mass at Rome in the 8th century the oblations of bread offered by the nobles were received by the bishop himself, the archdeacon following to receive the AMULAE. The regionary sub-deacon took the loaves from the pontiff and gave them to another sub-deacon, by whom they were placed in a larger sheet of linen ("corporale, id est sindonem," Ord. Rom. ii. 9; "lineum pallium," v. 8) held by two acolytes. The amulae were emptied by the archdeacon into a flagon (scyphus) carried by an acolyte. The other offerings of bread were received by the bishop whose weekly turn it was, who himself put them into the sindon borne after him. A deacon takes the amulae, and pours their contents into a scyphus (Ord. Rom. i. § 13; comp. ii. 9; iii. 12; v. 8). But Remigius of Auxerre, A.D. 880, represents the priest as taking the oblations, though he supposes a deacon present: "Suscipit interim (while the offertory is being sung) sacerdos a populo oblata" (De Celebr. Miss. ad calc. Pseudo-Alcuin. de Div. Off.). So Ahyto of Bâle, 811, directs that, "when the oblates are offered by the women, they be received by the presbyters at the chancel screen, and so brought to the altar" (Capitula 16).

IX. By whom set on the Altar.—In the West this was the office of the deacon. Thus Isidore says that it belongs to the Levites "oblationes inferre et disponere" (Epist. ad Leudefr. 8; comp. Etymol. vii. xii. 23; Conc. Aquisgr. 816, i. 7); i.e. "inferunt oblationes in altaris, com-ponunt mensam Domini" (De Eccl. Off. ii. 8). It was thought that the propriety of this usage was indicated by the fact that the first deacons were chosen to "serve tables" (De Eccl. Off. iii. 19). Rabanus says: "Levitae offerunt oblationes in altaria" (De Instit. Cler. i. 7; comp. with Isid. above). At Rome, in a pontifical mass in the 8th century, the archdeacon, receiving the oblates from the sub-deacons, set them on the altar. Then he takes the bishop's amula, and pours the contents through a strainer into a chalice, and similarly those of the deacons. The sub-deacon receives the water offered by the choir from the precentor, and "pours it crosswise into the chalice." Next, the bishop, going to the altar, takes the oblates from the presbyter of the week and the deacons. The archdeacon then takes the bishop's oblates from the oblationary (sub-deacon), and gives them to the bishop, who sets these on the altar himself. The archdeacon then takes the chalice from the regionary sub-deacon, and, putting the OFFERTORIUM through the handles, sets it on the altar near the bishop's oblates on the right (Ord. Rom. i. 14, 15; comp. ii. 9; iii. 14, 15; v. 8; vi. 9).

In the East this appears to have been generally the part of the celebrant. The Apostolical canons imply as much when they forbid bishops and presbyters to bring and set on the altar (προσφέρειν ἐπὶ τὸ θυσιαστήριον) anything but bread, wine, &c. (can. 3). The Clementine liturgy says: "Let the deacons bring the gifts to the bishop at the altar" (Constit. Apost. viii. 12). The liturgy of St. James: "The priest bringing in the holy gifts says this prayer" (of oblation, Assem. Codex Liturg. v. 17). In the Syrian offices the celebrant "brings the eucharistic bread on to the altar" (Liturg. Orient. Coll. Renaud. ii. 3), and the same usage prevails among the Copts and Abyssinians (ibid. i. 185–188). The Nestorian rites vary (Badger's Nestorians, ii. 218; Neale, Introd. Hist. East. Ch. 436). In the later Greek liturgy, at the "great entrance" the deacon brings in the paten, the priest the chalice; but the latter sets both on the holy table (Eucholog. Goar, 73).

X. By whom presented to God.—Deacons, as we have seen, might set the oblations on the altar, but only a bishop or priest could offer them to God. "Deacons have no authority to offer" (Conc. Nic. 325, can. 18). The principle was that "exordium ministerii a summo est sacerdote" (Pseudo-Ambr. de Sacram. iii. i. § 4); and as the power of the priest himself was derived, he could not delegate it. "Apart from the bishop," says Ignatius the martyr, "it is not lawful to baptize or to celebrate an agape," which included the eucharist (Ad Smyrn. 7), where the interpolator has, "or to offer, or to bring sacrifice, or to celebrate a feast." Hence priests were forbidden to "celebrate masses" in any diocese without the sanction of the bishops (Conc. Vernense, 755, can. 8). The bishop was the offerer by himself or by the priest, and therefore in the language of the earliest period a good bishop was one who "offered the gifts blamelessly and holily" (Clem. Rom. Epist. i. 44).

XI. How offered by the Celebrant. Prayers of Oblation.—At first "the whole of that action was accomplished in silence" (Bona, Rer. Liturg. ii. viii. § 2; Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. vi. 16; and others). It must not be inferred, however, that the primitive church did not regard the action of the celebrant with respect to the unconsecrated gifts as a distinct offering of them to God. It only means that such an oblation was not verbally made when they were set on the altar, though implied in the long eucharistic prayer which immediately followed. St. Irenaeus expressly says that Christ, in instituting the sacrament, "taught the new oblation of the New Testament, which the church throughout the world offers to God who gives us aliments—the first-fruits of His gifts in the New Testament" (c. Haer. iv. 17, § 5). "This pure oblation the church alone offers to the Creator, offering it to Him of His own creature with thanksgiving" (ibid. 18, § 4). Hence it is evident that he who said the eucharistic prayer was believed to offer the elements to God. Such an oblation is assumed, though not expressed, in the long preface (the original εὐχαριστία) of the Clementine Liturgy. All other liturgies have a distinct prayer of oblation introduced, as we must suppose, at some later period. It is always said by the celebrant, and was probably at first only a clearer expression of an oblation of the good creatures of God then lying before him. This is evidently the meaning of the earlier and simpler forms; but the later, as will be seen, introduce thoughts which must appear entirely out of place. We will begin with those which are true to their original intention. In St. Mark, after the cry of the deacon, "Pray for the offerers," "the priest says the prayer of proposition," in which is the following petition, "Cause Thy face to shine upon this bread and on these cups which the all-holy table receives through the ministry of angels and attendance of archangels and service of the priesthood" (Renaud. i. 143). This is only a prayer for the acceptance of the gifts expressed in a lofty style, nor can we see more than this in St. James: "Thyself bless this offering" (πρόθεσιν; comp. Heb. ix. 2; Matt. xii. 4), "and receive it on to Thine altar above the heavens" (Assem. u. s.). In St. Basil's "prayer of oblation" (εὐχὴ προσκομιδῆς) the celebrant prays chiefly for himself that he may rightly fulfil his office, but also for the acceptance of the offerings, "Of Thy goodness, O Lord, receive these gifts from the hands of us sinners" (Goar, 164). In St. Chrysostom, however, which has long been the common liturgy of the Greeks, the prayer would be more suitable after the consecration, for it is an invocation [EPICLESIS], "that this our sacrifice may be acceptable unto Thee, and that the good spirit of Thy grace may make His abode on us, and on these gifts, and on all Thy people" (Goar, 74).

In all the Eastern liturgies of later revision there is the same tendency that we observe in St. Chrysostom, to anticipate the consecration, or to confound the previous oblation of the elements with that of the sacramental body and blood. Thus in the Armenian: "Do Thou to whom we bring this sacrifice accept this offering from us and make it the mystery of the body and blood of Thine only begotten Son, and grant unto us who are partakers of them that this bread and wine may be for the healing and pardoning of our sins" (Neale, u. s. 444).

In the West there was no unvarying verbal oblation of the elements until after the 12th century (Microl. A.D. 1160, De Eccl. Observ. 11). Five have become of obligation since, viz. (1), "Suscipe, Sancte Pater, omnipotens æterne Deus, hanc immaculatam hostiam," &c.; (2), "Offerimus Tibi," &c.; (3), "in spiritu humilitatis," &c. (which appear to be borrowed from Spain; Miss. Mozar. Leslie, 2, 232; see below); (4), "Veni Sanctificator," &c. (which is Gallican; Microl. u. s. 11; see below); and (5), "Suscipe, Sancta Trinitas," &c., which is both Ambrosian (Pamel. Rituale PP. i. 298) and Gallican (Microl. u. s.; see below). Long, however, before any of these prayers are known to have been even in private use, there was a variable collect in the sacramentaries, called in the Gelasian the secreta ("because it is said secretly"; Amal. de Off. Eccl. iii. 20); and in the Gregorian either secreta or oratio super oblata, in which the oblations were directly or indirectly offered. The following is an example from the so-called Leonian sacramentary: "We beseech Thee, O Lord, that the gifts of Thy people may be acceptable to Thee through the intercessions of the blessed apostles (SS. Peter and Paul); that as they are offered to Thy Name for their triumphs, so they may be perfected by their merits; through," &c. (Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 330).

During the whole office of oblation an anthem of three verses was sung; the first of which, called the OFFERTORY, was repeated between the second and the third until the offerings were all brought up, and the celebrant said "Orate" (Ord. Rom. ii. 9). "In offerendis revertuntur versus, dum offerenda repetitur" (Remig. Autiss. in Pseudo-Alcuin, de Div. Off. 40). See examples in Antiphonarium Gregor. (Opp. iii. 653 et seq., ed. Ben.).

In the Milanese rite the celebrant says in a loud voice, "Receive, most merciful Father, this holy bread, this cup, wine mixed with water, that it may become the body, the blood, of Thine only begotten," &c. (Pamel. u. s. 297). This is followed by later prayers said secretly, and by a variable "Oratio super Oblata alta voce dicenda" (see MISSA VIII. (2) (c)), which corresponds, though said aloud, to the Roman secreta. In the Gallican liturgies, suppressed in the 8th century, there is no constant form of oblation; there was, however, a Collectio post Nomina corresponding to the secreta of Rome. See examples in Missa VIII. (3) (e). The Mozarabic priest says four distinct prayers of oblation: (1) over the bread and cup, "May this oblation . . . which we offer for our sins, be acceptable to Thy Majesty," &c.; (2) over the cup only, "We offer unto Thee, O Lord, this cup for the benediction of the blood of Thy Son," &c.; (3) setting the cup on the altar and placing the veil (filiolam) over it, he says, "We beseech Thee, O Lord, graciously to accept this oblation, and to pardon the sins of all the offerers for whom it is offered unto Thee, through," &c.; (4) "In spiritu humilitatis," &c. (Leslie, u. s.), of which "Veni . . . Sanctificator" (above) is in this liturgy a continuation. The sacrificium (the Mozarabic offertory) is then sung; some prayers of preparation follow, and the celebrant having said, "Offerunt Deo Domino sacerdotes nostri, Papa Romensis et reliqui, pro se," &c., and read the names of those commemorated, this part of the liturgy closes with the Oratio post Nomina (see Missa viii. (4) (d)).

We observe in many of these Latin prayers of oblation the same departure from their original intention that was noticed in several of the Eastern forms. Thus in the Roman Missal we have, "Receive this immaculate host" which I offer . . . for my numberless sins," &c. Similarly in a Mozarabic Post Nomina (Leslie, 39). For attempted explanations see Bona, Rer. Lit. ii. ix. 3; Le Brun, Explic. de la Messe. iii. vi. 2; Romsée, Sens. Rit. Miss. xiv. 5; and others. They amount to this: "Qu'en commençant à offrir le pain nous parlons déjà comme si nous offrions cette hostie sans tache qui est l'unique, dont l'offrande puisse nous laver de nos péchés" (Le Br.). Many Roman secretae contain a similar assumption (Sacr. Greg. ii. 46). Similar incongruities occur in Gallican collects Post Nomina (Miss. Goth. 191).

It may be conjectured that the foregoing anomalies first made their appearance when an attempt was made in an age of decaying learning and intelligence to simplify, by breaking up and rearranging, the prolongèd eucharistia, which originally embraced both the oblation of the gifts when brought to the celebrant, and all that belonged to, and was connected with, the subsequent consecration.

XII. The Remainder of the Consecrated Oblations.—No uniform mode of disposing of them prevailed during any part of our period either in the East or West. For a considerable time a part was sent to the absent, and a part taken away by the communicants for daily use at home. [RESERVATION.] A part was also in some places, from the 6th to the 8th century inclusive, sent to other churches, as FERMENTUM. We have to speak here of the part that still remained when due provision had been made for these purposes. Evagrius, near the end of the 6th century, tells us that "it was an ancient custom in the royal city (Constantinople), whenever a large quantity of the holy particles of the undefiled body of Christ, our God, was left over, for uncorrupted boys of those that attended the school of the undermaster to be sent for to consume them" (Eccl. Hist. iv. 36). From the testimony of Nicephorus Callistus, who had himself, when a boy at that school, communicated in this manner, we learn that the custom survived till the earlier part of the 14th century, if not later (Hist. Eccles. xvii. 25). At Jerusalem, however, as we know from the authority of Hesychius the patriarch, 601, "whatever happened to be left unconsumed was given to the fire," as were the remains of the sacrifices mentioned in Exod. xii. 10 (Explan. in Levit. (viii. 32) ii.). In the West the council of Mâcon, 585, decreed that "whatever remains of the sacrifices shall be left in the sacrarium after the mass is ended, innocent children be brought to the church by him whose office it is on the Wednesday or Friday, and, a (subsequent) fast having been prescribed them [FASTING, § 8], receive the said remains sprinkled with wine"

* This phrase occurs with proper application in a Gallican Post Secreta, and, therefore, after the consecration: "Offerimus tibi, Domine, hanc immaculatam hostiam . . . Obsecrantes ut infundere digneris Spiritum tuum sanctum edentibus nobis," &c. (Miss. Goth. in Lit. Gall. 298.)

(can. 6). The following order occurs in one of the forged decretals about 830, but probably derived from an earlier document: "But if any shall remain, let them not be reserved till the morrow, but consumed by the care of the clerks, with fear and trembling. But let not those who consume the remains of the Lord's body that have been left in the sacrarium come together immediately to take common food," &c. (Epist. Clem. ad Jac.: Hard. Conc. i. 50; see the same as Praecepta Petri in S. Leon. Opera, ed. Baller. iii. 674). That this latter usage was widely spread in the West we may infer from the appearance of the above passage from Pseudo-Clemens in Regino (de Eccl. Discipl. i. 195; Burchard, Decr. v. 11; and Gratian, Decr. iii. De Consecr. ii. 23).

XIII. Disposal of the Unconsecrated Surplus.—The Apostolical Constitutions (both texts): "The eulogiae that are over and above in the mystic rites let the deacons distribute among the clergy, according to the discretion of the bishop or the presbyters — to the bishop, four parts; to a presbyter, three parts; to a deacon, two parts; and to the rest, subdeacons, or readers, or singers, or deaconesses, one part" (viii. 31; in the Coptic Canons of the Apostles, tr. Tattam, c. 75). They are here called eulogiae, because blessed through being offered. Theophilus of Alexandria, A.D. 385: "Let the clerks divide those things which are offered on account of the sacrifice (that remain) after those consumed for the use of the mysteries, and let not a catechumen eat or drink thereof, but rather the clerks and the faithful brethren with them" (can. 7; Hard. Conc. i. 2000). These oblations are spoken of under the name of eulogiae by Socrates, who says that Chrysanthus, the Novatian bishop at Constantinople, "received nothing from the churches, only taking two loaves of the eulogiae on the Lord's day" (Eccl. Hist. vii. 2). John Moschus, A.D. 630, relates the story of a monk who, being employed to distribute eulogiae, "which the deacons had set on the holy altar," happened to say over them the words of consecration, and thus, as it was afterwards revealed, unintentionally consecrated them (Prat. Spirit. 25).

We have less distinct information of the disposal of the superfluous oblations at an early period in the West. The earlier drafts of the Ordo Romanus tell us nothing; but from Ordo vi. (Mabill.) we learn that, after all the oblations of the clergy and people had been placed on the altar, fresh loaves were brought to the archdeacon, from which the bishop took what he thought proper for consecration, and then gave all the rest back to the archdeacon, "who gave them in charge to the custos of the church for safe keeping" (§ 9). This belongs to a period at which fewer communicated than during the 7th century. We are not told how these remains were employed, but it is probable that in the West the superfluous oblations of a festival served for the celebrations of other days; for we are told in the Life of St. Augustine, by Possidius, that he would sometimes in church admonish the faithful for "their neglect of the gazophylacium and secretarium, from which the things needful for the altar are brought in" (24). According to St. Ambrose, the custos was a deacon: "Haec quanti consilii sit prospicere, non ignoratis. Et ideo eligitur Levita qui sacrarium custodiat" (De Off. Min. i. 50, § 265). Gifts for the altar were put into the SACRARIUM or SECRETARIUM; those for the poor, the clergy, or the church, into the GAZOPHYLACIUM.

As the excess of bread and wine offered for the sacrament gradually decreased, so it ceased to form part of the ordinary provision for the clergy, and was distributed only as a token of communion, or blessed for the antidoron. [EULOGIAE.] This last application is expressly ordered by the council of Nantes, perhaps in 657 (can. 9; Hard. vi. 459), and after it by Hincmar, 852 (Ad Presbyt. 7).

XIV. Other Altar Oblations.—The third apostolical canon, as we have it, after forbidding anything but what Christ appointed to be offered on the altar (naming HONEY AND MILK [see vol. i. p. 783; Tertull. de Cor. Mil. 3; Id. adv. Marc. i. 14; Clem. Alex. Paedag. i. vi. 50, 51; Hieron. adv. Lucif. 8; Joan. Diac. Epist. ad Senar. (12) in Mus. Ital. i. 75; Sacram. Leon. in Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 318; Ratoldi Pontif. in Ménard, Sacram. Greg. n. 338; Ordo Romanus in Hittorp. 87; Apost. Const. Copt. ii. 46, Tattam's tr. 62; or Boetticher's in Bunsen's Analecta Antenicaena, ii. 468; Ordo Bapt. Aethiop. in Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. i. xv. 16], "sicera, birds, or any living things, or legumes"), adds, "except new grains or grapes in their season" [FRUITS, OFFERING OF]. The second book of the Coptic Canons of the Apostles, the Coptic form of the Constitutions, permits "the blessing of the grape, the fig, the pomegranate, the olive, the prune, the apple, the peach, the cherry, and the almond." Again: "It shall be that they shall offer flowers: let them offer a rose and the lily" (c. 54; Tattam's tr. p. 74; or Boetticher's, u. s. 471). The Greek canon proceeds: "But let it not be permitted to offer anything else upon the altar, in the time of the holy oblation, than oil for the lamp [OIL] and incense" (Beveridge, Works, xi. xxxix. Oxf. 1848). [INCENSE, Vol. I. pp. 830, 831.] Oil for another purpose—viz. for the unction after baptism—was offered at the altar in Africa before the probable date of the above canon. Thus St. Cyprian, 255, speaks of chrism as "the oil hallowed on the altar" (Epist. 70). Much later, in Pseudo-Dionysius, the bishop "takes the μύρον, and sets it on the holy altar" (De Eccl. Hier. iv. 2). According to the Ordo Romanus, however, this oil was brought "ante altare," and there consecrated (Ord. i. 31; app. 7).

XV. Deeds of Gift, &c. laid on the Altar, or held before or over it.—By a law of the Frank king Dagobert, A.D. 630, all free persons who gave aught "to the church for the ransom of their soul," "vills, lands, serfs, or any money," were to confirm the gift by an "epistle" under their own hand before six or more witnesses, who were to subscribe the deed. "And then let him place the said epistle on the altar, and so deliver the money itself in the presence of the priest who serves there" (Capit. Reg. Franc. Baluze, i. 95). Sim. Lex Alamannorum, eod. ann. (ibid. 57). In 803 Charlemagne received a petition from his states, in which they asked for greater security for gifts made to the church, on the ground that the donor "makes a writing of those things which he desires to give to God, and holds the writing itself in his hand before or over (coram altari aut supra) the altar, saying to the priests and guardians of the place, 'I offer and dedicate to God all the things which are set down in this paper, for the remission of my sins, and of the sins of my parents and children' (or for whatever he shall wish to make them over to God for), for the service of God out of these things in sacrifices, and celebrations of masses, in prayers, lights, the maintenance of the poor and the clergy, and other forms of service to God, and of usefulness to this church." They were offered under expressed pain of sacrilege if the church were robbed of them (Cap. Baluz. u. s. i. 407; or in the collection of Benedict, vi. 370).

It was probably a very frequent custom to lay valuable gifts of any kind, of small size, on the altar, apart from the eucharistic service, with or without such a deed as is described above. Thus "a devout man" in the 6th century "placed on the altar of the church" of St. Nazaire, near Nantes, a belt most carefully wrought, of the purest gold, with all its furniture. He gave it "ad reficiendos pauperes," but with prayer for the aid of the martyr in his needs (Greg. Turon. de Glor. Mart. 61).

XVI. Oblations not set on the Altar.—"All things that are offered to God are without doubt also consecrated. And not only are the sacrifices which are consecrated to the Lord on the altar called oblations of the faithful; but whatever offerings are offered to Him by the faithful, whether consisting of serfs or arable lands, vineyards, woods, meadows, waters, or watercourses, furniture, books, utensils, stones, buildings, garments, woollen fabrics, cattle, pastures, parchments, movables and immovables, or whatsoever things are done to the praise of God, or can furnish supply and ornament to holy church and her priests, by whomsoever they are of free will offered to God and His church, these all undoubtedly are consecrated to God and belong to the right of the priests" (Capit. ii. Car. Magn. A.D. 814, c. 12; Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 522; in Benedict's collection, vi. 407; Cap. Herardi, 65; Isaac Ling. vii. 7).

(a) Charitable Gifts.—Justin Martyr, in Samaria, A.D. 140, tells us that, when the Christians of his day met on the Sunday for prayer and the holy communion, "those who were prosperous, and wished to do it, gave each as he determined beforehand what he would, and that the collection was laid up with the presiding (elder), who personally relieved orphans and widows and those who were in distress from sickness or any other cause, and those in bonds and strangers sojourning among them, and in a word took care of all who were in any necessity" (Apol. i. 67). Tertullian at Carthage, A.D. 199: "Though there be a sort of (money) chest, the amount in it is not got together from payment as for a religion that is bought. Every person once a month, or when he will, and only if he will and be able, places therein a moderate gift; for no one is forced, but gives it of his own accord. These are, as it were, the deposits of piety; for therefrom are dispensed portions, not for feasts or drinking bouts, or thankless haunts of voracity, but for feeding and burying the needy, and for boys and girls destitute of means and of parents, and for the aged confined now to the house, also for the shipwrecked, and for any who become pensioners on their confession, in the mines or the islands, or in prisons, if only it be for the sake of the way of God" (Apol. 39). Caesarius of Arles, 502, considers it the part of a good Christian, "when he comes to church," to "offer according to his ability money or food for the poor" (Serm. 77, § 2; comp. Serm. 76, § 2). Similarly Pirminius, 750: "Quando ad ecclesiam convenitis, pauperibus secundum vires vestras aut argentum aut aliud aliquid porrigite" (Scarapsus in Vetera Analecta, Mabill. 72; ed. 2). Isidore of Seville, 595, says that it was part of the duty of the archdeacon to "receive the money collected from the communion" (Ep. ad Leudefr. 12).

The fourth apostolical canon, referring to the grapes and corn mentioned in the third, says, "But let every other fruit be sent away into the house (or chamber, οἶκον, the GAZOPHYLACIUM or Domus Ecclesiae, Possid. Vita August. 24), as first-fruits for the bishop and the presbyters, but not brought to the altar." In the Life of St. Augustine (u. s. see above § xiii.) a distinction is made between offerings for the gazophylacium and for the secretarium. We learn there also how the former were applied: "He was always mindful of his companions in poverty, and used to distribute to them from the same source as to himself and all his household, viz. from the revenues of the church, or even from the oblations of the faithful" (23). A feast for the poor was often the object of an oblation. Thus Paulinus, A.D. 405, relates (Poema xx. 317) how a pig was reared with this intention. Two other instances are mentioned by this author in the same poem (lines 67, 389).

(b) Offerings were also made for the furniture of the church, and of a lamb at Easter. [LAMB, OFFERING OF.]

XVII. To whom the Oblations were intrusted.—All oblations of whatever kind were given to the bishop in trust. "That which is collected," says Justin Martyr, "is laid up with him who presides" (Apol. 67). Among the earlier of the apostolical canons are two (39, 41) which place the whole property of the church from whatever source derived in the hands of the bishop in trust for the poor and the clergy, himself included. Hence the precept addressed to the bishops in the Constitutions (ii. 25): "Dispense the offerings to the orphans and widows and afflicted and strangers . . . giving their shares to all in want, and yourselves using the things of the Lord, but not devouring them alone; but sharing them with the needy, be ye without offence before God. . . . It is right for you, O bishops, to be nourished from the things brought into the church; but not to devour them." This is in the purer text also (Bunsen, Analecta Antenicaena, ii. 256). See further under PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH.

OBSEQUIES OF THE DEAD.—The heathen fear of evil, if the body were left unburied or neglected, was unknown to the Christian from the first. "All those things, that is to say, the arrangement of the funeral, the state attendance on the burial, the pomp of obsequies, are rather consolations of the living than advantages to the dead" (Aug. De Civ. Dei, i. 12; so Serm. 172, § 3, and De Cur. pro Mort. ii. § 4; comp. St. Chrysostom, Hom. iv. in Heb. § 5; see after, § viii.). But "not on that account are the bodies of the departed to be spurned and flung aside; and least of all those of the righteous and faithful, of which the Spirit has made use as organs and instruments for the performance of all good works" (De Civ. 13; De Cur. iii. § 5). It was inferred from various references in holy Scripture (Gen. xlvii. 30, l. 2, 24; Tob. ii. 9, xii. 12; &c.), and especially from the narrative of our Lord's burial, that "the bodies of the dead are subjects of the providence of God, to whom even such works of piety are well pleasing" (De Civ. u. s.). But the future resurrection of the body was the chief ground of present care for it; it could not be right, they thought, deliberately to destroy and dissipate that for which God designed a glorious future. Thus Prudentius, Hymn. in Exeq. Defunct. l. 45:—

> "Hinc maxima cura sepulcris
> Impenditur; hinc resolutos
> Honor ultimus accipit artus
> Et funeris ambitus ornat."

1. The Laying-out of the Body.—The first solemn circumstance was the formal composure of the whole body: "They put the hands together, close the eyes, put the head straight, draw down the feet (Pseudo-Chrysost. de Job. Hom. i. § 2). Dionysius of Alexandria, A.D. 254, says that during the plague the Christians of that city "took up the bodies of the saints (who died of it) in their arms and laps, closed their eyes and mouths, carried them on their shoulders, and laid them out," &c. (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 22.) St. Augustine closed his mother's eyes with his own hands (Confess. ix. 12, § 29). Pseudo-Epiphanius, apostrophising Joseph of Arimathea, says: "Dost thou then with thy fingers close, as becomes the dead, the eyes of Jesus, who, with His undefiled finger, opened the eye of the blind? And dost thou close the mouth of Him who opened the mouth of the dumb?" (De Sepulcro Dom. inter Opp. Epiph. iv. 17; ed. Dind.).

II. The Washing.—Rites followed which had long been common to all the more civilised races.

There is a reference to the washing in the case of Dorcas (Acts ix. 37); and the practice was so much a matter of course among Christians that we find Pseudo-Epiphanius (u. s.) and others assuming incidentally that the body of our Lord was so treated. Tertullian alludes to it when he says, "I can be stiff and pale after a bath when dead" (Apol. 42). Gregory Nazianzen asks those who delay their baptism, if they are "waiting that they may be washed when dead" (De Bapt. i. 648). The ceremonial importance of the action in France in the 6th century is evident from the frequency with which it is mentioned by Gregory of Tours, when we can discover no other reason for his noticing it (Hist. Franc. ii. 5; iv. 5; vii. 1; De Glor. Conf. 75; Vitae Patr. xiv. 4). See other examples of men, Hist. Franc. vi. 46; De Glor. Conf. 81; Vitae PP. x. 4 ("corpus sacerdos ablutum recondit in tumulo"); ibid. xiii. 3. Similarly of women, "Having been washed by other women, she was buried" (De Glor. Conf. 16). Miracles are said by Bede to have been wrought by the earth on which the water used in washing the body of St. Cuthbert had been thrown (Vita S. Cuthb.). To come to the end of our period, the body of Charlemagne is said to have been washed "more solemni" (Eginhard. in Vita, c. 9, § 36).

III. The Beard, &c., cut.—At one period there was a custom of shaving the head, at least in France. When the body of St. Eloy, who died about 665, was removed from its first resting-place, "his beard and hair, which had been shaved off according to custom at the time of his death, had grown in the tomb in a wonderful manner" (Vita, auct. Audoen. ii. 47; Dach. Spicil. ii. 116, ed. 1723). A later example occurs in the case of an Angevin bishop, who was buried "barbâ rasâ" (Gesta Gulielmi Maj. c. 1, in Spicil. Dach. ii. 160).

IV. The Body anointed or embalmed.—The next process was to "anoint" the body. This may have been often done with the simple oil, but more frequently, where it could be procured, with a precious unguent, μύρον, which might be, as Galen describes it, only medicated oil (De Methodo Medendi, xi. 16); but sometimes we are to understand that the body was embalmed with various antiseptic gums and spices. When the woman in Matt. xxvi. 7 poured ointment on our Lord's head, He accepted it as done in anticipation of His death, πρὸς τὸ ἐνταφιάσαι με, "with a view to prepare me for burial" (ver. 12). After His death, Nicodemus (John xix. 39, 40) "brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about a hundred pound weight, and wound the body in linen clothes with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury." Afterwards the women who had followed Him from Galilee, probably in ignorance of what had been done, "prepared spices and ointments," ἀρώματα καὶ μύρα, for the same purpose (Luke xxiii. 56). This example would probably have suggested the custom among Christians, had they not inherited it from their Jewish and heathen forefathers.

Tertullian is alluding to this practice when he says, "The Sabaeans will know that merchandise of theirs, more in quantity and more costly, is lavished on the burial of Christians than on the censing of the gods" (Apol. 42). Again, "Let them look to it, if the same objects of trade, frankincense to wit, and other foreign things for sacrifice to idols, are likewise useful to men for medicinal pigments,—to us (Christians) also beside for a solace of burial" (De Idol. 11; see also De Resurr. Carn. 27). Clemens Alexandrinus,

A.D. 192, explaining a mystic interpretation of Matt. xxvi. 7, says incidentally, "For the dead are anointed" (μυρίζονται, Paedag. ii. 8, § 62). In the Octavius of Minutius Felix the heathen objector says, "Ye (Christians) reserve unguents for funerals" (c. 2). In the same century (290) we find a Roman governor threatening a martyr thus, "You imagine that some wretched women are going to embalm your body with spices and ointments? But what I am thinking of is how to destroy your remains" (Acta Tarachi, 7; in Ruinart, Acta Sinc. 385). And many other instances are found.

A sweet odour has often been perceived on the opening of an ancient tomb (see CATACOMBS, Vol. I. p. 309). This arose, without any doubt, from the spices buried with the body, but superstition has regarded it as a proof of the sanctity of the person who occupied the tomb. This was an early opinion. Thus, when the tomb of St. Valerius was opened in 550, the sweet smell was taken to indicate that "a friend of God rested there" (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. 84). So at the discovery of the body of St. Mallonus, the bishop of Cologne, who was present, exclaimed, "I believe in Christ that He is revealing His martyr to me, seeing that this sweet odour has surrounded me" (ibid. 63). Compare also St. Jerome's Life of Hilarion, 46, where he speaks of the body of the saint as "tantis fragrante odoribus ut delibutum unguentis putares." When the tomb of Amantius was opened, an unspeakably sweet odour proceeding from it reached even the people in the porches and courts of the church (Fortunatus in Vita S. Amant. 11). See also Epist.; Luciani de Revel. Stephani Mart. § 9; Eugippus of St. Severin in Res Gest. S. Sev. Baron. Ann. vi. § 10, ad an. 488, &c. For a similar story from Constantinople, see Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. ix. 2. Evagrius supplies another from the East (Hist. Eccl. ii. 3). But they were common everywhere.

V. The Grave-clothes.—The body was always clothed, often in linen only, but sometimes also in the best dress worn in daily life, or in the insignia of office. The custom was traditional, but it received a mystic interpretation, the new dress then put on being said to represent the garment of incorruption in which the body will be clothed when restored to life (Pseudo-Chrysost. de Patientiâ, ix. 808).

1. The body seems to have been generally swathed in linen (see CATACOMBS, p. 309), as might be expected from what we know of the custom of the Jews. Lazarus was "bound hand and foot with grave-clothes" (John xi. 44). "Then took they the body of Jesus, and wound it (ἔδησαν) in linen clothes (ὀθονίοις) with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury" (ibid. xix. 40). St. Matthew (xxvii. 59) and St. Luke (xxiii. 53) say that Joseph "wrapped, or rolled, it in fine linen—ἐνετύλιξεν αὐτὸ σινδόνι" (καθαρᾷ, M.). St. Mark (xv. 46) says, ἐνείλησε τῇ σινδόνι. The custom had been brought from Egypt and retained, though the Jews did not embalm their dead. Words that express the notion of swathing are sometimes used at a later period. Thus the disciples of St. Anthony εἰλίξαντες his body—buried it (Athan. Vita S. Anton. 90). Similarly Dionysius of Alexandria speaks of the Christians of that city as περιστολαῖς κατακοσμοῦντες, in preparation for burial, the bodies of those stricken by the plague (Hist. Eccl. Euseb. vii. 22). In Latin authors the more common word is "obvolvere." In the above two instances the material is not mentioned, but we may assume that it was linen, the use of which was common everywhere, if not universal. To give examples, St. Jerome, speaking of a woman who had been unjustly put to death, says, "They wrap the bloody corpse in a linen cloth" (Epist. ad Innoc. 12). Sixtus III., A.D. 432, "with his own hands dressed" the body of his enemy, Bassus, "with linen clothes and spices" (Anast. Biblioth. Vitae Pont. No. 45). In Gregory of Tours we read of a nun who was buried "induta linteis mundis" (Hist. Franc. vi. 29), and of a bishop who in a vision was told to prepare for his burial by "getting him clean linen clothes" (ii. 5). The linen was sometimes waxed. Thus in one Life of St. Cuthbert we are told that his body was "in sindone cerâ curatum" (Vita, iii. iv. 13; Bolland. Mart. 20). The body of St. Ansbert, archbishop of Rouen, A.D. 698, "magna fidei ambitione vestitum est, ac desuper linteis ceratis obvolutum" (Aigrad. in Vita Ansb. 9; Boll. Feb. 9). In a later instance we read of a "shirt (camisale) covered with wax" carefully put on the body of the deceased (St. Udalric), "lest the priestly apparel in which he was clad should be quickly destroyed by the earth" (Vita S. Udalr. xxvii. 83; Boll. July 4).

2. Among the Romans, while the private citizen was buried in a toga, those in office, even to the lowest vicomagister (Livy, xxxiv. 7), were buried in the dress proper to it. The analogous practice was to some extent adopted among Christians. In the Acta of Peter of Alexandria, martyred in 301, it seems implied that the linen in which he was wrapped was the dress in which he usually officiated (Migne, Ser. Gr. xviii. 464, 5). This is not a contemporary account; but if it be not historically true, it may be taken to shew the custom of the country a century and a half later. St. Cuthbert was "vestimenta sacerdotalia indutus" (Anon. Vita, u. s.). The same thing is related of an Irish bishop named Merolilanus (Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. iv. 48), and of Gebhard of Constance: "Sacerdotalibus, ut moris est, vestibus indutus" (Vita, i. 22; in Ménard, note 880 to Sacram. Gregor.). Of St. Ansbert we read: "As he had been wont to stand at the holy altars of Christ, so the brethren had taken care that he should be clothed" (Aigrad. u. s.). Hadrian I., A.D. 772, was "wrapped in his apostolical ornaments (infulis), as the custom is to bury a Roman bishop" (Vita, in Mus. Ital. i. 41). Observe also the instance of Udalric in the last paragraph. Charlemagne was clad in the imperial vestments, and "his face covered under the diadem with a napkin" (Vita, Auct. Monach. Engol.).

Under this head we may mention an order ascribed to Eutychian, A.D. 275, that no martyr should be buried "without a dalmatic or a purple collobium" (Anast. Vit. Pont. No. 28); such ornaments thus becoming the insignia of martyrdom.

3. A dress more or less costly to shew honour to the deceased, but with no other significance, is often mentioned. Thus when Marinus was martyred at Rome in the reign of Gallienus, Astyrius, a senator, clothed the body "very richly" for the burial (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 16). The remains of Stratonica and Seleucus, A.D. 297, were covered with a silk cloth (S. E. Assemanus, Acta SS. Martyrum, ii. 121). St. Anthony wrapped the body of Paul, the first hermit, in a "pallium" which St. Athanasius had given him (Hieron. in Vita Pauli, § 14). St. Anthony himself, when dead, was wrapped in an old cloak which had also been the gift of Athanasius many years before (St. Ath. in Vita S. Ant. § 91). St. Gregory of Nyssa gives an elaborate account of the manner in which the body of his sister Macrina was prepared for the grave (A.D. 379). It was proposed to bury her in her ordinary dress, but her brother had provided a better. As this was not done to please human eyes, an old black mantle (ἱμάτιον) was thrown over all (De Vita S. Macr. ii. App. 200; Par. 1618). St. Jerome, addressing wealthy Christians, asks: "Why do ye wrap (obvolvitis) your dead in garments covered with gold?" (Vita Pauli, 17.) Of Paula the same father says: "What poor man died who was not wrapped in her garments?" (Epist. 108 ad Eustoch. § 5.) Several times Gregory of Tours mentions that persons of eminence were clothed before burial "dignis vestimentis" (Hist. Fr. iv. 37, 51; De Glor. Conf. 81; Vitae Patrum, xiv. 4, xx. 4). When Chilperic was slain, A.D. 584, a bishop covered his body for burial with "better garments" (Hist. Fr. vi. 46). The Seven Sleepers of Ephesus "to this day rest in the very place (where they were found), covered with clothes of silk or fine linen" (Mirac. i. 95).

4. In the 6th century we first hear of a strange abuse by its prohibition. The council of Auvergne, 533: "It is to be observed that the bodies of the dead be not wrapped in palls or divine services," i.e. cloths used for the service of the altar (can. 3); "Touching the covering of the Lord's body or the pall of the altar, let not the body of a priest, when carried to the tomb, be ever covered with it" (can. 7). The council of Auxerre, A.D. 578: "It is not permitted that the bodies of the dead be wrapped in the veil or in palls" (can. 12). The latter practice is also forbidden by Boniface of Mentz, 743 (can. 20). Nor was the East free from the same superstition. Pseudo-Athanasius, as quoted by John Damascene: "Fail not to burn oil and wax candles at the tomb, though the body be buried in an air," i.e. a eucharistic veil of the largest size (Damasc. Orat. de iis qui in Fide dormierunt, § 19).

5. It is probable that, however the body was dressed, a napkin always concealed the face, as in the scriptural examples (John xi. 44, xx. 7). Of St. Cuthbert we read, "Capite sudario circumdato" (Anon. Vita, iii. u. s.); of St. Ansbert, that "sudarium cerâ litum capiti ejus imponere vellent" (Aigrad. u. s.); and of Charlemagne, "Sudario sub diademate facies ejus operta" (Monach. Engol. u. s.).

6. The richness of the dress and ornaments sometimes buried with the dead was a temptation to thieves. This led to their being cut or torn and otherwise rendered useless before the body was left in the tomb. Thus St. Chrysostom: "A costly burial has often been the cause of the tomb being broken open, and of the body that was buried so carefully being cast out naked and graveless. . . . That this may not happen, many persons tear the fine linen clothes and fill them with many kinds of spices, that they may in two ways be made useless to those who are guilty of such outrage, and so commit them to the earth" (Hom. 85 in S. Joan. Ev. § 5). Examples of such robberies are not wanting. Thus when, in 585, a woman of high rank had been buried at Metz, "with great ornaments and much gold," some young men of her family "uncovered the tomb and took and carried off all the ornaments of the dead body that they could find" (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. viii. 21). When Hadrian I. was buried in the monastery of Nonantula, A.D. 795, some of the monks, thinking that the rich robes with which the body was covered would be better bestowed on their church, "went at night to his sepulchre, and having stripped him of his shining and glittering garments clad him in poorer" (Vita Hadr. in Mus. Ital. i. 41).

VI. Bells tolled.—We first hear of bells in connexion with death in the 7th century; but the notices are scanty. Bede relates that when St. Hilda died, in 673, a nun in a distant monastery founded by the saint, while in her dormitory at night, "suddenly heard in the air the well-known sound of the bell by which they were wont to be roused to prayers or called together when any one of them had been called out of this world" (Hist. Eccl. iv. 23). Here the custom was to toll the bell as soon as the death had taken place. The Life of St. Boniface seems to imply that, in the churches founded by him, the bell was tolled when the corpse was on the way to the grave. The inhabitants of the place, we are told, resisted the removal of his remains, A.D. 755, but suddenly "the bell of the church, touched by no human hand, was put in motion" (Willibaldus, Vita S. Bonif. c. xii. § 38; sim. Othlo in Vita, ii. § 25). This was accepted at once by all as an intimation that the body was to proceed to another place of rest. Sturmius, the founder under Boniface of the great monastery of Fulda, seeing himself in danger, A.D. 770, ordered all the bells of that house to be rung to assemble the monks to pray for him and to receive his last words (Vita, c. 25; Acta Bened. iv. 279). The second council of Cealchythe, A.D. 816, directs that "in every church throughout the parishes," on the death of the bishop, "the signal be immediately struck, and every congregation of the servants of God meet at the basilic" to sing psalms for his soul (can. 10).

VII. Prayers and Psalms before the Funeral.—The body of Constantine was watched day and night as it lay in the palace "in a golden coffin," covered with a purple cloth and surrounded by innumerable lights (Euseb. Vita Const. iv. 66); but we do not read of any religious rite performed at that time. Nor are any prayers or psalms mentioned at this stage in the case of St. Ambrose, though his body lay in state in the great church called by his name (Paulinus in Vita S. Amb. 48).

1. Yet Tertullian, about A.D. 195, speaks of prayer being made at this time: "Cum in pace dormisset, et morante adhuc sepulturâ, interim oratione presbyteri componeretur," &c. (De Animâ, 51). What this "prayer of the presbyter" was does not appear. In the Gelasian Sacramentary are four sets of prayer to be used over the departed. The first group are headed, Orat. post Obitum Hominis; the second, Orat. antequam ad Sepulcrum deferatur (Liturgia Lat. Vet. Murat. i. 747, 9). In the Gregorian Sacramentary (ibid. ii. 213) we find prayers corresponding to the former of the above groups under the heading, Orationes in Agenda Mortuorum quando Anima egreditur de Corpore. After these prayers, psalms (not indicated; in the Vatican Codex, "psalmi congrui," Opp. S. Greg. v. 230, ed. 1615) are sung, and then "dicantur capitula" ("deinde Oratio Dominica et haec versuum capitella," Cod. Vat. u. s.): "In memoriâ," &c. (Ps. cxii. 6, P. B. v.) (after which Cod. Vat. gives "Anima ejus," &c., from Ps. xxv. 12); "Ne tradas bestiis animas," &c. (Ps. lxxiv. 20; see Vulg. lxxiii. 19); "Pretiosa," &c. (Ps. cxvi. 13), for which Cod. Vat. substitutes, "Redimet Dominus animas sanctorum suorum" (derived probably from Ps. xcvii. 10); "Non intres," &c. (Ps. cxliii. 2); "Requiem æternam dona eis, Domine" (derived from 2 Esdr. ii. 34; Vulg. 4, Esdr.). Two prayers follow in this book as given by Muratori, headed Incipiunt Orationes post Lavationem Corporis (215), which correspond to the second set in the Gelasian, as described above. In the Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 41) are prayers bearing a strong general resemblance in matter to the above Western forms, under the title, Προσφώνησις ὑπὲρ τῶν κεκοιμημένων. They seem intended to be introduced by the deacon after the usual suffrages in any service of prayer with the words, "For our brethren who rest in Christ, let us pray." They might be said, apparently, at any time after the death.

The Gelasian prayers mentioned above are found, with some change and omission, in a very ancient MS. preserved at Rheims (printed by Ménard, Sacram. Greg. not. 68), in which they have the following heading: "Incipit Officium pro Defunctis. In primis cantatur Psalmus, In exitu Israel, cum antiphona, vel alleluia." The book appears to have been written in the time of Charlemagne (Praef. x. Opp. Greg. iii. ed. Ben.), when the alleluia was generally in the West no longer thought suitable to a funeral office. It is still sung in the Greek offices (Euchologion, Goar, 526, 527, 531, 535, 553), and in that for priests with frequent repetitions (562, 563, 564, &c.).

2. Testimonies to the use of psalms before the funeral are much more frequent than to the prayers. When Monica died, "Evodius seized a psalter and began to chant the psalm Misericordiam et judicium (the 101st), the whole family responding" (Aug. Conf. ix. 12, § 31). Before the burial of Macrina there was "psalmody throughout the night, as at the vigil of a martyr's festival" (Greg. Nyss. De Vitâ S. Macr. ii. App. 200). St. Jerome tells us that at the death of Paula "not wailings and beatings in the breast were heard, as is the wont among men of this world, but numberless psalms in divers tongues" (Epist. 108 ad Eust. § 29). Even before Fabiola was dead, if we are to take St. Jerome's words to the letter, this chanting had begun: "Psalms sounded, and the alleluia echoing aloft shook the gilded ceilings of the temples" (Ep. 77 ad Oceân. § 11). Earlier in the same century the disciples of Pachomius (cir. 350), "having cared for his venerable body after the custom . . . as was meet, passed the whole night watching, singing psalms and hymns" (Vita, 53; Rosweyd, 138). The 6th century furnishes many instances; e.g. the body of Fulgentius, A.D. 553, placed in the oratory of a monastery, "invited both monks and clerks to watch together that whole night in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs" (Vita, in fine; Surius, Jan. 1). St. Gall, A.D. 554, lay three days in a church, "constant singing of psalms going on" (Greg. Tur. Vitae PP. vi. 7). Similarly St. Salvius (about 560), (Id. Hist. Franc. vii. 1); St. Aridius, 571 (Vita S. Arid. 34; inter Opp. Greg. Tur. 1303); and St. Radegund, 587 (Baudon. in Vita, 27).

VIII. Mourning Habits.—The feeling expressed in the foregoing extracts was carried so far that in many churches, if not in all, mourning-dresses of a dark colour were strongly discouraged. Practically this affected one sex only, at least among the Romans, for their women in mourning already, i.e. from the 1st century, "wore white garments and white head-dresses" (Plutarch, Quaest. Rom. 26). Hence the condemnation of dark colours made a distinction between the Christian and the heathen man, but permitted none between the women. In the former case the principle created the difference; in the latter it was thought more important than the maintenance of it.

St. Cyprian is the earliest writer in whom the objection occurs: "Black garments are not to be assumed here, when they (who have gone before) have put on their robes of white" (De Mortal. 164. ed. Brem.). St. Basil tells one who exhibited such outward signs of grief that he resembled actors in a tragedy: "Like them thou thinkest that the outward condition of things should befit the mourner, a black dress and disordered hair, and darkness in the house, and dirt and dust, and a chant unpleasing to the ear, and that keeps the wound of grief ever fresh in the soul. Leave such things to them that are without hope" (De Grat. Act. ii. 363). St. Chrysostom condemns among other tokens of grief the custom of "covering ourselves with black garments" (Hom. iii. in Ep. ad Phil. § 4; comp. Hom. 62 in S. Joan. Ev. § 4). An unknown but very ancient author, whose tract is preserved in a MS. of the 7th century, asks: "Why do we dye our garments black, unless it is to prove that we are truly unbelieving, not only by our weeping but by our dress?" (De Consol. Mort. Serm. ii. c. 5; in App. Opp. Aug.) Nevertheless this rejection of a dark mourning-dress could hardly have been common among men in the West in the age of St. Augustine and St. Jerome, for the latter, writing in 404, claims praise for a Roman of high rank for having given up his mourning habit (lugubrem vestem) and resumed his white garments (candida vestimenta) at the end of forty days, after the loss of his wife and two daughters within a few days of each other (Epist. 118 ad Julian. 4). In France, when the elder son of Chilperic died, A.D. 580, there was "a great lamentation of all the people; for the men mourning, and the women clad in mourning habits, as the custom is at the obsequies of husbands, in such sort attended this funeral" (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 35). It may be doubted whether women in the East acted generally in the spirit of St. Chrysostom's advice even in the 4th century. Had they done so, it would not have been mentioned that the mother of Gregory of Nazianzus wore a dress of shining white at the funeral of her son Caesarius (Greg. Naz. Orat. vii. 15). [MOURNING.]

IX. The Bier and Coffin.—The body was placed on a bier (feretrum, lectus, grabatum, sandapila, κλίνη, σκίμπους), sometimes in a coffin (arca, loculus, capulus, λάρναξ, σορός). There is reason, however, to think that the bier and coffin, by whatever word described, were generally one. The coffin was without a lid, and the face (at least) of the corpse was often exposed during the procession. At the funeral of St. Basil, A.D. 379, the people could see his face (Greg. Naz. Orat. xliii. 80). The same thing is mentioned of his sister Macrina (Greg. Nyss. de Vita Macr. 201). When Honoratus of Arles was carried to the grave, A.D. 430, the people were able to kiss various parts of the body ("osculum aut ori aut quibuscunque membris impressit," Hilar. Arel. in Vita Honor. vii. 35). This was probably general among the Greeks, for it is their custom to this day, the face being painted to simulate life.

It is probable that in many cases the whole body was concealed at first by a loose pall, sometimes of rich material, of which we often read both in the East and West. A dalmatic was thrown over the bier at the funeral of the bishops of Rome, until Gregory I. ordered that for the future "the bier on which a Roman pontiff was carried to burial should be vested with no covering" (Epist. iv. 44). He desired to suppress the popular custom of tearing the dalmatic to pieces and preserving them as relics. Hilary of Arles says that the body of Honoratus, already mentioned, was "clothed on the bier by the great solicitude of faith, and almost stripped afterwards by a greater, when it was taken to the grave" (Vita Honor. vii. 35). When the empress Placilla, A.D. 385, was carried into the city before her burial, the body was covered "with gold and purple cloth" (Greg. Nyss. Orat. Fun. de Placillâ, ii. 960). Her daughter Pulcheria is by the same writer only said to have been "borne on a golden bier" (κλίνης, In Fun. Pulch. Orat. Vid. 948).

X. The Bearers.—Tertullian, 195, explaining Christian customs to the heathen, says that the offerings of the faithful provided among other things "for the burial of the poor" (Apol. 39). The council of Carthage, 398, decreed that the "penitents should carry the dead to the church and bury them" (can. 81). St. Augustine, speaking of his mother's funeral at Ostia, where she died on their way to Africa, says, "De more illis quorum officium erat funus curantibus" (Confess. ix. 31). Such officials, we infer, were to be found among Christians in every populous place. At Constantinople Constantine had already provided a large body of inferior clerks to whom this duty was committed. Their number was afterwards increased by Justinian. They were paid for their services out of a public fund, so that every burial might be free of charge. [See COPIATAE, DUCANI, FOSSARII, PARABOLANI.] These prepared the grave, bore the corpse, and buried it. It is probable, however, from the number of instances on record, that relations and others often became bearers, not from necessity, but from a desire to shew honour to the deceased. The body of St. Basil was thus "borne aloft by the hands of holy men," Jan. 1, 379 (Greg. Naz. Orat. xliii. 80). When his sister Macrina was buried in the same year, the bier was borne by her brother, Gregory of Nyssa, the bishop of the diocese, and two other eminent clergymen (Vita Macr. 201). St. Ambrose in the same year implies that he helped to carry his brother Satyrus to the grave (De Excessu Sat. i. 36). Paula at Bethlehem, 404, was "removed by the hands of bishops, who even put their shoulders to the bier" (Hieron. Ep. 108, § 29). Sidonius, 472, says of a lady of high rank "that she was taken up and borne to her abiding home like one asleep, by the hands of priests and relatives" (Epist. ii. 8). Fulgentius Ruspensis, A.D. 553, was taken "by the hands of priests" to the church in which he was buried (Vita, Surius, Jan. 1).

During our period monks and nuns were buried without the bounds of their monasteries (Martene, de Ant. Mon. Rit. v. x. 99), and the latter at least must often have employed the services of seculars as bearers.

XI. Time of Burial. — A Christian funeral took place by day whenever it was permitted. See BURIAL OF THE DEAD (3), p. 253. There was in France, at least, a feeling against burying on Sunday; for in a law forbidding servile works on that day in the Carlovingian code, we find the burial of the dead excepted, only "si forte necesse fuerit" (Reg. Fr. Capit. i. 75, vi. 380). Nevertheless St. Ambrose was buried at Milan on Easter Day (Paulinus in Vita, 48), and St. John of Naples in that city on the same day (Uranius, De Obitu Paulini, 11).

XII. The Procession.—Allusions to the triumphant character of the funeral procession as marked by the singing of psalms and hymns, the carrying of lights [see LIGHTS, CEREMONIAL USE OF, viii.], and palms, &c., are very frequent. The Apostolical Constitutions, probably compiled near the year 200, give this direction: "In the going forth of those who have fallen asleep, conduct them with singing of psalms, if they are faithful in the Lord, for 'precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints'" (vi. 30). Constantine, who died in 337, of the funeral of martyrs: "Nor is the sweet smell of frankincense desired, nor the funeral pyre, but pure light sufficient to light them that pray" (Orat. ad Sanct. Coetum, 12). St. Paul the first hermit was taken to his grave, A.D. 340, by St. Anthony, "singing hymns and psalms, after the Christian tradition" (Hieron. Vita Pauli, § 16). At the funeral of Macrina, "no small number of deacons and servants preceded the corpse in order on either side, all holding tapers of wax," while "from one end to the other of the procession psalms were sung in one part, as in the Hymn of the Three Children" (Greg. Nyss. Vita Macr. 201). At Constantinople Justinian, A.D. 554, made legal provision for the singing at all funerals (Nov. lix. 4). In France, 587, St. Radegund was carried to the grave with psalms and alleluias. (Baud. Vita, § 28.) In Spain, the council of Toledo, 589, ordered that the body should be conveyed to the tomb with psalm-singing only.

Incense was sometimes used after the first three or four centuries of our period. In the Acta (of late and uncertain date; see Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. note sur St.-Pierre Alex.) of St. Peter of Alexandria, 311, we read that the people

"carried palms the tokens of victory, while tapers blazed, hymns resounded, and incense flamed" (Migne, Ser. Græc. xviii. 465). Hilary of Arles, speaking of the funeral of Honoratus, his predecessor, A.D. 430: "We saw then, carried before his bier, spices and incense" (Vita Honor. vii. 35). At the funeral of St. Lupicinus in France, in the 6th century, there were "crosses and wax candles and the smell of sweet incense" (Greg. Tur. Vitae PP. xiii. 3). "Incense and lights" are also mentioned by Pseudo-Chrysostom (de Pat. i. tom. ix. 808).

Neither the Gelasian nor the Gregorian Sacramentary indicates the psalms used in the procession. We may, however, learn something of the Greek custom from St. Chrysostom: "Consider what thou sayest at that time, 'Turn again unto thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath rewarded thee' (Ps. cxvi. 7, P. B. v.); and again, 'I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me' (xxiii. 4); and again (xxxii. 8), 'Thou art a place to hide me in; Thou shalt preserve me from trouble'" (Hom. iv. in Ep. ad Heb. (ii. 15)).

XIII. The Body buried.—The church inherited from the first converts a repugnance to cremation, as doing violence to natural feeling. The heathen ascribed this abhorrence to a wrong motive, viz. a fear lest the body being dissipated should be incapable of resurrection. "Some," says Tertullian, "are of that opinion; they say that funerals ought not to be by fire for that reason, out of a needless care for the soul. But the reason of that pious custom of burial is different, not a pretence of care for the remains of the soul, but an aversion to cruelty even in regard to the body" (De Animâ, 51). In the Octavius of Minutius Felix (c. 2), the heathen interlocutor inveighs against the Christians as superstitiously "execrating funeral piles and condemning sepultures by means of fire." To this the Christian replies (c. 10): "We do not, as you suppose, fear any loss of burial (comp. St. Augustine, de Civ. Dei, i. 12), but we observe the ancient and better (St. Aug. u. s. 13) custom of interment." The practice of cremation was extinct throughout the empire in the 5th century ("Urendi corpora defunctorum usus nostro sæculo nullus," Macrob. Saturn. vii. 7); but we infer from a prohibition of Charlemagne that it existed among the tribes of Germany at a much later period: "If any one shall cause the body of a deceased person to be consumed by flame according to the rite of the pagans, and shall reduce his bones to ashes, he shall be capitally punished" (Capit. de Part. Saxon. 7, in Cap. Reg. Fr. i. 252).

In Egypt there was a peculiar custom of preserving the dead above ground. "The Egyptians are wont . . . not to hide them under the earth, but to place them on litters and to keep them in their houses, thinking thereby to do honour to the departed." This statement is made, however, only in reference to "the bodies of the devout departed, and especially of the holy martyrs" (Athan. Vita S. Anton. § 90). The custom was earnestly opposed by St. Anthony, who ordered his own body to be buried in a secret place, that it might not be so treated (ibid.). The author of his life is the only writer who mentions it.

XIV. Place of Burial.—For the earlier period, especially in the cities, see AREA, BURIAL, CATACOMBS, CEMETERY. Burial in churches was forbidden by a law of Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius, A.D. 381: "Let no one think that the abode of the apostles or martyrs is permitted to be used for the burial of bodies" (Justin. Codex, i. ii. 2). This law was admitted by Justinian into his code, A.D. 529. [CHURCHYARD, p. 391.]

Constantine and his Christian successors, and the bishops of Constantinople, are said by Sozomen (Hist. ii. 34; comp. Euseb. Vita Const. iv. 70) to have been buried in the Church of the Apostles in the city; but from St. Chrysostom it appears that this must be understood of the approach to the church. (Hom. xxvi. in 2 Cor. pr. fin.). St. Ambrose was buried, A.D. 397, in the church at Milan built by himself and called after him (Paulinus, Vita S. Amb. 48). Paula was interred at Jerusalem, 404, "subter ecclesiam et juxta specus Domini" (Hieron. Epist. 108, § 30); i.e., as we conceive, under the church, but from without. Of the burial of Fulgentius of Ruspe in Africa in a church, we read: "He was the first bishop who was honoured by being laid in that basilica, where a strict ancient custom permitted no one, priest or laic, to be buried; but the great force of affection removed the obstacle of custom, the citizens universally demanding it" (Vita in Surius, Jan. 1 in fin.). Here the ground of the "custom" appears to have been forgotten. Queen Radegund in 587 requested of the bishops of the province that she might be buried in a church which she had begun to build (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ix. 42). The occasional practice is also attested by stories of sinners miraculously cast out of churches in which they had been interred. Such an event happened at Toulouse, according to Gregory of Tours (Mirac. i. 89), while Gregory of Rome places a similar occurrence at Milan (Dial. iv. 53). Another story of the last writer shews that two ladies had been buried in a church at Monte Cassino (Dial. ii. 23).

XV. The Service in Church.—The body was often taken to a church and a service held over it there, though it was to be buried elsewhere. Gregory of Nyssa, in his account of the funeral of Macrina, says: "When we stood within the building [of the Holy Martyrs, in which the bodies of her parents lay], setting down the bier, we first betook ourselves to prayer" (Vita S. Macr. 201). The body of St. Ambrose was taken to a church immediately after his death on the morning of Easter Eve. On Sunday at dawn, "after the celebration of the divine sacraments," it was removed to the church in which it was to be buried (Paulinus, Vita, 48). The language of St. Jerome, when he says that the alleluia of the people shook the roof of the temple at the funeral of Fabiola (Epist. 77, § 11), seems to imply an office of praise and thanksgiving in the church. Paula, before burial, was "placed in the middle of the church of the cave of the Saviour," and the joyful chanting of the procession, it is implied, continued there (Hieron. Epist. 108, § 29). Pseudo-Dionysius, in the East, tells us that if the deceased had been of the clergy, the body was set before the altar; if a layman, by the sacrarium at the priest's entrance (De Eccl. Hier. v. iii. 2). The foregoing testimonies make it probable that the body was always carried into the church when it was to be buried near it.

XVI. The Composition of the Service.—Psalms and hymns formed a considerable part of the service in the church and at the grave, but there were prescribed forms of prayer also, and lessons from Holy Scripture, at an early period. We read both of psalms sung and of prayers said in church at the funeral of Macrina (Vita, u. s.). Psalms with the alleluia were sung at that of Fabiola (Hieron. u. s.); and psalms in Greek, Latin, and Syriac at that of Paula (Hier. u. s.). The martyrs Epictetus and Astion were buried "in a meet and fit place, with hymns and psalms" (Vita, 20; Rosw. 219). Of other martyrs, Victor Vitensis says, "The remains of the blessed saints were buried with solemn hymns" (Passio Septem Monach.). The same writer represents a persecuted church asking, "Who will bury us when we die, with the solemn (i.e. customary) prayers?" (De Persec. Vand. ii.) Pseudo-Dionysius, speaking of the service in the church, says: "Then the priest celebrates a prayer of thanksgiving. Next, the ministers, having read the unfailing promises of our second resurrection set in the divine Scriptures, chant devoutly the songs of the oracles of psalms and hymns to the same end and intent. Then the chief minister dismisses the catechumens, and recites the names of the saints who have already gone to their rest, with whom he deems the person lately deceased worthy to be classed in public commemoration, and exhorts all to seek the happy end in Christ. Then the divine chief priest drawing near makes a most sacred prayer over him" (De Eccl. Hier. v. iii. 2).

The Gelasian Sacramentary gives prayers to be said "Ad Sepulcrum priusquam sepeliatur," and others, with a "Commendatio Animae," to be said "Post Sepulturam" (Liturg. Lat. Vet. Murat. i. 750–1). The corresponding prayers in the Gregorian are headed respectively "Orationes ante Sepulcrum, priusquam sepeliatur," and "Oratio post sepultum Corpus" (ibid. ii. 216). In both the "Commendatio" is the final prayer. We take the following from the Gregorian as an example: "We commend unto Thee, O Lord, the soul of Thy servant N., that being dead unto the world he may live unto Thee. And if by the frailty of worldly conversation he hath committed sins, do Thou by the pardon of Thy most merciful pity cleanse them away, through," &c. (ibid. ii. 218). At one time the whole of the service in the church and at the grave was called the Commendation; for the council of Carthage, 397, orders that where a funeral takes place in the afternoon, "the commendation shall be made by prayers only, if they who make it are found to have already broken their fast" (can. 29); i.e. the eucharist shall not form part of the commendation in that case. But only a few years later we find the word used of single forms of intercession (for the living, in can. 12 Conc. Milev. A.D. 416; comp. Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 13. See COMMENDATION), and it is the specific name expressly given to the last prayer at funerals in the Gelasian Sacramentary. By an order of Hincmar of Rheims, A.D. 845, the priest is to learn by heart "ordinem et preces in exequiis atque agendis defunctorum" (Capit. 4; Labb. Conc. viii. 569). It is evident, therefore, that at this time nothing was left to the discretion of the officiant.

We may add, with reference to the lessons, that some copies of the Comes Hieronymi (App. ad Capit. Reg. Franc. ii. 1351; see LECTIONARY) to the eucharistic lessons to be read "in Agenda Mortuorum" (sic) add nine "Lectiones Defunctorum" (see Amalarius, de Eccl. Off. iv. 42) from the Book of Job, to be read in the Officia Mortuorum. Of these some or all, we may suppose, would be read in the church or at the grave, when the eucharist was not celebrated. They are, Job vii. 19–21; x. 1–7; x. 8–12; xiii. 22–28; xiv. 1–6; xiv. 13–16; xvii. 1–15; xix. 20–24; xix. 25–27.

The early remains of the Greek church do not give us the same information respecting the prayers actually said in the church or at the grave within our period. The prayers in the Apostolical Constitutions, to which we have referred in § vii. 1, might be used with propriety at that time; but the rubric (viii. 40) shews that they were the special addition on occasion of a death to the ordinary daily service. Elsewhere (vi. 30) this book mentions lessons and psalms: "Assemble in the cemeteries, reading the sacred books and singing psalms on account of the martyrs who have fallen asleep, and of all saints from the beginning, and of our brethren who have fallen asleep in the Lord;" a direction which seems to apply both to the occasion of the funeral and to subsequent commemorations. In the East one of the Arabic canons of Nicaea, referring to the funeral of a bishop, says, "Let those things be read at the funeral which the doctors and holy spiritual fathers have ordained touching the prayer" (can. 65; Labbe, Conc. ii. 312).

For the discourse sometimes delivered at or after a funeral, see FUNERAL SERMON.

XVII. The last Peace.—Pseudo-Dionysius says that after the prayers the bishop kissed the corpse, after which all present did the same (Eccl. Hier. v. iii. 2). This was the kiss of peace, and a sign of communion unbroken by death; but it could never have been common. From a prohibition of the practice by the council of Auxerre, A.D. 578 (can. 12), we learn that there was some observance of it in France in the 6th century.

XVIII. The last Unction.—In a work ascribed to St. Chrysostom, in the imperial library at Vienna, it is said that we "ought to pour oil on the dead at their burial" (Comment. in Biblioth. Caes. Lambecii, VIII. xlv. 68). Pseudo-Dionysius says that after the kiss the bishop "poured oil on the departed, and then after offering a sacred prayer for all present laid the body away with other sacred bodies of the same (ecclesiastical) rank" (Hier. Eccl. v. iii. 2). Theodore of Canterbury, 668, says that "there was in the church of Rome a custom of carrying monks or religious men to a church when dead, and anointing their breasts with chrism, and there celebrating masses for them" (Capit. 90; Labbe, Conc. vi. 1877). These statements are worthy of note from the fact that in the Greek church of the present day either oil from the church lamps or a cinder from the thurible is put on the corpse immediately before burial (Euchol. Goar, 538). Pseudo-Dionysius gives a mystic reason for this unction. The unction at baptism, he says, "calls the initiated to the sacred strife, but the oil now poured on the body shews that he who has fallen asleep has fought the sacred fight, and is perfected" (ibid.).

XIX. The Eucharist given to the Dead.—We meet with several traces of this profane superstition from the end of the 4th century downward. It was forbidden in Africa by the council of Carthage in 397: "It is decreed that the eucharist be not given to the bodies of the dead" (can. 6); by that of Auxerre, 578: "It is not lawful for the eucharist to be given to the dead" (can. 12); and by the council of Constantinople in 691 (can. 83). The canon of the last is, however, only a transcript of that of Carthage, and even repeats its argument: "It is written, Take, eat; but the bodies of the dead can neither take nor eat" (comp. St. Chrysostom, Hom. 40 in Ep. i. ad Cor. § 1). It is not intimated in these canons that the eucharist was placed between the lips of the corpse; and we infer probably, from other records, that it was placed on the breast,[a] especially as Balsamon (Comm. in Can. C. P. u. s.) suggests that the intention of the practice was to keep off evil spirits. St. Benedict is said to have ordered "the body of the Lord" to be placed on the breast of a corpse that had been cast out of its grave by invisible hands (Greg. M. Dial. ii. 24). An oblate was placed on the breast of St. Cuthbert (Amalar. de Off. Eccl. iv. 41). In the late and fabulous Life of St. Basil falsely ascribed to Amphilochius, the saint is said to have ordered a portion of the eucharist which he consecrated on a certain occasion to be reserved that it might be buried with him (Opp. Amphil. ed. Combefis. 176, 224). For the later history of the practice see Notitia Eucharistica, p. 920; ed. 2.

This observance must have been more common, especially at Rome, than has been usually supposed, if modern antiquarians are right in thinking that the vessels tinged inside with red found in the loculi in the catacombs contained eucharistic wine (CATACOMBS, 308; but see GLASS, 730); but the age and paucity of the notices of the custom must be considered one objection to that opinion. It is probable that intinction was practised—i.e. that the bread was moistened with the wine. See SPOON, EUCHARISTIC.

XX. How placed in the Grave.—The position of the bodies found in the CATACOMBS (see Vol. I. p. 307) shews that their direction was considered unimportant for the first four centuries. At a later period we find evidence both in the East and West of the face being generally turned towards the rising sun. Thus Pseudo-Chrysostom: "We turn the coffin to the East, signifying thereby their resurrection" (De Pat. i. u. s.). See also the Vienna MS. before cited (Lambec. VIII. xlv. 68). Pseudo-Epiphanius (de Sepult. Dom.), apostrophising Joseph of Arimathea: "Dost thou bury towards the East the Dead One, who is ἡ ἀνατολὴ τῶν ἀνατολῶν?" The belief that our Lord had been so buried would be sufficient to induce a general practice. A similar testimony is given by Latin writers. Thus Arculfus, who visited the Holy Land in 679, says that the soles of the feet of the patriarchs were not turned as it is the custom for the soles of the buried to be turned in other parts of the world, viz. towards the east, but to the south, and their heads to the north (Adamn. De Locis Sanctis, ii. 10; Acta S. O.S.B. ii.). Bede says that the body of our Lord "had the head on the west," and therefore looking eastward (iv. in S. Marci Ev. c. 16).[b] The body was generally, but not always, laid on the back. Charlemagne was seated on a throne (Monach. Engol. in Vita).

XXI. Bay-leaves, &c., in the Grave.—The floor of the grave was sometimes strewed with evergreens. Thus when the body of Valerius was found in the 6th century "he had bay-leaves strewn under him" (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. 84). When certain bodies, supposed to be those of St. Simon and St. Jude, were translated from the ancient Vatican basilica in the 17th century, "there were found leaves of bay under their heads" (Casalius, de Vet. Sacr. Christ. Rit. 66, p. 266). Even in the 12th century John Beleth (copied by Durandus A.D. 1285, Ration. VII. xxxv. 38) says, "Let ivy or bay, which keep the greenness of their leaves for ever, be placed in the sarcophagus near the bodies, to express that they who die do not cease to live in Him" (Div. Off. Explic. 141).

XXII. Instruments of suffering buried with Martyrs.—St. Babylas, A.D. 250, according to St. Chrysostom, requested to be buried with the iron chains in which he had died (De Babyla c. Julian, 11). St. Ambrose, about 393, asserts that he found in the grave of Agricola at Bologna the cross and nails by which he had suffered in 303 (Exhort. Virgin. ii. 9). St. Sabine desired that the stone which was to be tied to him when thrown in the river should be buried with his body (Surius, March 13; not in the copy of Baluze, Miscell. i. 12; ed. Mansi). When the body of St. Daniel was found in 707, the nails by which he suffered were found with him (Petr. Natal. ii. 60, apud [illegible] de Fun. Vet. Christ. 181). For other objects found in tombs, see CATACOMBS, Vol. I. p. 314.

XXIII. One not buried on another.—This was forbidden by the council of Auxerre, 578: "Non licet mortuum super mortuum mittere" (can. 15), and by a law of Childeric about 744 (Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 153), which was adopted by the compilers of the Carlovingian code (vi. 197). The reason of the prohibition is not given; but we may believe that it could not have been that assigned in an inscription given by Gruter: "Solus cur sim quaeris. Ut in die censorio sine impedimento facilius resurgam" (Corp. Inscript. mlii. 8).

XXIV. Flowers on the Grave.—St. Ambrose, 392, clearly alludes to a custom of decking the grave with flowers in his oration on the death of Valentinian: "I will not scatter his tomb with flowers, but will bedew his spirit with the odour of Christ. Let others scatter lilies from full baskets; our lily is Christ" (De Obit. Valent. 56). St. Jerome, in 397, addressing one who had lately become a widower: "Other husbands scatter over the tombs of their wives violets, roses, lilies, and purple flowers, and solace their heart's pain by these offices. Our Pammachius waters the holy ashes and venerable bones with the balsam of alms" (Epist. 66, § 5). Prudentius, A.D. 405, alludes to the same custom (Peristephanon, Hymn iii. prope fin.; Cathem. Hymn. vii. in fin.).

[a] The words ἐν τῷ στόματι αὐτοῦ in Pseudo-Amphilochius (Vita S. Bas.) are an interpolation. See Amphil. Opera, p. 224; Par. 1644.

[b] Isidore of Seville, de Situ Corporum SS. Petri et Pauli, has been cited to shew that Christians buried to the east in the 1st century. There is no work of Isidore's under that title, and the reference can only be to the tract once ascribed to him, De Ortu et Obitu Patrum (App. 20; vii. 388, Rom. 1802), where we read in the account of St. Peter: "Sepultus in Vaticano ab urbe Roma ad orientem (forte, occidentem) tertio milliario" (§ 39). One MS. (Isidoriana, ibid. c. 107) says of St. Peter, "Ad Australem plagam est sepultus," and of St. Paul, "contra Orientalem plagam."

In Gregory of Tours (de Glor. Mart. 71) we read of sage-leaves scattered in the crypt of a basilic "in honour of the martyrs" buried there.

XXV. Lights at the Grave.—It is impossible to say when this practice began. The council of Elvira, about 305, ordered that "wax lights shall not be burnt in a cemetery in the daytime: for the spirits of the saints are not to be disquieted" (can. 34); the more probable sense of which is, that a needless blaze of light in the daytime would disturb the devotions of the faithful who frequented the cemetery for private prayer. See Notitia Eucharistica, 133 note; ed. 2. It is probable that these were in honour of martyrs only. The practice was apparently the same when Vigilantius wrote about 404: "We see under pretext of religion a custom introduced into the churches, after the fashion of the Gentiles, of burning masses of wax lights while the sun is still shining. . . . These people do a great honour to the most blessed martyrs, in conceiving them to receive light from worthless wax tapers, whom the Lamb, who is in the middle of the throne, lights with the full blaze of His majesty" (apud Hieron. contra Vigilant. § 4). Jerome ascribed the practice to women who had more zeal than knowledge, but at the same time defended it, "Hoc fit martyribus, et idcirco recipiendum est" (§ 8). At a later period we find lights left at the graves of others besides martyrs, and often renewed as at theirs. Thus when the mother of Aredius was buried, 570, "they placed a wax candle at her head" (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. 104). This is related incidentally; so that we infer a common practice. In the East Pseudo-Athanasius says: "Fail not to burn oil and wax at his tomb; for these things are acceptable to God, and they bring a great reward from Him" (apud Joan. Damasc. Orat. de iis qui in Fide dormierunt, § 19). See LIGHTS, THE CEREMONIAL USE OF, § ix.

XXVI. Almsgiving at Funerals.—The giving of alms both at the funeral and on days of commemoration was so strongly inculcated and strictly practised both in the East and West, that it is desirable to shew the grounds of it as well as to give testimonies to the fact; the more so because the reason more commonly alleged gave rise to momentous consequences in after-ages. The Apostolical Constitutions, about 200, appear to regard it as a simple act of piety to the deceased, to conciliate respect for his memory and to keep it alive among the people: "Of the things belonging to him, let there be given to the poor for a remembrance of him" (εἰς ἀνάμνησιν αὐτοῦ, viii. 42). Before the end of the 4th century, however, we find St. Chrysostom insisting without hesitation on a very different reason: "I shew you another mode of honouring the dead than by costly graveclothes, . . . the vesture of almsgiving. This garment will rise again with him" (Hom. 85 in Ev. S. Joan. § 5). Elsewhere he urges the practice that the departed "may be clothed with greater glory. If he has died a sinner, that his sins may be loosed: if a righteous man, that there may be an addition to his recompense and reward" (Hom. 31 in S. Matt. Ev. ix. 23). Again, speaking of a sinner who has "offended God in many things," he says: "It is right to weep (for him), or rather not to weep only, for that does not profit him, but to do those things that may bring him some comfort,—to give alms, to wit, and make offerings" (Hom. 62 in S. Joan. Ev. § 5). A later Greek writer calls "the alms left to the poor by the departed dead sacrifices," but adds, "Nevertheless, if he was merciful in his lifetime, his good deeds in death are accepted of God" (Quaest. ad Antioch. 90 inter Opp. S. Athan.).

The same sentiment prevailed in the Latin church at least from the middle of the 4th century. St. Jerome, for example, A.D. 397, says decidedly of Pammachius, that he moistened the ashes of his wife with the balsam of alms (Epist. 66 ad Pamm. § 6). St. Augustine: "It is not to be doubted that the dead are helped . . . by the alms which are distributed on behalf of their spirits; so that the Lord deals more mercifully with them than their sins have deserved" (Serm. 172, c. 2; sim. Enchirid. 110, § 29; De Dulcitii Quaest. ii. 4, and De Cura pro Mortuis, 18, § 22). He explains, however, that alms after death only profit those who have so lived as to be capable of benefit from them (Ench. u. s. cited by himself in De Dulc. Quaest. u. s.; comp. Serm. u. s. and De Cura, u. s.; also Isidor. Hispal. de Offic. i. 18). Laws were at length founded on the practice. Thus a canon of the English council of Cealchythe, A.D. 816, orders that on the death of a bishop "a tenth of his substance shall be given for his soul's sake in alms to the poor, of his cattle and herds, of his sheep and swine, and also of his provision within door, and that every Englishman [of hic] who has been made a slave in his days be set at liberty, that by this means he may deserve to receive the fruit of retribution for his labours and also forgiveness of sins" (can. 10; Johnson's tr.).

XXVII. The Feast at the Funeral.—The motives which led to the giving of alms at a funeral also gave rise to a custom of entertaining the poor at a feast, which was often repeated on days of commemoration. An early allusion occurs in the Apostolical Constitutions: "In the memoriae of the departed, feast when invited in an orderly manner and in the fear of God, that ye may be able to intercede for those who have departed" (viii. 44). Constantine, about 325, speaks of the "perfectly sober feasts celebrated by many" at the funerals of the faithful "for pity and relief of the needy and the assistance of exiles" (Orat. ad Sanct. Coetum, 12). "Why," asks St. Chrysostom, "dost thou invite the poor and call priests to pray? That the departed may come to rest, you say, that he may find the Judge merciful" (Hom. 31 in S. Matt. Ev. ix. 23). "If thou wert commemorating a son or a brother deceased, thou wouldst be conscience-stricken if thou didst not observe the custom and invite the poor" (Hom. 27 in 1 Cor. xi. 25). Paulinus, A.D. 397, has left a description of the funeral feast given by Pammachius, on the death of his wife, to the poor of Rome in the church of St. Peter (Epist. xiii. 11).

It will be observed that Pseudo-Origen speaks as if the festival were of the same character, whether it celebrated the death of a martyr or of a private friend. The fact is that the festivity of a saint's day was at first nothing more than the repetition of his funeral feast on the anniversary of his death. [CELLA MEMORIAE.]

When Christianity became the religion of the people, such occasions naturally led to excess and other evils. "I know that there are many," says St. Augustine, "who eat and drink most luxuriously over the dead" (De Mor. Eccl. 34, § 75). On this account St. Ambrose suppressed the feasts of commemoration at Milan (Aug. Conf. v. 2); but it is uncertain whether his prohibition embraced that held at the funeral itself. St. Augustine, encouraged by the example, induced his bishop Aurelius to do the same at Hippo (Epist. 22 ad Aurel. i. § 6). With this advice of St. Augustine to his bishop we may connect a canon of the council of Carthage, 398, at which both were present: "Let those who either refuse to the churches the oblations of the dead or give them grudgingly be excommunicated as slayers of the needy" (can. 95). The last phrase occurs also in a canon of Vaison in France, 442, where the reason assigned is that "the faithful departing from the body are defrauded of the fulness of their desires, and the poor of the relief of alms and needful sustenance" (can. 4). Modern writers have called the feast of which we have now spoken "the funeral agape." We are not aware that it was ever so called by the ancients. Nor does it answer to the true notion of an agape. It was not a common meal to which many contributed and of which all partook as an act of communion. Whatever its motive, it was simply a provision for the poor by the rich mourner, and it does not appear that even the giver of the feast sat down to it with those whom he fed.

Though the festivities of saints' days originated in the funeral feast, they are more properly referred to another head.

XXVIII. The Eucharist at Funerals.—The eucharist was celebrated at funerals, but we cannot say that this was general, even when the ceremony took place in the morning. The persons in whose case it is mentioned were of eminence. The Apostolical Constitutions, referring to the obsequies of the dead, say: "Offer both in your churches and in the cemeteries the acceptable eucharist, the antitype of the kingly body of Christ" (vi. 30); but this would be satisfied by any subsequent celebration. The council of Carthage, A.D. 397, orders that "the sacraments of the altar be celebrated only by men fasting;" and as a consequence, that when the "commendation of any deceased persons, whether bishops or others, is to take place in the afternoon, it be celebrated with prayers only, if they who celebrate it are found to have already broken their fast" (can. 29). The natural inference is that a celebration at the time was not considered all-important. Nor was it likely to have been so considered, seeing that it formed part of the later rites of commemoration. The following are among the instances on record of a celebration at the funeral itself. Eusebius says that Constantine was at his funeral "deemed worthy of the mystic liturgy, and enjoyed the communion of holy prayers" (Vita Const. iv. 71). St. Augustine says in reference to his mother's burial, "Those prayers which we poured out to Thee, when the sacrifice of our ransom was offered for her, the body already placed near the tomb before its burial, as is the custom there," &c. (Conf. ix. 12, § 32). So at the funeral of St. Augustine himself: "The sacrifice for commendation of the burial of the body was offered to God, and he was buried" (Possid. in Vita Aug. 31). Similarly in the 6th century, St. Lupicinus was buried "celebratis missis" (Greg. Tur. Vitae Patr. 13).

St. Ambrose was carried from the church (where he lay in state) "after the celebration of the divine sacraments to the Ambrosian basilica, in which he was buried" (Paulinus, in Vita S. Ambr. 48). As this was on Easter Day, the celebration was not "pro defuncto," but his name would be inserted in the office for the day. "For this, handed down from the fathers, the whole church observes, that prayer be made for those who have died in the communion of the body and blood of Christ, when they are commemorated in their place at the sacrifice itself, and that it be also mentioned that it is offered for them" (Aug. Serm. 172, § 2). To this commemoration of the departed St. Cyprian refers when he says of an offender, "He does not deserve to be named at the altar in the prayer of the priest," which he otherwise expresses by saying that "that sacrifice should not be offered for his falling asleep" (Epist. i. p. 8). In accordance with this Cyril of Jerusalem says, "We pray for the holy fathers and bishops, and, in a word, for all who have gone to their rest among us, believing that a great benefit will result to the souls of those for whom the prayer is offered when the holy and awful sacrifice is set forth" (Catech. Myst. v. 6). This will receive illustration from later sections.

XXIX. Commemorations.—There were commemorations by prayer and eucharist at various periods after the death or burial. Thus the Apostolical Constitutions: "Let the third day of those departed to rest be celebrated in psalms and reading (of Scripture) and prayers, for the sake of Him who rose again on the third day; and the ninth for a remembrance of the surviving and the deceased; and the fortieth (some MSS. thirtieth), because the people thus bewailed Moses (Deut. xxxiv. 8), and the anniversary in remembrance of the person, and let there be given of his substance to the poor for a memorial of him" (viii. 42, the original text; sim. the Coptic Constit. 76, Tattam's tr. 146). St. Ambrose says that some observe the third and the thirtieth, others the seventh and the fortieth day after death (De Obitu Theod. 3). His oration on the death of Theodosius was delivered on the fortieth. His first De Excessu Satyri was preached at the funeral ("procedamus ad tumulum," sub fin. § 78); the second on the seventh day after the death (§ 2). In a story told by Palladius, 401, the fortieth day was being celebrated in a monastery on a certain occasion for one person, and the third for another at the same time (Hist. Laus. 26). An African bishop, writing to St. Augustine, says, in reference to the funeral of a friend, "For the space of three days we praised the Lord with hymns over his grave, and on the third day we offered the sacraments of redemption" (Ep. 158, inter Epp. Aug. § 2). Justinian in his laws recognises the days mentioned in the Apostolical Constitutions (Coll. ix. 16, xvi.; Novell. 133, c. 3). The rules laid down by Theodore of Canterbury, a Greek of Tarsus by birth, are especially interesting, from his history and position: "He ought to celebrate the masses of departed laymen thrice in the year, on the third day, the ninth day, and thirtieth day; because the Lord rose on the third day, and gave up the ghost at the ninth hour, and the sons of Israel bewailed Moses thirty days" (Capit. 37; Labbe, Conc. vi. 1876). "For a deceased monk mass is performed on the day of his burial, on the third day, and afterwards, if the abbot will; for a good layman three or seven masses are to be said, after fasting; for a penitent, on the thirtieth or seventh day; and his relations ought to fast, and offer an oblation on the altar on the fifth, as in Jesus, the son of Sirach, it is read, 'The children of Israel fasted for Saul;' and afterwards, if the presbyter will" (ibid. 19). Of "monks or religious men," he says that at Rome "a mass is performed for them on the first and third, and ninth and thirtieth day; and it is observed again at the end of the year, if they will" (ibid. 90, 1877). Amalarius, at the beginning of the 9th century, says, "We have it written in a certain sacramentary (comp. the Gelasian, iii. 105; Murat. i. 762) that the offices of the dead are to be celebrated on the third, the seventh, and the thirtieth day" (De Eccl. Off. iv. 42). It is naturally inferred from some of the foregoing authorities that these days were reckoned from the death; but at Rome, during the latter part of one period, at least, it seems to have been from the burial; for in the Gelasian Sacramentary, a commemorative missa has this title, "Missa in Depositione Defuncti tertii, septimi, xxxmi dierum, vel annualem" (Murat. u. s.). So in the Gregorian Prefaces (Murat. ii. 355), "In die depositionis Defuncti tertio, et septimo, et trigesimo."

Although the ninth day was so widely observed, especially in the East, we find it rejected by St. Augustine, as recalling a heathen observance. He says that it has no precedent in Scripture: "Therefore they ought, as it seems to me, to be kept from this custom ("which they call among the Latins, novemdial," ibid.), if any Christians observe that number in the case of their dead, which belongs rather to the custom of the Gentiles" (Quaest. in Gen. 172).

XXX. Annual Commemorations.—The celebration at the year's end was recurrent from a very early period. Tertullian, A.D. 195, says, "We make oblations for the departed by way of birthday gifts on the anniversary" (De Cor. Mil. 3). St. Cyprian, 250, of certain martyrs: "We always, as ye remember, offer sacrifice for them, as often as we celebrate the passions and days of the martyrs by an annual commemoration" (Epist. 39, p. 77). Gregory Nazianzen thus apostrophises his deceased brother Caesarius: "Every year will we, at least those who are left alive, offer honours and rites of commemoration" (Orat. vii. § 17). It is probable that Monica had in mind this custom of a yearly commemorative celebration of the eucharist when she said, shortly before her death, "I ask no more than that, wherever ye are, ye will remember me at the altar of the Lord" (Aug. Conf. ix. 9).

XXXI. Daily Masses for the Dead.—In the 6th century we find masses said daily in the West on behalf of the departed: e.g. a widow of Lyons "celebrated masses every day, and offered an oblation pro memoria viri" (Greg. Turon. de Glor. Conf. 65). Gregory of Rome in his Dialogues (iv. 55) speaks of a priest who "for a whole week afflicted himself in tears, and daily offered the salutary host" for one deceased. He also relates of himself that he once ordered a priest "to offer sacrifice for thirty days consecutively" for the soul of a monk who had broken his rule (ibid.). It is, in all probability, owing to this statement of Gregory, that the practice of trentals (trigintale, trentale, trigintalium, trigintinarium, trentenarium, tricenarium, &c.) was said to have originated with him (Sala in Bona, Rer. Lit. i. xv. 4). We do not hear of it, however, as usual, until the 8th century. In 757, Lullus, archbishop of Mentz, writes to his presbyters: "We have sent you the names of the lord bishop of Rome (Stephen II., lately deceased), for whom let each one of you sing thirty masses et illos psalmos et jejunium (probably corrupt), according to our custom" (Ep. 107, inter Epp. Bonifacii, ed. Würdw.). In the 9th century, the faithful in France were commanded to keep fast and to make oblations for their kindred thirty days (Capit. Reg. Fr. vi. 198). Similarly Herard of Tours (can. 58): "Triginti diebus amici et parentes pro eis agant." This lengthened observance of thirty days was obviously suggested by Numb. xx. 29 and Deut. xxiv. 8. In Bede we read of a priest who offered masses frequently (saepius, crebras) for a brother supposed to be dead (Hist. Eccl. Angl. iv. 22). They do not appear to have been daily, nor is any period mentioned throughout which he offered them.

XXXII. Where the Name of the Deceased was introduced.—For several centuries there were no special prayers provided for use when the eucharist was celebrated on account of one departed: only the name was introduced at some appropriate part of the service. The council of Châlons-sur-Saône, 813, orders that "in every celebration of the mass the Lord be entreated for the spirits of the departed at a suitable place" (can. 39). At that place the names were mentioned. It varied, as at length fixed by custom, in the several liturgies. [DIPTYCHS; NAMES, OBLATION OF.]

XXXIII. Missa Defuncti.—We do not know when, at a celebration for the dead, a set of proper prayers (Missa pro Defuncto, Missa Defuncti) was substituted for the usual collects. For a long period "a mass for the dead differed [only] from an ordinary mass in being celebrated without Gloria, and Alleluia, and the kiss of peace" (Amal. de Eccl. Off. iii. 44). There is reason to think that the change began in France, for our earliest examples of a Missa Defuncti are thence. One occurs in the Besançon Sacramentary discovered at Bobio, consisting of a proper Praefatio (Gallican), Collectio, Post nomina, Ad pacem, and Contestatio (Museum Ital. i. 385). The MS. is of the 7th century. There is also a fragment of a Missa pro Defunctis discovered by Niebuhr, and published by Bunsen, which the latter ascribes to Hilary of Poitiers, A.D. 350 (Analecta Antenic. iii. 263). Had it been so early, we should certainly have found similar forms in all the sacramentaries used in France, but there are none in the Gallico-Gothic, the Frankish, or old Gallican, the MSS. of which date from about 550 to about 800 (Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. ii. 513). There are several such missae in the Mozarabic Missal, but we can gather nothing to the purpose from this fact, as that liturgy was in use and receiving additions till the 11th century. Turning to Rome we find several such masses in the Gelasian Sacramentary (Murat. i. 752, &c.), the MS. of which is at least 1100 years old; but they could not have been in general use or much known when Amalarius wrote (827), for beside the remark quoted above he says expressly (ibid.), "Recordatio mortuorum nuncupative agitur ante Nobis quoque peccatoribus," i.e. in the canon. The MSS. of the Gregorian Sacramentary, in which similar forms are found (Murat. ii. 752), do not carry us with probability higher than the 8th century. The Gelasian Missa Defuncti contained a collect for the day, Secreta, Infra actionem, Post Commun. (Greg. Ad complendum), to which the Gregorian adds a proper preface (Murat. ii. 354 et seq.).

The name of the person for whom the oblation was made was inserted in each of the proper prayers of the Missa. Thus in the Besançon Sacramentary: "That Thou vouchsafe to take the soul of Thy servant N. (famoli Tui ill.) into the bosom of Abraham" (Praef.); "To take to Thyself the soul of Thy servant N." (coll.); "We pray Thee for the soul of Thy servant N." (Post nom.); "For the spirits of all the departed, but chiefly for the soul of this Thy servant N." (Ad pac.); "Do Thou, O Christ, receive the soul of Thy servant N." (Contest.) (Mus. Ital. i. 385).

These Missae pro Defunctis were in use in the church of Rome before prayer for acknowledged saints was given up in it. The Secreta for the feasts of St. Leo and St. Gregory was left with the following petition in it down to the 13th century (see Innocent III. Decr. Const. iii. 130): "Grant, O Lord, that this oblation may profit the soul of Thy servant Leo (or Gregory)" (Murat. ii. 25, 101).

The omission of the Alleluia which Amalarius (u. s.) seems to have thought universal in his time was, as we have seen, contrary to the feeling of the earlier church. Nor was this expression of joy ever quite disused even in the West. It is sung with the Officium or Introit of the Mozarabic Missa Defuncti: "Thou art my portion, O Lord. Alleluia." "In the land of the living. Alleluia," bis (Miss. Moz. Leslie, 456). Compare the Officium pro Defunctis mentioned at the end of § vii. 1.

The Antiphonary ascribed to Gregory I. supplies two sets of Antiphons for these Missae Defunctorum (Pamelius, Rituale PP. ii. 175), in which the chief point of interest is that one of them has the introit, "Requiem aeternam dona eis, Domine, et lux perpetua luceat eis" (from 2 Esdr. ii. 345; Vulg. 4 Esdr.), still in use. The former clause of it had been used earlier as a capitulum (see before, vii. 1).

XXXIV. Abuse of Masses for the Dead.—A dreadful crime to which these missae gave occasion is described as frequent by the council of Toledo in 694. Priests would say "missam pro requie defunctorum" for a living object of their hatred, in hope that it would cause his death, "ut . . . mortis ac perditionis incurrat periculum" (can. 5). It is difficult to believe that this was very common, though the council affirms that many priests ("plerique sacerdotum") were guilty of it. Gratian gives the canon in brief, but preserves this startling expression (II. xxvi. v. 13, § 1; Quicunque sacerdotum).

XXXV. Mutual Compacts for Masses, &c.—In the 8th century we begin to hear of agreements between priests that prayers and masses shall be said by the survivors for those of the number who should pre-decease them. In 752 we find Boniface making this proposal to the abbot Optatus: "We earnestly beseech you that there be the intimacy of brotherly charity between us, and that there be mutual prayers for the living, and that prayers and masses be celebrated for those who depart out of this world, when the names of the deceased shall be sent from either of us to the other" (Ep. 93). About the same time Cuthbert writes to Lullus: "The names of the brethren which thou hast sent to me are recorded with the names of the brethren of this monastery who sleep in Christ, so that I have given order to celebrate for them ninety masses, and more than that" (Ep. 127, inter Epp. Bonif.). As the writer speaks of the "amicitiae foedera" long existing between them, and entreats Lullus to continue to pray for him, and declares that he (Cuthbert) remembers him in his "daily prayers," we shall not be wrong in regarding this celebration of masses as another instance of the mutual engagements then becoming common. In 765 a number of bishops and abbots, met in council at Attigni-sur-Aisne, agreed that "every one of them . . . should, when any one of their number departed this life, say one hundred psalters, and their presbyters sing a hundred special masses for him; and that the bishop should himself perform thirty masses, unless prevented by sickness or any other hindrance, in which case he was to ask another bishop to sing them for him. Abbots, not bishops, were to ask bishops to perform thirty masses in their stead, and their presbyters were to perform one hundred masses, and their monks to remember to sing one hundred psalters" (Labb. Conc. vi. 1702). A similar compact was entered into by the bishops at Tousi or Savonières in 859 (see can. 13, Labb. viii. 678). [See NECROLOGIUM.]

XXXVI. To whom Christian Rites were denied.—Catechumens were not generally buried with the solemnities that we have described. St. Chrysostom, after a reference to those rites, says: "But this concerns those who have departed in the faith. Catechumens are not thought worthy of this consolation, but are deprived of every help of the kind, with one exception. What is that? We can give to the poor on their behalf, and that yields them a certain solace, for God wills that we should be benefited by one another" (Hom. iii. in Ep. ad Philipp. § 4; sim. Hom. xxiii. in Ev. S. Joan, § 3; lxxv. 50; Hom. 21 in Act. App. 3, 4). This was the rule, but there must have been exceptions in the case of catechumens who suffered death for the faith, for their martyrdom was considered an effectual baptism in blood (see Bingham, x. ii. 20, and MARTYR), and must therefore, we presume, have been held to entitle the sufferer to every Christian privilege after death. The inference is slightly strengthened by the fact that, when catechumens are related to have suffered with the baptized, no difference of treatment after death is noticed (see Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 4). We may believe the same of those who were prepared for baptism, but lost it through no fault of their own. "I conclude," says Augustine, "that not only suffering for the name of Christ can supply that which is wanting of baptism, but that faith and conversion of heart can also, if it so happen that in the difficulties of the time help is not forthcoming toward the celebration of the mystery of baptism" (De Bapt. c. Don. iv. 21, § 29). Valentinian was an instance. He was prepared, and earnestly desired to be baptized, but was cut off suddenly before he could receive the sacrament. We should infer from the language of St. Ambrose that he was buried with all the usual rites; for not only did he deliver a funeral oration on the occasion of his death, but in it he says, "Give the holy mysteries to his manes; let us pray for his rest with pious affection. Give the heavenly sacraments; let us wait on his soul with our oblations" (De Obitu Valent. 56).

In 563 the council of Braga decreed that "neither the commemoration of an oblation nor the office of psalm-singing should be bestowed on catechumens who had died without the redemption of baptism" (can. 17); and, with regard to suicides, that "no commemoration should be made for them in the oblation, and that their bodies should not be conducted to the grave with psalms" (can. 16). Both these rules, the council declares, had been violated through ignorance. It made the same order with reference to those who are "punished for their crimes" (can. 16). The council of Auxerre, 578, also forbids the oblation of suicides to be received (can. 17). Earlier than either, the council of Orleans, 533, says: "We judge that the oblation of the dead who have been cut off in any crime (i.e. probably, while under accusation for any offence), ought to be received, provided that they are proved not to have brought death on themselves by their own hands" (can. 14). Eugenius II., A.D. 824, deprives nuns who persist to the last in breach of rule, of "Christian burial" (Decr. 3). He decrees the same against those who exhibit feats of strength at fairs, &c., though granting them "penance and the viaticum" (ibid. 7). The council of Mentz, 848, decrees that "the bodies of those who are hung on the gallows may be carried to church, and masses and oblations offered for them, if they have confessed their sins" (can. 27).

XXXVII. Unreconciled Penitents.—The Gregorian Sacramentary provides a "Missa pro Defunctis desiderantibus Poenitentiam et minime consequentibus" (Murat. ii. 219), to which this is prefixed: "If any one who asks for penance rubric shall be deprived of the power of speech while the priest is coming, it is determined that, if suitable witnesses have declared this, and he himself proves it by any gestures, the priest do all things in regard to the penitent according to the custom." The proper collects assume that he desired absolution, and pray that his death may not deprive him of the "fruit of penance which his will desired." See further on this, OBLATIONS, § iii. 2, from which it will be seen that the earlier discipline of the church of Rome was different.

OCEANUS. (1), martyr with Theodorus, Amianus, Julianus; commemorated Sept. 4 (Basil, Menol.); the same or another, Sept. 18, at Nicomedia (Wright's Ancient Syr. Mart. in Journal of S. Lit. 1866, 429). [C. H.]

OCTAVA, sister, probably, of St. Laurentius; commemorated Aug. 17. (Usuard, Mart.)

[C. H.]

OCTAVAE INFANTIUM, Low Sunday or the octave of Easter, otherwise called Dominica in Albis, so called because the white bands which were wrapped round the heads of the newly-baptized infants were then taken off. "Hodie Octavae dicuntur infantium, revelanda sunt capita eorum, quod est indicium libertatis" (August. de Temp. 160, § 1); and again, "vos qui baptizati estis et hodie completur sacramentum Octavarum vestrarum, infantes appellamini quia regenerati estis." (Ibid. Serm. 11, de Diversis.)

[E. V.]

OCTAVE OF A FESTIVAL. (Octava, Octavae.) The eighth day, or space of eight days, after a festival, kept as a prolongation or repetition of the festival itself, honoris causa. It is a Western custom, apparently unknown in the Oriental church. [See APODOSIS.] In more recent times the number of festivals to which octaves are assigned has been largely multiplied; and the octaves are divided into four classes, according to their degrees of solemnity; but within the first eight centuries it would seem that only Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost had this distinction, together with the Epiphany in some localities, and perhaps the Feast of the Dedication of the Church, or of the Patron Saint.

Various reasons have been assigned for the custom. Different writers on ritual have found a ground for it in the Jewish observance of the eighth day for circumcision, to which indeed St. Augustine refers in speaking of the octave of Easter as kept by the newly baptized, OCTAVAE INFANTIUM (de Div. Temp. cap. i.; Ep. lv. 32, 33, &c.), or in the celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles for eight days, or in the Feast of the Dedication of the Temple by Solomon, and of the re-dedication under Zerubbabel; or, again (under the new covenant), in the appearance of our Lord on the eighth day from the Resurrection; and in the mystical value of the number eight, as a symbol of perfection and of rest.

But the first actual trace of the custom upon which we light is the Octave of Easter, during which the newly baptized continued to wear their white baptismal garments. Bede mentions the Octave of Pentecost. In a capitulary of Charlemagne we meet with the octaves of Christmas, Epiphany, and Easter; in can. 26 of the council of Mainz (A.D. 813) with those of Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost. The end of the 8th and beginning of the 9th century was the period to which may be assigned the chief growth of this observance. In the treatise De Eccles. Off. of Amalarius, we hear only of the octaves of Christmas, Epiphany, Easter, and Pentecost; but it says also (iv. 36): "Solemus octavas natalitiorum aliquorum Sanctorum celebrare, eorum scilicet, quorum festivitas apud nos clarior habetur, veluti est in octavis apostolorum Petri et Pauli, et caeterorum Sanctorum, quorum consuetudo diversarum Ecclesiarum octavas celebrat," clearly implying that the custom was growing up in different parts of the church, but that it had not yet become a matter of uniform obligation.

As to the liturgical observance of these days, from the fact that neither in the Gelasian nor Gregorian Sacramentary is any mass assigned for the days within the octave, but only for the octave itself, we may perhaps infer that at first the octave was merely, as it is still in the majority of cases, a repetition of the festival, and of its office on the day week, and that afterwards the intermediate days were filled up by similar repeated commemorations. This would only hold good, however, of the principal octaves. The various rules for determining the right precedence of offices, when other festivals fall within an octave, belong to a period later than our limits.

For the literature of the subject see under FESTIVAL, adding Grancolas, Commentarius Historicus in Romanum Breviarium, lib. i, cap. 45; Venetiis, 1734. [C. E. H.]

ODE. The name ᾠδή is given in the Greek Church—

(1) To the nine Canticles which are said at Lauds. [CANTICLE, p. 285.]

(2) To certain rhythmical compositions, often of considerable beauty, relating to the special commemoration of the day, which are said in the Greek matin office. See CANON OF ODES, p. 277; OFFICE, THE DIVINE; TROPARIA. The arrangement of these odes, generally nine in each office, separated into three groups by a short litany after the third and sixth, resembles that of LECTIONS in the Western offices; they may in fact be said to take the place of lections, which are not used in ordinary offices in the East. (Freeman, Principles of Divine Service, c. i. § 5, p. 125.) [C.]

OECONOMUS (1), the house steward, or manager of a household. Possidius (Vita August. c. 24) says that St. Augustine never used key or seal, but committed the whole management of his domestic affairs to the most able of his clergy, who transacted all the business of receipts and payments, and gave in an annual account. See also Conc. Herd. (c. 16) quoted below.

2. The treasurer of a particular church. Thus Cyriac, before his elevation to the patriarchate of Constantinople, was oeconomus of the great church in that city. (Chronicon Paschale, p. 378.)

3. A diocesan official, holding a distinct position and discharging a public duty in managing all property belonging to the see. Originally the business connected with the temporal affairs of the see appears to have been managed by the bishop and his chapter. The council of Antioch, A.D. 341 (c. 24. 25), speaks of the possibility of the revenues of the church being misapplied by the bishop and his presbyters, and decrees that all church property should be administered with the knowledge of the whole of the clergy, both priests and deacons, and a regular account kept of the property belonging to the church, in order to prevent waste on the one hand, and spoliation of the property of a deceased bishop on the other. Though the appointment of an oeconomus is not specially decreed in these canons, yet it seems to have been considered as implied in them, or at least originating from them. At the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (act. 9), the case was brought forward of Ibas, bishop of Edessa, who was charged with malversation of the property of the church, and who promises that for the future the revenues of the see shall be administered by an oeconomus chosen from the clergy, according to the decrees of the great council of Antioch. From the date indeed of this council the oeconomus is recognised in the decrees of councils as one of the officials necessarily existing in a diocese. The council of Gangra (c. 7, 8) forbids under pain of anathema that any one shall receive or dispense the revenues of the church except the bishop himself, or the officer appointed to the stewardship of benefactions (εἰς οἰκονομίαν εὐκοδαν). The council of Chalcedon, already quoted, after declaring (c. 26) that it had come to the knowledge of the council that certain bishops administered the property of the church without an oeconomus, provides that every diocese should have an oeconomus, chosen from the clergy belonging to it (ἐκ τοῦ ἰδίου κλήρου), who should manage the property of the church under direction (κατὰ γνώμην) of the bishop, in order that no waste should be made of the property, and publicity given to the way in which it was employed. In case of the death of a bishop (c. 25) the oeconomus was to manage the property of the see during the vacancy. The same council (c. 2) mentions the oeconomus among the officials in whose appointment simony is forbidden. The council of Lerida, A.D. 523 (c. 16), while reprobating the custom that appears to have prevailed among the Spanish clergy of plundering the property of a deceased bishop, orders that the bishop who has charge of the funeral shall provide that all things are fitly and carefully managed, and that the officer who has charge of his domestic affairs, associating with himself one or two clergy, should pay the stipends of the clergy belonging to the bishop's household, and take charge of the property of the see for the succeeding bishop. The council of Valentia, A.D. 524 (c. 2), after again reprobating the custom of plundering the house of a deceased bishop, enacts that at the death of a bishop the incumbent of the nearest see should make an inventory within eight days of the goods and property belonging to the diocese, and send it to the metropolitan, who should put a proper person in charge of such revenues, in order that the clergy should receive their proper stipends during the vacancy, and the property be handed over unimpaired to the succeeding bishop. [VACANCY.] It would appear from these canons that the office of oeconomus was unknown in the dioceses of Spain at the date of the councils by which they were made. But the second council of Seville, A.D. 618 (c. 9), after reciting that it had come to the knowledge of the council that certain bishops had oeconomi chosen from the laity, enacts that no bishop should administer the temporal affairs of his diocese except through an oeconomus chosen from among his clergy, according to the decree of the council of Chalcedon, giving as a reason that it is unbecoming that a layman should be the representative vicarius of a bishop, or sit in judgment on church matters; and that those who are associated with a bishop in the administration of affairs ought not to differ with him either in apparel or profession. From this canon it appears that the oeconomus possessed some jurisdiction in the adjustment of financial matters. Thus we are told (Theod. Lect. H. E. i.) that Marcian, a convert from the sect of the Cathari, whom Gennadius of Constantinople appointed as his oeconomus, at once ordained that all the offerings of the faithful in Constantinople should belong to the churches in which they were made, instead of being considered the property of the great church. The fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (c. 48), referring to the decree of the council of Chalcedon, enacts that every bishop should select from the clergy of his diocese those officers whom the Greeks call "oeconomi;" that is, who, in stead (vice) of the bishop, manage the affairs of the church. The council of Meaux, A.D. 845 (c. 47), strictly forbids the clergy of the diocese, under any circumstances, to elect an oeconomus to manage the temporal affairs of the see without the assent of the bishop; if the bishop, through bodily infirmity, is incapable of acting, the archbishop is to select the oeconomus with the assent of the bishop. Another council, A.D. 876 (Conc. Pontigo. c. 14), enacts that at the death of a bishop the oeconomus shall be his executor, and guardian of the property of the see.

The laws of the French kings make frequent mention of the oeconomus and his duties. A capitulary of Charles the Great (ii. c. 9, ed. Baluz.) provides that the oeconomus shall be responsible for any injury sustained by the property of the see during his administration; and also mentions an archioeconomus, probably the head of the other oeconomi. Photius (Synt ag. tit. x. 2) gives an edict of Justinian commanding oeconomi to settle the accounts of their sees once a year. If bishops do not appoint oeconomi, the archbishops are to do so (Nomocan. tit. x. c. i.).

Oeconomi appointed in accordance with these decrees are frequently mentioned in ecclesiastical writers. Socrates (H. E. vi. 7) says that Theophilus of Alexandria appointed two Egyptian monks to the stewardship of his church (οἰκονομίαν τῆς ἐκκλησίας), adding that they thus discovered his greediness and rapacity, and were so disgusted that they deserted their posts and retired to the desert (see Vales. Annot. in loco). Gregory the Great (Epist. iii. 22, p. 640), in the case of the vacant see of Salona in Dalmatia, orders that the oeconomus who was in charge of the diocese at the death of the bishop should continue to manage the revenues, and give in his account to the next bishop. A precept of Hincmar, bishop of Rheims, addressed to Hedenulph, bishop of Laon (Gall. Conc. ii. p. 660), strictly forbids him to take money for the appointment of an oeconomus, whom he styles the dispenser of the property of the church ("facultatum ecclesiæ dispensator"). In an epistle to the church of Laon (Opp. ii. p. 178), the same prelate declares that the oeconomus was the proper guardian of the property of the see at the death of the bishop. Liberatus (Brev. c. 16) speaks of a certain John, who was promoted from being an oeconomus to be presbyter of the church at Tabennesus, and afterwards became again oeconomus, having charge of the revenues of all the churches. The duties of the oeconomus are defined at length by Isidore of Seville (Epist. i.; Bibl. Patr. viii. p. 210) as comprising all business relating to the building of churches, the management of all law matters in which the church was concerned, the superintendence of all fields, vineyards, and all ecclesiastical possessions, the division of the revenues in due proportion among the clergy, the widows, and poor, and the allowance of food and clothing to the clergy and others belonging to the bishop's household. But all to be done under the authority and by the direction of the bishop.

From all this two things seem clear—that the oeconomus was to be one of the clergy, and to be appointed by the bishop. But a canon of Theophilus of Alexandria (c. 9, in Beveridge, Pandect. ii. 173) says that the oeconomus was chosen by the vote of all the clergy. (See Bingham, Antiquities, iii. 13, § 1.)

In later years the duties of the oeconomus appear to have been transferred to the treasurer, Thesaurarius.

[P. O.]

OECONOMUS (MONASTIC), Cymr. MAER, Gael. MAOR, Irish MAER, MAOR, MOHR, and FERTIGHIS (Four Mast. A.D. 777, 782: Fear a man, and Tigh a house), called also EQUONIMUS (Ann. Ult. A.D. 780 sq.), was "custos monasterii," spenser or house steward, having charge of the internal secular affairs of the monastary, such even as providing the corn and wood (Colgan, Acta SS. 213, c. 44; 393, c. 6). In Four Mast. A.D. 777, he is called prior, and may have been local administrator of the subject monasteries, or vice-abbat in the parent house (Reeves, S. Adamnan, 65, 365). As the oeconomus of the see had charge of the gifts of the faithful, and, at a later period, of the episcopal and cathedral estates (Du Cange, Gloss. iv. 696, 697), so the monastic oeconomus received the tributes due to the monastery; while again in Ireland the airchinnech, in Scotland the herenach, and on the Continent the advocatus ecclesiae, farmed the monastic termon or lands, as the abbat's deputy, maor, or steward, with a percentage of one-third for his labour. The tributes and fines, in Irish "cain," were of various kinds, according to the form of transgression; as the amounts must have been considerable, a person of probity was required, and the ancient canons required the person so entrusted to belong to the clerical order (Bingham, Orig. Eccl. iii. c. 12, § 1, 2). But in Ireland the oeconomus or maor had custody also, specially in later times, of the sacred relics and valuable property belonging to the monastery; as at Armagh, the "Book of Armagh," and patron's bell (Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 150, 370), and St. Patrick's crozier, called the "Baculus Jesu" (Bernardus, Vit. S. Malach. c. 5), and held an endowment of land attached to the office, which being hereditary has given a name to the family of Mac Moyre, and to the townland of Ballymire beside Armagh (Todd, S. Patrick, 170, 171; Petrie, Round Towers, 333–335; O'Conor, Rer. Hib. Script. i. Ep. Nunc. pp. lvii. lviii). In illustration of this, we find the steward, maor, and later the thane, as a regal officer collecting the royal dues from the crown lands, and presenting the royal tenantry at the annual hosting; while a still higher official, called the mormaor, or lord high steward, discharged a similar duty in the larger province, which afterwards became the earldom or county. (Robertson, Scotland under her Early Kings, i. 29 sq., 329, 330; O'Curry, Lect. Man. Cust. Anc. Irish, i. pp. ccxliv. ccxlv.) [J. G.]

OECUMENICAL (οἰκουμενικός) (1). The word "oecumenical," when applied to a council, designates one to which the bishops of the whole world have been summoned; or the decrees of which have at any rate been accepted by the whole church. Οἰκουμενικός is of course derived from ἡ οἰκουμένη, which, though frequently applied to that portion of the world which was organised under the Roman empire, is commonly used both in the LXX. and in the New Testament for the whole inhabited earth (Bleek, Erklär. d. drei ersten Evangg. i. 68; COUNCILS, p. 474). The councils within our period which are recognised as oecumenical are, the First of Nicaea (325), Constantinople (381), Ephesus (431), and Chalcedon (451); the Second (553) and Third (680) of Constantinople, and the Second of Nicaea (787).

(2) On the title "oecumenical bishop," or "oecumenical patriarch," applied to the bishop of Rome, see POPE. [C.]

OFFA JUDICIALIS. [ORDEAL, V.]

OFFERENDA. [OFFERTORIUM.]

OFFERINGS. [OBLATIONS.]

OFFERTORIUM. (1) Offertorium, Antiphona ad Offertorium, Cantus Offertorii, Offerenda, were names given to the anthem sung while the oblations were received. We learn from St. Augustine that in his time "a custom had sprung up at Carthage of saying at the altar hymns from the Book of Psalms, whether before the oblation, or when that which had been offered was being distributed to the people" (Retract. 11). The latter hymn or anthem was afterwards called the COMMUNIO: the former the offertorium or offerenda in Italy, and its derived churches; the sonum, or perhaps, more correctly, sonus, in Gaul, and the sacrificium in Spain. Whether the practice originated at Carthage, or had been observed before elsewhere, is not known. Walafrid Strabo, A.D. 842, did not not know who added to the office "the offertory which is sung during the offering," or "the antiphon said at the communion;" but believed that "in old times the holy fathers offered and communicated in silence" (de Reb. Eccl. 22).

Isidore, A.D. 595, appears to be the first who uses the word offertorium: "Offertoria quae in sacrificiorum honore canuntur" (u. s.). "Offerenda" was later, but apparently as common for a long period. It is used by Amalarius, de Eccles. Off. iii. 39: "De offerenda Vir erat in terra," where he has "offertorium" also; by Remigius of Auxerre (de Celebr. Missae, ad calc; Pseudo-Alcuin, de Div. Off. cap. 40); John of Avranches (Rit. Celebr. Miss. in App. Sacram. Gregor. Opp. Greg. iii. 255); Pseudo-Alcuin, de Div. Off. 19.

This anthem is not prescribed in the earliest Ordo Romanus, about 730; but in the second, perhaps about A.D. 800, after the creed, which is also absent from the first, "the bishop salutes the people, saying, The Lord be with you. After that he says, Let us pray. Then the offertorium is sung, with verses" (Mus. Ital. ii. 46). When the oblations have been all received and offered, "the pontiff, bowing a little towards the altar, looks at the choir, and nods to them to be silent" (47). The verses and offerenda were repeated until the offering was over. Remigius (u. s.) says, "Sequitur deinde offerenda, quae inde hoc nomen accepit, quod tunc populus sua munera offerat. Sequuntur versus, a vertendo dicti, quod in offerenda revertantur, dum repetitur offerenda." The offertory is not mentioned in the Gelasian Sacramentary (Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. i. 695); nor in the Vatican Gregorian printed by Rocca (Opp. Greg. v. 63; Antv. 1615); but it appears in the copies edited by Murntori (u. s. ii. 1), Ménard (Opp. Greg. ed. Ben. iii. 1, 74, 244), and Pamelius (Rituale SS. PP. ii. 178).

The Antiphonarium ascribed to Gregory, but later, provides offertoria for every considerable day of the Christian year. Walafrid (u. s.) tells us that down to his time no offertory was sung on Easter eve, nor do we find any provided in the antiphonary of Gregory (Pamel. u. s. ii. 111).

The Milanese Offerenda, now called offertorium (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. xii. ord. 3), was constructed like the Roman (Pamel. u. s. i. 298). It is now sung while the priest is censing the altar and oblations, after having said the secret prayers of oblation (Mart. u. s.; Le Brun, Dissert. iii. art. ii.).

Germanus of Paris, 555, speaks of the Gallican offertory under the name of sonum. It began when the FERMENTUM was brought in: "Nunc autem proce lentem ad altarium corpus Christi non jam tubis inreprahensibilibus, sed spiritalibus vocibus praeclara Christi magnalia dulci modulis psallet Ecclesia" (sic; Expos. Brev. c. De Sono). In France this took place, not as at Rome before the service began (Ord. Rom. i. 8, ii. 4), but just before the offerings were made; when, "lectâ passione (it was the feast of St. Polycarp) cum cæteris lectionibus, ... tempus ad sacrificium offerendum advenit, acceptâque turre diaconus in quâ mysterium dominici corporis habebatur, ferre coepit ad ostium" (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Mart. 86). We do not know any extant example of the Gallican conum.

The Goths of Spain called their offertory sacrificium; but probably not till after the 6th century, as Isidore uses the word offertorium both in his book De Officiis (i. 16) and his Epistle to Leudefred (§ 13). In the latter, however, he uses the phrase "sacrificii responsoria" (§ 5), which, probably meaning the responses at the offering, would be a step towards the later usage. "Sacrificium" is always used in the Mozarabic Missal (Leslie, pp. 3, 8, 11, 17, &c.). Once we have, "Dicat chorus sacrificium quod dicitur offertorium" (8); but we cannot tell the age of the rubric.

(2) Offertorium was also the name of a large dish, often of precious materials, in which the loaves [OBLATES] were received from the offerers at the celebration of the Eucharist. In the Life of Benedict of Anagni, A.D. 801, we are told that he procured "very large silver chalices, silver offertoria, and whatever he saw to be needful for the work of God" (Ardo, 5, § 25; comp. § 33 in Bolland. Feb. 12). [OFFERTORY DISH.]

(3) Sheets of fine linen or richer material employed to receive or cover the offerings of bread, were also called offertoria. According to the Ordo Romanus (about A.D. 730), the loaves, as they were received by the celebrant, were put into a fine linen cloth (sindonem), which was carried after him for the purpose (Ord. i. 12; ii. 9; in Mus. Ital. ii. 11, 47).

(4) A cloth in which the chalice was held by the minister, when he lifted or set it on the altar. When the chalice had two handles, it was passed through them. Ordo Romanus, i.: "Levat calicem archidiaconus de manu subdiaconi regionarii, et ponit eum super altare juxta oblatam pontificis, a dextris involutis ansis cum offertorio" (§ 15); again, "Levat cum offertorio calicem per ansas" (§ 16; similarly Ord. ii. §§ 9, 10). Such a cloth under the same name was also used with the vessel in which the water was offered: "Aqua etiam . . . ab imo diaconorum . . . cum offertorio serico offertur" (Institt. Monast. Cisterc.; Cassandri Liturgica, 22). St. William the Duke, about 812, gave to the church of Gellon, among other gifts, "chalices of gold and silver, with their offertories" (Vita, § 21; Acta S. Ord. Ben. IV. i. 82).

(5) From the following passage it would appear that in France, in the province of Rheims at least, offertorium also signified, either the amula in which the wine was presented, or the offering of wine itself, as oblatio and oblata signified the offering of bread: "Let him offer for an oblation . . . one oblate only, and an offertorium. But if he shall wish to offer more wine in a bottle or can, or more oblates, let him," &c. (Hincmari Cap. ad Presbyt. 16). Probably for such large offerings of wine it was that Adrian of Rome, 772, gave to the church of St. Adrian in that city "amulam offertoriam unam, pensantem libras sexaginta et septem" (Anastas. Bibliothh. Vitae Pont. n. 97). The use of this phrase favours the supposition that the offertorium of Hincmar was an amula. Similarly, in the Charta Cerauniana, an ancient forgery purporting to belong to the year 471, but evidently much later, a "hamula oblatoria" is among the gifts ascribed to the benefactor of a church (Anastas. B. ed. Rom. 1728, iii. Prolog. 31).

OFFERTORY PLATES. We are not without examples of large dishes of precious metal, which, often originally presented as votive offerings, have been used in the services of the church as offertory plates. A silver-gilt dish of Byzantine workmanship is mentioned by De Rossi as in the possession of Count Gregory Stroganoff, which was found in 1867 in the island of Berezovoy in Siberia. It is six inches in diameter and weighs 1½ lbs. It bears no inscription, but there are some rude letters on the dish which give no intelligible sense. The dish bears a relief in repoussé work, consisting of a cross planted on a small globe studded with stars, beneath which issue the four rivers of Paradise, and on either side stand two nimbed angels, holding a rod in their left hand, and elevating their right hand towards the cross in token of adoration. De Rossi regards it as the work of Byzantine goldsmiths of the 6th century (Bulletin. di Archeol. Cristian. 1871, p. 153, tav. ix. 1) [PATEN]. A votive silver dish, also of Byzantine workmanship, of the 5th or 6th century, probably the offering of a victorious general, discovered, together with some spoons, at Isola Rizza, near the river Adige, in the Veronese territory, is also described by De Rossi (Bulletin. di Arch. Crist. 1873, pp. 118 ff. 151 ff.; tav. x. i.). The basin or dish is 1 ft. 4 in. in diameter, and weighs 4½ lbs. The dish bears a military scene in repoussé work. A mounted warrior, helmeted and mailed, pierces a fallen enemy, vainly endeavouring to cover himself with his shield and defend himself with his dagger. Another lies dead at his feet on his shield. The spoons bore a cross dividing the words "utere felix."

A third dish, also of silver and of Byzantine manufacture, very similar in design to that last described, was found in a tomb at Perugia, early in the last century, together with earrings, fibulas, rings, and other personal ornaments (Bianchini, de Aur. et Argent. Cimel. in agro Perusino effoss. Romae, 1717), which have since disappeared and have probably been melted down. It was the subject of an elaborate treatise by Fontanini (Discus Argenteus Votivus Veterum Christianorum, Romae, 1727). The dish represents a mounted soldier bareheaded in a cuirass, transfixing a barbarian with cloke, shield, and dagger. Round it runs the inscription: "De Donis Dei et Domni Petri. Utere felix cum gaudio." From this it has been reasonably gathered that this basin once formed part of the altar furniture of the Vatican, and vain attempts have been made to identify the persons represented. De Rossi, misunderstanding the force of the genitive, interprets the inscription as indicating a gift of the Roman Pontiff in the name of St. Peter and the Church to a victorious general, and expresses his belief that this, as well as the Veronese basin, may have been presented to a captain of the Byzantine army of Belisarius or of Narses. But there is no doubt that Dona Dei in ecclesiastical Latin signifies gifts made to God, i.e. votive offerings. Fontanini gives (p. 32) an inscription over a side door of the church of St. Peter's at Bagnacavallo, c. 857: De Donis Dei et Sancti Petri Apostoli, Johannes umilis Presbyter fecit. The inscription on the golden cover of the Evangeliarium given by Queen Theodelinda to the church of Monza contains the same formula, and there is no doubt that the meaning is the same here. Mabillon (Iter Ital. p. 77) mentions a similar dish of bronze in the Museo Landi, which he designates, on very insufficient grounds, the shield of Belisarius, exhibiting Vitiges as a suppliant. All these dishes are of Byzantine workmanship, and belong to the same period, the 5th or 6th century. The British Museum contains an example of an offertory dish of Northern manufacture once belonging to the abbey of Chertsey, and dug up in its ruins at the beginning of this century, bearing an inscription in characters variously regarded as Runic, Russian, or "a fanciful manipulation of German black letter" (Eric Magnusson). This vessel is a flat circular dish of nearly pure copper with a very wide rim, on which the inscription, of which we give a cut, is engraved.

Inscription on Offertory Dish.

Its diameter is about 9⅜ inches, and its greatest depth 1¼ inches. Mr. John Mitchell Kemble (Archaeolog. 1843, vol. xxx. pp. 40–46) regarded it as a copy made in the 10th or 11th century of a Scandinavian alms-dish used in the monastery almost from the time of its foundation in the 7th century. He renders the inscription in Saxon words: GÆ–TEOH VRÆCKO, i.e. "Offer, sinner." Mr. G. Stephens (Runic Monuments, vol. i. p. 482), on the other hand, considers it to be an original work of the 9th century, which must have found its way by gift or otherwise from the North of England, to which the words of the inscription belong. On the authority of Russian scholars he denies the Sclavonic character of the inscription (on which see Archaeolog. vol. xliv. pp. 73, 74), which is engraved "in mixt Runic and Decorated uncials." Mr. Stephens remarks that "more than once Old English charters mention an 'offring disc' presented to some church or monastery," and adds that during his residence in Scandinavia he had come across many modern examples copied from ancient works, with pious inscriptions cut or painted on them. [E. V.]

OFFICE, THE DIVINE (OFFICIUM DIVINUM). This stated service of daily prayer has been called by various names: such as Opus Dei in the rule of St. Benedict, as though it were the special work to be performed by the clergy for and to God; or Cursus, from the course of the sun which determines the hours of prayer (St. Columbanus, Reg. cap. 47), so called also by Gregory of Tours, "exsurgente Abbate cum Monachis ad celebrandum Cursum;" and by St. Boniface, bishop of Mentz, who bids his clergy "speciales horas et Cursum ecclesiae custodiant."

We also meet with the following terms used in the same sense:—Collecta in the rule of St. Pachomius; also the Greek words canon or synaxis. Also agenda in the acts of various councils, as being one of the more important duties to be performed. The term missa, also, is sometimes applied to the office for the hours of prayer. "In conclusione matutinarum vel vespertinarum missarum" (Conc. Agath.).

The name breviary, by which the Divine office, or rather the book containing it, was subsequently known, and which in common use took the place of all others, probably originated in the form of office, thus designated, being an abbreviation of a previously existing form [BREVIARY, p. 247].

The object of this article is to give an outline of the offices for the several hours of prayer, which together constitute the Divine office, as distinguished from the liturgy—of the breviary, in a word, as distinguished from the missal.

There is much obscurity as to the sources and original form of these offices. Hence many conjectures, some resting upon very slight hints. To pursue this most interesting inquiry with any fulness would far exceed the limits of an article, and we must content ourselves with the bare statement of results arrived at. It is sufficient for our purpose that the germ of the offices as they now exist may be traced to primitive, if not to Apostolic times.

But though in course of time the Eastern and Western forms of worship came to differ so much from each other, that in the opinion of a learned modern writer, the Oriental rites (i.e. of the daily office) are, as to their origin, "perfectly distinct from those of the Latin churches" (Palmer, Orig. Lit. vol. i. p. 218), it seems more probable that both the Greek and Latin offices were derived from the same source, and that the wide subsequent divergence is due to the different manner in which they were developed or added to, and largely to the different bent of the Greek and the Latin minds, and the different genius of the Greek and the Latin languages.[a] It is also probable that the germ of both Eastern and Western forms alike is to be found in the earliest Eastern forms.

This form appears to have consisted in the recitation of psalms, together with prayers and hymns, but with no lessons; and to have been designed for use during the night and in the early morning. SS. Basil and Chrysostom and others often speak of these services. The origin of these prayers has been traced with much probability to the "Eighteen prayers" used in the Jewish synagogue. [Archdeacon Freeman develops this theory with much ingenuity in his learned work The Principles of Divine Service, cap. i. sec. iii.] It may be permitted to say a few words on the origin and growth of the Western rites, and especially of the Roman. This has undoubtedly the chief interest for Western Christians, as being the mould in which the devotions of the Western church have been cast for so many centuries. Though there were countless variations of national and local use in the early and mediaeval church, yet these variations were, after all, in matters of detail which did not touch the outline or substance of the office; and all the uses, with the two important exceptions of the Ambrosian and the Mozarabic, were closely modelled on the Roman pattern.

[a] No one, I venture to think, can study the Greek and Latin office books without being struck with this difference; and few, I would add, without feeling the wonderful beauty and fitness of the Latin language for purposes of devotion.

The earliest form of the Roman office appears to have consisted solely of the psalter, so distributed as to be recited once a week. At the end of the appointed number of psalms for the daily office Pater noster was said. This seems to have constituted the entire office, which contained no lessons, hymns, or collects. Traces of this custom may still be found in the title of the first part of the breviary, which is still called psalterium, though it now contains a great deal more than the psalter (indeed all the "ordinary" parts of the office, except the lessons and what is appointed with them, which are relegated to the proprium de tempore), and which is headed Psalterium dispositum per hebdomadam; and also in the fact that Pater noster is still recited at the end of the psalms of each nocturn.

Thus the author of the book de Virginitate, among the works of Athanasius, couples Pater noster with the psalms as forming a complete office; and Gregory of Tours (Vit. Patr. c. 5), when wishing to say that he had not yet recited his office, says he has not gone through his psalms: "Quod necdum Domino psalmorum decantationem debitam exsolvisset."

Lessons were in early times only read at the mass. So we find that of the early office books sent by Gregory the Great and others into Gaul, the missals alone contained any lessons. It will be seen, too, in the course of this article, that the nocturnal office [μεσονύκτιον or μεσονυκτικόν] of the Eastern church and the Mozarabic matins contain no lessons at the present time.

The first to introduce lessons into the nocturnal office appear to have been the monks, with the double object of thus obtaining variety in the office and occupation for themselves during the nocturnal watches. Thus St. Benedict in his order prescribed no lessons in the nocturnal office during the summer, when the nights are shorter; and when a question arose in the time of Charlemagne, why he had made this provision, Theodemarus, abbat of Monte Cassino, in a letter to the emperor, gives as the reason that before the time of St. Gregory the pope, it was not the custom at Rome to recite any lessons, and that that pontiff was the first to adopt them: "In Ecclesia Romana Sacras Scripturas legi mos non fuerit ante B. Greg. Pap." &c. [LECTION.]

Cassian, also, when describing the nocturnal office of the monks of Palestine, says only that after twelve[b] psalms they recited a prayer, and, on Sunday only, two lessons.

To this earliest form of office, psalms and Pater noster, the Apostles' Creed was added; and it is supposed that pope Damasus [A.D. 366–384] sanctioned an order of distribution of psalms, acting with the co-operation of St. Jerome, who is also reputed to have framed an order of lessons, known as Cones Hieronymi, or simply Liber Comes or Liber Comitis. [LECTIONARY.]

Whenever the lessons were finally made part of the office, it is clear that the course in which Scripture should be read was fixed definitely and by authority. For in all the variety of breviaries of the Roman type, however much the individual lessons may vary—and there are great variations—certain books are read in all at certain seasons; so that Isaiah is universally read in Advent, St. Paul's Epistles in the Epiphany season, Genesis and the rest of the Pentateuch from Septuagesima onwards, Jeremiah in Passiontide, the Acts of the Apostles and the Catholic Epistles in Eastertide, and the historical, moral, and prophetical books from Trinity Sunday onwards. The Gospels were read at the Mass, and so do not appear in the course of daily r[illegible]. Indeed, so firmly has this sequence of [illegible]s rooted itself into the mind of the church, that the modern French breviaries, which utterly revolutionised the order of saying the psalter, respected the course of Scripture reading, while often altering and lengthening the individual lessons.[c]

Gregory the Great added antiphons and responsories: and this, with the exception of minor enrichments, the date and origin of which it is often difficult to ascertain, brought the office to the degree of maturity which is sufficient for our present purpose, and, to the form in which it substantially exists and is used at the present day. Later modifications and revisions are beyond our scope.

We now proceed to give a skeleton of the offices themselves, beginning with those of the orthodox Eastern church. Details would be here unsuitable, and, unless entered into more fully than the space at command permits, would confuse what they were meant to elucidate.

The daily offices of the Greek church are contained in the HOROLOGIUM [p. 784]. They are arranged, beginning with the nocturnal office.

The following is the order of the offices:—

After a short introductory form of prayer to be said on rising from bed [ἐξαναστὰς τῆς κλίνης] follows:—

The Office of the daily Midnight Service.
[ἀκολουθία τοῦ καθ' ἡμέραν μεσονυκτικοῦ.]
Introduction.

If there be a Priest, he says:—

"Blessed be our God, now and for ever and ever. Amen."

[εὐλογητὸς ὁ Θεὸς ἡμῶν, νῦν καὶ ἀεὶ, καὶ εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων. Ἀμήν.][d]

If there be no Priest, say:—

"By the prayers of our holy Fathers, O Lord Jesu Christ our God, have mercy upon us. Amen."

[διὰ εὐχῶν τῶν ἁγίων Πατέρων ἡμῶν, Κύριε Ἰησοῦ Χριστὲ ὁ Θεὸς ἡμῶν, ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς. Ἀμήν.]

[b] It will be remembered that twelve is the number of psalms appointed for the nocturnal of ordinary days both in the Gregorian and Benedictine psalters.

[c] The reformed Church of England also respects this order in its Sunday lessons, which begin in Advent with Isaiah, at Septuagesima with Genesis, and which during the summer and autumn are taken from the historical and prophetical books.

[d] This formula is known in the books as ὁ εὐλογητός; and the priest is said ποιεῖν εὐλογητόν.

"Glory be to Thee, O our God, glory be to Thee."
[Δόξα σοι, ὁ Θεὸς ἡμῶν, δόξα σοι.]

A short prayer to God the Holy Ghost for protection and purification, beginning:

Βασιλεῦ οὐράνιε, Παράκλητε, τὸ Πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας, κ.τ.λ.

and known as Βασιλεῦ οὐράνιε.

"O Holy God, Holy and Mighty, Holy and Eternal, have mercy upon us."

["Ἅγιος ὁ Θεός. Ἅγιος, Ἰσχυρός, Ἅγιος Ἀθάνατος, ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς, known as the τρισάγιον.]

Three bowings of the head [μετανοίαι[a] τρεῖς] Gloria Patri [in its Eastern form, i.e. Δόξα Πατρὶ, καὶ Υἱῷ καὶ ἁγίῳ Πνεύματι, καὶ νῦν, καὶ ἀεὶ, καὶ εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων. Ἀμήν. Often printed in the office books δόξα καὶ νῦν]. A short prayer to the Holy Trinity for pardon, and known from its opening words as Παναγία τρίας. The Lord's Prayer, with the Doxology. Kyrie eleison twelve times. Glory. Both now.

The invitatory in three clauses as follows:—

"O come let us worship and fall down before God our King.

O come let us worship and fall down before Christ our King and God.

O come let us worship and fall down before Christ Himself our King and God."

[Δεῦτε προσκυνήσωμεν καὶ προσπέσωμεν τῷ Βασιλεῖ ἡμῶν Θεῷ.

Δεῦτε πρσκ. . . . . Χριστῷ τῷ Βασ. ἡμ. Θεῷ.

Δεῦτε πρσκ. . . . . αὐτῷ Χριστῷ, κ.τ.λ.]

Three bowings of the head.

After this introduction the office proceeds as follows:—

Ps. 50[c] [51]; Ps. 118 [119] (called the ἑξάψαλμος), said in three divisions [στάσεις], each ending with Glory; And now; three Alleluias, and three bowings of the head. Then the [Nicene] (i.e. what is commonly called so, and so throughout the article) Creed, the trisagion, the Most Holy Trinity, the Lord's Prayer, and two troparia or hymns in rhythmical prose, suitable to midnight. Then a theotokion (or short hymn addressed to the Blessed Virgin, commemorative of the Incarnation); Kyrie eleison forty times; a prayer to Christ for grace and protection, and a few short ejaculatory prayers, the details of which vary with the day. From Sept. 22 to Palm Sunday a long prayer of St. Basil is said in this place.

At this point the second watch, or nocturn, may be considered to begin, and the office proceeds thus:—

Invitatory (as before). Pss. 120 [121], Levavi; 133 [134], Ecce nunc; Glory. Both now. Alleluia. Trisagion, three bowings of the head; Most Holy Trinity; troparia; a theotokion; Kyrie eleison twelve times; a prayer in commemoration of the departed; a short ejaculatory prayer to the Trinity, and one to the Theotokos.

Dismissal benediction.

The priest asks forgiveness from the people.[e]

A short ectene or litany, the response to each clause of which is Kyrie eleison.

The foregoing is the form of the midnight office [μεσονυκτικῶν] for week days, Saturday excepted. On Saturday the office is the same up to the end of Ps. 50 [51]. Then follows:—

Pss. 64 [65], 65 [66], 66 [67], said in one stasis, followed by Glory; Both now; and three Alleluias.

Ps. 67 [68], said similarly as a second stasis, and Pss. 68 [69], 69 [70], said as a third.

Troparia and a longer prayer of the same nature as, though different from, those in the office for other days in the week.

The second portion of the office for Saturday, from the second occurrence of the Invitatory onwards, is the same as for other week days.

On Sundays the office is the same as on other days as far as the end of Ps. 50 [51]. Then follows the triadic canon (i.e. a canon having reference to the Trinity), and some troparia of similar import called triadica [τριαδικά]. Then the trisagion and other short formularies, including Kyrie eleison forty times; the dismissal: the whole concluding with the same ectene or litany as before.

Lauds [τὸ ὄρθρον]:—

Blessed be, &c. Invitatory (as at the nocturnal office).[h]

Pss. 19 [20], 20 [21];[i] Glory; Both now; trisagion; Most Holy Trinity; the Lord's Prayer; certain troparia, and a few responsory petitions for priest and people.

Then the six psalms following, known as the Hexapsalmus, prefaced by—

"Glory to God in the Highest, and on earth peace; good will towards men" [said thrice].

"Thou shalt open my lips, O Lord, and my mouth shall shew forth thy praise" [said twice]:—

Pss. 3, 37 [38], 62 [63], 87 [88], 102 [103], 142 [143], each with its antiphon.

Twelve Morning prayers [ἑωθιναὶ εὐχαί] are said by the priest while the last three of these psalms are being recited. A few stichoi (nearly corresponding to our versicles), the troparia of the day, and the appointed portion or portions of psalms for the day (each portion being called a Cathisma [κάθισμα]).

Ps. 50 [51]. The canon, with the nine odes,[j] or only certain verses [στίχοι] from them, according to the day and the length of the troparia (or stanzas) of the canon. Then follow other troparia, or short hymns, under various names, but all of the same character.

The lauds [οἱ αἶνοι], i.e. Pss. 148, 149, 150.

The great doxology [i.e. Gloria in excelsis].

[a] μετάνοιαι are divided into μετ. μικραί, i.e inclinations of the head alone, what the Roman ceremonial calls "modica inclinatio," and μετ. μεγάλαι, which are made by bending the knee and prostration to the ground. When the word occurs, as in the text, without an epithet, μετ. μικραί are signified.

[b] Throughout this article the psalms are numbered according to the Greek and Latin versions, as they stand numbered in the office books. The number according to the English version, when it differs, is placed afterwards in brackets.

[e] This rite corresponds to the alternate Confiteor of the priest and people in the Roman offices. The priest is said in technical phrase λαβεῖν συγχώρησιν.

[h] This introduction is slightly varied during Lent.

[i] The distribution of Psalms will be given under PSALMODY; but for clearness, the fixed Psalms used in the daily offices are specified in this article.

[j] I.e. the Ode for the day. They are as follows: Ode 1, Song of Moses, Exod. xv.; Ode 2, Song of Moses, Deuter. xxxii.; Ode 3, Song of Hannah, 1 Sam. ii.; Ode 4, Song of Habakkuk, Hab. iii.; Ode 5, Song of Isaiah, Is. xxvi. 9; Ode 6, Song of Jonah, Jon. iii.; Ode 7, Song of the Three Children, Dan. iii. 1st part; Ode 8, Benedicite, Dan. iii.; Ode 9, Magnificat and Benedictus.

Versicles [στίχοι, chiefly from the Psalms, and corresponding to the Western preces].

Litany, &c.; dismissal.

This office, of which the foregoing is an outline, varies in detail on Sundays and certain other days. These variations are, for the sake of simplicity, omitted.

The hours [αἱ ὧραι]. First hour[k]:—

Invitatory (as before). Pss. 5, 89 [90], 100 [101], without antiphons.

A few stichoi, a theotokion, trisagion (Most Holy Trinity), the Lord's Prayer; a theotokion varying with the day of the week. A short prayer to Christ the true light, that He would shew the light of His countenance. The dismissal. [There are slight variations on Sundays and in Lent.]

The mesorion of the first hour:—

The invitatory. Pss. 45 [46], 91 [92], 92 [93]. Trisagion, Most Holy Trinity, the Lord's Prayer, two troparia, a theotokion, Kyrie eleison forty times; Glory; Both now; a short hymn to the Theotokos; three great reverences, i.e. prostrations [μετανοίαι μεγάλαι γ']; and two prayers of St. Basil for protection and blessing during the day. Glory. Both now. Dismissal.

The third, sixth, and ninth hours, each with its mesorion, are of precisely the same form as the first, consisting, after the introduction, each of three psalms, troparia, &c., and ending with a prayer, so that it seems unnecessary to set them out. These parts are different for each hour. The psalms are:—

At the third hour, Pss. 16 [17], 24 [25], 50 [51]. At the mesorion of the third hour, Pss. 29 [30], 31 [32], 60 [61]. At the sixth hour, Pss. 53 [54], 54 [55], 90 [91]. At the mesorion of the sixth hour, Pss. 55 [56], 56 [57], 69 [70]. At the ninth hour, Pss. 83 [84], 84 [85], 85 [86]. At the mesorion of the ninth hour, Pss. 112 [113], 137 [138], 139 [140].

In addition to these hours, there is an office called the typica [τὰ τυπικά], which is said after the sixth or the ninth hour, according to the season of the year. Its origin is obscure. The office is as follows:—

Pss. 102 [103]. Glory, 145 [146]. Both now. [In Lent[l] the psalms of the ninth hour are said instead of these.]

A short prayer to Christ for salvation.

The blessings [οἱ μακαρισμοί]. These are the blessings from the sermon on the mount (St. Matt. v. 3–12 (to great is your reward in heaven)), and are said with the clause, "Remember us, O Lord, when Thou comest in Thy kingdom," said as an antiphon at the beginning, and repeated after each blessing.

The tersanctus[m] thrice repeated, with a verse and Glory interposed between the first two repetitions; and Both now after the third.

The Nicene Creed, followed by a short prayer for pardon. The Lord's Prayer.

Then, if it be a Sunday or a saint's day, which is festivated, the contakion[n] of the day. If not, then first the contakion of the transfiguration, and afterwards that for the day of the week. These have reference on Monday to the heavenly host [τὰ ἀσώματα]; on Tuesday, to the forerunner [i.e. the Baptist, ὁ πρόδρομος]; on Wednesday and Friday, to the cross; on Thursday, to the holy apostles; on Saturday, to the departed [τὸ νεκρώσιμον]. Then one or two more short troparia of the usual type; the trisagion, &c.; a short prayer to the Holy Trinity: and the office ends with Ps. 33 [34]. The office before meat [ἀκολουθία τῆς τραπέζης] is used in monasteries, printed in this place in the Horologium; but it does not come within the scope of this article.

Vespers [τὸ ἑσπερινόν]:—

The priest begins, "Blessed be our God," &c. [ποιεῖ εὐλογητόν.] The invitatory; Ps. 103 [104], called the prooemiac psalm [τὸν προοιμιακὸν ψαλμόν].

The appointed section or cathism [κάθισμα] of the psalter. Pss. 140 [141], 141 [142], said as one psalm and called the Κύριε ἐκέκραξα from the opening words.

Stichi [στίχοι], i.e. versicles from the Psalms, and Ps. 116 [117]. The hymn "Joyful light" [φῶς ἱλαρόν].[o] The prokeimenon [προκείμενον] for the day. These vary with the day of the week, but are all of the same form. That for Sunday is:—

"Behold now praise the Lord, all ye servants of the Lord."

Stichos. "Ye that stand in the house of the Lord in the courts of the house of our God."

A prayer for protection, &c., during the night. More versicles from the Psalms, called here aposticha [ἀπόστιχα]. Those for ordinary days are Ps. 122 [123], said in two stichi.

Nunc dimittis, trisagion, &c., and dismissal.

[In Lent and at certain other seasons there are variations in the concluding part of the office, which it is unnecessary to specify.]

The foregoing is the order of daily vespers as given in the Horology (9th ed. Venice). When there is a vigil, an abbreviated form, omitting the section from the psalms, &c. is said; and after compline, great vespers are said. These are an amplification of the ordinary form, and include sections from Scripture, and the rite known as a lite [λιτή], and on great days finishes with the benediction of the loaves. [See those articles.] To specify the variations would go beyond our limits.

Compline [ἀπόδειπνον]:—

There are two forms of compline: ἀπ. μέγα and ἀπ. μικρόν. Great compline is said in Lent; little compline at other seasons.

The order of great compline:—

This is an office of great length and interest, and may be considered as divided into three parts, each beginning with the invitatory. "Blessed be our God," &c., with the usual introduction and invitatory. In the first week in Lent the (so called) great canon is said. At other times the office begins thus:—

Pss. 4, 6, 12 [13]. Three inclinations and Kyrie eleison thrice. Pss. 24 [25], 30 [31], 90

[k] This hour is said continuously with lauds, and so begins at once with the invitatory. If said separately, it would be prefaced by the usual introduction.

[l] τῇ μεγάλῃ τεσσαρακοστῇ, the usual term for the fast before Easter, i.e. the Western Lent.

[m] By this is meant the "Holy, Holy, Holy" from the liturgy, as distinguished from the trisagion.

[n] Id. a short hymn.

[o] This hymn is well known in its English translation. It is called in the Greek ἡ ἐπιλύχνιος εὐχαριστία, or ὕμνος τριαδικός. It is attributed by St. Basil (de Spir. Sanct. c. 29) to Athenogenes the Martyr, circ A.D. 175. It appears to have been reduced to its present form by Sophronius, Patriarch of Jerusalem, circ. A.D. 629.

[91]. Kyrie eleison thrice. The following stichi said alternately by the choir:—

"God is with us, know ye nations, and be confounded,
For God is with us.
Give ear to the ends of the earth,
For God is with us."

[And so on for twenty clauses, with the same response after each, taken from Isaiah viii. and ix. and ending thus]:—

"Wonderful, Counsellor,
For God is with us.
The mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace.
For God is with us.
The Father of the age to come,
For God is with us. Glory," &c.[p]

Then certain troparia, the Nicene Creed, invocations to the Theotokos and the saints.

Several other troparia, and a prayer of St. Basil for protection and purity.

The invitatory (thrice).

Pss. 50 [51], 101 [102]; the prayer of Manasseh; troparia, &c.; and a short prayer to the Holy Trinity.

The invitatory (thrice).

Pss. 69 [70], 142 [143].

Gloria in excelsis [called the Doxology] followed by versicles of precisely the same form as the Latin preces.

Ps. 150, with the clause, "O Lord of Hosts, have mercy upon us," said as an antiphon after each verse. More troparia, &c., among which occurs a prayer to the Saviour for protection during the night, beginning ὁ ἐν παντὶ καιρῷ, καὶ πάσῃ ὥρᾳ, κ.τ.λ.

A prayer to the Theotokos.

Two prayers to the Saviour, one beginning καὶ δὸς ἡμῖν δέσποτα πρὸς ὕπνον ἀπιοῦσιν, κ.τ.λ.; the other, δέσποτα πολυέλεε, κ.τ.λ.: an ectene or litany of the usual form, and the office finishes with another prayer to the Saviour.

Little compline [ἀπόδειπνον μικρόν]:—

"Glory be to Thee, O our God, glory be to Thee."

A short prayer to the Paraclete.

The usual introduction and the invitatory.

Pss. 50 [51], 69 [70], 142 [143].

Gloria in excelsis, with the versicles following as at great compline.

The Nicene Creed, the trisagion, &c., the troparia of the day, Kyr. el. (forty times).

The prayer to the Saviour, ὁ ἐν παντὶ καιρῷ, as at great compline; a few short versicles.

Prayer to the Theotokos.

Prayer to the Saviour, καὶ δὸς ἡμῖν δέσποτα, both as at great compline; a few ejaculatory ascriptions of praise.

The dismissal.

The Western offices will not detain us long. Even those parts which are not intimately known to all are of a familiar type. They are also shorter than the Eastern, and arranged with much greater terseness and method. The Roman office is by far the most important and most widely used. The older English, French, German, and Scandinavian uses are of precisely the same form, and only differ in details, such as the calendars, commemorations of saints, order of lessons, responsories, &c.—variations which it would be at once hopeless and useless to attempt to point out, and the magnitude and importance of which have been much exaggerated. There are indeed few more striking evidences of the uniformity and organization of the Roman Church than the wide dissemination and reception of its offices into distant regions and different races, and the unanimity with which what was in essentials the same rite was observed. The only two notable exceptions are the Ambrosian and the Mozarabic offices, both of which are very different from the Roman, and of great beauty; but which were used within narrow limits, and so are of much smaller practical importance. They will be described.

The Roman hours are seven or eight in number, according as matins and lauds are counted as one or two, i.e., Matins, lauds, prime (or the hour), the third, sixth, and ninth hours, vespers, compline. Taking them in order we have:

1. Matins (matutinum):—

These consist on Sundays and double feasts of three nocturns. On simple feasts and week days of one. Easter day and Pentecost with their octaves have only one nocturn with three psalms. The office for Sunday and feasts of nine lessons is as follows:

N.B. Before matins and all hours except compline is said secretly, Pater noster, Ave Maria; and at the beginning of matins and prime, and at the end of compline, the Apostles' Creed.

Then with a loud voice—

"Domine labia mea aperies,
Et os meum annunciabitur laudem tuam.
Deus in adjutorium, &c.
Domine ad adjuvandum, &c.
Gloria; sicut; alleluia;"

except when alleluia is not said, i.e. from Septuagesima to Easter, when "Laus tibi Domine rex aeternae gloriae" is said instead.

Invitatory, and the invitatory psalm, 94 [95].

Hymn (varying with the day and season).

In nocturn i. Psalms as appointed [12 on Sundays, 3 on feasts]. A verse and response. Pater noster, short form of absolution (absolutio), three lessons from Scripture in course, each preceded by its benediction, and followed by its responsory.

In nocturn ii. Three psalms, each with its antiphon. Verse and response. Pater noster, absolution. Three lessons from the patristic writings, each with its benediction and responsory.

In nocturn iii. The same as in nocturn ii., the lessons being a commentary on the gospel of the day from some homily. Instead of the last responsory, Te Deum is said, except in Advent, and from Septuagesima to Easter, when it is only said on festivals. When Te Deum is not said, there is a responsory instead.

[On week days, and when the office is of three lessons, there is one nocturn only, containing twelve psalms under six antiphons.]

2. Lauds:—

Deus in adjutorium, &c. Gloria, &c. Alleluia or Laus tibi Domine, &c., according to the season, as at matins.

Five psalms [i.e. what is reckoned as such, said under five antiphons and five Glorias]. On [p] It is impossible within reasonable limits to give more than the skeleton of this long and intricate office, even could more be attempted without sacrifice of clearness. The troparia, &c., are all of the ordinary form.

Sunday [except from Septuagesima to Easter] these are—

Pss. 92 [93], 99 [100], 62 [63], and 66 [67] (said as one), Benedicite, 148, 149, 150 (said as one).

On week days the psalms are[q] (1) 50 [51], (2) varies with the day of the week, (3) 62 [63] and 66 [67], (4) a canticle varying with the day of the week, (5) 148, 149, 150.

Capitulum, i.e. a verse from the Scriptures.[r] Hymn (varying with the day). A verse and response. Benedictus. Collect for the day. Commemorations (if any are said).

3. Prime:—

Pater noster. Ave Maria. Credo. Deus in adjutorium, &c. Hymn, "Jam lucis orto sidere." Four psalms (on Sunday), 53 [54], 117 [118], 118 [119] (first four sections of eight verses said as two). On week days, 54 [54], a varying psalm, 118 [119] (the same as on Sunday). The Athanasian Creed (when the service is on the Sunday,[s] and on Trinity Sunday). Capitulum.

Resp. "Christe fili Dei vivi. Miserere nobis (bis). V. Qui sedes ad dexteram Patris. R. Miserere nobis. V. Gloria, &c. R. Christe fili, &c. V. Exsurge Christe, adjuva nos. R. Et libera nos propter nomen tuum."

Then follow these preces, which are not said when the office is double, or within octaves. Kyrie eleison (ter), Pater noster, Credo.

Preces of the ordinary form of verse and response. Alternate confiteor and misereatur by priest and choir. A few more alternate versicles. Then, whether the office be double or not, the Oratio, "Domine Deus Omnipotens,"[t] &c.

V. Benedicamus Domino. R. Deo gratias.

On week days the Athanasian Creed is not said: in other respects the office is said as above. In Advent, Lent, and on certain other days, additional preces are said before the confiteor, from which point the office proceeds as usual.

4. Terce:—

Pater, Ave, Deus in adjutorium. Hymn, "Nunc sancte nobis Spiritus."

Six sections of eight verses of Ps. 118 [119], said in three, under one antiphon. Capitulum. Responsio brevis. Collect for the day.

5, 6. Sext and none are of precisely the same form, and require no separate remark. At sext the hymn is "Rector potens, verax Deus," and at none "Rerum tenax Deus vigor."

When preces are said at lauds, a short form of preces is said at terce, sext, and none immediately before the collect for the day.

7. Vespers:—

Pater, Ave, Deus in adjutorium. Five psalms as appointed, each with its antiphon. Capitulum. Hymn (varying with the day and season). Verse and response. That for ordinary Sunday and week days is

V. Dirigatur Domine oratio mea. R. Sicut incensum in conspectu tuo.

Magnificat (with its proper antiphon). Collect for the day. Commemorations, when said.

[q] See PSALMODY for details.

[r] That for ordinary Sundays is Rev. vii. 12, "Blessing," &c. That for ordinary week days, Rom. xiii. 12, "The night is far spent," &c.

[s] I.e. when a double feast, which takes precedence of an ordinary Sunday, does not fall on the day.

[t] The original of our third Collect at Morning Prayer.

When preces are said at lauds, they are also said at vespers after magnificat.

8. Compline:—

Lector. Jube Domne benedicere.
Lened. Noctem quietam, &c.
Lectio brevis. 1 Pet. v. 8.
V. Adjutorium nostrum in nomine Domini.
R. Qui fecit coelum et terram.

Pater, Confiteor, &c., alternately, as at prime.

V. Converte nos Deus salutaris noster.
R. Et averte iram tuam a nobis.
Deus in adjutorium, &c.

Pss. 4, 30 [31], (1–6), 90 [91], 133 [134], said under one antiphon.

Hymn, "Te lucis ante terminum." Capitulum (Jerem. xiv. 9). Responsio brevis. Nunc dimittis (with its antiphon). Kyrie eleison (ter), Pater, Credo, and short preces. The collect "Visita quaesumus," &c. Benediction.

No notice has here been made of the short capitular office at the end of prime, or of the antiphons to the B.V.M., of which one is said daily after lauds and compline.

The Roman office here given in outline is the model on which the secular breviaries throughout the Roman obedience were formed. These were universally of the same form, though differing in many details, and local commemorations and usages. The Gregorian distribution of the psalter is always adopted.[u]

In the old English uses the hymns and antiphons at compline varied with the season; and every day after compline and lauds, except in double feasts and during certain octaves and in Christmas and Eastertides, a short form consisting of Ps. 122 [123], a few versicles, and a collect was said "pro pace ecclesiae." When this was said at lauds, a similar form for protection during the day was said after prime.

The monastic office, of which the Benedictine is the type, differs from the secular in many respects, the chief of which are the following:

(1) The Benedictine distribution of the psalter is used and not the Gregorian.

(2) On Sundays, and days with three nocturns. There are four lessons in each nocturn, there are six Psalms in both the first and second nocturns, and three canticles in the third, each with responsory. Those of the first nocturn are from Scripture; those of the second from the writings of the fathers, or from the lives of the saints; those of the third from patristic exposition of the gospel. Te Deum is said after (not instead of) the ninth responsory, and then follow the gospel and collect of the day.

(3) On week days, and days of three lessons, twelve psalms are said in two nocturns; six in each. In the first nocturn three lessons, mostly from Scripture, are read. In the second nocturn there are no lessons. In the weekday office of the Benedictine rites, from Easter to Nov. 1, no lessons are read, but only a Lectio brevis, varying with the day of the week.

(4) There are no preces in Lent, &c., at lauds and vespers.

(5) Ps. 30 [31], ver. 1–6, and Nunc dimittis are not said at compline, except on the three last days of the Holy week.

[u] No account is taken of modern French and other breviaries, which do not come within the prescribed limits of time. These do not differ in form.

The Ambrosian office, which is still used in the diocese of Milan, except in the Swiss portion, which adheres to the Roman rite,[v] requires more detailed notice. Its origin and, still more, the steps by which it arrived at its final shape, are involved in much obscurity. It is undoubtedly of high antiquity, and originally framed by St. Ambrose. St. Simplician, who succeeded him as archbishop of Milan (A.D. 397), is said to have made many additions. It is probable that during the following century the office assumed its complete form as to its main features, and was afterwards gradually perfected in details. When St. Charles Borromeo became archbishop, he set to work to restore the ancient rites of the Milanese church, into which he complains that much had been introduced without authority from time to time by individual priests; and by comparison of the office, as he found it, with ancient documents and the "Ambrosian Institutes," and with the help of learned men, to bring it back as far as possible to the original form described by the most distinguished writers on the divine offices, and especially by his predecessor Theodorus.[w]

The Ambrosian office then, in its present form, which we are obliged to quote, owing to the uncertainty of earlier forms, is in outline as follows:—

Matins (Ad Matutinum):—

Pater noster. Ave Maria [secreto]. Deus in adjutorium, &c. Domine ad adjuvandum, &c. Gloria. Sicut. Hymn, "Aeterne rerum conditor" [said daily] Responsory [varying with the day].

The Song of the Three Children ["Benedictus es," &c. vv. 29–34] with its antiphon. Benedictus es Deus. R. Amen.

[The foregoing is common to all matins.]

Then: On Sundays three canticles said in three nocturns, one in each, each with antiphon.

In Noct. i. Song of Isaiah [from chap. xxvi.] De nocte vigilat.

In Noct. ii. Song of Hannah [from 1 Sam. ii.].

In Noct. iii. in Winter (i.e. from the first Sunday in October till Palm Sunday) the Song of Habakkuk [Hab. iii.].

In Noct. iii. in Summer (i.e. from Easter till the last Sunday in September) the Song of Jonah [Jon. ii.].

[On Sundays no psalms are said at nocturns.]

On week days, the appointed section of the psalms, called a decuria, said in three nocturns [v. art. PSALMODY].

Then follow three lessons.

On Sundays from a homily on the Gospel.

On week days from the Holy Scriptures read in course.

Each lesson is prefaced by a benediction; and the first two are followed by a response, and the third by Te Deum when said. When not said, there is no third response.

The benedictions are more varied than in the Roman rite. The responses, on the contrary, are for the most part not so full or rich.

Lauds:—

The following is the order for Sundays and the more important festivals of saints:—

Deus in adjutorium, &c. Benedictus, with its proper antiphon.

[On Sundays in Advent, Christmas Day and its octave, and on the Epiphany, Attende coelum [Deut. xxxii.] is said instead of Benedictus.]

Kyrie eleison (ter).

An antiphon called antiphona ad crucem, proper to the day, and said five, or on some days seven times.

The Song of Moses ["Cantemus Domino," from Exod. xv.] with its proper antiphon, and prefaced by an unvarying oratio secreta.

Benedicite with antiphon and oratio secreta.

A collect (oratio 1^ma^) [varying with the season].

Pss. 148, 149, 150, 116 [117] said under one antiphon. A capitulum and antiphon [both varying with the office]. A direct[x] psalm [varying with the day of the week]. Hymn [varying with the office]. Kyrie eleison (duodecies). Psallenda[y] i. and completorium i. Oratio ii. responsorium in baptisterio, a Psalm of four verses [varying with the day]. Oratio iii. Psallenda ii. and completorium ii. Oratio iv. [Commemorations, if any], and the office ends thus:—

V. Benedicat, et exaudiat nos Deus. R. Amen.
V. Procedamus in pace. R. In nomine Christi.
V. Benedicamus Domino. R. Deo gratias. Pater noster.
V. Sancta Trinitas nos semper salvet et benedicat. R. Amen.
V. Fidelium animae per Dei misericordiam requiescant in pace. R. Amen.[z]

On week days the office varies thus:—

Instead of Cantemus Domino and Benedicite, Ps. 50 [51] is said on all days but Saturday. Ps. 117 [118] is said on Saturday.

There are no psallenda. The resp. in bapt. and the four verses of a psalm are always said, and there are three collects instead of four.

There are variations in the arrangement of the details of the office at special seasons and on festivals.

Prime:—

Pater noster, &c., as at the beginning of all the hours. Hymn, "Jam lucis orto sidere." Pss. 53 [54], 118 [119] (four first sections of eight verses). Epistolella,[a] a few versicles and responses. Athanasian creed (called simply symbolum).

Then on Sundays and the higher class of festivals three collects, of which the first is the same as the corresponding Roman collect, and the office ends,—

V. Benedicamus Domino. R. Deo gratias.

Then the martyrology is read in choir.

On other days, after the symbolum, preces are

[v] When Cardinal Gaisruch in the present century attempted to impose the Ambrosian Liturgy on this portion of the diocese, the public voice answered, "Either Romans or Lutherans."

[w] Archbishop of Milan, circ. A.D. 480. He wrote a commentary on the nocturnal and matutinal office of the Milanese church. See preface to the Ambrosian Breviary as edited by Cardinal Gaisruch, A.D. 1841.

[x] So called because said straight through, and not antiphonally.

[y] These, and other similar names, are all antiphons of much the same character.

[z] This ending is common to all the hours.

[a] This corresponds exactly with the Roman capitulum.

said. These are of the same character as the Roman preces at prime, but longer, and the petitions are different, and they end with Ps. 50 [51].

Terce, sext, and none are in form exactly similar to the Roman offices for those hours. On ordinary week days short preces are said at each hour, the form containing a psalm. These are, at prime Ps. 50 [51], at sext 56 [57], at none 85 [86].

Vespers are said thus:—Pater noster, &c. An antiphon called lucernarium [proper for the office]. Antiphona in choro [proper]. Hymn [proper]. Five psalms with their antiphons. Oratio. Magnificat [with proper antiphon]. Oratio. Psallenda i. and resp. in bapt. (if said). Oratio iii. Four-verse psalm, with antiphon (if said). Two completoria. Oratio iv. Psallenda ii. and two more completoria. Oratio v. Conclusion of office.

The first two orationes are proper to the office; the other three are fixed.

On week days, after Magnificat the office continues as follows:—

Oratio ii. Resp. in bapt. Oratio iii. Four-verse psalm with antiphon. A completorium. Oratio iv. and conclusion.

The four collects on week days vary with the day of the week.

On festivals two psalms (or rather what are counted as two) are said at different points of the office, the arrangement of the component parts of which differs in some respects from the ferial arrangement. There are also certain variations at special seasons, as in Lent and Eastertide, into which it is not necessary to enter.

Compline closely resembles the Roman, though the materials are somewhat differently arranged. The office runs thus:—

Pater, Ave. Converte nos, &c. Deus in adjutorium, &c. Hymn ("Te lucis ante terminum"). Pss. 4, 30 [31] (1–6), 90 [91], 132 [133], 133 [134], 116 [117], said without an antiphon, and the last three under one Gloria. Epistolella. Nunc dimittis. Antiphon and response.

On ordinary week days preces of the usual form containing Psalm 12 [13]. Two collects,[b] "Illumina quaesumus Domine" and "Visita quaesumus Domine." Conclusion.

When preces are not said, the collects or orationes follow immediately the response after Nunc dimittis.

In Lent an additional hymn is said after the psalms.

The Mozarabic or Spanish office differs widely from all others. It is of high antiquity. The Spanish tradition would trace its origin to St. Peter, to disciples of whom and of St. Paul it assigns the introduction of Christianity into Spain,[c] and maintains that it should be called originally Roman and Gothic, after the conversion of Reccaredus, king of the Goths, to the Catholic faith, and the public abjuration of the Arian heresy in the third council of Toledo, A.D. 589. Subsequently St. Isidore, archbishop of Seville, and his brother Leander, who was a friend of Gregory the Great, revised and expurgated the office, which had contracted many flaws, and it is hence often known as the Isidorian rite. At a later period Cardinal Ximenes, "quasi apis argumentosa," again revised the office and reduced it to its final form.

The opinion now generally accepted is that the Mozarabic rite is a variety of the so-called Gallican or Ephesine family, which professedly traces back to St. John. The groundwork of the office was probably introduced with Christianity into Spain. To enforce uniformity of use the Council of Gerona [A.D. 517] directed that the order of celebrating mass and the Divine office, which was used in the Metropolitan church of Tarragona, should be alone adopted throughout the province. Gregory VII. [A.D. 1073–1085] directed the use of the Spanish office to be abolished, and the Roman introduced in its place. After some resistance this was effected. Afterwards so strong a feeling was manifested at Toledo in favour of the national rite, that its use was sanctioned in seven of the old churches of Toledo, the Roman being adopted into the others. Cardinal Ximenes afterwards built and endowed the so-called Mozarabic chapel in Toledo cathedral for the maintenance of the rite.[d]

The hours are the same as the Roman, with the addition of Aurora, which is said when the office is of the week day [in feriis].[e]

All the hours begin as follows:—

Kyrie eleison, Christe eleison, Kyrie eleison. Pater noster. Ave (secreto).

In nomine Domini nostri Jesu Christi lumen cum pace. R. Deo gratias.

Dominus vobiscum. V. Et cum, &c.

Matins[f] [matutinum] proceed thus:—

On Sundays, hymn, "Aeterne rerum conditor," followed by a prayer (oratio), having reference to the contents of the hymn.

Pss. 3, 50 [51], 56 [56], each with its antiphon. Oratio.

Three antiphons,[g] each followed by an oratio [tres antiphonae cum suis orationibus]. Responsory with its oratio.

[b] Our third collect at Evening Prayer, said at compline in the Sarum and other English offices. The Roman collect at compline is "Visita quaesumus Domine."

[c] Vide Preface to Mozarabic Breviary by Lorenzana.

[d] The legend is familiar how the two books, the Roman and Mozarabic, contended by the ordeal of battle, a Frenchman being champion for the Roman Book (the Roman office had at that time been established in France), a native of Toledo for the Mozarabic. The Frenchman is said to have conquered. The result however was not taken as conclusive, and the books were submitted to the further ordeal of fire; whereupon the Roman leaped out of the fire, while the Mozarabic remained uninjured by the flames: "Romanus ex igne procedit; Gothicus sub flammis illaesus." The inference drawn was that the Roman book should be generally used throughout the kingdom, while the Mozarabic should be continued in use at head-quarters, i.e. in Toledo.

[e] The Mozarabic hours are said to have been originally twelve in number, the four rejected ones being at the beginning of night, "in principio noctis;" before bedtime, "ante lectum;" at midnight, "media noctis;" and on rising from bed, "in surrectione lecti."

[f] The office for the day begins, as in other rites, with vespers of the preceding evening; but in a short conspectus, such as alone is possible, it seems more convenient to begin with matins.

[g] The Mozarabic antiphons are broken into verse and response, after the manner of a Roman responsory. [See art. ANTIPHON.]

On week days there is no hymn and only one psalm, which is one of the three Sunday psalms, with its oratio. The remainder of the office is of the same form as that for Sunday.

Lauds begin at once with a varying canticle [on Sunday "Attende coelum," Deut. xxxii.]. Benedictus [so called, i.e. a compressed form of the Song of the Three Children] with its antiphon.

Sono. Lauda.[h] Pss. 148, 149, 150 [called the Laudes].

A lection called prophetia, though not necessarily from the Prophets. Hymn (varying). Capitula (here signifying a prayer). Pater-noster, followed by the embolismus. Laud. Benediction.[i]

A short form of commemoration, consisting of a verse and response, here called lauda, and a short prayer for protection and guidance through the day.

Aurora:—

This service is said when the office is of the week day (in feriis per totum annum). Pss. 69 [70], and the following sections of Ps. 118 [119]: Beati immaculati, In quo corriget, Retribue servo tuo, said under one antiphon. A lauda, Pater noster (with the embolismus), a short form of intercessory prayers (preces).

Prime:—

Pss. 66 [67], 144 [145] (said in two divisions), 112 [113], 118 [119] (Adhaesit pavimento, Legem pone, Et veniat), said under one antiphon.

Responsory (varying); a short lesson (Zachar. viii.) called prophetia; second (Rom. xiii.); a lauda.

Hymn ("Jam lucis orto sidere"), except in Eastertide, when the hymn is "Aurora lucis rutilat."

V. Bonum est confiteri Domino. R. Et psallere nomini tuo altissime.

Then follows, on Sundays and festivals, Te Deum, Gloria in excelsis, and the Nicene Creed[k] [called in the rubrics symbolum apostolorum].

On week days (in diebus ferialibus), Benedictus es (as at lauds), and Ps. 50 [51].

Supplicatio [in form a short bidding prayer] beginning "Oremus mundi," &c. Capitula [a prayer]. Pater noster, &c. Benedictio. These all vary with the office.

Terce:—

Four psalms, i.e. Pss. 94 [95], 118 [119] (Memor esto, Portio mea, Bonitatem), under one antiphon. Responsory. Two short lections (similar to those at prime). Lauda, hymn, supplicatio, capitula, Pater noster, &c. Benedictio. All the parts of the office except the psalms vary with the season.

Sext and None are of exactly the same form and require no remarks.

[h] There are varieties of antiphons, as has been explained in the article ANTIPHON. It is impossible to translate these technical terms.

[i] Of this there are two forms—a longer one used on Sundays, and a shorter on other days. Pater noster is said with the response "Amen" to each clause, except to Panem nostrum, to which the response is "Quia Deus es."

[j] Mozarabic benedictions are in three clauses, each answered by "Amen." They vary with the day, and some are very beautiful.

[k] This is said in the Mozarabic rite in the plural: "Credimus in unum Deum," &c.

The psalms are: at Sext, Pss. 53 [54], 118 [119] (Feci judicium, Mirabilia, Justus es Domine). At None, Pss. 145 [146], 121 [122], 122 [123], 123 [124]. In Lent, and on certain other penitential days, the form of the office for these three hours is different, but offers no special peculiarity to call for explanation in this short survey.

Vespers:—

After the introduction, a lauda[l]; antiphon; another lauda. Hymn, supplicatio, capitula, Pater noster, &c. Benedictio, with its oratio. Sonus (or sono) [omitted "in feriis"], followed by another lauda with its oratio, and a short form of commemoration of the same form as that at lauds.

Compline:—Pss. 4, vv. 7, 8, 9; 133 [134]. A few versicles for protection and forgiveness. Hymn, "Sol angelorum respice." Ps. 90 [91], with its antiphon. More versicles from the psalms. Hymn, "Cultor Dei memento." Supplicatio, capitula, Pater noster, &c.; benedictio. At the end of the service a short form of commendation corresponding to the commemoratio at lauds and vespers.

On Saturdays and high festivals, "in diebus sabbatorum vel praecipuarum festivitatum," after the psalms[m] a responsory is said, followed by two short lessons, then a hymn, Ps. 50 [51] with a versus, said as an antiphon. Kyrie eleison, Pater noster, &c. Then on week days (in feriis) miserationes, which are short intercessory petitions in the form of litanies, with a constant response, so called because the opening words are "Miserere," or "Deus miserere," or "Domine miserere," and varying with the day of the week. Then a capitulum, Pater noster, and benedictio, and form of commendation as usual.

In the foregoing summary no notice has been taken of national or local variations of the main types of office, such as the old English uses (except in one point), or the ancient peculiarities of ritual in the churches of Lyons or Besançon, or any of the monastic variations from the normal Benedictine type. These, however interesting to liturgical students, are confined to points of detail. Neither does it come within the scope of this article to discuss or compare the contents of the several offices sketched in it. We may, however, draw attention to a few points which are obvious even from the skeletons given.

The Eastern offices, we thus see, are much longer and less methodically arranged than the Western. They contain also much less of Scripture; while the odes and canons which form so large a portion of the office, though often very beautiful and devotional, are much too prolix, and at times too rhapsodical to suit Western taste. The same may be said of the prayers.

The Western offices, on the other hand, are more clearly and compactly arranged. The hymns and collects are models of compressed thought and language. The antiphons and responses are for the most part taken from Scripture. Among the Western rites, the Roman is undoubtedly the most terse and pointed. The Ambrosian has many beauties, and is more varied in its collects and its psalmody, but less so in its ordinary hymns. Both hymns and collects are of the same type as the Roman.

[m] This means after the second set of versicles from the Psalms, and immediately before the second hymn.

The Mozarabic Office has the greatest variety of canticles, hymns, and preces. Some of these, in the form of short litanies, are very beautiful. The responsories and other variable parts of the office, though very rich and suggestive, change so constantly as almost to produce a sense of want of repose. The prayers are of the Eastern type, usually longer and more diffuse than those of other Western Offices. [H. J. H.]

OFFICIALIS LIBER (officiales libri), a book or volumes containing the officia divina. The term is used with considerable latitude of application. Ménard, in his notes on the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 147, ed. Paris, 1642), quoting Agobard, explains it as equivalent to "Antiphonarius;" but a reference to Agobard himself (Liber de Correctione Antiphonarii, cap. 19) will shew that he implies a threefold enumeration of the libri officiales, viz. the "Missal," the "Lectionary," and the "Antiphonary." Agobard was archbishop of Lyons, A.D. 814–840. This agrees with the use of the term by Amalarius (de Eccles. Off. lib. iv. cap. 29). In can. 22, C. Rotomag. it may refer to the antiphonary or the sacramentary. In can. 26, C. Tolet. iv., libellus officialis must be, as Ducange s. v. interprets it, Manuale Sacramentorum, a book which would include the minor offices, since the canon orders that parish priests were to be provided with one on their appointment, ne per ignorantiam etiam ipsis divinis sacramentis offendant; so, too, Binterim (vol. iv. p. 265). On the other hand, the treatise of Amalarius (de Eccles. Officiis) is said to be entitled in some MSS. Liber Officialis.

[C. E. H.]

OFFICIUM AD MISSAM. The name of the introit in the Mozarabic liturgy. It was probably once current throughout the whole Gallican family of liturgies, if not more widely still; for, though Mabillon (de Lit. Gallicaná, p. 36) gives "Antiphona" as the corresponding term in the Gallican liturgy, yet this is only a general name, like our "Anthem," and the similar term, officium missae, or simply officium, is found for the introit in the ancient office-books of the monastery of S. Germanus a Pratis at Paris (Bouillart, Histoire de l'Abbaye Royale de Saint-Germain des Prez, Recueil des Pièces Justificatives, 1ère partie, pp. 158–160, &c.), in the English uses of Sarum and York, and also, according to Sala (notes to Bona, Rer. Liturg. tom. i. p. 212), in the missals of the Carthusian, Carmelite, and Dominican orders. [C. E. H.]

OIL, HOLY. The later Greeks give this name especially to oil that is considered holy, because it has proceeded from or been in contact or juxtaposition with some sacred object (Ordo Sacri Minist. Philothei, in Euch. Goar, 10; see note 71, p. 34); though they still apply it to the oil of catechumens (Goar 361, 362) and the oil of the sick, τὸ ἅγιον ἔλαιον εἰς νοσοῦντας (ib. 428). Under this head we have to notice the Oil of the Cross, that of the Holy Places, the Oil of the Saints, and that taken as a remedy or safeguard from the church lamps.

THE OIL OF THE CROSS.—In the Itinerarium, doubtfully ascribed to Antoninus of Placentia, who lived in the 6th century, the writer, after describing the cross exhibited as that on which Christ died, in a cubiculum attached to the basilica of Constantine, on Golgotha, adds: "Oil to be blessed is brought there in ampullae of onyx stone; but when the wood of the cross has touched the ampullae, it soon boils over" (§ 20; Bolland. Maii, tom. ii. Prolegom.). We should infer from this that the "oil of the cross," of which we read much from the 6th century downward, was at first merely oil which had been in such contact with the cross. Perhaps we are not to understand more than this in the following instances: Cyril of Scythopolis, 555, records two cures effected by St. Sabas by means of the "oil of the holy cross" (Sabae Vita, 45, 63). He also sprinkled with it a hill haunted by evil spirits (27). St. Cyriac is said to have cured an insane person "with the oil of the cross of Christ" (Vita, Simeon Metaphr.; Migne, Ser. Gr. ii. 931). Spiridion is said to have gone to the emperor Constantius, when sick, with an earthenware vessel hung from his neck, "as is the custom with those who dwell in the holy city, when they purpose to carry oil of the divine cross" (Vita, 18; sim. Met. u. s. iii. 440). Eutychius, to prevent miscarriage, "anointed both man and wife with holy oil, both that of the precious cross" and that from an image (Life by Eustratius, vi. 45). He healed a demoniac by the same means (§ 55). In the West St. Gregory, at the end of the 6th century, acknowledges in one of his epistles, among other gifts from the East, some "oil of the holy cross ... which (quod) blesses by its touch" (Epist. vii. Ind. i. 34).

There is no indication of a belief in the foregoing writers that the oil itself was a miraculous production; but Adamnanus, A.D. 679, speaking of that which his informant Arculfus had seen at Constantinople, whither a portion of the cross was said to have been sent by Helena, says: "De nodis eorundem trinalium lignorum liquor quidam odorifer quasi in similitudinem olei expressus ... cujus videlicet liquoris si etiam parvula stillula super aegrotantes imponatur, qualicumque languore vel morbo molestati, plenum recuperant sanitatem" (Acta S. O. Ben. 3, iii. 520; or Bede, de Sanctis Locis, 20).

The ampulla of Monza, figured in Vol. I. p. 78, appears from the inscription to have been made for the reception of oil of the cross. Gretser, de Sancta Cruce, lib. i., has a chapter (91) De Oleo S. Crucis, Opp. tom. i. p. 152; Ratisb. 1734. See also Baronius, Annal. ad ann. 598, § 23.

OIL OF THE HOLY PLACES.—(1) We learn from Paulinus Petricorius, A.D. 461, that it was the custom to set vessels of oil in the places hallowed by the birth, death, burial, and ascension of our Lord, under the belief that it would acquire from them a miraculous healing power (De Vitâ S. Martini, v. l. 110).

(2) The oil of the lamps that burned in the holy places was supposed to possess the same virtue. Thus the Itinerarium of Antoninus, speaking of the holy sepulchre: "The urn of the lamp which had been placed at His head at that time [of His burial burns there day and night; out of which we took a blessing, and set it in order again" (c. 18; Bolland. Maii, tom. ii. in Prolegom.).

OIL OF THE SAINTS.—Theodoret of Cyrus, A.D. 423, thought that he heard an evil spirit addressing him one night, who among other things said, "Be assured that I should long ago have shot thee down, had I not seen a band of martyrs with James (the ascetic of Nimuza, who was still living) guarding thee." The narrator explains, "I understood that he called a band of martyrs the ampulla of the oil of the martyrs which, containing the blessing (εὐλογίαν) gathered from many martyrs, hung beside my bed" (Historia Religiosa, 21). The oil of the martyrs or saints was of five kinds: (1) That which was supposed to exude from their relics; (2) that which flowed miraculously from their tombs; (3) that which had acquired virtue from contact with, or nearness to, their relics or tombs; (4) oil that distilled from their icons; (5) oil from the lamps which burnt before their images or shrines.

(1) In the Life of John the Almoner, by Leontius of Cyprus, A.D. 590, we are told that "a sweet, health-giving unguent flowed from his precious relics" (c. 54), and the author adds that in Cyprus the same grace was given to many saints, "the sweetness of unguents flowing from their precious relics as from fountains" (c. 55). Justinian is said by Procopius to have been healed by oil that flowed from the relics of several saints (De Aedif. i. 7). Unguent (μύρα), which flowed from the bones of Glyceria, a martyr at Heraclea, had long run freely into a brazen basin. When a silver one, which without the knowledge of the donor had been used for magical purposes, was substituted, the oil ceased to flow (A.D. 583), nor did it run again until the unpolluted vessel was restored to its place (Theophylact. Simoc. Historia, i. 11). St. Myrops of Chios "collected the unguent (μύρα) that flowed from the relics of the holy martyrs and apostles" buried at Ephesus, "and healed the sick therewith." From this circumstance she even received her name (Bolland. July 13, ex Synaxariis Graecis).

(2) In the Life of St. Sampson (§ 23; Surius, June 27) we read that a healing oil used to flow from his tomb on the anniversary of a miracle performed by him. St. Bonitus "ordered the sick to be anointed with oil, which he had ordered to be raised for a blessing out of the tomb of St. Peter at Clusina in Tuscany" (Vita S. Bon. vi. 26; Bolland. Jan. 15, p. 1074). A dying woman was healed by the oil flowing from the tomb of St. Eloy (Vit., ii. 51; Surius, Dec. 1). The church of St. Mary trans Tiberium is said in the Acta S. Quirini, 8 (Boll. Jun. 4), "fundere oleum fundatoria."

In the East, SS. Andrew, Nicholas, Theodorus Stratelates (Goar, u.s. 452), and above all Demetrius, were noted for this miracle. See especially the Analecta de Unguento seu Oleo e S. Demetrii Tumulo, in the supplement to the works of Simeon Metaphrastes (iii. Migne, Ser. Gr. 116).

This substance was also called manna. Thus among the relics collected by Angilbertus at Centule was some of "the manna of St. John the Evangelist" (Scriptum S. Angil. 15, in Bolland. Feb. tom. iii. 103). See also Menolog. Basil. May 8, St. John Ev. as cited by Ducange, Gloss. Graec. v. μάννα. Gregory of Tours speaks of it as a dust, probably dust saturated with the supposed oil: "Cujus (S. Joan.) nunc sepulcrum manna in modum farinae hodieque eructat" (De Mirac. i. 30). But others speak of it as fluid (Duc. Gloss. Lat. in Manna).

(3) In the case of Demetrius, and many others, there is no ambiguity; the oil itself is supposed to be a miraculous product. But it is sometimes doubtful whether this is really meant. For there was a custom of placing oil in or near the tombs of the saints in the hope that it would derive virtue from their remains, or from the earth into which they were resolved. Thus Paulinus of Nola, A.D. 303, says of the tomb of St. Felix (Natal. 6, l. 38), that it was anointed. And again (Nat. 13, l. 590):—

> "Ista superficies tabulae gemino patet ore
> Praebens infusae subjecta foramina nardo,
> Quae cineris sancti veniens a sede reposta
> Sanctificat medicans arcana spiritus aura."

From Paulinus Petricorius, quoted above, we learn that the practice was common in the 5th century. The tomb of St. Martin was especially famous for the oil that received virtue from it (Greg. Turon. de Mirac. S. Mart. i. 2; comp. ii. 32, 51; iii. 24; iv. 36; &c.). It is, we suppose, of oil thus sanctified at the Memoria of St. Stephen that St. Augustine speaks, when he relates the recovery of a boy from apparent death on being anointed "ejusdem martyris oleo" (De Civit. Dei, xxii. viii. 18). St. Chrysostom: "Not the bones of the martyrs only, but their tombs and coffins, pour forth abundant blessing. Take holy oil, and thou wilt never suffer the shipwreck of drunkenness" (Hom. in Mart. ii. 689). A magnate of Antioch, anointed with oil from the tomb of Euthymius, was at once healed (Euthym. Vita, 127; Monum. Gr. Cotel. ii. 309).

(4) There was an icon of the Blessed Virgin at Constantinople in the 7th century, from which oil was believed to flow continually. Of this Arculfus, the French bishop who went to the Holy Land in 690, declared himself to be an eyewitness (Adamnanus, de Locis Sanctis, iii. 5).

(5) Far more common are stories of healing by oil from a lamp burnt in honour of Christ or the saints. The following examples are from the East. The wounded hand of a Saracen was healed by oil from a lamp before the icon of St. George (Mirac. S. Georg. vi. 55; Boll. Apr. 23). St. Cyrus and St. John "appeared to a person suffering from gout, and bade him take a little oil in a small ampulla from the lamp that burnt before the image of the Saviour" in the greater tetrapyle at Alexandria, and anoint his feet with it (Vitae SS. Cyr. et Joan. § 2; Boll. Jan. 31: see also Vita E thymii, 147, in Cotelerii Monum. Gr. ii. 325; Vita Lucae Jun. Combef. Auctarium, ii. 1012; Vita Eudocimi i. 9, Boll. July 30).

Similar stories are found in the Western writers. Thus Nicetius of Lyons, by means of "the oil of the lamp which burnt daily at his sepulchre, restored sight to the blind, drove demons from bodies possessed, restored soundness to shrunken limbs," &c. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iv. 37). An epileptic was cured by oil from the lamp that burnt night and day at the tomb of St. Severin (Transl. S. Sev. Auct. Joan. Diac. Boll. 8). It was revealed to a blind woman that oil from the lamp of St. Geneviève would restore her sight, if the warden of the church were to anoint her with it (Mirac. S. Genof. § 14). A week after she brought a blind man, who was healed in the same manner (ibid.). On the lamps at tombs see LIGHTS, sect. ix. p. 997.

Mabillon, in 1685, found in a private collection at Milan (Iter Ital. Ap. 28; Mus. Ital. i. 14) an "Index oleorum sacrorum quae Gregorius Magnus misit ad Theodelindam Reginam." The MS. bears the heading, "Notitia de olea (sic) Sanctorum Martyrum, qui Romae in corpore requiescunt." This he printed in 1705 in App. 3 to his tract, De Cultu Lynotorum Sanctorum. It may be seen also in the Acta Martyrum Sincera of Ruinart, p. 619, and in the Anecdota Ambrosiana of Muratori, ii. 191. It gives the name of above sixty saints, and claims many thousand more as contributing to the production of the sacred oil ("Sancti Cornili et multa milia (sic) Sanctorum"). One entry deserves to be cited from its singularity, "Oleo (sic) de sede ubi prius sedit Sanctus Petrus." Muratori (u. s.) has a disquisition bearing on the present subject.

OIL FROM THE CHURCH LAMPS USED IN HEALING.—St. Chrysostom, speaking of the ornaments of a church, says, "This table is far more honourable than that table (in your house), and this lamp than (your household) lamp: and they all know it, who, having in faith and at a happy time anointed themselves with (its) oil, have dispelled diseases" (Hom. 32 in S. Mat. Ev. § 6; vii. 373). From this we infer that oil from any church lamp was thus used, before the custom arose of setting lights before icons, and of taking the oil that fed them with a view to engage the intercession of the saint represented. We have an example in the life of Nilus the Younger, who invited a priest to his oratory, to pray over a sick person and "to anoint him with oil from the lamp." We are told that "in this manner he healed monks and laymen who were harassed by evil spirits, anointing them with oil by the hands of priests" (Vita, viii. 58, 59; Boll. Sept. 26). The practice is not extinct. In one "Office of Supplication" for the sick, printed by Goar, we have this rubric: "And he anoints him with holy oil from the lamp, saying this prayer." The heading of the prayer is, "A prayer on the unction of the sick with holy oil" (Euchol. 842). An instance in the West is related by Gregory of Tours (de Mirac. S. Mart. i. 18). In a cattle plague a person "went to the holy basilica, and took the oil of the lamps which hung from the arched roof," and anointed the animals affected with a good result. [W. E. S.]

OIL, RITUAL USES OF. (1) THE OIL OF THE CATECHUMENS, Oleum Catechumenorum, Baptizandorum.—There was a general custom from an early period of anointing catechumens once or oftener during their catechumenate with "exorcised" or "hallowed" oil. [UNCTION.] Forms for the benediction or exorcism of this oil are found in most of the ancient offices: e.g. "A thanksgiving (eucharist) touching the unction of the mystic oil" is ordered and sketched in the Apostolical Constitutions, vii. 42. As it was usual to anoint the possessed with a view to their deliverance from the power of Satan, and catechumens, as unbaptized, were considered his subjects, a similar rite would readily suggest itself as appropriate in their case.

(2) THE OIL OF CHRISM (see CHRISM).—This had a twofold use in connexion with baptism: (1) in the West, and at an early period in Egypt, it was employed by the priest immediately after baptism [BAPTISM]; and (2) it was used at confirmation both in the East and West. [UNCTION.]

(3) THE OIL OF THE SICK, Oleum Infirmorum, Oleum pro Infirmis, Oleum pro populo, εὐχέλαιον.—The use of oil with prayer for the sick was a tradition from the apostles. In our Lord's lifetime they "anointed with oil many that were diseased, and healed them" (Mark vi. 13). St. James prescribes its use to presbyters in general, "Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord" (James v. 14). There is abundant proof that the example and precept were followed. [SICK, VISITATION OF.]

Oil was blessed for the sick, not by the clergy only, but by laymen of great repute for sanctity. It was even done by women. Thus St. Monegund, about 570, on her death-bed "blessed oil and salt," which were afterwards given to the sick with good effect (Vita, § 9, in Acta S. O. Ben. i. 204; Greg. Tur. Vitae Patr. xix. 4). From the story of a nun who, having dreamt that St. Radegund her abbess, anointed her with oil, awoke healed, we may perhaps infer that it was her practice also (Radeg. Vita, i. 35, auct. Fortunato). In the West this office was restrained to the bishops at a somewhat early period. Pseudo-Innocent says that it was lawful for presbyters and others to apply "the oil of chrism" to the sick, but that it must be "made by the bishop" (Epist. i. 8). This was at Rome. The rule seems to have been enforced elsewhere much later. About 730, however, Boniface orders "all presbyters to obtain the oil of the sick from the bishop and have it by them" (Statuta, 29; ed. Würdw. 142; comp. Capit. Reg. Fr. vi. 179). The early Gallican church knew no such restriction; but Pepin, 744, seems to have borrowed it from Rome (cap. 4; in Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 158). The council of Châlons, 813, decides that "the sick ought to be anointed by the presbyters with oil, which is blessed by the bishop" (can. 48).

This rule never obtained in the East. Thus Theodore of Canterbury, by birth of Tarsus, A.D. 668: "According to the Greeks it is lawful for presbyters . . . to make exorcised oil and chrism for the sick, if it be necessary" (Capitulare apud Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. vii. 3, § 7). Among them it is now generally consecrated as required by a sick person, either in their house or in the church, by seven priests, if they can be brought together, though one is sufficient (Metrophanes Critop. Confessio, 13; in Kimmel, Monum. Fidei Orient. ii. 153; Goar, Euchol. 408, 432). The Armenian rule in the 8th century was that the priest should bless the oil of the sick, "using proper prayers, as much as was needed for the occasion" (Joan. Cathol. can. 11, Mai, u. s.).

(4) OIL IN THE AGNUS DEI.—The Ordo Romanus, about 730, tells us that at Rome, on Easter-eve, the archdeacon, coming early to the church of St. John Lateran, "pours wax into a clean vessel of large size, and mixes oil with it in the same, and blesses the wax, and pours out thereof into the figure of lambs" (Mus. Ital. ii. 31). [AGNUS DEI, Vol. I. p. 44.] The same Grifo says (32). "Similiter in suburbanis civitatibus cera faciunt," where for "cera" Pseudo-Alcuin reads "oleo" (De Div. Off. 19).

(5) OIL, THE ELEMENT IN BAPTISM.—Turribius, bishop of Astorga in Spain, A.D. 447, in a letter to two other Spanish bishops, Idacius and Ceponius, speaking of the apocryphal books received by the Priscillianists, says: "That is especially to be noted and execrated in the so-called Acts of St. Thomas, that it says that he baptized not with water, as the preaching of the Lord directs, but with oil only, which practice those books of ours (in the context, libri canonici) do not admit, but which the Manicheans follow" (Epist. § 5; ad calc. Epist. xv. Leon. M. 130, ed. Ven. 1748).

The fact of Manichean baptism in oil will hardly be doubted by those who are aware that the practice was at least not unknown among the orthodox Christians of Persia. Our authority for this is the Menology of the Greek church in its account of the martyrs Dadas, Gobdelaas, and Kasdoa. (Lesson for Sept. 29; Lib. Mens. Venet. 1628.)

(6) OIL IN THE EUCHARISTIC BREAD.—For many ages the oblates of the Nestorians and Syrian Jacobites have been made with oil. Among the former the preparation of the dough, which is accompanied by prayer, is the subject of rubrical direction. It is to be made with "fine flour and salt and olive oil, and three drops of water" (Officium Renovationis Formenti; Martene, de Ant. Eccl. i. iii. 7; sim. Badger, Nestorians, ii. 182; see also Le Brun, Explication, Diss. xi. 9).

(7) OIL IN THE FONT.—From the second century downwards, the bishop consecrated the water of baptism by prayer, though the sacrament was considered valid without it. See BAPTISM, § 42, Vol. I. p. 159. That no oil or μύρον was at first used in this consecration, or poured into the water after it, we may infer from the silence of the earlier writers. Our first witness is Pseudo-Dionysius, who is generally supposed to have written about 520: "The chief priest pours the μύρον in lines forming a cross, into the purifying font of baptism" (De Hierarch. Eccl. iv. 10; comp. ii. 7). [FONT, BENEDICTION OF, p. 680.]

The orders both of the East and West supply internal evidence of the fact, that the consecration of the water was originally considered complete without the infusion of the oil or chrism. This was a later ceremony added to the several offices at various and uncertain periods.

(8) OIL IN CHURCH LAMPS.—The lights of a church were so costly that at an early period some stated provision for them, beyond the voluntary offerings of the faithful, became necessary. We might infer this from a tradition of Eudocia, the wife of Theodosius the Younger. It is said that "on Easter Day going into the church (at Jerusalem) to celebrate the holy resurrection of Christ, she gave 10,000 sextarii of oil to be used for the lights" (Nicephorus Call. Hist. Eccles. xiv. 50). In a will ascribed to Perpetuus of Tours, about 470, we read: "From the revenues of those (estates aforenamed) let oil be furnished to light perpetually the tomb of the lord (domni) Martin" (App. ad Opp. Greg.Tur. 1318). Caesarius of Arles, 502: "Let those who are able present wax tapers, or oil to be put into the lamp" (Serm. 76, § 2). The council of Bracara, 572, directed that a third part of all the ordinary oblations of the people should be spent "pro luminariis ecclesiae" (can. 2). Gregory of Rome, in 603, gave lands and buildings to the church of St. Paul at Rome, with the proviso that all revenues therefrom should be spent on its lights (Epist. xii. 9).

OLD TESTAMENT (IN ART). The manner in which the Old Testament was generally employed in early Christian art indicates a conviction of the identity of the revelation contained in it with the fuller one made in the New Testament. The cycle of subjects selected from it for pictorial representation, and the mode in which they were intermingled with subjects from the Gospels, may be regarded as a visible exemplification of Augustine's words, "Novum Testamentum in vetere latet. Vetus Testamentum in novo patet." From the almost boundless wealth of persons and histories offering themselves to the pencil of the artist in the older books of the Bible, only those, as a rule, are chosen which the Christian consciousness regarded as typical of the great redemptive acts of Christ, or of the Sacraments of the Church. In the Western church, where alone any large remains of ecclesiastical art have been preserved to us, a rule was very speedily established in practice rigidly defining not only what subjects were suitable for employment in religious art, but the very form and arrangement in which they were to be represented. Hieratic types were prescribed for each of these chief symbolic events, from which, when once defined and accepted by the church, it was not permissible for an artist to diverge. So permanent was this formulated type, so unchanging the accessories, that a very small fragment of a fresco or a mosaic is frequently sufficient to enable us to determine its subject with perfect certainty. Instead of having the licence "quidlibet audendi," the ecclesiastical artist was confined within trammels so close that he became little more than the mechanical reproducer of authorised designs. It is needless here to repeat what has been already said [FRESCO, Vol. I. pp. 690–701] of the general character of early Christian art. It will be sufficient to indicate the subjects from the Old Testament which we find portrayed, and the type commonly followed. We would premise that we give art its widest meaning, including paintings, mosaics, the bas-reliefs of sarcophagi, gilt glasses, ivories, lamps, &c.

(1) The Creation of Woman.—The formation of Eve out of the side of Adam was an early-recognised and favourite symbol of the church, the spouse of Christ, proceeding from the pierced side of the Second Adam (Tertull. de Anim. c. 43). This is, however, only found represented on a few sarcophagi, and that not with sufficient clearness to render the identification unquestionable, though there can, we think, be little doubt of its correctness. The most remarkable example is on the upper left-hand corner (the spectator's left) of a sarcophagus of the 4th century, discovered under the floor of St. Paul's without the walls of Rome, now in the Lateran Museum (Appell. Monuments of Early Christian Art, No. 5; Brownlow and Northcote, Roma Sotterran. pl. xix. p. 301; Westwood, Sculp. of the Sarcoph. p. 50). Dean Burgon enumerates eleven instances among the fifty-five sarcophagi in the Lateran Museum. Sometimes our Lord wields the wonder-working rod. An ivory of the 4th century, given by Gori (Thes. Vet. Diptych. vol. ii. p. 161; Agincourt, Sculpt. pl. xii. No. 1), represents unmistakably the extraction of Eve from Adam's side, with other subjects from the opening chapters of Genesis—the murder of Abel, &c.

(2) The Fall.—Few subjects are more frequent in every class of Christian art. Our first parents usually stand on either side of the tree of knowledge, round which the serpent twines, hiding their shame, sometimes with their hands alone, sometimes with fig-leaves. A lamp, figured by Agincourt (Terres Cuites, pl. xxiv. No. 2), represents Eve seeking for a veil at the moment that she takes the fatal fruit. On the Lateran sarcophagus already referred to the serpent offers the apple in his mouth. Our Lord, as a beardless young man, presents Adam with a bundle of ears of corn, and Eve with a lamb, the emblems of their future labours in tilling the ground and spinning wool. On the celebrated sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (Bosio, p. 45; Aringhi, vol. i. p. 277; Bottari, vol. i. pl. 15; Agincourt, Sculpture, pl. 6, nos. 5–11; Appell. p. 9; Parker, Photogr. 2997, Sculpture, pl. xiii.) the serpent is absent; Adam and Eve turn their backs to one another and to the tree, and the emblems of labour stand by their side. By a singular eccentricity, on a gilded glass given by Buonarruoti (Vetri, tom. i. fig. 2, and p. 8), Eve wears a necklace and bracelet of gold. Martigny (p. 16, b) refers in explanation of this to some Rabbinical writings, which assert that immediately after her fatal offence Eve was decked with every variety of female dress and ornaments. The subject is frequent in the catacomb frescoes both of Rome and Naples. (Bellermann, Katakomben zu Neapel, pl. 5; Appell. no. 23.) The expulsion from Eden occurs on a sarcophagus on the Lateran Museum (Parker, Sculpture, pl. xv.; see also Bottari, Sculpture e Pitture, tav. ii.).

(3) Abel and Cain.—The sacrifice of the lamb by Abel naturally offered itself to Christian typology as prefiguring the death of the Lamb of God, as well as the sacrifice of the Eucharist. In the latter reference Abel's offerings, "munera pueri tui justi Abel," occur in the canon of the Mass in connexion with the sacrifice of Abraham, and the bread and wine of Melchizedek. The subject is more frequent on sarcophagi than in wall decorations. We have, however, an example of the latter in the mosaics of the sanctuary of St. Vital's at Ravenna, where Abel stands alone, clad, shepherdlike, in a goat-skin, holding a lamb in his arms extended in prayer over a sacrificial table, on the other side of which Melchizedek is offering bread and wine, thus indicating the spiritual identity of the gifts with the Real Presence in the Eucharist. [MOSAICS, p. 1322.] On some sarcophagi Cain and Abel often appear together, making their respective offerings of a sheaf of corn or grapes and a lamb to the Deity, represented as an old man, seated (Bottari, tav. li.; cxxxviii., Bosio, p. 159).

(4) Noah.—The ark as a symbol of the church carried safely through the deluge of God's wrath, and Noah as a type of redeemed humanity admitted to the church by the waters of baptism, receiving from the dove, figuring the Holy Spirit, the olive branch of heavenly peace, is repeated constantly in all examples of early Christian art (cf. Tertull. de Baptismo, c. viii.). The countless representations of this one scene, depicted purely symbolically, without the slightest attempt at historical accuracy, evidence the strong hold it had on the early Christian mind. This was one of the subjects selected by St. Ambrose for the adornment of his Basilica at Milan. [FRESCO, Vol. i. p. 699, no. 10; DOVE, p. 575.]

(5) Abraham's Sacrifice.—The purely symbolical character of early Christian art is evidenced by the perpetual recurrence of this specially typical act, alone out of the whole of the incidents in the life of Abraham. It is one of the scenes which meet us everywhere. The primitive character of this type appears from a passage from St. Gregory Nyssen, quoted in the second Nicene council (act. iv.; Labbe, Concil. vii. 736), describing a picture which he says he never looked on without tears, in which the sacrifice of Isaac was represented just as we see it on the walls and ceilings and on the sarcophagi of the catacombs. St. Augustine speaks too of it as "tot locis pictum" (Contr. Faustin. lib. xxii. c. 72). It is needless to particularise the variety of costume found in different examples. In one instance Abraham is vested in the high priestly robes of the Jewish ritual (Bottari, tav. clxi.). The substituted ram appears hard by, sometimes struggling in the brambles (which were regarded as a type of our Lord's crown of thorns), sometimes standing free. Abraham's sacrifice appears in the mosaics of the sanctuary of St. Vital's at Ravenna, in conjunction with the reception of the three angels. The lunette containing these subjects corresponds to that containing the conjoined sacrifices of Abel and Melchizedek. The eucharistic and sacrificial reference of the whole series is evident.

(6) Melchizedek.—As already stated, the offering of bread and wine made by the royal priest to the father of the faithful, is one of the eucharistic subjects at St. Vital's. [EUCHARIST, p. 626.] This subject is also the first of the series of Old Testament representations in the name of St. Mary Major's at Rome.

(7) Moses.—There is no Old Testament history from which so many illustrations have been taken as that of the great deliverer and lawgiver of God's ancient people. The sacramental character of the passage of the Red Sea, the giving of the manna, and the water flowing from the smitten rock, having been so recognised by our Lord and His apostles, these events naturally took their place among the leading eucharistic types, and are found perpetually recurring in every variety of Christian art.

(a) The first of these symbolical incidents in life of Moses is his loosing his sandals from his feet before the burning bush. The act was regarded by the fathers as typical of the duty of putting away all worldly thoughts and cares in approaching to the Divine Presence (cf. Ambros. de Isaac, c. 4; Greg. Naz. Or. xlii. tom. i. p. 689). This is one of the most frequent subjects in the catacomb frescoes, and appears in early mosaics, as at St. Vital, Ravenna, and St. Catherine, Mount Sinai.

(b) The Passage of the Red Sea.—We do not find this subject so frequently represented as we might have expected from its universal recognition as a type of baptism. It is not found in paintings, only on sarcophagi. We may instance one from the Vatican cemetery (Bottari, tav. xl.; Agincourt, Sculpture, pl. viii. no. 1). The subject is represented with far greater detail and a larger number of figures on other sarcophagi (Bosio, p. 591; Bottari, tav. cxciv.; Millin, Midi de la France, pl. lxvii.). In the Museum of Aix is one discovered at Arles, which in addition to the Gathering of the Quails, and the striking of the Rock, represents the Exodus from Egypt and the overthrow of Pharaoh (Millin, u. s. pl. 9). Three sarcophagi at Arles, two in the museum, and one at St. Trophimus, also present the scene in detail, with the remarkable addition of the pillar of fire going before the Israelites.

(c) Moses striking the Rock.—This subject, so distinctly typifying the waters of baptism and the supplies of spiritual grace and strength flowing from the smitten rock, "which was Christ" (1 Cor. x. 4), meets us perpetually. It is seen constantly in the catacomb frescoes, and is seldom absent from the sarcophagi, where the thirsty crowd, generally wanting in the pictures, are eagerly drinking of the copious streams which are gushing from the rock struck by the miraculous rod. In close connexion with this subject there is almost always found on the sarcophagi a group of persons in flat caps, who seize an old and bearded man carrying a rod by either arm, and lead him off as a prisoner (Bosio, 103, 285, 287, 295, 425). This has been usually identified with the apprehension of St. Peter. Martigny considers that it is intended for the rebellion of the Israelites, which preceded the miraculous gift of water (Exod. xvii. 4). Probably there is an intentional combination of the two scenes, thus evidencing the complete identification of the two revelations in the mind of the early Christians, by whom Peter was regarded as the antitype of Moses, "the leader of the new Israel," as Prudentius calls him. This is also indicated by the marked resemblance the figure of Moses in this subject usually bears, in the general look of his hair and beard and the outline of his features, to the traditional type of St. Peter, and is still more strikingly brought out in some of the gilded glasses representing the striking of the Rock, where not only is the resemblance unmistakable, but all doubt is removed by the name PETRUS being superscribed. (See Brownlow and Northcote, Rom. Sott. fig. 33, p. 287; pl. xvii. no. 2; pp. 248, 265, 287, 303.)

(d) The Manna and the Quails.—The manna, as a symbol of the Living Bread that came down, might have been expected to appear more frequently than it does. Only one indubitable example is found among the catacomb pictures. This was discovered in 1863 in the cemetery of St. Cyriaca, and was described by De Rossi (Bullettino, Oct. 1863, p. 76; see MANNA, p. 1084). Dr. Appell cites another example from the sarcophagus of the abbess Eusebius in the museum at Marseilles, figured by Millin (pl. lviii. no. 2). He also mentions one example of the quails from the Arles sarcophagus in the museum at Aix, already spoken of. It is not at all improbable that the same combination of Old and New Testament symbolism spoken of in connexion with the striking of the rock has place also in this allied miracle, and that a large number of the pictures usually identified with the multiplication of the loaves and fishes in its closing scene, the gathering of the fragments, have also, as Martigny suggests (following Bosio's lead) a reference to the gathering of the manna in baskets. The venerable bearded personage represented has more resemblance to the type of Moses than that of Christ (Bosio, p. 251).

(e) The giving of the Tables of the Law.—This subject is found in juxtaposition with that of striking the rock on a very large number of the sarcophagi. Moses usually stands with his right foot on a rock, symbolizing Mount Sinai, and receives the tables from a hand emerging from a cloud (Bosio, pp. 363, 367, 589; Bottari, tav. xxvii.).

(8) The Grapes of Eshcol.—Dr. Appell mentions that a sarcophagus in the museum at Marseilles, traditionally said to have contained the bodies of two of St. Ursula's virgins, bears on its cover the parallel subjects of the two Israelite spies bearing a large bunch of grapes on a staff, and the miracle of turning the water into wine at Cana (Millin, u. s. p. lix. no. 3; Dr Piper, De Caumont, Bullet. Monument. vol xxxi. pp. 553–559).

(9) David.—Singularly enough, this remarkable type of Christ is only known to appear once in the whole range of Christian art. This is in a fresco filling one of the compartments of the ceiling of a cubiculum in the catacomb of Callistus (Bosio, p. 239; Bottari, tav. lxiii.; Aringh. i. 54). In his right hand the youth wields a loaded sling, and with his left raises the fold of his short girdled tunic, bearing a supply of stones.

(10) The Ascension of Elijah.—This subject, at once a type of our Lord's ascension (Greg. Magn. in Evang. Hom. xxix. c. 6), and a proof of the rapture into heaven of the glorified bodies of the living saints (Iren. lib. v. c. 5), was a special favourite with the early Christians, who delighted to have it sculptured on their sarcophagi and painted in their burial vaults. Elijah is usually pourtrayed standing in a four-horse chariot, an almost exact reproduction of the triumphal cars of the Roman emperors carved on their arches and stamped on their coins. With his right hand he delivers his mantle to Elijah. Attendant figures of a diminutive size stand for the sons of the prophets, watching the prophet's ascent. In some instances the Jordan [p. 890] is personified by a river-god, with a crown of rushes, leaning on his arm (Appell, p. 34[1]). The finest example is on a sarcophagus in the Lateran Museum, figured by Brownlow and Northcote (fig. 30, p. 250), and Dr. Appell (Monuments of Early Christian Art, p. 22); see also Bosio, pp. 73, 77, 161, 257; Aringhi, tom. i. pp. 305, 309, 423; Bottari, tav. lii.; Allegranza, Spiegazioni, tom. v.; Perret, tom. iv. pl. xvi. no. 21.

(11) Ezekiel's Vision of the Valley of Dry Bones.—Striking as the symbolical force of this subject is as a foreshadowing of the Resurrection, it is of rare occurrence in early Christian art.

It appears on a few sarcophagi, and is always represented in the same manner. The prophet stands erect, holding his roll, extending his right hand towards a group of two naked men standing up, into whom the spirit of life has just been breathed, and a third, still inanimate, extended on the ground, by whose side are two human heads, one a mere skull, the other partially covered with flesh. (Bottari, tav. xxxviii. cxxiv., cxcv.; Agincourt, Sculpt. pl. viii. no. 3; Bosio, pp. 95, 425; Parker, Photogr. 2921.)

(12) Daniel.—Daniel in the Lions' Den disputes for frequency of representation with Moses Striking the Rock, and the History of Jonah. It meets the eye everywhere, and always conforms to the same general type, with many minor modifications. The prophet is almost always entirely naked, standing, with his hands extended in prayer, between two lions. Habakkuk, according to the apocryphal addition, stands by, with the hand which has conveyed him through the air sometimes still grasping his hair, and offers the prophet a basketful of round bread cakes, decussated, exactly resembling our "hot cross buns" (Bosio, 155, 285). A fish is sometimes added, in evident allusion to Christ as the food of the soul, as in the very curious design, from a sarcophagus at Brescia, given by Dr. Appell (p. 31). In the earliest known example, in the cemetery of Domitilla (Brownlow and Northcote, p. 73, fig. 11), Daniel is clothed in a short tunic; but this is so exceptional that Le Blant (Inscriptions Chrétiennes de Gaul, tom. i. p. 493) is only able to produce five similar examples, and all of these of comparatively late date. Sometimes he wears a cincture (Bottari, tav. cxcv.). The apocryphal story of his destruction of the dragon with balls of pitch and hair is also sometimes depicted on sarcophagi. There is an example from the Vatican cemetery (Bosio, p. 57; Bottari, tav. xix.; Parker, Photogr. 2920). The woodcut given [DRAGON, p. 579] from this sarcophagus renders description needless. The position of the serpent twining round a tree sets historical truth at defiance. It is found on a sarcophagus at Verona (Maffei, Ver. Illust. pars iii. p. 54), and on one in the museum at Arles, and on a gilt glass published by Garrucci (Vetri, iii. 13), where Christ stands behind the prophet, who turns to him for succour before offering the food to the dragon who is issuing from a cavern.

(13) The Three Children in the Furnace.—This is another constantly recurring representation. Not so frequent is the preliminary scene, when they are required to worship the Golden Image. It is found in a fresco from the catacomb of St. Callistus (Bottari, tav. lxxviii.); and a sarcophagus from the Vatican cemetery (Bosio, 63) in connexion with the furnace scene. Nebuchadnezzar is seated in front of his statue, attended by his courtiers. Two of the youths are already in the furnace; one of them is helping in the third, who is being pushed forward by an officer. A fourth figure, "one like unto the Son of God," stands in the centre. It also occurs in a fresco from the cemetery of Callistus (Bosio, p. 279) and on a sarcophagus at St. Ambrogio at Milan (Allegranza, Spiegaz. tav. iv.; Appell, p. 33). The image is a bust, set on a pedestal; the Hebrew youths wear Phrygian bonnets and a short tunic. In the more usual subject of the furnace they also wear the bonnet and sometimes trousers, and stand erect with their arms extended in prayer [FRESCO, No. 12, p. 700; FURNACE, 704]; (Bottari, tav. lxi., xli., lxii., cxliii., cxcv., clxxxvi. 6; Bosio, pp. 63, 129). The furnace is sometimes wanting, and the youths stand among flames on the ground (Bosio, pp. 463, 495). There is one example in which there are only two youths. In one from St. Priscilla (Bottari, tav. clxxxi.; Bosio, p. 551) by a beautiful symbolism, a dove is depicted in the air above the heads of the youths carrying the olive branch of peace in her mouth.

(14) Jonah.—As a type of our Lord's Resurrection this prophet occurs constantly in the catacomb frescoes and on the sarcophagi, on lamps, diptychs, gilt glasses, and sepulchral slabs. Three scenes in his history are of constant recurrence, sometimes forming distinct pictures, as in the cemeteries of Callistus (Bosio, p. 225) and Marcellinus (pp. 377, 383), sometimes through exigencies of space ingeniously combined into one compendious scene (Bosio, pp. 289, 463). (a) Jonah being cast into the sea and swallowed up by the sea monster; (b) being vomited forth; (c) reclining under his gourd, to which a fourth is sometimes added, (d) deprived of the shade of his gourd and lamenting over the sparing of Nineveh (Bosio, u. s.). He is always absolutely naked. The "great fish" is an impossible monster of the dragon type, with a very long and narrow neck, and large head and ears and sometimes even horns, and an elongated sinuous tail. The gourd also is a plant totally unknown to nature, covered with dependent swelling pear-shaped fruit. Its trailing branches cover a trellis, beneath which the prophet lies supporting himself on one arm, with an aspect of chagrin. One of the most spirited representations of the history is on a sarcophagus in the Lateran Museum, from the crypt of St. Peter's (Bosio, p. 103; Aringhi, vol. i. p. 335; Bottari, vol. i. tav. xlii.; Appell, p. 19; Parker, Photogr. 2905). In a sarcophagus from St. Lorenzo (Bosio, p. 411) the histories of Jonah and Noah are combined, and the dove is conveniently perched on the prow of the ship.

(15) Job.—Job, seated on a heap of ashes, or on a dunghill, visited by his friends and reproached by his wife, is found on Christian art monuments with some degree of frequency. It appears in the catacomb frescoes (Bosio, p. 307; Bottari, tav. cv.; Perret, tom. i., pl. xxv.; Bottari, tav. xci.) and on sarcophagi, though more frequently in southern France than in Italy. There are examples in the Museum of Arles and Lyons (Millin, u. s. pl. xlvii. 1). The best representation of the scene is on the tomb of Junius Bassus, A.D. 359 (left-hand corner of the lower tier). In a fresco given by Bottari (tav. xci.), and Bosio (p. 307), Job holds a potsherd with which he is scraping his leg.

(16) Susanna.—As a type of the church persecuted by the two older forms of religion—the Pagan and the Jewish—the history of Susanna is found on sarcophagi, but only rarely. It is more frequent on those of France than in Italy. The mode of representation is always the same. Susanna, veiled, is standing as an orante between the two elders. An additional symbolism is exhibited in some of the French monuments, where a serpent coiled round a tree is dashing his tongue at some doves among its branches (Bosio, p. 83, no. 4; Bottari, tav. xxxii., lxxxi.; Buonarruoti, Vetri, p. 1; Millin, u. s. pl. lxv. 5, lxvi. 8, lxvii. 4). An allegorical picture given by Perret (vol. i. pt. lxxviii.) represents the story under the image of a lamb between two wild beasts, intended for wolves. The application is made certain by the words "SUSANNA" and "SENIORES" above them. [CHURCH, p. 389.]

(17) Tobias.—The fish caught by Tobias, whose gall drove away the evil spirit and cured blindness, was regarded by the early Christians as a distinct type of Christ (cf. August. Serm. iv. de Petr. et Paul.; Optat. lib. iii.). In a catacomb fresco we see him starting on his journey with the angel for his guide (Agincourt, Peinture, cl. vii. n. 3). The most frequent subject is his catching the fish. Once in the vault of a cubiculum of St. Callistus he is depicted quite naked, carrying the fish by a hook in his right hand, and his traveller's staff in his left (Bottari, tav. lxv.; Bosio, p. 243; Macarii Hagioglypta, p. 75). He is also naked, save a cincture, in another fresco (Perret, vol. iii. pl. xxvi.), in which he presents the fish to the angel. More generally, as on the gilt glasses, he is clothed in a short tunic, and has his right hand down the fish's throat (Buonarruoti, tav. ii. no. 2; Perret, vol. iv. pl. xxv. no. 33; Garrucci, Vetri, iii.; Hagioglypt. p. 76). A fresco from the cemetery of Priscilla, badly drawn and misunderstood by Bosio (p. 474), is decided by Garrucci (Hagioglypt. p. 76, note 2) to represent Tobias carrying the heart, liver, and gall of the fish, with his dog running before him. On a sarcophagus at Verona (Maffei, pars iii. p. 54) the dog is depicted fawning on old Tobit on his son's return.

This list includes all the subjects from the Old Testament embraced in the ordinary cycle of early Christian art. A few isolated subjects may be found here and there, not enumerated above, chiefly on ivories and other minor works of art, but they are quite exceptional, and it does not fall within the purpose of this article to dwell upon them. It will be seen that the leading principle of early Christian art is the unity of the two covenants, and the interpretation of the Old Testament by the New, and the exhibition of the New as the fulfilment of the Old. This principle had its most complete development in the system of parallelism, by which type and antitype were placed in such immediate juxtaposition that the eye could embrace both at once and observe their correspondence. It was not an unfrequent practice to devote one wall of the nave of a church to the Old Testament, and the opposite wall to the New. This is specially recommended in the letter of Nilus to Olympiodorus cited in the acts of the fourth session of the second Nicene council (Labbe, Concil. vii. 749). "Novi et Veteris Testamenti historiis hinc inde parietes templi repleri doctissimi pictoris operâ velim," the object being, as there stated, that the unlearned who were unable to read the Holy Scriptures might be instructed by the sight, and be excited to emulate the devotion and noble deeds thus depicted. The legates of pope Hadrian I. at the same council acknowledged that this was the received custom, and mentioned a basilica erected by a former pope John in which it was adopted, referring particularly to the pictures on opposite walls of the expulsion of Adam from Paradise, and the admission of the penitent thief (Labbe, ibid. 750). The basilicas erected by Paulinus at Nola contained the one subjects from the Old, the other from the New Testament. [FRESCO, p. 701.] In the same article is a list of the twenty-one scriptural paintings, all but four taken from the Old Testament, with which St. Ambrose decorated his basilica at Milan (ibid. p. 700). We have a remarkable example of the same principle of arrangement in England in the churches erected by Benedict Biscop at the end of the 7th century at Wearmouth and Jarrow. At St. Peter's, Wearmouth, the south wall was occupied with scenes from gospel history, the north with corresponding subjects from the apocalypse. At St. Paul's, Jarrow, the parallelism between the Old and New Testament was developed on the opposite walls, Isaac carrying the wood for his sacrifice, answering to our Lord bearing His cross, and the Brazen Serpent to the Crucifixion (Beda, Vit. Abbatt. c. 5, cc. 5, 88).

The very remarkable scenes of mosaic pictures from the Old Testament in the basilica of St. Mary Major's at Rome, stand completely isolated, and form a class by themselves. They are simply a series of scenes from the sacred narrative treated purely historically, without the slightest hint of symbolism. These pictures, which begin with the interview between Abraham and Melchizedek, and carry on the history through the lives of the succeeding patriarchs to the times of Moses and Joshua to the battle of Bethhoron, have been described in an earlier article, to which the reader may be referred (MOSAICS, p. 1327).

We shall not here enter on the very interesting series of Old Testament pictures contained in early Greek MSS., such as that in the Imperial Library at Vienna (Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xix.) and the Book of Joshua in the Vatican (ibid. pl. xxviii.), which have been treated of in the article MINIATURE.

OLIVE. This tree appears to be intended among those which surround the mystic Orpheus, or Orpheus-Shepherd. Bottari, tav. lxviii. Also in tav. cxviii. and tav. cxxv. it accompanies the Good Shepherd; at least the trees represented are very like young olives or willows, and in cxxv. the olive is clearly drawn. Less attention seems to have been paid to St. Paul's allegory of the olive-tree of the church than might have been expected. The olive-branch is borne by Noah's dove* [DOVE], and the sepulchral dove of peace constantly bears it. See a well-marked branch in inscription 91 at p. 60, vol. i. of De Rossi's Inscript. Christianae Urbis Romae. See CROSS, Vol. I. p. 497, for the olive-wreath with the palm. That no certain representation, and only one problematical sketch, of a palm exists in the Utrecht Psalter, seems to disconnect that wonderful document altogether from Alexandria and Egypt. Trees and olive-crowns occur on some of the mixed or Gentile ornaments of the sarcophagi. See, however, Aringhi, i. 311, where a well-carved olive-crown is combined with the monogram; also Parker Phot. 2930, from Lateran Museum. The writer can find no reference in Art to Zechariah's vision of the two olive-trees and candlestick. The vine and palm are generally associated with the Mount of Olives. The great difficulty of representing an olive-tree so as to be easily recognized for what it is may be one reason why it is so seldom attempted. For 12th-century Byzantine olive, see Ruskin's Stones of Venice, vol. iii. p. 177. and plate iv. vol. iii.

An example is given in the annexed woodcut of olive branches on a sepulchral slab, from Aringhi, R. S. t. ii. p. 644. He gives various reasons for the symbolic use of the tree, but they are rather natural or secular than Scriptural; as for example, its fruitfulness, permanent leafage, &c. He does not mention any representations of the whole tree, only of its branches, as borne by Noah's dove, or the sepulchral dove signifying flight into Rest. There is an olive-tree on the celebrated casket of Brescia. (Westwood, Early Christian Sculptures and Ivory Carvings, p. 37.) It seems to the writer that the two trees placed on either side of the Shepherd (Bottari, cxiii. cxvi. cxviii. cxxii., all from the catacombs of SS. Marcellinus and Peter) are intended for olives, and that they may involve allusion to the Hebrew and Gentile church. [R. St. J. T.]

OMENS. It was to be expected that some at least of the superstitions of heathenism would survive in the church. In fact they did survive, and none more vigorously than the observation of omens and portents, which Christianity has never been able to extinguish. Chrysostom laments (Hom. in Galat. i. c. 7, p. 669, Montfaucon) the influence exercised upon the minds of Christians by ethnic superstitions, such as forecasts from chance sounds or expressions (κληδονισμοί), from the flight of birds (οἰωνισμοί), or from other signs (σύμβολα). And again (Catechesis ii. ad Illumin. p. 141) he inveighs strongly against certain superstitious practices of his time, and among them against omens. If, he says, when a man first leaves his door, he meets one who has but one eye, or is lame, he reckons this ominous of evil. This is part of the pomps of Satan; for it is not the meeting a man that makes the day evil, but the spending it in sin. . . . If a man meets a virgin he says, "this will be an unprofitable day with me;" but if he meets a harlot it will be a fortunate day. Augustine (de Doctr. Chr. ii. 20) stigmatises similar superstitions. An omen is drawn, he says, from the throbbing of some part of the body. If, when two friends are walking arm in arm, a stone, or a dog, or a child chance to come between them, they stamp the stone to pieces as a divider of their friendship; nay, they even beat the dog or the innocent child from the same superstition. A man returns to bed if he has sneezed while putting on his shoes; he returns to his house if he has stumbled on going out; he is terrified with the apprehension of future evil if the rats have gnawed his clothes: less wise than Cato, who, when the rats gnawed his boots, said that it was no marvel, but if the boots had gnawed the rats it might have been thought a portent. A kindred superstition is the observation of lucky and unlucky days or seasons against which the same father (Enchiridion, c. 79) also inveighs, as utterly unworthy of a Christian.

(Bingham's Antiquities, xvi. v. 8.) [C.]

OMOPHORION (ὠμοφόριον, ὠμόφορον). The omophorion, as its name implies, is an article of dress worn over the shoulders; and thus we find it as a part of the ordinary female dress. Thus Palladius tells of one Taor, a virgin, who never wished for a new dress, or omophorion, or sandals (Hist. Lausiaca, c. 138; Patr. Gr. xxxiv. 1237). The church at Balchernae was said to possess the omophorion of the Virgin Mary (Leo Grammaticus, Chronographia, p. 241, ed. Bekker).

In its ecclesiastical sense, the word is used to describe an ornament worn by patriarchs, and also by bishops generally in the Greek church. This consists of a long band of woollen material, passing once round the neck, with the ends falling before and behind to the knees or lower, and on it are embroidered crosses. There seems little doubt that it has been a recognised vestment since the 6th century at latest. Thus Isidore of Pelusium, writing early in that century, after speaking of the ὀθόνη worn by deacons, goes on to dwell on the woollen omophorion worn by bishops, the material being meant to suggest the notion of the lost sheep borne on the shoulders of the Good Shepherd. Therefore it is, he adds, that when in the service the book of the gospels is opened, the bishop lays aside his omophorion as in the presence of the chief Shepherd Himself (Epist. lib. i. 136; Patr. Gr. lxxviii. 272). These words of Isidore are copied almost verbatim by Germanus,[a] patriarch of Constantinople in the 8th century (Hist. Eccles. et Mystica Theoria; Patr. Gr. xcviii. 396; cf. also Symeon Thessal. de Sacra Liturgia, c. 82, ib. clv. 260). Another early example may be drawn from the life of Chrysostom by Palladius (c. 6; Patrol. Gr. xlvii. 23), where Theophilus of Alexandria is accused of ill-treating a monk named Ammonius, in that he ἐνειλεῖ . . . . τὸ ὠμοφόριον ἐν τῷ τραχήλῳ οἰκείαις χερσί, and then beat him about the head.

Again, at the third general council of Constantinople (A.D. 680), in its eighth Actio, in which the heretic Macarius, bishop of Antioch, was on his trial, his views were at length received with cries of "Anathema! rightly let him be deposed from his bishopric, let him be stripped of the omophorion that encircles him" (Labbe, vi. 759). At the fourth general council of Constantinople (A.D. 870) the rule is laid down as to the wearing of the omophorion at the proper time and place by those qualified to wear it (τοὺς ὁρισθέντας ὠμοφορεῖν ἐπισκόπους: can. 14, Labbe, viii. 1376).

In the Byzantine historians, the omophorion is frequently referred to. One example will suffice:—Cedrenus (under twenty-first year of Constantine) tells us how Paul, patriarch of Constantinople, was strangled by the Arians with his own omophorion (vol. i. 529, ed. Bekker).

A confirmation of our statement as to the early use of the omophorion, may be derived from the fact that in the still existing ancient mosaics in the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, said to be of the 6th century, are figures of 4th century bishops wearing white vestments with omophoria, on which are coloured crosses (Marriott, Vestiarium Christianum, p. lxxv.).

This being the case, we may at once dismiss the story told by Luitprand (Relatio de Legatione Constant. c. 62; Patrol. cxxxvi. 934), to the effect that even the patriarch of Constantinople only wore the omophorion (here called pallium) by permission of the pope ("scimus, immo videmus, Constantinopolitanum episcopum pallio non uti, nisi sancti patris nostri permissu,"), but that by means of bribes leave was obtained from the Roman usurper Albericus, in whose hands the then pope, John XI. (ob. A.D. 936), completely was, for the patriarch and his successors to wear this ornament, without any further permission being necessary. Hence, adds Luitprand, the custom of wearing the pallium spread from the patriarch of Constantinople to the bishops of the eastern church generally.

Into the question whether the omophorion properly belonged to a prelate of the rank of a patriarch or metropolitan, or merely marked the episcopal order, it is not our purpose to enter. The evidence we have brought forward seems to us to lead strongly to the latter conclusion. The point is discussed at length by Goar (Euchologion, p. 312); reference may also be made to Ducange's Glossarium Graecum, s. v. ὠμοφόριον.

ORACLES. [PAGANISM.]

ORANGE, COUNCILS OF (ARAUSICANA CONCILIA). Two councils are recorded: the first as celebrated for its thirty canons on ecclesiastical discipline, as the second is for its twenty-five decrees on dogma. The first had St. Hilary of Arles for its president, was attended by St. Eucherius of Lyons on behalf of his suffragans, by fourteen other bishops and the representative of a fifteenth who was absent, but no sees are given. It met Nov. 8, 441. Its first canon is remarkable, as permitting presbyters, if a bishop cannot be had, to sign with chrism and benediction heretics in a dying state desiring to be Catholics. The second, which in the Pseudo-Isidorian collection stands first, ordains that nobody that has received power to baptize should ever set out without chrism. Doubtful readings make the remaining clauses obscure, but the highest minister named in this connexion is not the bishop but the priest. The fifth forbids those who have taken sanctuary to be given up. The seventh threatens with ecclesiastical censures any person infringing on the liberties of those who had been formally manumitted in church. The words of the thirteenth are: "amentibus quaecunque pietatis sunt conferenda"; and the next three relate to the possessed by devils. The wording of the seventeenth, "cum capsâ et calix offerendus est; et admixtione eucharistiae consecrandus," is rightly called by Mabillon "obscurissimus" (De Liturg. Gall. i. 5, 19), though its first part is in keeping with our Sarum Missal (Bona, Rer. Lit. ii. 9, 2). Canons eighteen, nineteen, and twenty relate to the treatment of catechumens. Canon twenty-one is directed against two bishops ordaining a third. Canon twenty-two forbids the ordaining married men deacons unless they will undertake to live no longer as such. Canon twenty-six forbids the ordaining of iconesses under any circumstances. Canon twenty-seven indicates how the profession of widowhood is to be made. Canon twenty-eight directs that all of either sex relinquishing their vow of chastity shall be treated as offenders, and subjected to due penance. Canon twenty-nine decrees the observance by all, absent or present, of the canons which have been made; and also that the synod shall separate without fixing where the next is to meet. The last canon enacts that bishops incapacitated from discharging their episcopal duties through any physical ailment, shall not delegate them to presbyters, but get another bishop to undertake them (Mansi, vi. 4, 33–52). The second council, July 3, had St. Caesarius of Arles for its president, and was attended by thirteen other bishops, but no sees are given. And though its decrees are purely dogmatic, eight lay notable say of them in turn: "consensi et subscripsi," like the bishops. St Caesarius calls them "constitutionem nostram," in subscribing first. But it would be difficult to point out one that is not borrowed word for word from St. Augustine, or from those who followed him in controversy with the Pelagians or semi-Pelagians, against whose various errors they are directed. The first eight, for instance, form eight consecutive dogmas in the work of Gennadius (De Eccl. Dogm. 38–45); the thirteenth, nineteenth, twenty-first, and nine-tenths of the twenty-fifth, which is the longest of all, are from the same work (c. 48–51). The Sentences of Prosper, or excerpts by him from the writings of St. Augustine, supply most, if not all, of the remaining. (Mansi, viii. 711–24.) [E. S. Ff.]

ORANTI. The figures which bear this name, and are so frequently found in the catacomb frescoes, are generally to be described as male or female forms in the Eastern attitude of prayer. The former, of course, more frequently represent or symbolize some special personage or character. They are, for the most part, in a standing position, with the arms extended. In some instances, they may be taken as symbolizing the church of believers, but most frequently they appear to be portraits, or rather memorial pictures of the dead. The celebrated one in SS. Saturninus and Thrason—somewhat grand in form and conception, though grotesquely ill-drawn—is seen in its present state in Parker's photographs, 469 and 1470; also in Bottari, tav. 180. Others are on tav. 172, 183, and Aringhi, ii. pp. 76, 79, from SS. Marcellinus and Peter; from St. Agnes, p. 183, and Rohault de Fleury, pl. lxi.; but see infra. Female Orantes are often represented in rich garments, and profusely adorned with necklaces and other jewellery. See photographs 467, 475–6, 1751–2, 1775, 1777, and the mosaics of SS. Oranede and Pudentiana, 1481–2 in Parker. This Martigny (p. 356) rightly explains: "En décorant ainsi leur image, on avait bien moins pour but de retracer aux yeux ce qu'elles avaient été dans la vie, que d'expliquer allégoriquement la gloire dont elles jouissaient dans le ciel." [PARADISE.] Compare Ruskin, Modern Painters, vol. iii. p. 49, for similar treatment of the Blessed Virgin by Francia and Perugino, with comments. For the Virgin Mary as an Orante in the later pictures of the catacombs, see Mr. Hemans's Essay in the Contemporary Review, vol. iii. The late Mr. Wharton Marriott (Evidence of the Catacombs, p. 15) says that he can find, after careful examination, but one Orante, properly so called, in all the catacombs, which can, with any probability, be interpreted as referring to the Virgin Mary. [Compare MARY THE VIRGIN IN ART, p. 1150.]

ORARIUM. (1) Besides its technical meaning of a stole, this word is used in the literal sense of a handkerchief, primarily, as the derivation shews, to wipe the face. Jerome, writing to Nepotianus, and dwelling on the proper mean to be shewn in dress, observes, "ridiculum et plenum dedecoris est, referto marsupio, quod sudarium orariumque non habeas gloriari" (Epist. 52, § 9, vol. i. 264). Ambrose uses the word for the napkin bound about the face of Lazarus (de Excessu Fratris sui Satyri, ii. 78; Patrol. xvi. 1396). For further references, see Greg. Turon. (Hist. Franc. vi. 17; de Gloria Martyrum, i. 93; Patrol. lxxi. 389, 787); Prudentius (Peristeph. i. 86). See also Ducange, Glossarium, s. v. [R. S.]

ORATION (FUNERAL). [FUNERAL ORATION; OBSEQUIES.]

ORATIO MISSAE. A part of the Mozarabic liturgy, following next after the offertory, which, though called Oratio, is not, strictly speaking, a prayer, for it is generally cast in the form of a short address or exhortation to the people, reminding them of the particular person or fact commemorated on the day. It is therefore one of the variable parts. Sometimes it is called simply "oratio." In the Gallican sacramentaries it is sometimes called "Praefatio Missae" (which must not be confounded with the Preface, commonly so designated), sometimes "Missa." It is a feature peculiar to this family of liturgies. [C. E. H.]

ORATORIUM (1). A stool, or possibly a cushion, on which to kneel at prayer, is so called in the earliest Ordo Romanus, supposed to have been compiled about 730. Thus, "The fourth in the choir precedes the pontiff, that he may set the oratorium before the altar" (§ 8; Mus. Ital. ii. 8; compare § 34; p. 22; § 35 p. 23; App. § 8; p. 35).

(2). We are told by Anastasius Bibliothecarius, A.D. 870, who may be taken as a good witness to things existing in his day, though we cannot depend on his accuracy as to their origin, that Hilary of Rome, in the time of Constantine, made three "oratories" in the baptistery of the basilica of Constantine, dedicated to John the Holy Baptist, St. John the Evangelist, and the precious Cross severally, "all of silver, of the Holy stones," and that "in the oratory where he placed the Cross he made a CONFESSIO of a golden cross of the wood of the Lord, pounds." All three gemmed, weighing 20 pounds former of brass with oratories had gates, thirty (triginto clusas), the last silver locks or bolts (tertiae Pond. n. 47). The oratory of "purest silver" of St. John the Baptist and evangelist also had oratories of the Cross are not told what was in confessions, but we assume, however, from the name of them. We know the confession, that they contained ordinary use relics of those saints; and this is confirmed by the fact that a supposed fragment of the true cross was put in the confession of the third. Several "oratoria" of the same materials, dedicated to SS. Thomas, Apollinaris, Sosius, John the Baptist, John the Evangelist, and to the Holy Cross, are said to have been given by Symmachus, A.D. 498, to the basilicas of St. Andrew and St. Peter. They all had confessions, and in the confession of the last was also "lignum Domini" (ibid. n. 52). Now here, we appear to have the description of a miniature chapel, i.e. of a shrine or tabernacle at which the people were invited to pray, on the same grounds as in a larger oratory, viz. its dedication, and possession of relics. Such larger oratories, with the entire bodies of martyrs or others under their confessio, were frequent in the large churches of Rome [see (3) below]; and the small fabrics of precious metal of which we have now treated, appear to have been made in imitation of them.

(3). Oratoriolum, Oratoriolus, Oraculum, οἶκος εὐκτήριος, εὐκτήριον, προσευκτήριον.

I. The Greek historians, though commonly using ἐκκλησία, often gave these descriptive names to churches. Thus Eusebius (Hist. x. 3; comp. de Laud. Constant. 17) says that, when peace was given to the church, "there were feasts of dedication in every city, and consecrations of newly-built oratories" (προσευκτηρίων), and that the emperor adorned the city named after him "with many oratories" (εὐκτηρίοις) (de Vita Const. iii. 48). Socrates (Hist. i. 18), that Constantine ordered "an oratory" (οἶκον εὐκτήριον) to be built under Abraham's oak, and "another church" (ἑτέραν ἐκκλησίαν) at Heliopolis (ibid.). We are aware that the Latin "oratorium" was used, as εὐκτήριον, &c., were, to denote a church with full privileges.

II. A "memoria" or sepulchral chapel built over the remains or some relic of an eminent Christian, or it might be only to perpetuate his name and do him honour, but at the same time a place of prayer, was called an oratory. The following are examples both from the East and the West. Sozomen (Hist. ix. 2) tells us that an oratory (οἶκος εὐκτήριος) was constructed under ground, so as to enclose the remains of certain presbyters, and a house built over it in which was a secret descent to it. Theodoret says that "they built many enclosures for prayer (σηκοὺς εὐκτηρίους) to Marcian" (Hist. Relig. in Marc. iii.). They placed the abbat Thomas in a tomb, and "built a small oratory over him" (John Moschus, Prat. Spirit. 88). The foregoing, it will be observed, are instances in which the oratory has no immediate connexion with a church.

III. Many, however, belonging to the last century of our period, were so connected, being built either (1) within, or (2) on to the church itself, or (3) in close proximity to it.

(1) John VII. A.D. 705, "made an oratory of the holy mother of God inside the church of the blessed apostle Peter" (Anast. Biblioth. Vitae Pont. n. 87), before the altar, in which oratory he was himself buried. Gregory III., A.D. 731, "made an oratory within the same basilica, by the principal arch on the men's side," in which he deposited relics (ibid. n. 91). The same pope enlarged a basilica "in which there were previously diaconia and a small oratory" (ibid.). In the life of Hadrian, 772, we read that he "made in the church of the blessed Peter, through the several oratories, silver canistra, twelve in number" (ibid. n. 97). In that of Leo III. 795, mention is made of "the oratory of St. Stephen in St. Peter, which is called the Greater" (ibid. 98).

For small shrines or tabernacles within a church, also called oratories, see (2).

(2) Many oratories were built against churches with an entrance into them, or placed within buildings (as porches, vestries, baptisteries) connected with churches. These were the early form of the side-chapel and chantry, afterwards so common (see Muratori, Dissert. xvii. in S. Paulini Poemata). Anastasius Bibliothecarius tells us that Sergius I., A.D. 687, restored all the cubicula round (in circuitu) the basilica of the blessed apostle St. Paul" (Vitae Pont. n. 85), and those attached "circumquaque" to St. Peter's (ibid.). That by "cubicula" we are to understand oratories is evident from the same author's account of Symmachus, A.D. 498; in which, after enumerating several "oratories" built by him, he immediately adds, "All which cubicula he built up complete from the foundation" (ibid. n. 52). St. Paulinus, too, A.D. 393, added "cubicula" to his church at Nola, "inserted in the longer walls of the basilica" (Epist. 32 § 12), which were intended, as he expressly says (ibid.), for the private use of persons "praying or meditating on the law of the Lord" (Ps. i. 2), as well as for memorials of the departed. Elsewhere (Poema, 27, l. 395; comp. 19, l. 478), he speaks of them; and of those whom the desire to pray had attracted to them. That these oratories opened into the church, appears from the fact that a thief, who had concealed himself in one of them, escaped when the door of the church was unlocked in the morning (Poema 19, l. 480).

(3) There is also frequent mention of oratories near a church, and belonging to it, but not part of the same structure. Such appears to have been one at Tours in the 6th century, viz. "Oratorium atrii beati Martini." (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Martyrum 15.) At Rome in the 8th there was an oratory of St. Leo, "secus fores introitus Sanctae Petronillae." (Anast. Biblioth. Vitae Pont. n. 95.) Theodore, A.D. 642, built one "foris portam beati Pauli Apostoli" (ibid. n. 74). This position appears to have been common at Rome; for the earliest Ordo Romanus, in giving directions for striking the light on Maundy Thursday [See LIGHTS, CEREMONIAL USE OF, § v.] orders it to be done "in a place outside the basilica; but if they have no oratory there, then they strike it in the doorway there." (§ 32; Mus. Ital. ii. 21.)

IV. The name of "Oratory" was given to different parts of the interior of a church. Thus, in a law of Theodosius, the nave is called "the people's oratory" (εὐκτήριον τοῦ λαοῦ Epist. Theod. et Valentin. Codex Theodos. ix. 45; tan. 3, p. 366). Compare the expression τὸν εὐκτήριον ναόν, denoting a part, expressly distinguished from the bema and the narthex (ibid. l. 4; p. 364). In the West, the word has been used to denote the choir of a church. A bishop of Mans is said to have taken great pains in the construction of the "upper parts" of a new church, "oratorium scilicet quod chorum vocitant, sedemque pontificalem," &c. (Act. Pontif. Cenom. 34; Mabill. Anal. Vet. 312, ed. 1723).

V. (1) Every monastery, whether of men or women, had its oratory. Thus St. Augustine, writing in 423 to women: "Let no one do in the oratory anything but that for which it was made, and from which it has received its name." (Epist. 211, ad Sanctimon. § 7). Sim. in the Regula ad Servos Dei, adapted from this, § 3. Cassian about the same time, of the monks in the East: "He who at terce, sext, or none, has not come to prayer before the psalm which has begun is over, does not venture to enter further into the oratory" (De Co nob. Inst. iii. 7). In the rule of St. Benedict, A.D. 530, the word occurs frequently, e.g., "Oratorium hoc sit, quod dicitur" (c. 52).

(2) The oratories in monasteries of women had no priests attached to them until the beginning of the 5th century, and the practice seems to have spread somewhat slowly. They were publicly professed in church, and attended it regularly in a body, a part, spoken of as enclosed, being assigned to them. These facts are proved by the following testimonies. St. Basil, Epitimia in Canonicas, 17; ii. 531; St. Ambrose, de Lapsu Virg. v. § 19; Palladius, Hist. Laus. 138. St. Jerome, when describing (in 404) the life of those in the house founded by Paula, says that "only on the Lord's day did they go out to the church, by the side of which they dwelt" (Epist. 108, ad Eustoch. § 19). Elsewhere, in 414, he implies that members of a female community went "ad loca religionis," and says that he "knew some who kept at home on festivals because of the concourse of the people" and its attendant evils (Ep. 130, ad Demetr. § 19). On the other hand, the community to which St. Augustine writes in 423 (if the epistle be wholly from his hand), though not confined to their house (Epist. 211, ad Sanctim. § 10), had a priest who celebrated, we may presume, in the oratory which Augustine mentions (§ 7).

(3) The houses of charity so numerous in the early church [HOSPITALS] were all under the management of the clergy or attached to monasteries; and there is evidence that some, and a probability that many, of them had their own oratories. For example, it is recorded of Leo III., A.D. 795, that he gave certain ornaments to the "oratory of the holy mother of God in the xenodochium at Firmi" (Anast. B. Vitae Pont. n. 98; pp. 130, 6), to the oratories in three other xenodochia at Rome, dedicated severally to St. Lucy, St. Cyrus, and SS. Cosmas and Damian (ibid. 139), and to "the oratory of St. Peregrine, which is placed in the hospital of the Lord at Naumachia" (ibid.).

VI. (1) Chapels under the name of oratories were often attached to episcopal palaces. E.g., in the Life of John the Almoner by Leontius (c. 38), we read, "Facit missas in oratorio suo" (Rosweyd, 199). Gregory the Great says of Cassius of Narni, that a little before his death "in episcopii oratorio missas fecit" (Hom. 37, de Evang.). Gregory of Tours, 573, consecrated "cellulam valde elegantem," which had been the buttery of his palace, for an oratory, and removed to it relics of SS. Martin, Saturnius, and Julian (de Glor. Conf. 20). It was "infra domum ecclesiasticam urbis Turonicae" (Vitae PP. ii. 3). Pope Theodore, 642, "fecit oratorium beato Silvestro intra episcopium Lateranense" (Anast. Biblioth. Vitae Pont. n. 74), i.e., in the palace which Constantine was said to have given to the see in the time of Melchiades (Labbe, Conc. i. 1530). See also Liber Diurnus Rom. Pontif. v. 10.

(2) Oratories (= domestic chapels) were common in or near the houses of the wealthy. By a law of Justinian they were to be devoted to prayer alone, "We forbid to all the inhabitants of this great city, and much more to all others under our rule, to have oratories (εὐκτηρίους οἴκους) in their houses, and to celebrate the sacred mysteries therein. . . . But if any simply think it right to have sacred chambers in their houses for the sake of prayer only, and nothing whatever pertaining to the sacred liturgy be performed there, we permit this to them" (Novell. 57). Compare the Carlovingian law: "He who has an oratory in his house may pray there. But let him not presume to celebrate the sacred masses therein without the license of the bishop of the place." The punishment was to be the confiscation of the house and excommunication (Capit. Reg. Franc. v. 383; comp. v. 102, and Capit. Ingilheim. 826, c. 6, &c.). The council in Trullo, 691, orders the clergy who serve in oratories in a house, to do it under the rule of the bishop (can. 31). Another canon (59) says, "Let not baptism be on any account celebrated in an oratory within a house." In the West, the council of Agde, 505 (can. 21), orders that "if any of the clergy chose to celebrate or attend masses on festivals (Easter, Christmas, &c., had been named) in the oratories (unless the bishop order or permit it), they be driven from communion." A canon of Theodulf of Orleans, 797, shews that this rule had been relaxed by time: "Let not the priests on any account celebrate masses in the oratories, except with such precaution before the second hour that the people be not withdrawn from the public celebrations" (can. 46; Labbe, Conc. vii. 1147). In another injunction of the same bishop the rule is extended to suburban monasteries and churches, and the early celebration permitted is to be "foribus reseratis" (Additio altera, Labbe, u. s. 1857), which here can only mean with doors closed (comp. reserre).

(3) Such oratories (often on the homesteads, or attached to the houses of the wealthy) were often unconsecrated, and still more frequently served by priests not submissive to authority. So early as 541 the fourth council of Orleans had to forbid the domini praediorum to "introduce strange clerks against the wish of the bishop" of the diocese to serve "in the oratories" (can. 7). The council of Châlons, about 650, states that the clergy who served the "oratories in the vills of the powerful" were not allowed by their patrons to submit to the archdeacons (can. 14). The council of Paris, 829 (i. 47), complains that masses were wont to be celebrated in gardens and houses, or at least in "aediculae," which they built near their houses." These are contrasted with "the basilicas dedicated to God," which their builders had forsaken. Presbyters were "compelled" to celebrate in them, and all this "in defiance of episcopal authority." Such an abuse naturally tended to degrade both the character and the position of the clergy. Agobard tells us that the "domestici sacerdotes" were employed as huntsmen and butlers, and in various other servile capacities (De Privilegio et Jure Sacerdotii, 11). To avert such evils, masses were absolutely forbidden by many authorities in all but dedicated churches, as in the Excerptiones of Ecgbriht, 740 (can. 52); by Charlemagne in 769 (Capit. i. 14), and in 789 (Capit. iii. 9); by Theodulf of Orleans, 797 (Capit. 11); by a council of bishops held at some unknown place in France, 802 (can. 9; Labbe, Conc. vii. 1179); by the council of Châlons-sur-Saône, 813 (can. 49); and by the council of Aix, in 816. See also Jonas of Orleans, 821 (Instit. Laic. 11, in Spicil. Dach. i. 33), who speaks of the unconsecrated "aediculae" of the rich in terms which the council of Paris seems to have borrowed. We must suppose, however, that during the prevalence of heresy a breach of this rule would have been justified in the West, as we know that it was in the East. Thus, Theodore Studita says (Epist. i. 40, ad Naucr.), that in that case it was lawful "even to perform the liturgy in an oratory."

Another check was the law that all who built oratoria for more than private prayer should endow them. Gregory I. directed that an oratory built by a nobleman at Firmi should be consecrated, provided that "no human body had been buried there," and that there was a suitable endowment for the cardinal presbyter who was to serve it (Epist. x. 12). He permitted the consecration of another oratory outside the walls of the same city, "percepta primitus donatione legitimâ;" but ordered that in this case the mass should not be publicly celebrated at the consecration, and that a presbyter cardinalis should not be appointed to serve it, nor a baptistery built in connection with it (Ep. vii. 72). Similarly, Zachary of Rome, writing to Pipin about 743 (Epist. viii. 15). And these restrictions are made conditions in the form of mandate for consecration in the Liber Diurnus (v. 4). Charlemagne enacted generally, that "those who had or wished to have a consecrated oratory, should by the advice of the bishop make a grant out of their property in that same place" (A.D. 803, c. 21; Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 401). See also Justinian, Novella, 123, § 18.

Much information on this subject may be found in J. B. Gatticus, de Oratoriis Domesticis, ed. 2, Rom. 1770; Josephus de Bonis, de Oratoriis Publicis, and Fortunatus a Brixia, de Oratoriis Domesticis, both printed by J. A. Assemani (Rome, 1766) as a supplement to the work of Gatticus; Z. B. Van Espen, Jus Eccl. Univ. ii. i. v. 8; J. M. Cavalieri, Comment. in Rit. Congr. Decreta, v. 4, Venet. 1758; and many others. But it should be mentioned that these writers are chiefly concerned with the later history and rights of oratories. [W. E. S.]

ORATORY. [PREACHING.]

ORDEAL. This article is limited to an account of some of the more notable forms of a superstition very prevalent among christian nations, not only in the first eight centuries, but long afterwards, viz., a belief that on the subjection of an accused person to some extraordinary physical test, supernatural intervention might be expected for the purpose of making known his guilt or his innocence. The pagan origin of one kind of ordeal is referred to under PAGANISM, SURVIVAL OF. The following are the more remarkable forms under which it continued to exist, and even became more widely diffused after paganism had been overthrown.

Under the general denomination of JUDICIUM DEI we have

I. The Duel, a form especially prevalent among Teutonic nations. In the year A.D. 500, the code of laws promulgated at Lyons by Gondebald, the Arian king of Burgundy, and known as the Lex Gombette, gave legal sanction to this mode of ordeal. Barbarous as were the times, the preamble of the enactment relating to the subject implies a sense that such a law requires some justification, and this is found in the alleged fact that the morality of the community is at so low an ebb that it is a common practice for individuals to offer evidence on oath with respect to matters of which they have no certain knowledge, or even knowingly to perjure themselves. It is accordingly enacted (with reference apparently to an already existing institution analogous in some respects to the English frithborh of a later period) that whenever a cause of dispute shall have risen, and the party against whom judgment is given shall still deny his obligation to what is demanded of him or his commission of the alleged offence, by a sacramental oath[a] (sacramentorum obligati ne negaverit), the dispute shall be thus decided: if the party on the side of him to whom the sacramental form of oath has been proffered, shall refuse to make sacramental attestation (noluerit sacramenta suscipere), but, confident in the rightfulness of his cause, shall declare themselves able to convince his antagonist by arms, and those of the opposite party refuse to yield, it shall be lawful to decide the dispute by combat ("pugnandi licentia non negetur." It is, however, required that one of the witnesses, of those who had come prepared to make sacramental attestation, shall be a combatant ("Deo judicante confligat"); it being right, the law goes on to say, that if any man unhesitatingly affirms his knowledge of a matter in dispute, and proffers his sacramental oath in attestation, he should not hesitate also to fight. Then, if the witness on the side which has offered to take the oath ("testis partis ejus quae obtulerit sacramentum") be vanquished, all the witnesses who had offered to do the same are required forthwith to pay a fine of 300 shillings; but if he who declined to take the oath should be slain, the party of the victor are to be indemnified, as to the mulct, out of the dead man's possessions ("de facultatibus ejus novigildi solutione pars victoris reddatur indemnis." Canciani, Barbarorum Leges Antiquae, iv. 25, 26).

This formal sanction of duelling confirmed the custom; and both among the Franks and the Lombards a similar recognition was extended to it by legislation. The code of Rotharis (A.D. 643), king of the latter nation, opposed it as one form of superstition to repress another, in directing that any man bringing the accusation of witchcraft against a freedwoman (calling her "striga, quod est maxa"), should be compelled to make good his charge in single fight,—"si perseveraverit, et dixerit se probare posse, tunc per Camplonem caussa, id est per pugnam, ad Dei judicium decernatur" (Canciani, i. 79). The character of Luitprand, who reigned over the Lombards A.D. 713–735, is illustrated by his superiority to this superstition. He says that he hears that many are defeated in the duel, although theirs is notoriously the juster cause, but confesses his inability to repeal an "impious law," sanctioned by the custom of the race. The utmost he could do was to direct that the party defeated in conflict should not therewith lose his whole substance, but be allowed to make a composition,—"sicut antea fuerit lex componendi. Quia incerti sumus de judicio Dei; et multos audivimus per pugnam sine justa caussa suam caussam perdere. Sed propter consuetudinem gentis nostrae Longobardorum legem impiam vetare non possumus." Luitprandi Leges, iv. 65; ib. i. 127.

The advance of education and general enlightenment under Charles and his son Lewis, seems to have in no way checked this superstitious practice. In the year 809, at the council of Aachen, the same mode of proving his innocence is conceded to a criminal found guilty of a capital offence (Pertz. Legg. i. 155), and a distinct article (art. 25) of the same capitulary, forbids that any shall venture to call in question the validity of such a test, "ut omnes judicio Dei credant absque dubitatione" (ibid i. 157). A capitulary of the year 819 permits those accused of theft to vindicate their honour in a contest with their accuser, to be fought "scuto et fuste" (Baluze, i. 782). The single combat between counts Bera and Sanila, in the reign of Lewis the Pious, of which a minute description is given by Ermoldus Nigellus (book iii. v. 550–638), is perhaps the most notable instance to be met with at our period.

The voice of the most enlightened churchmen was not unfrequently, though vainly, raised against this kind of ordeal. "Purgation," or the formal proof of innocence, is described by ecclesiastical writers as of two kinds, "canonica" and "vulgaris"—the former being by "sacramentum et juramentum," that is by sacramental and simple oath, the latter by the duel, hot or cold water, &c.—methods to which Agobard refers as devices of men, "hominum adinventio," and which Ivo of Chartres denounces as a law for which no sanction can be claimed, "nulla sanctione fulta lex" (Migne, Patrol. clxii. 37). We learn from the former writer that Avitus, bishop of Vienne in the 6th century, in a conversation with king Gondebald, strongly condemned the duel as a method of deciding personal disputes. (Migne, civ. 125.)

But while the voice of the church appears to have been generally raised against the duel as a barbarous and inequitable test, inasmuch as superior physical powers, or skill in the use of weapons, thus became the real criterion of right and wrong, the religious superstition of the age favoured the resort to other methods, which appealed to the belief in the miraculous. One of the earliest instances of this kind[b] is that [a] I.e. an oath to which it was supposed additional solemnity was imparted by the person to whom the oath was administered touching at the same time the relics of a saint or a cross (in later times a crucifix), or a copy of the Gospels.

[b] The different forms of ordeal referred to in connexion with the miracles of St. Alban in the 3rd century, e.g. ordeal by hot water, the trial of relics by fire, bibliomancy, &c., probably point to the essentially unhistoric character of the whole tradition (see Hardy, Introd. to Descript. Catalogue, I. ii. p. xxxiv).

recorded by Gregory of Tours, of Simplicius, a bishop in the first half of the 4th century. Simplicius was accused of adultery, and both he and the woman implicated in the charge vindicated themselves by taking live coals in the folds of their garments, and holding them there for nearly an hour, their garments remaining uninjured (de Gloria Conf. c. 76; Migne, lxxi. 967). Among other and more common forms of ordeal was—

II. The Ordeal of Hot or Cold Water.—Both of these methods were sanctioned by ecclesiastical authority. Among the Formulae Veteres Exorcismorum (see Baluze, Capit. Reg. Franc. ii. 639; Bouquet, Scriptores, iv. 597), there is given a form of exorcism used on the employment of either test. In that of ordeal by hot water, the two parties in the dispute repaired to the neighbouring church; there they knelt down, while the priest recited a prescribed form of prayer. Mass was then celebrated, and the two presented their alms and received the holy communion, having previously been solemnly adjured if in any way participant in or cognizant of the alleged crime not to communicate. Then mass was performed, after which the priest proceeded to the appointed place of ordeal, bearing with him the gospels and the cross; he then chanted a short litany, and finally pronounced the following exorcism over the water before it was heated: "I exorcise thee, thou creature water in the name of God the Father Omnipotent, and in the name of Jesus Christ His Son, our Lord, that thou mayest become exorcised water, to put to flight all powers of the enemy and every phantasm of the devil; so that if this man, now about to put his hand in thee, be innocent of this fault of which he is accused, the compassion ["pietas"] of Almighty God shall deliver him. But if, which may God forbid, he be guilty, and shall have dared presumptuously to put his hand in thee, may the power of the same Almighty One condescend to declare this concerning him, so that all may fear and tremble before the holy and glorious name of our Lord, who lives and reigns ever One God throughout all ages." When the water had been raised to boiling heat, the accused recited the Lord's Prayer, made the sign of the cross, and then drew from the vessel containing the water a heavy stone, previously placed therein by the presiding judge.

The severity of this form of ordeal seems to have given it the preference in cases where the accused was of the servile class. In the year 816, a capitulary of Lewis the Pious directs that slaves accused of homicide shall submit to this test, in order that it may be made apparent whether they had designedly slain their victims, or done so only in self-defence. If the slave's hand exhibited marks of injury from the ordeal, he was to be put to death (Baluze, i. 177; see also 1251).

The method of procedure at the ordeal of cold water was similar; but here the difficulty was reversed; for while, in the former method, it consisted in escaping injury, in this it was almost impossible to obtain a conviction. The accused was only held guilty if he or she floated on the surface, the element having been previously adjured by the priest to refuse to receive him or her if really criminal (non suscipiat te aqua incredulum aut seductum). A deviation from this method is recorded by Gregory of Tours, on an occasion when a woman accused of adultery was flung into the Rhone, with heavy stones fastened round her neck; she, however, invoked the aid of St. Genesis, and was miraculously borne along on the surface of the current, and her innocence established (de Gloria Mart. c. 70; Migne, lxxi. 799). But the former method was undoubtedly the more common, though in the opinion of Le Brun (Hist. critique, p. 467), it was not recognised by law before the 9th century, when pope Eugenius II. gave his sanction to its employment (Migne, cxxix. 985–7). Lewis the Pious, on the other hand, in a capitulary of Aachen of the year 829, ordered it to be discontinued (Baluze, i. 668), though not, probably, with the view of abolishing a superstitious practice (for other forms of ordeal were still resorted to), but, as Muratori has pointed out, because it practically amounted to an evasion of justice.

III. Judicium Crucis, otherwise known as Stare ad Crucem.—In this mode of ordeal, the accused and his accuser lifted their arms to a horizontal position, so that the entire body of each represented the figure of a cross. Then some chapters from the Gospels, or a portion of the church services, were read aloud, and he who, from fatigue, was first compelled to let fall his arms was held to be defeated. Herchenrad, bishop of Paris in A.D. 771, having become involved in a dispute with a monastic body, offered to submit the question at issue to this test, and was victorious (Muratori, Dissert. in Antiq. Ital. Medii Aevi, vol. iii.).

A capitulary of Charles the Great of the year 799, directs that persons accused of perjury shall "stand cross-fashion" ("stent ad crucem," Pertz, Legg. i. 37). Another of the year 803, directs that if the prosecutor of a freeman who is unable to pay a fine, refuses to receive the "sacramenta" of twelve men in evidence of such inability, then the dispute shall be settled either "by the cross" or by a duel fought with clubs and shields (Baluze, i. 397). Similarly, in the year 806 a decree of the same emperor enjoins that in disputes respecting boundaries, "the will of God and the truth of the matter" shall be ascertained "judicio crucis" (ibid. i. 444). [MORTIFICATION, p. 1320.]

IV. The Ordeal of Hot Iron.—This consisted either in drawing a bar of iron from a furnace with the naked hand, or in walking over heated ploughshares with naked feet—modes denoted by the expressions, "judicium calefacere," "judicium portare," where judicium is equal to ferrum. It is prescribed as a method of self-vindication from the charge of manslaughter in the code of Luitprand, king of the Lombards, "et si negaverit ipsum occidi-se ad novem vomeres ignitos ad Judicium Dei examinatos accedat" (Canciani, i. 162). A capitulary of Charles the Great, of the year 803, enacts in the case of a man who is accused of having slain a neighbour in defence of his own freedom, but denies the deed, that he shall pass over (accedat) nine fiery ploughshares, to be tested "judicio Dei" (Baluze, i. 389). According to Milman, this mode of ordeal was especially reserved for accused persons of august rank; and he mentions as individuals by whom it was undergone "one of Charlemagne's wives, our own queen Emma, the empress Cunegunda" (Lat. Christianity, bk. iii. c. 5).

V. The Ordeal of Swallowing Food.—It was believed that bread and cheese, administered with due prescribed solemnities to an accused person, would infallibly choke him if he knowingly perjured himself (Muratori, u. s.).

The most remarkable and elaborate protest against this superstition, in all its forms, was undoubtedly that contained in a treatise by Agobard, bishop of Lyons in the 9th century, who, about the year 830, composed a treatise contra dumnabilem opinionem putantium divini judicii veritatem igne, vel aquis, vel conflictu armorum patefieri (Migne, civ. 250). This remonstrance produced no small effect in its own day; and Palgrave (Hist. Normandy and England, i. 241) ascribes the prohibition of the water-ordeal at the synod of Worms, A.D. 1076, to its influence. Agobard relied mainly on Scripture for his arguments. He was, however, opposed by Hincmar, who in his manifesto (de Divortio Lotharii et Tetbergae) upheld the system, especially the water-ordeal. He maintained, that where faith was really present in the hearts of those who conducted or submitted to these tests, the result was an infallible declaration of the divine will; only doubt and vacillation would deprive it of its efficacy (Migne, cxxvi. 171).

The belief had, indeed, taken too strong a hold of the church to be readily dispelled by mere argument; and in England, nearly a century later, we find the forms II. and IV. referred to and sanctioned with considerable circumstantiality. The language, however, is calculated to suggest that, either through fraud or connivance, these tests had been often successfully evaded, and that the physical injury likely to be sustained was but trifling (Brompton, Chronicon; in Twysden, Scriptores, p. 856). Even so late as the 11th century, these practices still prevailed in the church. Ivo, of Chartres, when writing to Hildebert, bishop of Mans, respecting an accusation brought against one Gislandus, a priest, deems it necessary to give special instructions that none of the above tests shall be resorted to (Migne, clxii. 37). I. Names for Orders and Collective Names for the Clergy.—1. Ordo.—This is the earliest and most general Latin word; first found in Tertull. de Exhort. Cast. c. 7, "differentiam inter ordinem et plebem constituit ecclesiae auctoritas," usually with a defining epithet; o. ecclesiasticus, Tertull. de Monog. c. 11; de Idol. c. 7; 1 Conc. Carth. c. 1; o. clericalis, e.g. S. Leon. M. Epist. 6 (4), c. 3, vol. i. p. 620; Hraban. Maur. de Instit. Cler. i. 2; o. sacer, e.g. S. Leon. M. Epist. 4 (3), vol. i. p. 612; S. Greg. M. Epist. iv. 26. The word ordo in this sense was probably transferred from Roman civil life, in which it was the ordinary designation of the governing body of both a municipality and a collegium. (a) Of the senate of a provincial town, o. mutinensis, Tac. Hist. ii. 52; o. Berytiorum, Le Bas et Waddington, Inscriptions d'Asie Mineure, No. 1847 a; o. splendidissimus Thagastensium, Renier, Inscr. Rom. d'Algérie, No. 2902, and frequently in the Corpus Juris, e.g. Dig. 50, 9, 3. Even so late as the end of the 6th century Gregory the Great, writing to the civil as well as to the ecclesiastical authorities of Ariminum, uses "ordo" for the former, "clerus" for the latter (Epist. i. 58); so also at Naples (id. Epist. ii. 6). (b) Of the officers of a collegium, e.g. Orelli-Henzen, No. 4054 (=Grut. 1077), No. 4115 (=Grut. 391, 1). (It is uncertain whether the addition of "sacer" to "ordo" is meant to distinguish the ecclesiastical from the civil use of the word, or whether it was not simply a continuation of a civil use, e.g. ἡ ἱερὰ σύγκλητος of the Roman senate, C. I. No. 2715; ἱερὰ σύνοδος of a meeting of theatrical artists, Le Bas et Waddington, Inscriptions d'Asie Mineure, No. 1619.) But it became more common, especially in later times, to use ordines in the plural: ordines ecclesiastici, Tertull. de Exhort. Cast. c. 13; o. sacri, probably first in Conc. Rom. A.D. 465, c. 3; S. Greg. M. Moral. lib. xxiii. c. 25, p. 756, Hom. in Evang. lib. ii. hom. 39, c. 6, p. 1648, and frequently afterwards. (For the later restriction of the phrase to bishops, presbyters, and deacons [and sub-deacons], see below.) In this sense "ordo" and "ordines" were used not of church officers only, but (cf. κλῆρος below) of any "estate" of men or women in the church. S. Hieron. in Esai. lib. v. c. 19, 18, speaks of "fideles" and "catechumeni" as forming two of the five "ecclesiae ordines." S. Greg. M. Moral. lib. xxxii. c. 20, p. 1065, says that the church consists of three orders, "conjugatorum, videlicet, continentium, atque rectorum"; id. Hom. in Ezech. lib. ii. hom. 4, c. 5, p. 1344, speaks of the same three orders as "praedicantium, continentium, atque bonorum conjugum," cf. ibid. lib. ii. hom. 7, c. 3, p. 1378; so, much later, Hrabanus Maurus, de Instit. Cleric. lib. i. c. 2: "tres sunt ordines in ecclesia laicorum, clericorum, et monachorum." In earlier times, Optatus, de Schism. Donat. lib. ii. c. 46, had avoided the ambiguous use of ordo by the use of a less technical phrase: "quatuor genera capitum in ecclesia, episcoporum, presbyterorum, diaconorum, et fidelium"; so in later times, intermediate between the earlier phrase, "ordo martyrum, virginum," &c., and the subsequent "omnes martyres. virgines," &c., is "chorus martyrum, virginum," &c.

2. Κλῆρος, κληρικοί, clerus, clerici.—(a) Κλῆρος is first found in the plural = ordines in the sense spoken of in the preceding paragraph, in 1 Peter v. 3, where τῶν κλήρων is evidently identical with τοῦ ποιμνίου. Hence, even so comparatively late as the beginning of the 5th century, laymen, as well as church officers, are spoken of as constituting a κλῆρος (λαϊκὸς κλῆρος, Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. 20, Migne, P. G. vol. xxxiv. 1059 = λαϊκὸν τάγμα, Conc. Nicaen. c. 5). Probably its first use in the singular of the collective body of church officers is in Clem. Alex. Quis div. salv. c. 42, p. 948, ed. Pott. (= Euseb. H. E. iii. 23), of St. John at Ephesus: Tertull. de Monog. c. 12. Afterwards frequent in both Greek and Latin, e.g. in the fathers, S. Cypr. Epist. 2, vol. ii. p. 224; S. Petr. Alex. Epist. Canon. c. 10, S. Basil. Epist. 240 (192); in canon law, e.g. Conc. Illib. A.D. 306, c. 80; 1 Conc. Carth. c. 6; Conc. Nicaen. c. 1, 14; in the Const. Apost. e.g. ii. 43; in civil law, e.g. Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 3, c. 40 (39), 9. Of the clerical office in the abstract, probably first in Origen, Hom. in Hierem. 11, c. 3, vol. iii. p. 189. In the plural of the clergy of different churches, Hippol. Ref. Haeres. ix. 12, ed. Duncker, p. 460; S. August. Enarr. in Ps. lxvii. c. 19, vol. iv. p. 824. Occasionally distinguished from ordo, S. Greg. M. Epist. i. 58, 68; and also combined with it, 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 13, "omnis aecclesiastici ordinis clerus," Karlomanni, Capit. Liptin. A.D. 743, § 1, ap. Pertz, M. H. G. Legum, vol. i. p. 18. The original meaning of κλῆρος in this sense, though mistaken by medineval writers, hardly admits of dispute. The word was the ordinary Hellenistic designation of rank or class; it is so used (1) in non-ecclesiastical late Greek, e.g. Epict. Diss. i. 18, 21; Lucian, Hermot. c. 40; Le Bas et Waddington, Inscriptions, No. 1257; (2) in Judaeo-Christian Greek, e.g. Test. xii. Patr. Levi, 8; Orac. Sibyll. vii. 138; (3) in early patristic Greek, e.g. S. Iren. adv. Haer. i. 27, 1; iii. 3, 3; Clem. Alex. Strom. v. 1, p. 650, ed. Pott.; Euseb. H. E. v. 1 (letter of the churches of Vienne and Lyons). There is a trace, but not more than a trace, of the use of the word in reference to the governing body of a θίασος, or Greek religious association; but there is no room in modern philology for the quaint fancy of Jerome that the clergy derive their collective name from Deut. x. 9, xviii. 2; Ps. xvi. 5, lxxiii. 26: "propterea vocantur clerici vel quia de sorte Domini vel quia ipse Dominus sors, id est, pars clericorum est" (S. Hieron. Epist. 52 (2) ad Nepot. c. 5; cf. S. Ambros. de Fuga Saec. ii. 17, vol. i. p. 420), or for that of Augustine: "et cleros et clericos hinc appellatos puto . . . quia Matthias sorte electus est" (S. August. Enarr. in Ps. lxvii. c. 19, vol. iv. p. 824). The prevalence of these explanations in later times is probably due to their having been copied by Isidore of Seville, de Eccles. Off. ii. 1, 1, and thence into most mediaeval textbooks. (b) Κληρικοί, clerici, probably first in S. Cypr. Epist. 40, c. 3, vol. ii. p. 334; Epist. 66, c. 2, vol. ii. p. 399; S. Alex. Alexandr. Deposit. Arii (Migne, P. G. vol. xviii. 581, and in the Benedictine edition of S. Athanas. vol. i. p. 313); Cod. Theodos. lib. xvi. tit. 2, 2 (a law of Constantine in A.D. 319), which gives the earliest definition of the word, "qui divino cultui ministeria religionis impendunt, id est, qui clerici appellantur"; S. August. Enarr. in Ps. lxvii. c. 19, vol. iv. p. 824, whence probably Isid. Hispal. de Eccles. Off. ii. 1, 1: "omnes qui in ecclesiastici ministerii gradibus ordinati sunt generaliter clerici nominantur." But sometimes, especially before κληρικός had become established, periphrases were used to designate the members of the κλῆρος, e.g. οἱ ἐν τῷ κλήρῳ, Epist. Cuii, ap. Euseb. H. E. v. 28; Conc. Nicaen. c. 3; οἱ ἐν τῷ κλήρῳ καταριθμούμενοι, Conc. Chalc. c. 2; οἱ ἐν τῷ κλήρῳ καταλεγόμενοι, Conc. Trull. c. 3, 27; οἱ ἐν κλήρῳ κατειλεγμένοι, Conc. Chalc. c. 3; οἱ ἐκ τοῦ κλήρου, Conc. Ancyr. c. 3; οἱ ἀπὸ κλήρου, S. Petr. Alex. Serm. de Poenit. c. 10, Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Gr. vol. i. p. 556.

3. τάξις, τάγμα (= Latin ordo; cf. Vitruv. i. 2), Conc. Ancyr. A.D. 314, c. 14; Conc. Neocaes. c. 1; Justin. Novell. 6, c. 5, usually with a defining epithet, ἡ ἱερατικὴ τ. (τὸ ἱερ. τάγμα), Conc. Laod. c. 3; Justin. Cod. tit. i. lib. 3, 47 (46); Socrat. H. E. vi. 18, vii. 7; Sozom. H. E. i. 23; ἡ ἐκκλησιαστικὴ τ. Conc. Laod. c. 24; Conc. Chalc. c. 6. Also used, like ordo and κλῆρος, of any class or rank of persons in the church, e.g. of laymen, Conc. Nicaen. c. 5; Conc. Constantin. c. 6; of monks (ἀσκητῶν), Conc. Laod. c. 24; of catechumens, Conc. Neocaes. c. 5; cf. the Pfaffian fragment of Hippolytus in Gallandi, vol. ii. p. 488, where the seven θεῖα τάγματα are prophets, apostles, martyrs, priests, ascetics, holy men, just men.

4. βαθμός, gradus, possibly used from the first in a metaphorical sense, but more probably with reference to the platforms on which the several ranks stood or sat in church; first in 1 Tim. iii.

13; β. τοῦ κλήρου, Epist. Synod. Sardic. ap. S. Athanas. Apol. c. Arian. c. 37, vol. i. p. 123; β. πρεσβυτέρου, S. Greg. Nazianz. Epist. 8 (11), vol. ii. p. 8; Conc. Chalc. c. 29; β. διακονίας, S. Greg. Nyss. de Vita S. Macrin. ap. Migne, P. G. vol. xlvi. p. 988; β. ἱερατείας, Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 3, 53 (52); β. ἐπισκοπῆς, Conc. Ephes. c. 1; Conc. Sardic. c. 5; Conc. Chalc. c. 2; apparently of all orders from readers upwards, Conc. Sardic. c. 10, but of the higher orders only in S. Basil. Epist. 3 ad Amphiloch. c. 51, p. 325; εἴτε ἐν βαθμῷ τυγχάνοιεν εἴτε καὶ ἀχειροθέτῳ ὑπηρεσίᾳ προσκαρτέρουεν; cf. Justin. Novell. 123, c. 4, οἱουδήποτε τάγματος ἢ βαθμοῦ, where there may be a similar distinction. Gradus is also sometimes used in distinction from ordo, S. Leon. M. Epist. 1 (6), vol. i. p. 593: "nec in presbyteratus gradu, nec in diaconatus ordine, nec in subsequenti officio clericorum"; 4 Conc. Brac. A.D. 675, c. 7: "qui gradus jam ecclesiasticos meruerunt, id est, presbyteri abbates sive levitae" (are as a rule to be exempted from corporal punishment); but elsewhere "gradus ordinum," Conc. Taurin. A.D. 401, c. 8, or "sacrati gradus," Conc. Rom. A.D. 465, c. 2, or "clericatus gradus," Can. Eccl. Afric. c. 27, or "sacratissimi ordines clericorum," S. Siric. Epist. ad Himer. c. 7, are used of any of the ranks of the clergy.

5. Among other equivalent words which were in use may be mentioned σχῆμα, Justin. Novell. 3, 1; Conc. Nicaen. c. 8 (al. τάγμα); ἀξίωμα, Const. Apost. ii. 28, viii. 1; Conc. Nicaen. c. 8; Conc. Trull. c. 7; ἀξία, Conc. Chalc. c. 2; Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 3, 42 (41), c. 9; sacri honores, 8 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 653, c. 7.

6. Several collective names for the clergy are based upon the fact that a list or roll of the clergy was kept in each church; hence οἱ ἐν τῷ κλήρῳ καταριθμούμενοι, Conc. Chalc. c. 2; οἱ ἐν κλήρῳ καταλεγόμενοι, id. c. 3; Conc. Trull. c. 3, 27; οἱ ἐν τῷ κανόνι ἐξεταζόμενοι, Conc. Nicaen. c. 16; οἱ ἐν ἱερατικῷ καταλεγόμενοι τάγματι, Conc. Trull. c. 11, 24; οἱ ἐν ἱερατικῷ καταλόγῳ, id. c. 5; rarely, κανονικοί, S. Cyrill. Hieros. Procatech. c. 4, p. 4; S. Basil. Epist. 1 ad Amphiloch. c. 6, where, however, it is probably feminine, though interpreted by Balsamon and Zonaras as masculine (so Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Gr. vol. i. p. 614).

II. INTERNAL ORGANIZATION OF THE CLERGY (i.e. grades and divisions of orders).—It is clear from the use of the designations οἱ προϊστάμενοι (1 Thess. v. 12), οἱ ἡγούμενοι (Heb. xiii. 7, 17, 24), οἱ προηγούμενοι (Clem. R. i. 2, 1; Herm. Vis. 3, 9), and also from the use of κλῆρος and ordo in the singular, which has been pointed out above, that a distinction was drawn in the earliest period between the governing body of a church and its ordinary members. What were the elements of that governing body, and how far the distinction which was thus created corresponded to the later distinction between clergy and laity, are questions of too great intricacy and uncertainty to be properly discussed here. But side by side with the use of κλῆρος and ordo in the singular, which almost passed away with the civil organization from which it was derived, is found, also in early times, their use in the plural to designate, not the governing body, but all "estates" of men or women in the church. In the κατάλογος, or list of members of each church, as in the corresponding lists of the Greek and Roman associations, with which the early churches had much in common, the members were arranged in groups; each of these groups was a κλῆρος or "ordo"; the number of such groups was not rigidly defined, and the variety which exists in the lists which have come down to us makes it extremely difficult to lay down any general propositions concerning them. The enumeration of orders in the Apostolical Constitutions is probably a relic of such a list. It specifies bishop, presbyters, deacons, readers, singers, doorkeepers, deaconesses, widows, virgins, orphans [laymen] (C. A. ii. 25; viii. 10, 12), but elsewhere there is a shorter enumeration of clerks, virgins, widows [laymen] (iii. 15; cf. viii. 29). The difficulty of determining which of the classes thus enumerated corresponded to the clergy of a later age is increased by the fact that sometimes the members of the clerus seem to have been regarded as identical with the persons whose names were inscribed on the canon, a word which was in ordinary use under the empire, in reference to fixed payments and allowances of provisions (Conc. Nicaen. c. 3, οἱ ἐν τῷ κλήρῳ apparently = ibid. c. 16, οἱ ἐν τῷ κανόνι ἐξεταζόμενοι; so in S. Epiphan. c. Haeres. iii. 1, 1, p. 812, εἴ τινα γὰρ εἶδε τῶν φιλοχρηματούντων τοῦ κλήρου ἢ ἐπίσκοπον ἢ πρεσβύτερον ἢ ἕτερόν τινα τοῦ κανόνος).[a] Of the classes who were thus included in a common list with the church officers, those which survived longest were those of widows and virgins. When the distinction between clergy and laity began to be more sharply drawn, these classes remained for some time on the border-line; and it is an indication of the conservative character of forms of public prayer that the ancient enumeration of orders survived in the missals long after it had ceased to be recognized in conciliar decrees, or by ecclesiastical writers. For example, in bishop Leofric's Exeter missal, in the Bodleian library (A.D. 969), the "ordines" include bishops, presbyters, deacons, subdeacons, acolytes, exorcists, readers, doorkeepers, confessors, virgins, widows,

[a] As the word has been very frequently misunderstood, it may be advisable to trace its several meanings with undoubted instances of their occurrence: it denoted (a) the fixed sum paid by the perpetual occupier of a fundus emphyteuticus, Cod. Theod. 5, 13, 30; 11, 16, 13; (b) the fixed contribution of corn or other produce paid by a province to Rome, hence, e.g., "Canon Aegypti," Vopisc. Vit. Firm. c. 5; (c) the total amount thus contributed and available for distribution in fixed rations among the Roman populace, hence "canon urbis Romae," "canon urbicarius," Cod. Theod. 14, 15, 2, 6; cf. Novell. Majorian. tit. 7, c. 16, ed. Haenel, Novell. Constit. p. 320; Lamprid. Vit. Elagab. c. 27; Spart. Vit. Sever. c. 8; Bulenger. de Vectig. Rom. ap. Graev. Thes. vol. viii. 894; Falconer. ad C. Datum Epist. ap. eund. vol. iv. 1490; Kuhn, Städt. u. bürgerl. Verfassung des Röm. Reichs, i. p. 274 sqq. Hence the double enactment of Conc. Nicaen. c. 16, καθαιρήσεται τοῦ κλήρου καὶ ἀλλότριος τοῦ κανόνος ἔσται, i.e. he will lose not only his rank but his allowance: hence also the importance attached to ἐπιστολαὶ κανονικαί, i.e. letters which entitled the bearer to a fixed allowance in the church to which he travelled. That a similar connotation came to attach itself to the word κατάλογος is clear from Justin. Novell. tit. 3, 2, where the emperor deprecates the formation of δευτέρους καταλόγους by ordaining more than the fixed number for a church, and providing for those so ordained in some extraordinary way.

and all the people of God (fol. 108). But in the meantime, though not uniformly throughout christendom, the distinction between those who held office and those who did not had become sharply accentuated. Between them came those who had taken monastic vows (μᾶλλον τῷ λαῷ παρὰ τοὺς ἱερατικοὺς πλησιάζοντες, S. Dionys. Areop. Epist. viii. ad Demophil. p. 599), the τάγμα τῶν ἀσκητῶν, Conc. Laod. c. 24, or τάγμα τῶν μοναζόντων, S. Basil. Epist. Canon. ii. ad Amphiloch. c. 19. Into this class were merged, not only the ancient orders of widows and virgins, but also that of deaconesses; the former became simple nuns, the latter were more usually abbesses. Hence there came to be only three orders or estates—the "ordo clericalis," the "ordo monachorum," and the "ordo laicorum" (Hrabanus Maurus, de Instit. Cleric. lib. i. c. 2; cf. Hugo de S. Vict. de Sacram. lib. ii. pars 3, c. 14). It may be added that the distinction between monks and clerks was apparently always recognized in the West, e.g. S. Hieron. Epist. 125 (4) ad Rusticum, vol. i. p. 944, "ita vive in monasterio ut clericus esse merearis," and usually in the East, e.g. S. Cyrill. Alexand. Epist. ad Episc. Lib. c. 4; S. Athanas. Epist. ad Dracont. c. 9, vol. i. p. 211; but not always in the East, e.g. Schol. in Nomocan. tit. 1, c. 31, ed. Rallé and Potlé, Athens, 1852, vol. i. p. 71; Balsamon, in Conc. Carth. c. 35, vol. i. p. 357, though elsewhere Balsamon includes among clerks only those monks who had received episcopal ordination, in Conc. Carth. c. 6, vol. i. p. 119; in Conc. Trull. c. 77, vol. i. p. 247.

But even if the term "orders" be limited, as it will be limited in what follows, to the "ordo clericalis" in its later sense, there is great diversity of use in regard to the persons whom it denotes. No two periods and no two churches altogether agree as to the grades into which the clergy were to be divided, or as to the offices which created a difference of grade in distinction from those which were merely differences of function between persons of the same grade. A complete account of this diversity of use would be considerably beyond our present limits; but the following incomplete account will give the leading facts in regard to (1) the grades which were at various times recognised, (2) the groups into which those grades were divided.

(1) Grades of Orders (gradus ordinum, Conc. Taurin. A.D. 401, c. 8).—1. Bishops, presbyters, deacons.—Without here entering into the question of the primitive distinction between bishops and presbyters [see PRIEST], there is no doubt that from the end of the 2nd century these three grades were generally if not universally found, and even so late as the 4th century they are sometimes treated as comprising all the clergy; e.g. in the synodical letter of the council of Antioch in reference to Paul of Samosata, Euseb. H. E. vii. 30, "bishops, and presbyters, and deacons, and the churches of God;" so S. Cyrill. Hieros. Catech. 16, 22, p. 256, bishops, presbyters, deacons [monks, virgins, laymen], and even much later Suidas, p. 2120 c, defines κλῆρος as τὸ σύστημα τῶν διακόνων καὶ πρεσβυτέρων. (The later tendency to treat bishops as not being a separate order, but as constituting with presbyters the "ordo sacerdotum," Conc. Trident. sess. xxiii. c. 2; Catech. Rom. ii. 7, 26, may be either a survival from the earlier time in which, whatever may have been the distinction between them, bishops and presbyters together formed the "ordo ecclesiasticus," or an exaltation of the conception of the priesthood; the latter seems to be the view of a 15th century pontifical in the library of St. Geneviève at Paris (B. B. l. 50, fol. xiv.), "episcopatus non est ordo sed sacerdotii culmen et apex atque tronus dignitatis.") 2. The earliest addition to these three grades (there is no certain evidence of its primitive coexistence with them) appears to have been that of readers. The four grades of bishop, presbyter, deacon, and reader form the nucleus of every organization in both East and West, and they are sometimes the only grades which are recognized, e.g. Tertull. de Praescript. Haeret. c. 41; Διατ. Κλήμεντος, ap. Lagarde, Jur. Eccl. Reliq. p. 74, Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Gr. vol. i. p. 84; Conc. Sardic. c. 10; S. Greg. Nazianz. Orat. xlii. c. 11, p. 756; Conc. Ephes. Act i. cap. 23. The only churches which have preserved the order of bishops without retaining that of readers are probably those of England and Abyssinia (Ludolf, Historia Aethiopica, Append. pp. 306, 320). 3. The complex character of the duties of deacons caused them to be divided, and a new order of assistant-deacons (ὑποδιάκονοι, subdiaconi; ὑπηρέται, ministri) was recognised; among the earliest instances of such a recognition are S. Cypr. Epist. 24, vol. ii. p. 287; Const. Apost. viii. 11, 12, 20; Conc. Illib. c. 30; Neocaes. c. 10; Laod. c. 22, 43; Sozom. H. E. i. 23; Cod. Theodos. lib. xvi. tit. 2, 7. The five grades of bishop, presbyter, deacon, subdeacon, and reader are apparently the only grades recognized in S. Joann. Damasc. Dial. c. Manich. c. 3, vol. i. p. 431; S. Sym. Thessal. de Sacr. Ordin. c. 156, p. 138 (but id. de Divino Templo, c. 26, 27, 30, p. 275, omits subdeacons); they became the ordinary grades of the Greek, Coptic, and Nestorian churches (see Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. 8, 1; Denzinger, Rit. Orient. vol. i. pp. 118, 122; but the Scholiast in Rallé and Potlé's edition of the Councils, vol. i. p. 71, states that the current practice agreed with the Nomocanon in also recognizing the order of singers; the Copts and Nestorians also subdivided the higher orders as mentioned below). 4. Sometimes the order of readers was subdivided so as to make a separate order of singers, Justin. Novell. 123, c. 19; Nomocanon, tit. i. c. 31; the subdivision has remained in the Syrian churches, both Jacobite and Maronite, who, however, also subdivide the higher orders as mentioned below. Sometimes when singers are recognized the order of subdeacons is omitted, Const. Apost. viii. 10, and some MSS. of Can. Apost. 69. 5. Sometimes doorkeepers were added as a separate order, Justin. Novell. 3 praef.; but ibid. c. 1, § 1, doorkeepers are distinguished from clerks; similarly in Const. Apost. ii. 25 doorkeepers are mentioned, whereas ibid. viii. 10, they are omitted; so in the Nestorian canons of the patriarch John, circ. A.D. 900, ap. Ebedjesu, Tract. vi. cap. 6, can. 11, ap. Mai, Scriptt. Vett. vol. x. p. 117: "de omnibus ordinibus, sacerdotum et clericorum atque ostiariorum." They are also mentioned in the canons of the Alexandrian church, wrongly attributed to St. Athanasius, but are not recognized in the later Alexandrian (Coptic) ordinals, nor in other eastern churches. 6. Sometimes exorcists are added, the eight orders of bishop, presbyter, deacon, subdeacon, exorcist, reader, singer, doorkeeper, being enumerated, Conc. Laod. c. 24. They are mentioned as members of the clerus by St. Cyprian, Epist. 16; but they are apparently excluded in Const. Apost. viii. 25, and though sometimes mentioned, e.g. by Greg. Barhebraeus, Nomocan. c. 7, § 8, they never had any general recognition as a separate order in the East. (a) From this list sometimes singers are omitted, Cod. Theodos. lib. 16, tit. 2, 24 (a law of Valens, Gratian, and Valentinian in A.D. 377 = Cod. Justin. lib. 1, tit. 3, 6, where some editions insert "acoluthos," against MSS. authority, apparently to make the list tally with the later Roman lists); so Nomocanon, tit. 1, c. 31. (b) Sometimes doorkeepers as well as singers are omitted, so apparently Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, c. 10 (which is one of the few recognitions of exorcists in Eastern canons); this is the case even in some of those Western ordinals which give a ritual for the ordination of doorkeepers, viz. those which quote the decretal of Zosimus (Hinschius, Decret. Pseudo-Isid. p. 553), in which only six orders are specified. 7. Sometimes acolyths are added to the orders enumerated above, S. Cyprian. Epist. 28, 3; possibly Cod. Theodos. lib. 16, tit. 2, c. 10; Isid. Hispal. Etym. 7, 2, 2, but when this is the case singers are commonly omitted. This is the earliest Roman list, being found in the 3rd century in the account which Cornelius gives, ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 43; it is not found in the East, nor until the 8th century is it common in the West, one of the rare instances of its occurrence being in a Gallican inscription of A.D. 517, given by Le Blant, Inscriptions Chrétiennes de la Gaule, No. 30; probably also ibid. No. 617, A.D. 445, assuming that "sequentibus" is a translation of ἀκολούθοις. But it came at last to be the usual list of the western canonists, e.g. Capit. Hadrian. c. 72; Yves of Chartres, Serm. 2, vol. ii. p. 263; Alcuin, de Div. Offic. c. 34; Hraban of Mainz, de Cleric. Instit. c. 4 (where, however, readers and singers appear to be identified), and Hugh of St. Victor, de Sacram. lib. ii. p. 3, c. 5, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. clxxvi. p. 425. It was adopted in later times by the council of Trent, sess. xxiii. c. 2, with the exception that bishops and presbyters are classed together as "sacerdotes." But Innocent III., though recognizing acolyths, excludes exorcists and readers, thus giving the six orders of bishop, presbyter, deacon, subdeacon, acolyth, and singer, which he regards as the Christian counterpart of the Levitical orders "pontifices, sacerdotes, levitas, nathinaeos, janitores, et psaltas" (Innoc. III. de Sacro Altaris Ministerio, i. 1, Migne, P. L. vol. ccxvii. p. 775). 8. In some Oriental churches there are grades which in the west either do not exist or are not ranked as grades but as functions: (a) chorepiscopi are distinctly ranked as co-ordinate with the other grades of clerks in Conc. Chalc. c. 2; Cod. Justin. lib. 1, tit. 3, 40 (39), § 9; Gennadius, Epist. Encycl. in Act. Conc. Constan. A.D. 459, Mansi, vii. 911, Pitra, vol. ii. 184; and among the Jacobite Syrians, the Maronites (both of whom have a separate form of ordination for chorepiscopi), and, according to George of Arbela, the Nestorians. (b) Periodeutae are also ranked as a separate order in Cod. Justin. l. c., probably in Conc. Laod. c. 57 (cf. Hefele, Councils, E. T. vol. ii. p. 321), among the Syrians both Jacobite and Maronite, and, according to Ebedjesu, Tract. vi. c. 1, ap. Mai, Script. Vett. vol. x. p. 106, among the Nestorians (but in regard to the eastern status of both chorepiscopi and periodeutae, see Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium, vol. i. pp. 121 sqq.). (c) Archdeacons are reckoned as a separate order among the Copts, Jacobites, Maronites, and Nestorians. (d) The Copts also recognise an order corresponding to the archpresbyters or protopresbyters of the Latin and Greek churches, whom they call Igumeni [ἡγούμενοι, properly used of abbats or archimandrites, Denzinger, i. 117]. (e) The Nestorians recognise an order of officers to whom they give the name Sciahara, who are a special grade of singers, Denzinger, i. 124. 9. The oriental churches also recognise grades of the episcopate; the Copts have bishops, archbishops (= metropolitans), and a patriarch, for each of whom there is a distinct form of ordination, Denzinger, i. 116, ii. 33; the Jacobites and Maronites have bishops, metropolitans, and patriarchs; the Nestorians, according to Ebedjesu, have bishops, metropolitans, and patriarchs, but according to George of Arbela there is properly a distinction between patriarchs and catholici [CATHOLICUS, Vol. I. p. 321]. The western church has also sometimes recognised differences of grade in the episcopate. Isid. Hispal. Etym. vii. 12, 2, recognises bishops, archbishops, metropolitans, and patriarchs. Hrabanus Maurus identifies archbishops and metropolitans, de Cleric. Instit. c. 5. But the council of Trent made these grades to be with "priests simply so called," i.e. presbyters, grades not of the episcopate but of the priesthood, Catech. Rom. 2, 7, 26. 10. From the 6th century it appears to have become the custom, especially in the Gallican churches, to confer upon persons the privileges and immunities of the clergy by giving them the tonsure without admitting them to any special office in the church; such persons were called clerici, but it is admitted by canonists and by the council of Trent that they were not an "ordo" (Catalani, ad Pontif. Rom. pars i. tit. iii.). 11. Several other classes of church officers appear at various times to have been recognised as members of the clerus, e.g. (a) copiatae, Cod. Theodos. lib. xiii. tit. 1, 1 (but distinguished from clerici, ibid. lib. xvi. tit. 2, 15), S. Epiphan. Expos. Fid. c. 21, p. 1104 [COPIATAE, DECANI, FOSSARII]: (b) custodes martyrum mentioned apparently as co-ordinate with deacons in the Liber Pontif. Vit. S. Silvestr. = Synod. Gest. S. Silvestr. c. vii. Migne, P. L. vol. viii. 802, in the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals, Hinschius, p. 450: (c) custodes sacrorum, Isid. Hispal. de Divin. Off. 2, 9: (d) κοιτιῶντες, Ps.-Ignat. Epist. ad Antioch. c. 12; (e) θέωροι, Balsam. in Conc. Trull. c. 77, vol. i. p. 247: (f) ἑρμηνευταὶ γλώσσης εἰς γλῶσσαν, S. Epiphan. Expos. Fid. c. 21, p. 1104.

It is possible that mystical reasons had something to do with the elimination of some of these classes from the list of grades which came ultimately to be received by theologians in the West; the seven orders were the seven manifestations of the work of the Holy Spirit, e.g. Yves of Chartres says that "sancta ecclesia septiformis gratiae est munere decorata" (D. Ivon. Carnot. Serm. 2, ii. p. 263); so Hugh of S. Victor: "septem spiritualium officiorum gradus proinde in sancta ecclesia secundum septiformem gratiam distributi sunt" (Hugon. de S. Vict. de Sacram. lib.

ii. pars 3, c. 5). But Innocent III. de Sacro Altaris Minister. lib. i. c. 1, Migne, P. L. vol. ccxvii. p. 775, finds an equally valid mystical reason for six orders, "senarius enim numerus est perfectus;" and still later canonists agree with Isidore in reckoning nine, adding clerks and bishops to the seven grades which were ordinarily received by theologians (Catalani, note to the Pontificale Romanum, pars 1, tit. 2); so in the Maronite pontifical, Morin, de Sacr. Ordin. pars ii. p. 406). Alcuin (Albinus Flaccus) reckons eight orders, by making bishops distinct from presbyters, assigning the mystical reason that the gates of the temple in Ezekiel's vision had each eight steps (Albin. Flacc. de Divin. Off. 33; Ezek. xl. 31, 34, 37). The same number, without the reason, is given by Hrabanus Maurus, de Instit. Cleric. i, 4, and in St. Dunstan's and the Jumiéges pontificals.

(2) Groups of Grades of Orders.—The several ordines tended to combine into groups; but the groups varied widely under different circumstances.

1. Sometimes the bishop was regarded as standing apart from the other officers of the church. This distinction, which is important in relation to the history of the episcopate, shews itself from the fourth century onwards in the restriction of the use of κλῆρος and κληρικοί to those who were not bishops. This may not have been universally or invariably the case, as many passages, e.g. in the Apostolical Canons, may be interpreted in either way; but the following instances are clear: in the Canon Law, Conc. Ephes. c. 6, εἰ μὲν ἐπίσκοποι εἶεν ἢ κληρικοί; Conc. Chalc. c. 3, μὴ ἐπίσκοπον, μὴ κληρικόν; 1 Conc. Carth. c. 9, 11; Conc. Trull. c. 17; in the Civil Law, Cod. Theodos. 16, 2, 11 (A.D. 354), antistites et clerici; id. 16, 2, 32 (A.D. 398); episcopi et clerici; Cod. Justin. lib. 1, tit. 3, 39 (38), τοὺς ἐπισκόπους ἢ τοὺς κληρικούς; id. Novell. 6, c. 8 (A.D. 535), 123, c. 6; in the Fathers, e.g. S. Cyrill. Alex. Epist. 1, x. p. 4; id. Ep. 2, x. p. 20; S. Leon. M. Epist. 167, 1, i. p. 1420; Theodoret, H. E. 2, 7, p. 851; in inscriptions, e.g. at Corycus in Cilicia, θεοφιλεστάτου ἐπισκόπου καὶ [τοῦ εὐ]αγοῦ[ς κ]λήρου; Le Bas et Waddington, Inscriptions d'Asie Mineure, No. 1421 = C. I. G. 8619; so in Suid. p. 2120, c. κλῆρος τὸ σύστημα τῶν διακόνων καὶ πρεσβυτέρων.

2. Sometimes the higher orders, both collectively and in the abstract, are designated by words connoting sacredness or priesthood; ἱερατεῖον, Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, c. 3; εἴ τις πρ. ἢ διακ. ἢ ὅλως τῶν τοῦ ἱερατείου τις, S. Athanas. Epist. Encycl. 1, i. p. 88; id. Epist. ad Rufin. i. p. 769, τῷ ἱερατείῳ καὶ τῷ λαῷ τῷ ὑπὸ σέ, S. Basil. Epist. 198 (203), iii. p. 289. Ἱερατεία, Cod. Just. lib. 1, tit. 3, 53 (52), A.D. 532; id. Novell. 6, c. 7. Ἱερωσύνη, S. Epiphan. adv. Haer. 2, 1, 48, 9, i. p. 410; Sozomen, H.E. ii. 34; S. Basil. Epist. 188 (Canonic. 1), § 14, iii. p. 275—all in the abstract of the office; in the concrete, S. Maxim. Conf. Epist. 21, ap. Migne, P. G. xci. p. 604. Ἱερατικοί, Conc. Laod. c. 24, 27; S. Basil. Epist. 237 (264) iii. p. 365 = τὸ ἱερατικὸν πλήρωμα, id. Epist. 240 (192), § 3, iii. p. 370. So Cod. Theodos. lib. xvi. tit. ii. 44: "quicunque cujuscunque gradus sacerdotio fulciuntur vel clericatus honore censentur." The distinction between various grades of orders which was thus created was by no means uniform. (i.) In the East—a. Sometimes bishops and presbyters were classed together in distinction to deacons and other clerks, e.g. Auct. Vit. Spiridionis ap. Haenel, Corp. Leg. ante Justin. lat. p. 209, "omnibus qui sunt partium ecclesiasticarum, sacerdotibus quam et diaconis." Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 3, 10 (law of Arcadius and Honorius, A.D. 398), "sacerdotes et ministri"; S. Sym. Thessal. de Divino Templo, c. 26, 27, p. 275. b. Sometimes deacons were included among those who had sacred or priestly rank, e.g. Conc. Laod. c. 24; ἱερατικοὺς ἀπὸ πρεσβυτέρων ἕως διακόνων; S. Basil. Epist. 227 (264), vol. ii. p. 365. c. Sometimes subdeacons appear to have been also included, e.g. Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, c. 3; by implication, S. Epiphan. Expos. Fid. c. 21, vol. i. p. 1104; so according to Balsamon, who may, however, be simply stating the practice of his own day, Conc. Trull. c. 77, which makes the tripartite division ἱερατικοὺς ἢ κληρικοὺς ἢ ἀσκητάς. But in the East as in the West subdeacons were for several centuries on the border-line; they had sometimes the privileges of the higher, sometimes those of the lower, division of the clergy. (ii.) In the West a distinction was ultimately drawn between "ordines" and "sacri ordines"; the latter were for some time regarded as consisting of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, but the earliest canonical restriction of the phrase to these three orders is probably Conc. Benevent. A.D. 1091 (Mansi, vol. xx. p. 738), which is the authority quoted by Gratian, pars i. dist. 60, 4. But the earlier use of "sacri ordines" for all classes of church officers is occasionally found even after the limitation had become ordinarily fixed, (e.g. in a Reims pontifical, no. 179 (162), fol. 109, "sacri ordines" are distinguished not from minor orders but from the orders of virgins or widows). The modern inclusion of the subdiaconate among "holy orders" dates from the 12th century. It is expressly excluded by Hugh of St. Victor, de Sacram. lib. ii. pars 3, c. 13. Peter the Singer, A.D. 1197, speaks of the inclusion as a recent institution Verb. Abbrev. c. 60; Migne, P. L. vol. ccv. 184, and about the same time Innocent III. says that "hodie" a subdeacon is in holy orders and may be elected bishop (Epist. x. 164; Migne, P. L. vol. ccxv. 1257); Durand (Rationale, ii. c. 8), ascribes the inclusion to Innocent III. himself. (Cf. Morin, de Sacr. Ordin. pars iii. exercit. 12, c. 5; Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. 8, art. 2.) Earlier traces of this elevation of the subdiaconate are S. August. Serm. 356, de Diversis, c. 2, vol. v. p. 1575; Can. Eccles. Afric. c. 25; Conc. Gerund. A.D. 583, c. 1; 2 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 531, c. 3; on the other hand in most Oriental churches subdeacons still retain their primitive place, and do not enter into the sanctuary.

3. Sometimes bishops, presbyters, and deacons were classed together, without express reference to their sacred or priestly character, as forming a higher class of clergy; the existence of this distinction in early times is made apparent, without being expressly stated, by differences in discipline, e.g. in Can. Apost. 42, 43, 54, 55; afterwards it came to be commonly expressed, e.g. 1 Conc. Matiscon. A.D. 581, c. 11; Episcopi, presbyteri, vel universi honoratiores clerici; Joann. Diac. Vit. S. Greg. M. i. 31; hence "inferiores clerici," Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 28; "inferioris ordinis clerici," S. Augustin. Epist. 43 (162), c.

8; Alcuin (Albinus Flaccus), de Divin. Off. c. 33, "tres superiores gradus;" Amalarius of Metz, de Eccl. Off. 2, 6, where "inferiores ordines" are "ordines subjecti diacono et presbytero." Sometimes the reference to relative superiority or inferiority is omitted, but bishops, presbyters, and deacons specially enumerated, and the other orders are summed up as "clerici," e.g. Can. Apost. 4, 8, 16; Conc. Nicaen. c. 3, Antioch, c. 2, 3 Chalc. c. 6, 3 Carth. 9, 15; will of Perpetuus of Tours, A.D. 474, in D'Achery, Spicilegium, vol. iii. p. 303; Karlomanni Capit. Liftin. A.D. 740, ap. Pertz, M. G. H. Legum. vol. i. p. 18. The line was afterwards drawn at subdeacons (one of the earliest instances of which is in the Leges Wisigothorum, lib. ii. tit. 1, c. 18), but it was not until the 13th century that the subdiaconate was ordinarily ranked among "majores ordines;" from that time "sacri ordines" are identical with "majores ordines," and included bishops, presbyters, deacons, and subdeacons, "minores ordines" including acolyths, exorcists, readers, and doorkeepers. The distinction does not exist in Oriental churches.

(3) Succession of, and intervals between, grades of orders.—There is no evidence of the existence in the earliest period of any rule against the appointment of a layman to any office whatever in the church, still less is there any evidence to shew that a clerk who had begun in a lower grade had to pass by any regular steps of succession to a higher. There are instances (1) of bishops who had never been presbyters [BISHOP, Vol. I. p. 219], to the examples given in which place may be added the case of Paulinianus in S. Hieron. Epist. 82 (62), vol. i. p. 518: the cases mentioned in S. Leon. M. Epist. 14, ad Anastas. c. 6, vol. i. p. 688; S. Greg. Magn. Epist. ix. 109, vol. ii. p. 1014: the case of St. Caesarius of Arles, Vit. c. 1, Migne, P. L. vol. lxvii. 1005: the very late instance of a bishop of Lyons, in A.D. 841, in Pertz, M. G. H. Script. i. p. 110, Mabillon, Mus. Ital. vol. i. 68; and of John, bishop of Constance, mentioned in Walafrid Strabo, Vit. S. Gall. lib. i. c. 23, Migne, P. L. cxiv. 998, Greith, Altirische Kirche, p. 382: the complaint of pope Celestin, Epist. ad Episc. Gall. c. 3: and the Brehon law that when a bishop "stumbled," i.e. committed adultery, the reader shall be installed in the bishopric, Senchus Mor, ed. Hancock, p. 59: see also Mabillon, Mus. Ital. vol. ii. p. cviii.; Denzinger, Rit. Orient. vol. i. p. 146: and for evidence that some popes never passed through the presbyterate, Mabillon, l. c. p. cxix. The case of Photius, who was accused and ultimately deposed because, among other reasons, he had not passed through the lower grades, can only be mentioned here; the weakness of the Latin attack upon him is shewn in the writings which contain it, especially Nicolas I. Epist. 12, 13, Migne, P. L. vol. cxix., Mansi, vol. xv.: Ratramn. of Corbey, Lib. contr. Graec. iv. c. 8, Migne, P. L. cxxi. 334, D'Achery, Spicil. vol. i.; Aeneas of Paris, adv. Graec. c. 210, Migne, P. L. vol. cxxi., D'Achery, Spicil. vol. i.; Photius's letter in defence will be found in Migne, P. G. vol. cii., Epist. i. 2. (2) Of presbyters who had never been deacons (e.g. St. Cyprian, according to Pontius, Vit. S. Cypr. c. 3; St. Augustine, according to Possidius, Vit. S. August. c. 4; probably St. Basil as St. Greg. Nazianz. Orat. 43, c. 27, vol. i. p. 792, mentions only his being reader, presbyter, bishop: Cosmas mentioned in S. Greg. Magn. Epist. xiii. 28, vol. ii. p. 1237: the case is also contemplated in the Canon Law, Gratian, Decret. i. dist. 74, c. 9, = Ivo, Decret. vi. c. 106). (3) Of deacons who had never been subdeacons (e.g. St. Chrysostom in Socrates, H. E. 7, 3, p. 313; the subdiaconate is not mentioned in the enumeration of necessary grades in Conc. Sardic. c. 10, and it is not even now necessary among the Jacobite Syrians, Denzinger, Rit. Orient. vol. ii. p. 82).

But although these instances are important as shewing not only that the rules which were laid down from time to time were limitations of an earlier freedom, but also that ordinations per saltum, as they were afterwards called, were regarded as canonically valid, yet they must probably be considered as exceptions to a prevailing tendency. As early as the Pastoral Epistles promotion to a higher grade is held out as an inducement to "use the office well" (1 Tim. iii. 13), and a person who had only recently been converted is made ineligible for the office of a "bishop" (μὴ νεόφυτον, 1 Tim. iii. 6). This latter regulation had evidently come to be disregarded at the beginning of the 4th century, and the council of Nicaea, c. 2, in re-enacting it extended it to all clerks (the meaning of the difficult Greek text of the canon is probably best expressed by Rufinus, H. E. 2, 6, "ne quis nuper assumptus de vita vel conversatione Gentili, accepto baptismo, antequam cautius examinetur, clericus fiat;" so in effect Dionysius Exiguus, but Hefele ad loc. takes a slightly different view). But in the course of the same century there are traces of the growth of a tendency to appoint no one to a higher office until he had passed through the lower. The tendency was probably fostered by the civil law in regard to appointments, "ut gradatim honores deferantur," Modestin. in the Dig. 50, 4, 11, quoting a letter of Antoninus Pius; "gerendorum honorum non promiscua facultas est, sed ordo certus huic rei adhibitus est," Callistratus in the Dig. 50, 4, 14, § 5. This tendency finds its first authorized expression in Conc. Sardic. c. 10, which however deals with the special case of a wealthy man or lawyer (πλούσιός τις ἢ σχολαστικός) being elected to a bishopric, and requires such a man to pass gradatim through the offices of reader, deacon, and presbyter. Gregory Nazianzen is less definite. He lays down as a general rule that a man should fill a lower office in the church before filling the highest office (Orat. 2, Apolog. § 111, vol. i. p. 62, sometimes interpreted that he should be a reader before being a presbyter). The first writer who speaks of passing "per solitos gradus" is Jerome (Epist. 60 (3), ad Heliodorum, vol. i. p. 337). Leo the Great discourages the omission of the lower grades, but does not disallow it (Epist. 12, vol. i. p. 674), whereas Gregory the Great speaks of the omission as "grave nimis" (Epist. ix. 109, vol. ii. p. 1014, writing to Brunhild; cf. ibid. ix. 106, vol. ii. p. 1009, "ordinate ad ordines accedendum est").

When the rule had been fairly established, there still arose cases in which it created a difficulty. In such cases the rule was at once observed and evaded by accumulating ordina-tions, i.e. a person was admitted to successive grades on the same day or at short intervals. Early instances of this practice are that of Wulfad, in whose favour Charles the Bald wrote, Epist. Caroli R. in Conc. Suession. A.D. 866; Mansi, vol. xv. p. 708, and that of a bishop of Salerno mentioned by Leo Marsicanus, Chron. Casin. ii. 98; Migne, P. L. vol. clxxiii. One edition of the Roman pontifical (that which was published by Albertus Castellanus at Venice in 1520 and dedicated to Leo X.) makes provision for the case of a pope who was elected either as a layman or in minor orders, "accipiet primam tonsuram et minores ordines, ut alii inferiores," with this difference, that he is to be vested from the first in mitre and rochet, and to receive the instruments of the several orders at his faldstool. But even when grades were not accumulated, it was not until the 8th century that ordinations per saltum began to be considered invalid or to be punished by deposition.

One of the earliest instances is in the Frankfort capitulary of A.D. 789, which deposes a bishop Gaerbod, who admits that he had not been ordained presbyter or deacon (Capit. Francofurt. § 10, ap. Pertz, M. H. G. Legum, vol. i. p. 73). Of later instances the mediaeval canonists furnish an abundant crop, e.g. Innocent III. Epist. vii. 192. A presbyter who has not been ordained deacon is allowed to retain his orders, but has to go through the ceremony of being ordained deacon, id. Epist. viii. 118; a deacon who does not know whether he received minor orders or not, is required to receive them "ad cautelam," id. Epist. x. 146; a deacon who has knowingly passed over the subdiaconate is sent to a monastery for a time.

The question what grades were necessary resolves itself into two questions—(i.) what was the first grade, (ii.) what were the necessary subsequent grades. (i.) The inference to be drawn from recorded historical examples is that, as a rule, those who dedicated themselves to the service of the church began as readers. An indication of this is found as early as the time of Cyprian (Epist. 33, vol. ii. p. 319, of the ordination of Aurelius; but the use of "placuit" shews at the same time that there was no existing rule on the subject). In the following century Basil (according to S. Greg. Nazianz. Orat. 43, c. 27, vol. i. p. 792) and Chrysostom (according to Socrat. H. E. vii. 3; Pallad. Vit. S. Chrys. c. 5) both began as readers. In the 5th century there are the instances of Felix of Nola (Paulin. Poem. XV. de S. Felice, v. 108; Migne, P. L. vol. lxi. 470), and of John of Châlons (Sidon. Apollin. Epist. iv. 25). The same inference as to the custom of beginning as readers follows (1) from the constant practice of the Greek church; (2) from the earliest papal decretals on the subject, those of Siricius, Zosimus, and Gelasius, which are quoted below; (3) from Conc. Milev. A.D. 416 (cf. S. August. Epist. 63 (240), vol. ii. p. 231), 2 Conc. Nicaen. c. 14. The earliest indication of the practice of beginning as a doorkeeper is probably that which is indicated by Paulinus of Nola Epist. 1 (6) ad Sever. c. 11; Migne, P. L. vol. lxi. 158 (although this may shew rather his own humility, than the prevalence of a custom); but in the 9th century the rule was laid down which has been the rule of Western canon law ever since that every clerk must pass through that grade (Silvest. Epist. c. 7; Cali Epist. c. 6; both adopted by the Pseudo-Isidore from the Liber Pontificalis, see below). Martin of Tours began as an exorcist (Sulp. Sever. Vit. S. Martin. c. 5), and Gregory the Great speaks of a monk who began as a subdeacon (Epist. 13, 28, vol. ii. p. 1237).

It must also be noted that there was a counter tendency to that which ultimately prevailed; it was probably not until the clerical office became a regular profession that promotion from one grade to another became an ordinary rule; persons who were well fitted for particular offices sometimes remained in them to the end of their lives. Ambrose (de Offic. Ministr. i. 44) writes as though division of labour were recognized in the church, and as though it were a function of the bishop to find out the office for which each person was best qualified. As instances of the prevalence of this view we find an acolyte of eighty-five years of age (Le Blant, Inscriptions Chrétiennes de la Gaule, no. 36) a deacon of fifty-eight (ibid. no. 430), a subdeacon of thirty-two (De Rossi, Inscr. Christianae Urbis Romanae, no. 743, A.D. 448).

(ii.) The definition of the particular grades through which a clerk must pass, and of the time which he must spend in each grade, belongs to the period of the Isidorian and Pseudo-Isidorian decretals. The uncertainty which prevailed, even after those decretals had been formally incorporated into canon law, is shewn by the great variety of readings which exist in the various MSS. of the decretals. 1. The earliest of them is probably that of Siricius, Epist. ad Eumer. c. 10 (= Gratian, Decret. i. dist. 77, c. 3; Ivo Carnot, Decret. 6, c. 91), which, according to the text given by Hinschius, Decret. Pseudo-Isid. p. 520, allows a person to be ordained reader in early youth; then from puberty until thirty years of age he is to be acolyte or subdeacon; five years afterwards he is to be deacon, but no definite period is prescribed before he can become presbyter or bishop; if, however, a person is not ordained in early youth, he must be reader or exorcist for two years after his baptism, acolyte, and subdeacon for five years in all; there is no other prescription of time; but other texts give an interval of five years between a deacon and a presbyter, and of ten years between a presbyter and a bishop. 2. The decretal of Zosimus, which is probably next in order of antiquity (Epist. ad Hesych. c. 3 = Gratian, Decret. i. dist. 77, c. 2; Migne, P. L. vol. xx. p. 672; Hinschius, p. 553) provides that if any one has been ordained in infancy he must remain as a reader until he is twenty years of age; if he is ordained later in life, he must be either reader or exorcist for five years after baptism; in any case he must be either acolyte (Egbert's Pontifical has "catholicus") or subdeacon for four years, and deacon for five years. No other limits are prescribed. This rule seems to have been widely recognized after the 8th century, since it is found in the Gelasian sacramentary, and in the pontificals of Egbert, St Dunstan, Jumièges, Noyon, Cahors, Vatican ap. Muratori. 3. The Liber Pontificalis supplied the canon law with two other decretals: (1) in the Vita Cali (= Cali Epist. c. 6; Gratian, Decret. i. dist. 77, c. 1; Migne, P. L., vol. v.

190; Hinschius, p. 218) Caius is said to have laid down a rule that a bishop must have passed through the seven orders of doorkeeper, reader, exorcist, acolyte, subdeacon, deacon and presbyter; (2) in the Vita Silvest. p. 35 (Migne, P. L. vol. viii. 802, and vol. cxxvii. 1514, Hinschius, p. 450, whose text is followed here), that pope is said to have established the rule that a bishop must have been first doorkeeper, then reader, and then exorcist for whatever time his bishop may have determined; then acolyte for five years, subdeacon five years, custos martyrum five years [deacon five years, in some MSS.], presbyter three years.

But it would be difficult to shew that the intervals thus prescribed were even generally observed. No doubt the rule came to prevail that the conferring of each of the lower grades must precede the conferring any of the higher; but the ideal of the decretals, according to which a clerk must remain long enough in each grade to prove his efficiency in it, was probably seldom realised, except in the case of those who were devoted to the service of the church from infancy. In the case of those who sought admission to holy orders in later life, the only interval of time which maintained itself throughout, and from which a dispensation was very rarely given, was that of a year between the first admission to orders and the presbyterate. The Sarum Pontifical bewails the degeneracy of the times which left so short an interval between the "status laicalis" and the "status presbyterii supremus" (ap. Maskell, Mon. Ritual. vol. iii. p. 158); but it is probably the case that the adoption of this particular interval was due to the custom which grew up in some parts of Spain and Gaul in the 6th century of requiring an "annua conversio," i.e. a year's seclusion from secular life before admission to major orders (3 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 524, c. 2; 3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 6; 5 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 549, c. 9); this again was connected with, and perhaps grew out of, the rule that a monk must spend a year in minor orders and the diaconate before being ordained presbyter (S. Gelas. Epist. 9 ad Episc. Lucan. c. 2; Gratian, Decret. i. dist. 77, c. 9; Hinschius, p. 650). At first this year was divided into definite periods; Gelasius directs that a person must spend three months in each of the four offices of reader (or "notarius" or "defensor"), acolyte, subdeacon, and deacon (ibid.). But afterwards the conferring of minor orders became a mere form and a clerk could pass through all grades up to the diaconate on one and the same day (but according to Roman canonists, only the pope could grant a dispensation for accumulating major orders on the same day; see Catalani, ad Pontif. Rom. pars I, tit. 2, §§ 4, 6).

In the East the primitive custom of appointing a layman to any church office lingered longer; the custom of interstitia is almost unknown. The limitations are rather limitations of age than of interval; for example Ebed Jesu, Tract. vi. c. 4, 2; ap. Mai, Scriptt. Vett. Nov. Coll. vol. x. p. 112, lays down the rule that boys are not to receive imposition of hands, but are only to be appointed readers; when they have reached adolescence they may become subdeacons; at the age of eighteen they may become deacons, at twenty-five presbyters; but even after a succession of grades had become established a person who had attained the requisite age might be admitted to more than one grade on the same day; among the Nestorians such an accumulation of grades became the usual rule (see the ritual in Denzinger, Rit. Orient. vol. ii. p. 227). This is in conformity with the later Western practice, which allowed a layman to be appointed to any office whatever, but compelled him to go through the ordination ceremonies of all the lower grades. (See above for the case of a layman elected pope.)

III. EXTERNAL ORGANISATION OF THE CLERGY.—In apostolic and sub-apostolic times there is no evidence of the existence of any other than the internal organization which has been described above. Each church has its officers, but each church was independent and complete in itself. There were friendly relations between one church and another; there was an interchange of letters and of hospitality; but there does not appear to have been any organized combination for common purposes, and still less any subordination of the officers of one church to the officers of another. But in the course of the 2nd century begin to appear the outlines of a system which has done more than anything else to shape the subsequent history of Christendom. First of all the clergy of neighbouring churches, and ultimately the clergy of the greater part of the Christian world, came to be associated in a single organization.

Into the causes which produced a tendency to organization it is not to the present purpose to enter. But the shape which the organization took cannot be understood without a reference to the influences which produced it. Those influences flowed chiefly from the system of administration which prevailed in the empire. Just as the internal organization of the church reflected the main features of the civil policy and religious associations of the time, so did its external organization follow the lines which were already marked in contemporary life.

This is seen in the following respects especially:

(1.) Every year deputies (σύνεδροι, legati) from the several towns of a province met together in a provincial council (κοινόν, concilium). The objects of these councils were various and their powers extensive. They had a common fund from which they could build temples or erect statues; they decided as to the boundaries of the territories of cities; they had the right of communicating directly with the emperor in regard to the civil and judicial administration of the province. From them came the first beginnings of ecclesiastical organization in similar assemblies or "councils" of the clergy. Such councils began in Greece and Asia Minor, where the civil councils are known to have been exceptionally active (Tertull. de Jejun. c. 13, "aguntur per Graecias illa certis in locis concilia ex universis ecclesiis;" cf. Euseb. H. E. 5, 16, quoting probably Apollinaris of Hierapolis: τῶν κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν πιστῶν πολλάκις καὶ πολλαχῆ τῆς Ἀσίας εἰς τοῦτο [sc. against the Montanists] συνελθόντων); in the time of Cyprian they were beginning to be a regular institution in North Africa, and from that time onwards they became permanent factors in church history [see COUNCILS, Vol. I. p. 473 sqq.]. Their importance in regard to the organization of the clergy is that, following the example of the civil councils, the ecclesiastical councils kept to the lines marked out by the civil government, and that consequently instead of the organization for ecclesiastical purposes being determined by proximity of place or similarity of origin, it was determined by the lines of demarcation of the Roman provinces. Those provinces became ecclesiastical units, and their chief cities became centres of ecclesiastical administration. (For the facts in relation to the civil councils, see Marquardt, Römische Staatsverwaltung, bd. i. pp. 365–377; id. in Ephemeris Epigraphica, 1872, pp. 200–214; Duruy, Histoire des Romains, vol. v. pp. 213-219; Fustel de Coulanges, Histoire des Institutions Politiques de l'Ancienne France, vol. i. p. 107 sqq.)

(2.) In the civil councils the president was an officer whose functions were to a great extent religious, and who bore the name of Sacerdos provinciæ (Cod. Theodos. 12, 1, 46, 75, 174), or ἀρχιερεύς (C. I. G. 3487, and elsewhere). To him the other priests of the province were subordinate, and in some cases he appointed them. (Julian, Epist. 49, 63; Eunap. 57, ed. Boisson. cf. Marquardt, l. c. p. 368). When the ecclesiastical councils came to be established, their president not only received the same or an equivalent name, ἀρχιερεύς, ἀρχιεπίσκοπος, summus sacerdos, but he was also invested with the right of confirming both the appointment and in certain cases the acts of the other bishops of the province. In the East this office fell to the bishop of the metropolis, who was hence also called ὁ τῆς μητροπόλεως or metropolitanus; but in Africa, and probably also at first in Gaul and Spain, it fell to the bishop who was senior in date of appointment [see PRIMATE].

(3.) Within the limits of the great provinces were smaller organizations. The provinces were subdivided into districts, partly for fiscal, partly for commercial, but chiefly for judicial purposes. These were known as conventus, conventus juridici, juris lictiones, διοικήσεις (a use of the word which must be kept distinct from its use to denote the larger divisions of the empire under Diocletian). Each of them had its centre of administration, its "county-town" with its basilica or "county-hall." It was in these centres that Christian communities were first formed, and the area of the juridical conventus or "diocese" became naturally the area of the ecclesiastical organization. The jurisdiction of the bishop and presbyters was concurrent with that of the civil authority, and the seat of jurisdiction, which was also the place of meeting, was under the Christian emperors, the basilica of the civil magistrate. At first of course there were many districts in which the Christian community was not large enough to warrant the formation of any organization; where this was the case, a neighbouring bishop was charged with the oversight of such communities, until in process of time, and usually through the intervention of the provincial council, they were large enough to have bishops of their own; but even in the 5th and 6th centuries the sphere of a bishop's jurisdiction is sometimes spoken of in the plural, Sulp. Sever. Dial. 2, 3, "dum diœceses visitat;" cf. Sidon. Apollinar. Epist. 7, 6, p. 183; 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 36. (For an account of the civil conventus or diœceses, see Marquardt, Röm. Staatsv. Bd. I. p. 341; the early history of ecclesiastical dioceses has yet to be written.)

Such were the three chief respects in which the ecclesiastical organization followed the lines of the civil organization; in the association of churches according to provinces, in the formation of an intra-provincial hierarchy with a metropolitan or primate at its head, and in the recognition of the bishop of a city as having jurisdiction over the district of which the city was the centre, the church adapted but did not materially transform leading elements of contemporary civil life.

How close the correspondence was between the ecclesiastical and the civil organization can be shewn from many instances in both east and west. The most interesting case in the west is that of Gaul. According to the Notitia Provinciarum et Dignitatum (circ. A.D. 400), Gaul was divided into two civil dioceses: (1) D. Galliarum; (2) D. Viennensis. The former was subdivided into ten provinces, viz. Belgica prima et secunda, Germania prima et secunda, Maxima Sequanorum, Lugdunensis prima, secunda, tertia, quarta (= L. Senonia), Alpes Graiæ et Poeninæ. (The Veronese MS., which gives the division under Diocletian, divides Lugdunensis into two instead of four divisions, thus shewing that the subdivision took place in the 4th century; cf. Mommsen, Abhandlungen der Berlin. Academ. 1862, p. 492.) The latter was subdivided into seven provinces, viz. Viennensis, Narbonensis prima et secunda, Novem Populi, Aquitania prima et secunda, Alpes maritimæ. Not only was the civil metropolis of each province an episcopal see, but in all cases except two (Elusa and Ebrodunum) the see has remained until modern times, and in almost all cases the metropolitan character of the see has also remained, the bishops being styled *arch*bishops to the present day. For example, the metropolis of Belgica Prima was Augusta Treverorum = Trier, a bishop of which see was present at 1 Conc. Arelat. in 314; that of Belgica Secunda was Durocortorum Remorum = Reims, a bishop of which see was also present at 1 Conc. Arelat.; that of Germania Prima was Moguntiacum = Mainz; that of Germania Secunda, Colonia Agrippina = Köln; that of Maxima Sequanorum, Vesontio = Besançon, of which see a bishop existed as early as the time of St. Irenæus. It is also remarkable that of the towns (civitates) which are mentioned in each province as being towns of importance, almost every one had a bishop. For example in the Provincia Viennensis twelve such towns are mentioned (besides the metropolis Vienna), viz. civitas Genavensium = Geneva, civ. Gratianopolis = Grenoble, civ. Deensium (= Ad Deam Vocontiorum of the Peutinger Table = civ. Dea Vocontiorum of the Jerusalem Itinerary) = Die, civ. Valentinorum = Valence, civ. Tricastinorum (= Senomago of the Peutinger Table) = S. Paul-trois-Châteaux: civ. Vasiensium (= Vasio of Pliny) = Vaison, civ. Arausicorum (= Arusione of the Peutinger Table) = Orange, civ. Cabellicorum = Cavaillon (for the name of this town there is a various reading in the Notitia, viz. civ. Carpentoratensium = Carpentras, of which a bishop is mentioned in 483), civ. Avenuicorum (= Avennione of the Peutinger Table) = Avignon; civ. Arelatensium (in some MSS.

metrop. civ. Araelatensis = Arelato of the Peutinger Table) = Arles, civ. Massiliensium = Marseilles, civ. Albensium ("nunc Vivaria") = Viviers. Every one of these towns had a bishop in Roman times. The same was the case, with hardly an exception, in the other provinces. France preserves in its bishoprics to the present day the outlines of the Roman administration. On the other hand, England is an example of a country in which, the Roman organization having almost entirely passed away before the final organization of the church began, the dioceses were for the most part formed out of the Saxon kingdoms (see Stubbs, Constitutional History, vol. i. p. 224): and similarly in Ireland, "the spiritual jurisdiction of the bishop was coextensive with the temporal sway of the chieftain" (Reeves, Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor, and Dromore, p. 303).

Within the skeleton thus furnished several other tendencies operated which arose within the church itself.

1. There arose a tendency to attach a clerk to a particular church, and to give local limits to the exercise of his functions. In the earliest ages there is presumptive evidence that a member of the ordo of one church might freely pass to another. It did not of course follow that he thereby became a member of the ordo of the other church. But the fact of his holding office elsewhere was recognised, and he enjoyed a certain precedence. Sometimes also he was placed on the clergy-roll, and he might thus be on the roll of several churches at once. An ambitious or a disaffected clerk was able in this way to pass easily from a narrower to a wider sphere, or to rid himself of the supervision of a too exigeant superior. But this came at last to be prohibited, except with the full consent of all who were concerned. The final prohibition was indeed the result of a long struggle, nor is there any enactment of canon law, except those relating to marriage, which required to be so frequently repeated. The earliest existing enactment in the east is Conc. Nicaen. c. 16 (which however refers to an earlier canon, possibly that which is preserved in Can. Apost. 15), which provides that no one who is on the clergy-roll of any church shall leave it under penalty of excommunication; and that any ordination in one church of a clerk who is on the roll of another church, without the consent of his proper bishop, shall be invalid. These enactments were repeated, with additions, by 1 Conc. Antioch. c. 3, Conc. Sardic. c. 15, Conc. Chalc. c. 10, after which no further regulation on the subject became necessary in the east for two centuries and a half, when the Trullan Council recognized the fact of the non-observance of the earlier canons, and repeated them (c. 17). In Africa similar regulations were made by the councils of Carthage, and were incorporated in the African code (1 Conc. Carth. c. 5; 3 Conc. Carth. c. 21, 44; Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 54). But the struggle to evade them seems to have been stronger in Gaul and Spain; they were first made at Arles in 314 (1 Conc. Arelat. c. 21); they were renewed ten times in the 5th and 6th centuries, and three times in the 7th century; at Orange in 441 (Conc. Arausic. c. 8), at Arles in 451 (2 Conc. Arelat. c. 13), at Tours in 461 (1 Conc. Turon. c. 9), at Vannes in 465 (Conc. Venet. c. 10), at Valentia in 524 (?) (Conc. Valent. c. 6), at Arles in 524 (4 Conc. Arelat. c. 4), at Clermont in 535 (Conc. Arvern. c. 11), at Orleans in 549 (5 Conc. Aurelian. c. 5), at Arles in 554 (5 Conc. Arelat. c. 7), at Braga in 563 (2 Conc. Brac. c. 8), at Toledo in 633 (4 Conc. Tolet. c. 53), at Châlons in 650 (Conc. Cabillon. c. 13), at Toledo again in 683 (13 Conc. Tolet. c. 11); and they were sanctioned by a capitulary of Pippin in 753 (Capit. Vernense duplex, c. 12, ap. Pertz, 1, 26). In England they were recognized by the Legatine Synods in 787, c. 5 (Haddan and Stubbs, vol. iii. p. 447), and by Egbert of York (Dial. Egbert Eborac. c. 7, 9, ibid. pp. 402 sqq.). Afterwards they passed into the body of canon law (see Gratian. Dist. 70; D. Ivon. Carnot. Decret. 6, 26; Hugon. de S. Vict. de Sacram. 2, 3, 22), nor has there been any serious subsequent attempt to destroy the relation of lord and vassal which they established between a bishop and the other members of the ordo ecclesiasticus.

2. A second tendency, which arose in the course of the 3rd century, and which ran pari passu with that which has just been described, took the double form of giving local limits to a bishop's powers, and of subordinating him either to the provincial council, or to a single superior. (a) Probably the first express recognition of this local limitation is in the letter of the four Egyptian bishops, Hesychius, Pachomius, Theodorus, and Phileas, to Meletius of Alexandria, in A.D. 303–5, which was published from a Latin version at Verona, by Maffei, Opusc. Eccles. ii. p. 253, and republished by Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Gr. vol. i. p. 1. A few years later the council of Antioch expressly limits the exercise of a bishop's powers to his own province or ἐπαρχία (which may possibly be used as in Conc. Nicaen. c. 6 = διοίκησις); he could not for the future pass into another province for the purpose of making ordinations, except on the written invitation of the metropolitan and bishops of that province (Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, c. 13); the council of Constantinople, forty years later, renews the enactment (c. 2, ἀκλήτους δὲ ἐπισκόπους ὑπὲρ διοικήσιων μὴ ἐπιβαίνειν ἐπὶ χειροτονίαις ἢ τισιν ἄλλαις οἰκονομίαις ἐκκλησιαστικαῖς), but makes an explicit exception in regard to nations outside the Roman organization (ἐν τοῖς βαρβαρικοῖς ἔθνεσι). In those parts of the West in which the meshes of that organization were closer, the relation of one bishop to another were still more sharply defined. Where, as in Gaul at the beginning of the 4th century, there was a bishop for every civitas, i.e. for the centre of every circle of civil jurisdiction, it was provided that each bishop should be confined to his own circle, and should not exercise authority in the circle of his neighbour (1 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 314, c. 17, "ut nullus episcopus alium episcopum conculcet," 1 Turon. A.D. 461, c. 9, excommunicates those who transgress the "terminos a patribus constitutos;" 1 Lugd. A.D. 517, c. 5; 1 Arvern. A.D. 535, c. 10). But, on the other hand, as a proof of the intimate connexion between civil and ecclesiastical organization, where, as in Ireland, the imperial system of administration did not prevail, the bishops preserved their original status; they were the officers not of districts but of single congregations; they moved about almost as they pleased; dioceses in the ordinary sense did not exist until the synod of Rath-Breasil in 1141 (see Reeves, Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor, and Dromore, append. pp. 135, 139). (b) It is also probable that in the earliest times, a bishop or a community had the power of appointing any baptized person to office without regard to the place of his baptism or to his being already on the clergy-roll of another church. But while on the one hand, as we have already seen, the councils gradually came to prohibit a member of one church from taking office in another, on the other hand they restrained bishops from ordaining such persons, partly by making such ordinations null, and partly by subjecting offending bishops to the penalty of suspension and excommunication. (c) It is also probable that in the earliest times each bishop was independent of his colleagues; the several shepherds of the flock of Christ were amenable, not to any earthly superior but to Christ Himself: "singulis pastoribus portio sit adscripta, quam regat unusquisque et gubernet, rationem sui actus Domino redditurus" (St. Cyprian, Epist. 55, ad Cornel. c. 14, vol. ii. p. 821). But in the course of the 4th century there grew up the tendency, which was probably reflected from the great contemporary development of the hierarchical system in the empire, to subordinate bishop to bishop and church to church. The details of this subordination grew out of the extension to the ecclesiastical sphere of the civil system of provincial councils and provincial high priests; but the spirit which led to that extension grew up within the church itself.

3. A third tendency, which arose in the East from the gradual decay of the population, and in the West from the necessity of consolidating an organization, which had interwoven itself with the civil administration, and round which a complex growth of material interests had clustered, was the tendency to limit the number of towns in which bishops were appointed. The number of bishops in early times, in both East and West, was very large. From the small province of Asia Proconsularis, which formed but a tenth part of the Dioecesis Asiana, thirty-two bishops were present at the council of Ephesus in 431. In the provinces which made up the Dioecesis Africae, 470 bishoprics are known by name before the Vandal invasion; and possibly there may have been some truth in the retort of Petilianus to the reproach of Alypius, that the Donatists had bishops in villages and on estates, "immo vero ubi habes sane et sine populis habes" (Collat. Carthag. i. 181, ap. Gallandi Bibl. Patr. vol. v. p. 620; for the details here given in respect to Africa, cf. Gams, Series Episcoporum, p. 463; Kuhn, Städt. u. bürgerl. Verfassung des' Röm. Reichs, Bd. ii. p. 436). In Ireland the number of bishops cannot be certainly ascertained, but must have been large; the Annals of the Four Masters, ad ann. 493, speak of St. Patrick as having ordained 700 bishops and 3000 priests; and Aengus the Culdee, in the 9th century, speaks of no less than 141 places in the island, in each of which there were or had been seven contemporary bishops (Todd, St. Patrick, pp. 32, 35; Reeves, Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor, and Dromore, app. A. p. 123 sqq. where several other references are given). In the East, no doubt the gradual diminution in the number of bishoprics arose from the decay of the population, but in the West it was the result of policy. The power of the bishops was thereby increased. This is expressly stated by Leo the Great, who contends that bishops should not be appointed "in quibuslibet locis neque in quibuslibet castellis . . . . ne quod sanctorum Patrum divinitus inspirata decreta vetuerunt vitiis et possessionibus vel obscuris et solitariis municipiis tribuatur sacerdotale fastigium et honor cui debent excellentiora committi, ipsa sui numerositate vilescat" (S. Leon. Magn. Ep. 12, c. 12, I. p. 667). In the century that followed the conversion of Chlodwig, a different policy was no doubt followed within the Frankish domain. A large number of new bishoprics then, for the first time, appear in history, and the lines of the Roman organization are broken. But this foundation of new sees lasted only for a time. There is no record of any new foundation between that of Montpellier in 585 and St. Brieux in 848. On the contrary, it became necessary to re-enact the provision of the civil law: "ut episcopi debeant per singulas civitates esse" (Pippini Capit. Vern. A.D. 755, cf. Pertz, i. p. 24); but this does not appear to have amounted to more than the affirmation of a principle, and was modified by the Capit. Francofurt. A.D. 794, c. 22, which repeated the Sardican canon. The exigencies of the case were met by the combination with the existing system of an order of bishops, who were not tied to a particular city. Such an order had existed in the chorepiscopi of the East, and under that name it was revived in France. These chorepiscopi went from parish to parish, performing especially such episcopal acts as confirmation, and the consecration of the chrism and admission to minor orders; but they do not seem to have had either jurisdiction or power of ordaining presbyters (Hrabani Mauri de Instit. Cler. i. 5: ordinati sunt chorepiscopi propter pauperum curam qui in agris et villis consistunt, ne eis solatium confirmationis deesset: Pippini Capit. Vermer. A.D. 753, c. 14; Pertz, i. p. 22, where they are probably meant by "episcopis ambulantibus per patrias"). But they were found to give rise to many difficulties, and in the 9th century a determined and ultimately successful attempt was made to abolish them. (The history of the struggle, which is of especial interest in connexion with the origin of the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals, will be found on Weizsäcker, Der Kampf gegen den Chorepiscopat des fränkischen Reichs im neunten Jahrhundert, Tubingen, 1859; see also an article by the same writer in von Sybel's Historische Zeitschrift for 1860, pp. 42 sqq., and by van Noorden in the same journal for 1862, pp. 311 sqq.) A new form of organization had been gradually developing itself during the two previous centuries, and it now became both extended and firmly established. The old Roman organization still to a great extent survived. The old Roman civitates were still bishops' sees; the limits of the old Roman conventus were still for the most part the limits of the jurisdiction of the bishops of those sees. But the importance of those towns in relation to their neigh-sours had in many cases seriously diminished; and the districts of which they were the centres were full, not of pagani, but of Christians who required clergy, and of clergy who required supervision. Hence the dioceses were subdivided, not as they would have been in earlier times into new dioceses, but into districts in each of which an archpresbyter had a modified jurisdiction over the presbyters and other clergy. [ARCHPRESBYTERS, Vol. I. p. 139; it may be added that the idea probably came from the Eastern church, where we find the functions of archpresbyter (= πρωτοπρεσβύτερος) united with those of a περιοδευτής, or itinerant bishop, Corpus Inscr. Græcc. No. 8822, at Abrostola in Phrygia.] This was supplemented by occasionally sending the ecclesiastical officer who stood in the closest personal relation to the bishop, viz. the archdeacon, as a special delegate to enquire into the condition of the clergy and parishes on the bishop's behalf. Not only did such a delegation become in time a delegatio perpetua, but also in the case of some large dioceses, several of the districts under the jurisdiction of an archpresbyter were united together and placed permanently under the jurisdiction of an archdeacon. The detailed account of this last arrangement falls outside our limits; but it is necessary to mention it as forming the last important link in the series of changes by which the simple system of the early church was transformed into the elaborate diocesan organization of mediæval and modern times. (See Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte, Bd. iii. p. 364; Gréa, Essai historique sur les Archidiacres in the Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes, 3me serie, t. ii. pp. 39, 215; Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, Bd. ii. p. 610.)

IV. ADMISSION TO ORDERS.—1. Qualifications:—The fact that in the first ages of the church a person was almost invariably appointed to office in the city in which he lived, and by the community among which he had been baptized, prevented the necessity of minute enactments in regard to qualifications for orders. It was more a matter of common understanding than of ecclesiastical rule that no one should be appointed who had been known to lead an immoral life, or whose fitness for office had not been ascertained by experience. The election was practically free. The assembly which made it was not bound by any regulations except those which it laid down for itself. The points which were looked at were the internal qualifications of character rather than the external qualifications of age or status. Upon these internal qualifications all the earliest exhortations turn. The Pastoral Epistles, 1 Tim. iii. 1–12; Titus i. 6–9, mention no others; the almost contemporary epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians c. 5, 6, exhort that deacons be "blameless, not slanderers, not double-tongued, not fond of money, temperate in all things, compassionate, careful, walking in the truth of the Lord;" the Clementines, e.g. Epist. Clem. ad Jacob. c. 2, and the earlier books of the Apostolic Constitutions, e.g. ii. 1 sqq., direct that a bishop, at the time of his ordination, shall be tested as to his having brought up his children in the admonition of the Lord, whether he is blameless in regard to the needs of this life, given to hospitality, and apt to minister; the ordinances of Clement (Διατ. Κλήμ., Lagarde, Juris Eccl. Reliq. p. 74 sqq.; Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Gr. vol. i. p. 77 sqq.) direct that testimony shall be given whether he "have a good report from the heathen, whether he be without fault, fond of the poor, sober, not a drunkard, not a fornicator, not overreaching or abusive, or a respecter of persons, or the like: it were well that he were wifeless, but if not, let him be the husband of one wife, capable of discipline, able to interpret the scriptures; and, even if unlearned, gentle, and abounding in love towards all." But this free right of election came gradually to be restricted. With the increase in the number of churches, with the loosening of the bands of close fellowship, which had bound together the members of the churches in the face of the common danger of persecution, and with the multiplication of the links which bound one church to another, the original system was found to be too indefinite. The communities were too large and too scattered to know the habits and character of each individual member, and the functions which their officers had to fulfil became too important and too complicated to be entrusted to any one without close inquiry. Stress began to be laid upon the necessity of examination before appointment, and definite rules had to be agreed upon. With the existence of such an examination the inhabitants of the Roman municipalities were already familiar, and it is probable that the ecclesiastical communities followed in this as in other details of their organization the analogy of the civil communities. No one could be elected to the civil "Ordo" without being previously examined as to his possession of certain qualifications: he must be free-born, of a certain age, unconvicted of any crime, and possessed of sufficient property to discharge the duties of his office. The examination into these qualifications immediately preceded the election, and the duty of making it fell on the presiding officer (see Marquardt, Römische Staatsverwaltung, Bd. i. p. 497); the chief authorities are the Lex Julia Municipalis, Corp. Inscr. Lat. No. 206, and the Lex Malacitana, a bronze found at Malaga in 1851, which gives more minute details than were previously known, and which has been published by Mommsen in the Abhandlungen der kön. Sächs. Gesellsch. der Wissenschaft, Bd. 3, and, in a separate treatise, Die Stadtrechte der lateinischen Gemeinden Salpensa u. Malaca, Leipzig, 1855; also by Giraud, Paris, 1856 and 1868; in the Corp. Inscr. Lat. ii. 1964, and by Orelli-Henzen, No. 7421). In the same way the possession of certain positive qualifications and the absence of certain disqualifications were made conditions precedent to the admission to the "Ordo ecclesiasticus," and the presiding officer was charged with the duty of seeing that such conditions were fulfilled. But it is obvious that under such an arrangement the qualifications insisted upon must be such as to admit of an external test; and it was natural that, when once external tests began to be imposed, they should tend to become more complex and more rigid. The earliest of such tests arose out of the early controversies as to the marriage of the clergy. The only impediments to admission to orders which are expressly mentioned in the Apostolical canons are digamy, and marriage with two sisters, or with a niece, or with one who was not a virgin (c. 17, 18, 19). In subsequent lists of qualifications and disqualifications such impediments occupy so large a place that the lists themselves furnish the best contemporary evidence of the state of feeling on the subject. Three such lists in three successive centuries may be taken as typical, and, for the sake of more exact comparison will best be given in their original form. 1. In the 6th century the rules of admission to orders were settled by the civil law. Justinian (Novell. 123, c. 12) enacts as follows:—Κληρικοὺς οὐκ ἄλλως χειροτονεῖσθαι συγχωροῦμεν εἰ μὴ γράμματα ἴσασι καὶ ὀρθὴν πίστιν καὶ βίον σεμνὸν ἔχουσι καὶ οὐδὲ παλλακὴν οὐδὲ φυσικοὺς ἴσχον ἢ ἔχουσι παῖδας ἀλλ' ἢ σωφρόνως βιοῦντας ἢ γαμετὴν νόμιμον καὶ αὐτὴν μίαν καὶ πρώτην ἐσχηκόται καὶ μηδὲ χῆραν μηδὲ διαζευχθεῖσαν ἀνδρός. (Compare the disqualifications mentioned by S. Greg. M. Epist. 4, 26, ad. Januar. vol. ii. p. 704; id. Epist. 2, 37, ad Joann. vol. ii. p. 600). 2. A century later than Justinian, the fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633, which was held under Isidore of Seville, sums up as follows the canonical disqualifications which were recognised in the West at that time: "Qui in aliquo crimine detecti sunt, qui scelera aliqua per publicam poenitentiam admisisse confessi sunt, qui in haeresim lapsi sunt, qui in haeresi baptizati aut rebaptizati esse noscuntur, qui semetipsos absciderunt aut naturali defectu membrorum aut decisione aliquid minus habere noscuntur, qui secundae uxoris conjunctionem sortiti sunt, aut numerosa conjugia frequentaverunt, qui viduam aut marito relictam duxerunt, aut corruptarum mariti fuerunt, qui concubinas ad fornicationes habuerunt, qui servili conditioni obnoxii sunt, qui ignoti sunt, qui neophyti sunt, vel laici sunt, qui saeculari militiae dediti sunt, qui curiae nexibus obligati sunt, qui inscii literarum sunt, qui nondum ad triginta annos pervenerunt, qui per gradus ecclesiasticos non accesserunt, qui ambitu honorem quaerunt, qui muneribus honorem obtinere moliuntur, qui a decessoribus in sacerdotium eliguntur." (The last few phrases evidently apply not to all clerks, but only to presbyters or bishops.) 3. A century later (circ. A.D. 750), Egbert of York gives a similar list, but with important additions and omissions: "Hujusmodi tunc ordinatio episcopi, presbiteri vel diaconi rata esse dicitur; si nullo gravi facinore probatur infectus, si secundam non habuit [uxorem] nec a marito relictam; si poenitentiam publicam non gessit nec ulla corporis parte vitiatus apparet: si servilis aut ex origine non est conditionis obnoxius; si curiae probatur nexibus absolutus, si adsecutus est litteras; hunc elegimus ad sacerdotium promoveri. Pro his vero criminibus nullum licet ordinari sed promotos quosque dicimus deponendos; idola scilicet adorantes; per aruspices [et divinos atque] incantatores captivos se diabolo tradentes; fidem suam falso testimonio expugnantes; homicidiis vel fornicationibus contaminatos; furta perpetrantes; sacrum veritatis nomen perjurii temeritate violantes." (Egberti Eborac. Dial. c. 15, ap. Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, vol. iii. p. 402; Wilkins, Concilia, vol. i. p. 85.)

We proceed to give in detail the various qualifications and disqualifications for orders which were laid down between the 4th and the 9th centuries, grouping them as—I. Personal. II. Civil; III. Ecclesiastical; IV. Literary.

I. Personal Qualifications.—1. A clerk must be sound of limb, Conc. Rom. A.D. 465, c. 3; 3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 6; 4 Conc. Tolet. c. 19; especially he must not have mutilated himself with a view to living in chastity, Conc. Nicaen. c. 1 (cf. Socrat. H. E. 2, 26; Theodor. H. E. 2, 24); Can. Apost. c. 22; 2 Conc. Arelat. c. 7. At the same time it was held in early times that the Levitical regulations (Levit. xxi. 17 sqq.) did not strictly apply to the Christian church, and when the monk Ammonius tried to disqualify himself for ordination by cutting off his ear his mutilation was held to be no bar (Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. c. 12, Migne, P. G. vol. xxxiv. 1032; Sozomen, H. E. 6, 30); but when in later times the Levitical analogy was strictly applied, the loss of any part of any member was held to be a disqualification, and Innocent III. (Epist. x. 124) gives a special dispensation to one whose finger had been cut off against his will (the canonists based their rule on a pseudo-decretal of Innocent I. Hinschius, p. 533; Regino Prumiens. de Eccles. Discipl. lib. i. 410; Burchard, lib. ii. c. 14; Migne, P. L. vol. cxxxii. p. 272). Some later Roman pontificals (quoted by Catalani, ad Pontif. Rom. p. 1, tit. 2) require the examiners to feel (palpare), as well as diligently to observe the persons of candidates, and even to require them to take off their shoes, lest there should be a deformity in their feet. 2. (1) A presbyter must be at least thirty years of age. This rule, which was based on a reference to the age at which our Lord began his ministry, was first laid down by Conc. Neocaes. A.D. 314, c. 1[1]; but it does not appear to have been universally accepted, inasmuch as Jerome has to defend upon general grounds the ordination of his brother, Paulinianus, at that age (S. Hieron. Epist. 82 (82) ad Theoph. vol. i. p. 518). But it was recognised by a Syrian council, A.D. 405 (?), c. 24 (Mansi, vol. vii. 1181), by several Western councils, 4 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 524, c. 1, 3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 6, 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 20, and by the Trullan council, c. 14. It is also recognised in the civil law, Justin. Novell. 123, c. 13, and in the Carolingian capitularies, Capit. Francofurt. A.D. 794, c. 49 ap. Pertz, M. H. G. Legum, vol. i. p. 75. Bishops were sometimes ordained at an earlier age, but until the 8th century there is probably no instance of such an ordination of a presbyter. The instances even then belong to the outlying provinces of Christendom. Bede, in his history of the monastery of Wearmouth (Migne, P. L. vol. xciv. 729), clearly implies that Ceolfrid was ordained presbyter at the age of twenty-seven; and pope Zachary gives permission to Boniface, "the apostle of Germany," in 751, to ordain presbyters, in cases of emergency, at the age of twenty-five (S. Zachar. Epist. 13, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. lxxxix. 952; Gratian, pars i. dist. 78, c. 5). On the other hand, some canonists allowed of no exception to the rule which made thirty the minimum age, Burchard. Wormat. Decret. ii. c. 9, Ivon. Carnot. Decret. vi. c. 30, Panorm. iii. 29; so the Conc. Meint. A.D. 1089, c. 4. But the rule was ultimately relaxed, and the council of Ravenna, A.D. 1314, c. 2, fixed the age at twenty-five; so Stat. Eccles. Cadurc. et Reb. ap. Martene et Durand, Anecd. vol. iv. p. 718, and the modern Roman pontifical. The Nestorian canons of Ebedjesu also allow ordination to the presbyterate at the age of twenty-five. (Tract. vi. c. 4, can. 2, ap. Mai, Script. Vet. vol. x. p. 112). (2) The age of deacons was originally fixed at twenty-five; so Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 16 (but one version of 3 Conc. Carth. c. 4, which is in other respects identical with this canon, adds the proviso, "nisi primum divinis scripturis instructi vel ab infantia eruditi propter fidei professionem vel assertionem"); so with the Gallican and Spanish councils, Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 16, 4 Conc. Arelat. c. 1 (but the vigorous bishop Caesarius, who presided at this council and subscribed its acts, is said by his biographers never to have ordained a deacon under thirty, Vit. S. Caesar. Arelat. 1, 43, Migne, P. L. vol. lxvii. 1022), 4 Conc. Tolet. c. 20; so also with the Trullan council, c. 14, and in the civil law, Justin. Novell. 123, c. 13 (the later Roman use fixed it at twenty-four, Pontific. Roman. p. 1, tit. 2, 2). (3) The age of a subdeacon does not appear to have been fixed by any canon in the West earlier than 2 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 531, c. 1 (where, however, it is only an inference that the age mentioned applies to all subdeacons), and in the East earlier than Conc. Trull. A.D. 692, c. 15; in both cases the age mentioned is twenty. Justinian fixed it at twenty-five (Novell. 123, c. 13), but the later civil law agrees with the canon law (Leo Constit. 16 and 75). But it is clear that there was in subsequent times considerable variety of usage. Hugh of St. Victor, de Sacram. 2, 3, 21, makes fourteen the limit; the council of Melfi in 1089, c. 4, Mansi, xx. 723, makes fourteen or fifteen. In the Gesta Abbat. S. Trudon. lib. viii. c. 2, Migne, P. L. clxxiii. p. 113, Rudolph becomes subdeacon at eighteen, which is the age fixed by the statutes of Cahors and Rodez in 1289, Martene and Durand, Anecd. vol. iv. p. 718. The council of Ravenna, A.D. 1314, c. 2, Mansi, ut, xxv. 537, makes sixteen the limit; but the almost contemporaneous Conc. Vienn. under Clement V. in 1311, makes twenty-two, and this age was adopted by the council of Trent, and remains in the present Roman ordinal. (4) There is no canonical limit of age for minor orders. The civil law fixes the minimum age for a reader at eighteen (Justin. Novell. 123, c. 13), but it is clear that ordination might canonically take place at a much earlier age. There had already arisen in the West, and there soon afterwards arose in the East, the custom of dedicating children to the service of the church in their earliest years; hence the text of the Nomocanon, which incorporates the regulation of Justinian, varies in good MSS. between the ages of eight, eighteen, and twenty; and the Scholiast ad loc. finds it impossible to reconcile any of these readings with the practice of his day which allowed ordinations to the lectorate at the age of five or six. The letter of Siricius (Hinschius, p. 522, Migne, P. L. vol. xiii. 1142; quoted by the canonists, Gratian, pars i. dist. 77, 3, Ivon. Carnot. Decret. 6, 91) directs that "whoever has devoted himself to the service of the church ought from his infancy, before the age of puberty, to be baptized and associated with the ministry of readers." The letter of Zosimus (Hinschius, p. 553, Migne, P. L. vol. xx. 672; quoted by Gratian, pars i. dist. 77, 2) directs that "if any one has given his name from infancy to the ministry of the church, let him remain among the readers until the age of twenty." In Gaul the council of Vaison in 529, c. 1, in Africa the third council of Carthage, c. 19, and in Spain the second council of Toledo in 589, c. 1, provide for the case of readers marrying when they attain to puberty; and the fact of early ordinations is proved by historical examples, e.g. Sidon. Apollin. Epist. iv. 25, p. 126; S. Paulin. Nolan. Poem. XV. de S. Felice, v. 108; Anastas. Liber. Pontif. de S. Eugenio I. p. 134, "clericus a cunabulis"; and an extant inscription at Viviers to a reader who died at the age of thirteen, ap. Le Blant, Inscriptions Chrétiennes de la Gaule, No. 484. The later mediaeval practice, which was adopted by the council of Trent, was not to confer the tonsure before the age of seven.

II. Civil Qualifications.—1. In regard to the admission of slaves to orders both the canon and the civil law varied at different times: in the East the only early regulation is Can. Apost. 82, which allows slaves to be ordained only when they have been manumitted; this agrees with the civil law, Justin, Cod. I. 3, 37 (36), Novell. 123, 17. In the West the earliest regulation is that of Conc. Illiber. A.D. 305, c. 8, which disallows the ordination even of a freedman whose patronus was in saeculo; but 1 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 400, c. 10 allows such ordination with the patron's consent. In the fifth century Leo the Great, writing to the bishops of Campania, objects to the ordination of slaves as inconsistent with the dignity of the clerical office, but is at the same time a witness to the occurrence of such ordinations." (S. Leon. M. Epist. 4 (3) ad Epist. Campan. i. p. 612; for the meaning of "originali," cf. St. August. de Civit. Dei, 10, 1, "conditionem debent genitali solo propter agriculturam sub dominio possessorum.") In Gaul it would appear that ordination was at one time held to involve manumission, for 1 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 511, c. 8, enacts that if a bishop knowingly ordains a slave without the consent of his master he must pay "duplex satisfactio;" if he has done it ignorantly, then those who "testimonium perhibent aut eum supplicaverint ordinari" are to pay such satisfaction; (this seems to imply that part of the "testimonium" which was required before ordination was that the candidate was free.) In a council held in the same city a quarter of a century later, there is a definite exclusion of both slaves and serfs: aut nullus servilibus colonariisque conditionibus obligatus juxta statuta sedis apostolicae ad honores ecclesiasticos admittatur, nisi prius aut testamento aut per tabulas legitime constiterit absolutum (3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 26;) but eleven years later this rule was relaxed, and a slave might be ordained with his master's consent, or, if ordained without such consent, "is qui ordinatus est, benedictione servata, honestum ordini domino suo impendat obsequium," i.e. he might continue to be a clerk without ceasing to be a slave; it is, however, also provided that the bishop might, if the master preferred, give him two slaves in place of the one who had been ordained (5 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 549, c. 6). In Ireland the canons of St. Patrick, which are probably at least a century later than the fore[illegible]going councils, clearly imply that a clerk might be a slave; c. 7 provides for the excommunication of a clerk who is negligent in coming to prayers: "nisi forte jugo servitutis sit detentus." But in England Egbert of York, about the same period, expressly disallows the ordination of slaves, at least to the diaconate (Egberti Eborac. Dial. c. 15, ap. Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, &c. iii. p. 402). The Carolingian rule was equally strict: if a slave was ordained without first obtaining his liberty he must lose his orders and go back to his master (Capit. Hludowici I. Aquisgran. general. A.D. 817, c. 6, ap. Pertz, i. p. 207, cf. Capit. Francofurt. A.D. 794, c. 30; Pertz, vii. p. 79; Capit. Ticin. A.D. 801, c. 22; Pertz, i. p. 86).

2. The privileges and IMMUNITIES [p. 822] which Constantine at first conferred upon the clergy caused so many rich men to seek refuge from the burdens of taxation by taking office in the church that it speedily became necessary to enact that no person whose fortune placed him in the rank of those upon whom the weight of public burdens fell should be allowed to become a clerk; the first law on the subject has not been preserved, but the continuation of it which enacts that it shall not be retrospective is found in Cod. Theodos. 16, 2, 3, A.D. 320. It was re-enacted by Constantius in 361, Cod. Theodos. 8, 4, 7 = Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 4; and again, in effect, by Honorius and Arcadius in 398, Cod. Theodos. 16, 2, 32; fifty years later a law of Theodosius and Valentinian allowed ordained persons who were liable to municipal duties to discharge those duties by deputy, Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 21; but Justinian found it necessary absolutely to prohibit the ordination of such persons: θεσπίζομεν μηδένα παντελῶς μήτε βουλευτὴν μήτε ταξεώτην ἐπίσκοπον ἢ πρεσβύτερον τοῦ λοιποῦ γίνεσθαι (Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 53 (52); so, also, id. Novell. 6, c. 4; 123, c. 15). The necessity for such a provision appears even from ecclesiastical writers, e.g. Basil speaks of τῶν πλείστων φόβῳ τῆς στρατολογίας εἰσποιούντων ἑαυτοὺς τῇ ὑπηρεσίᾳ (S. Basil, Epist. 54 (181); Migne, P. G. 32, 400; cf. Joann. Diac. Vit. S. Gregor. M. 2, 15, vol. i. p. 49); and the rule itself was accepted, e.g., by Gregory the Great, Epist. 4, 26, ad Januar. vol. ii. p. 704, "videndum ne obnoxius curiae [i.e. liable to serve on a municipal senate] compellatur post sacrum ordinem ad actionem publicam redire"; and by 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 19; Egbert. Eborac. Dial. c. 15. The Frankish kings enacted that no freeman should be ordained without the permission of the king or his officer: 1 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 511 (shortly before the death of Chlodwig), c. 4, enacts "ut nullus saecularium ad clericatus officium praesumatur nisi aut cum regis jussione aut cum judicis voluntate"; in the following century another Frankish council, Conc. Remens. circ. A.D. 625, repeats the enactment; and among the Formulae Marculphi is a letter from a king giving such a permission (Formulae Marculphi, 1, 19, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. lxxxvii. p. 712). Several instances are found in the biographies of the same century, e.g. Sulpice of Bourges (Notit. in S. Sulpit. c. 8; Migne, P. L. vol. lxxx. p. 577); Ouen of Rouen (Vit. S. Audoën. ap. Sur. 24 Aug.). Charles the Great found it necessary again to renew the enactment (Capit. duplex in Theod. Villa, A.D. 805, c. 15; Pertz, 1, p. 134); but it is not found out of the Frankish domain.

III. Ecclesiastical Qualifications.—1. Baptism. It was so invariably assumed that any one who was advanced to office in the church had already been made a member of the church by baptism that the enactment of a canon on the subject was unnecessary. At Alexandria a catechumen might be a reader or singer, but the custom is mentioned as exceptional by Socrates, H. E. 5, 22, and, moreover, readers and singers were sometimes not reckoned in the clerus at all. In the middle of the 3rd century Cornelius of Rome expresses a doubt whether clinic baptism was sufficient in the case of Novatian, inasmuch as it had not been followed by confirmation (Euseb. H. E. 6, 43); and early in the following century the council of Neocaesarea, c. 12, is disposed, except in special cases (εἰ μὴ τάχα διὰ τὴν μετὰ ταῦτα αὐτοῦ [i.e., of the baptized person] σπουδὴν καὶ πίστιν καὶ διὰ σπάνιν ἀνθρώπων), to disallow altogether the ordination of those who had received clinic baptism. But the non-renewal of the enactment (except in 6 Conc. Paris. A.D. 829, c. 8, Mansi, 14, 542, which extends it to all irregular baptisms) makes it probable that it was construed rather in the spirit of its exceptions than in that of its main provision. The case of a presbyter being ordained before being baptized was so rare that no provision is made for it in any canon of the first eight centuries. The general case of uncertain or defective baptism is sometimes mentioned in ecclesiastical writers, e.g. S. Dionys. Alexand. Ep. ad Xystum ap. Euseb. H. E. 7, 9; S. Leon. Magn. Ep. 66 (35) ad Neon. Ravenn. p. 1407; id. Ep. 67 (2) ad Rustic. Narbon. c. 17, 18, p. 1427; but the special case of an unbaptized presbyter is first mentioned in Abp. Theodore's Penitential at the end of the 8th century, who apparently deals with two contingencies: a. If the presbyter has been ordained through ignorance on the part of his ordainer that he has not been baptized, the ordination is invalid, the baptisms performed by the supposed presbyter are also invalid, and he himself must be baptized, but cannot be reordained (Poenit. 1, 9, 12; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, vol. iii.). b. If a presbyter is ordained under the belief that he has been baptized, and then discovers that he has not, he may be both baptized and reordained, but persons baptized by him must be rebaptized (id. 2, 2, 13). In the following century a capitulary of Pippin, which mentions a similar case, does not specify what is to be done with the presbyter, but allows his baptisms provided that the Holy Trinity was invoked at the time (Capit. Compendiense, A.D. 757, c. 12; Pertz, Legum, vol. i. p. 28). As the imposition of hands was an integral part of baptism, it must be held to be implied in the general regulations as to baptism; the explicit mention of it as a condition of ordination is much later. (But it is sometimes supposed to be meant in Conc. Nicaen. c. 8, which requires returning Cathari to be χειροθετουμένους; so Hefele ad loc. and Catalani ad Pontific. Roman. p. 1. tit. 2, 3; but Gratian, 8, 1, 7, and others understand ordination, not confirmation, to be meant.)

2. There was a further rule that ordination was not to follow too closely upon baptism; the Pauline μὴ νεόφυτον (1 Tim. iii, 7) expresses both the ordinary rule and the ordinary practice. During the early years of Christianity it was obviously important that before a person was advanced to office in a church, and especially to an office which involved disciplinary control, sufficient opportunity should be given for the observation and testing of his character. The leading early canon on the subject is that of the council of Nicaea, c. 2, which refers to an otherwise unknown earlier canon (perhaps that which is embodied in Can. Apost. 80), and speaks of its having been frequently broken. The drift of the canon is clear, although there is some doubt as to the exact interpretation of the text. Rufinus, H. E. 2, 6, sums it up thus, "ne quis nuper assumptus de vita vel conversatione Gentili, accepto baptismo, antequam cautius examinetur, clericus fiat"; so also the later canonists, e.g. Gratian, 1, dist. 48 (see Hefele, Councils, E. T. vol. i.). It was repeated in effect in the same century by Conc. Laod. c. 3; but although it continued to be valid, as is seen from e.g. S. Leon. M. Epist. 12, c. 4, i. p. 663, 4 Conc. Tolet. c. 19, yet the necessity for it practically ceased to exist when the great mass of the population came to be of Christian parentage and to have received baptism in infancy. Gregory the Great interprets the Pauline injunction as having in his time a different meaning from that which it had in the earlier ages of the church; he applies it not to first ordination, but to subsequent promotion, and paraphrases it by "ordinate ergo ad ordines accedendum est" (S. Greg. M. Epist. ix. 106, vol ii. p. 1009). But two centuries after the council of Nicaea the spirit of the canon was revived in another form in Spain and Gaul. A period of probation was imposed before even one who had been a Christian all his life could be admitted, if not to minor orders, at least to the diaconate. 4 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 524, c. 2, 3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 6, 5 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 549, c. 3, enact that no one is to be ordained "nisi post annuam conversionem," i.e. except after a year's withdrawal from secular pursuits and devotion to a religious life. 3 Conc. Brac. A.D. 563, c. 20, enacts, what is not expressly stated in the Gallican canons, that this year is to be spent in minor orders "[nisi] . . . in officio lectorati vel subdiaconati disciplinam ecclesiasticam discat." But there is no evidence of the existence of these regulations outside the limits of Gaul and Spain, and their absence from the list of disqualifications in 4 Conc. Tolet. c. 19 (see above) is presumptive evidence of their not having been permanent even within those limits.

3. It was an early and apparently a universal rule that no one who had ever forfeited his position as a full member of the church, by 'professing penitence,' should be admitted to office. Before the age of councils the rule is mentioned by Origen (c. Cels. 3, c. 51, i. p. 482, ed. Delarue), and Augustine gives the reason for it, "ne forsitan etiam detectis criminibus spe honoris ecclesiastici animus intumescens superbe ageret poenitentiam, severissime placuit ut post actam de crimine damnabili poenitentiam nemo sit clericus ut desperatione temporalis altitudinis medicina major et verior esset humilitatis" (S. Augustin. Epist. 185 (50), c. 10, ii. p. 812). The Roman rule admitted of no exceptions: Conc. Rom. A.D. 465, c. 3; S. Siric. Epist. 1, c. 14; Hinschius, p. 522; Migne, P. L. vol. xiii. 1145; so also the Gallican rule, Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 43; Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 3; 4 Arelat. A.D. 524, c. 3; 3 Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 6; so also the African rule, Stat. Eccles. Antiq. c. 66; so also the early Pontificals, quoting the decretal of Zosimus, Pontif. Ecgb., S. Dunstan, Noviom., Sacram. Gelas. But the Spanish rule admitted of exceptions. 1 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 435, c. 2, makes the proviso "nisi tantum [si] necessitas aut usus exegerit inter ostiarios deputetur vel inter lectores"; and two later councils, Conc. Gerund. A.D. 517, c. 9, 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633. c. 54, allow the ordination of persons who made a general profession of penitence in extreme sickness, "nulla manifesta scelera confitentes sed tantum peccatores se praedicantes," and who afterwards recovered. (At the same time there is a treatise of Catalani, printed as a note to 10 Conc. Tolet. in his edition of De Aguirre's Concilia Hispaniae, vol. iv. pp. 163–194, "De disciplina antiquae ecclesiae speciatim Hispanicae circa lapsos in peccatum carnis post baptismum ne ordinentur nec administrent ordines jam susceptos.")

4. It was enacted, with a frequency which indicates that the rule was often broken, that no one should be ordained out of the church to which he belonged (i.e. probably, the church in which he had been baptized, but the question is not easy of determination: see the discussion of it in Hallier de Sacris Electionibus, pp. 605, sqq.), or promoted to a higher grade out of the church in which he was first ordained. Violations of this rule rendered the ordination invalid (ἄκυρος ἔσται ἡ χειροτονία), according to Conc. Nicaen. c. 16; Antioch. c. 24; Sardic. c. 15, 2 Arelat. A.D. 451, c. 13; 5 Arelat. A.D. 554, c. 7; 1 Turon. A.D. 461, c. 9, 10 (which, however, has a proviso, "nisi satisfactione quae ad pacem pertinent componantur"). Conc. Chalc. c. 10 excommunicates both the ordaining bishop and the ordained clerk until the latter returns to his own church; 5 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 549, c. 5, suspends the ordaining bishop for three months, and the ordained clerk during the pleasure of his proper bishop. The rule is also found, but without any express penalty for the violation of it, in Africa, 3 Conc. Carth. c. 21, 44 = Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 54; in Gaul, Conc. Arausic. A.D. 441, c. 8; Venet. A.D. 465, c. 10; Arvern. A.D. 535, c. 11; in Spain, Conc. Illib. A.D. 305, c. 24; Valent. A.D. 524 (546), c. 6; 2 Brac. A.D. 563, c. 8; in the Capit. Hadrian. A.D. 785, c. 18; and in the Carolingian capitularies, e.g. Karoli Magni Capit. A.D. 779, c. 2; Capit. in Papia, A.D. 789, c. 3; Pertz, i. p. 76. The regulation probably arose in the first instance from the desirability of a man's being ordained among those who could bear witness to his innocency of life and soundness in the faith (so expressly Conc. Illib. c. 24), but it was kept up in later times chiefly in the interests of ecclesiastical organization. (For the origin of the system of dimissory letters, see DIMISSORY LETTERS, Vol. I. p. 558.)

5. The regulations in regard to the marriage of candidates for orders were governed by the Pauline injunction, μιᾶς γυναικὸς ἄνδρες (1 Tim. iii. 2, 12; Tit. i. 6). As to the interpretation of that injunction, there appears to have been a consensus of opinion; it excluded those who, having lost one wife, had married another. But two questions arose: firstly, whether the rule applied in the case in which the first wife had been married before baptism; secondly, whether the rule applied to others than presbyters and deacons. On these questions there were varieties of opinion; as to the first, the Eastern rule seems to have been that only marriages after baptism were to be reckoned; so Can. Apost. 17, ὁ δυσὶ γάμοις συμπλακεὶς μετὰ τὸ βάπτισμα, Conc. Trull. c. 3; cf. Balsam. ad loc. This limitation of the rule is defended at length by Jerome, Ep. 69 (83) ad Oceanum. i. p. 411, but herein Jerome stands almost alone among Western writers. (At the same time it may be noted that Jerome's general view of digamy was of the strictest; cf. Epist. 123 (11), c. 6, i. p. 904). The Western rule rigidly excluded from the priesthood all who had married a second wife, whether the first marriage had taken place before or after baptism; so S. Ambros. de Off. Ministr. i. 50, ii. p. 66; S. Augustin. de Bono Conjug. c. 18; Migne, 6, p. p. 387; S. Leon. Epist. 5, c. 3, vol. i. p. 617; Innocent. I. Epist. ad Victoric. Hinschius, p. 530; Migne, P. L. vol. xx. 474; Zosim. Epist. ad Hesych. Hinschius, p. 553, quoted (sometimes as a decretal of Innocent I.) in the pontificals of Egbert, St. Dunstan, Cahors, Jumiéges, Vatic. ap. Muratori, and in the Gelasian sacramentary; and the later canonists, e. 1. Gratian, 1, dist. 26, 3; D. Ivon. Decret. i. 292. (It is probable that the exceptions mentioned by Tertull. de Exhort. Cast. c. 7 [Montanist], and Hippol. Philosophum, 9, 12, refer to violations not of the rule in general, but of this stricter interpretation of it.) The attempt to extend the rule to all clerks was not altogether successful, and the fluctuations of opinion which are marked in the successive enactments are worthy of study. The following are the more important enactments which bear upon the admission of married persons to orders; for a more general account of the regulations which affected persons already in orders, see CELIBACY, DIGAMY. (1) No one who had married a second wife could become a clerk: Can. Apost. 17; 1 Conc. Valen. A.D. 374 (?), c. 1; Rom. A.D. 465, c. 2; Gerund. A.D. 517, c. 8 (which excludes any one who, after the death of his wife, "aliam cujuscunque conditionis cognoverit mulierem"); 4 Arelat. A.D. 524, c. 3 (which speaks of the necessity which had arisen for imposing a severer penalty for the violation of the rule); 3 Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 6; Stat. Eccles. Antiq. c. 69; 4 Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 19; Rom. A.D. 743, c. 11; Poenit. Theod. i. 9, 10; and in the civil law, Justin. Novell. 123, c. 12 (but apparently limited to presbyters and deacons in id. Novell. 6, 5). (2) No one in a similar case could be a deacon or presbyter: Origen in Luc. Hom. 17, iii. p. 953, ed. Delarue; Justin. Novell. 6, 5; 123, 14; Conc. Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 2. (3) No one who had married one who had been herself married before, whether widow or divorcée, could be ordained: Can. Apost. c. 17; 1 Conc. Valent. A.D. 374, c. 1; Rom. A.D. 465, c. 2; 3 Aurel. c. 6; 4 Arelat. c. 3; Epaon. c. 2; Stat. Eccles. Ant. c. 69; Conc. Rom. A.D. 743, 11; Zosim. Epist. ad Hesych.; Poenit. Theod. i. 9, 10; Egbert. Eborac. Dial. c. 15; Conc. Trull. c. 3. (4) No one could be ordained who had married two sisters (Can. Apost. 19), or his niece (id.), or an actress, or slave, or courtesan (id. 18. Conc. Trull. c. 3), or who had a concubine (Can. Apost. 19; 4 Conc. Tol. c. 19; Trull. c. 3; Poenit. Theod. i. 9, 6), or whose wife had been guilty of adultery (Conc. Neocaes. c. 8; cf. S. Basil. Epist. Canon. iii. c. 69). (5) The earliest positive prohibition of the ordination of all married persons is 2 Conc. Arelat. c. 2, "assumi aliquem ad sacerdotium non posse in conjugii vinculo constitutum nisi fuerit praemissa conversio" [i.e. renunciation of married and secular life], but the date and authority of this council are both very uncertain.

6. Some other ecclesiastical disqualifications appear to have been of a local or temporary nature. (1) Can. Apost. 79, Conc. Arausic. A.D. 441, 3 Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 6, 11 Tolet. c. 13, enact that no one who had been possessed by an evil spirit could be ordained (cf. the story told by Gregory the Great in his life of St. Benedict of the youth who was exorcised by St. Benedict, and told never to enter holy orders; on his attempting to do so, the evil spirit returned: St. Greg. Dial. 2, c. 16; Migne, P. L. vol. lxvi. p. 164). (2) 1 Conc. Carth. c. 8 enacts that no one can be ordained until he has rendered his accounts as procurator, actor, or tutor pupillorum, in order to secure his entire disentanglement from secular business. (3) The Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua exclude "seditionarios, usuarios, et injuriarum suarum ultores" (cf. St. Basil, Epist. 188 [canonica prima], c. 14, p. 275). (4) In England the Dialogue of Egbert gives an indication of the mixed character of the English church in the middle of the 8th century by expressly excluding "idola adorantes, per aruspices [et divinos atque] incantatores captivos se diabolo tradentes" (Egbert. Eborac. Dial. c. 15; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 402; Wilkins, i. 82). (5) Illegitimacy was first made a bar by the synod of Meaux, A.D. 845, c. 64, but even then there was the exception, "nisi ecclesiae utilitas vel necessitas vel meritorum praerogative aliter exegerit"; but the question was an open one for some time afterwards, as is shewn by the discussion between Roscelin and Theobald d'Etampes, whether the son of a priest, as being necessarily born "ex lapsu carnis," could be ordained (Theobald's argument against the exclusion of such persons is given in D'Achery, Spicilegium, vol. iii. p. 448). In the East a canon of Nicephorus, sometimes printed as an addition to the canons of Chalcedon, Pitra, Spicileg. Solesm. vol. iv. 465, id. Jur. Eccl. Gr. vol. i. p. 536, vol. ii. p. 328, expressly allows the ordination of the offspring of concubinage, digamy, or even fornication; but the Western rule was severer, and it further ranked as illegitimate the children of heretics and slaves (cf. Catalani ad Pontif. Roman. p. 1, tit. 2, 1, §§ 5, 18).

7. Of later regulations, the most important was that which required every candidate for orders to have a fixed source of income, or title.[a]

[a] The meaning of the word titulus, like that of canon, in its ecclesiastical sense, has been so often misunderstood that it is advisable to mention the chief facts in regard to its use. It is a technical term of Roman law where, from its original use in relation to taxable real property, it came to be used of taxable property, and of property yielding revenue, in general: Cod. Theodos. lib. xi. tit. 26, 1 = Cod. Justin. lib. x. tit. 30, 1 (a law of A.D. 369), "in eodem titulo et in eodem modo ad solven-

In the earliest period, when each church had its own bishop, and parish was synonymous with diocese, appointment to office was, from the nature of the case, appointment to a particular office in a particular church. This primitive practice of appointments seems to have been first departed from in the 5th century; but the departure from it was strongly condemned by the council of Chalcedon, c. 6, which enacted that the ordination of those who were ἀπολύτως χειροτονουμένους and not ἰδικῶς ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ πόλεως ἢ κώμης ἢ μαρτυρίῳ ἢ μοναστηρίῳ should be invalid. For three centuries after the enactment of this canon there appears to be no necessity for re-enacting it; but it reappears in the Dialogue of Egbert, c. 9 (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, &c. vol. iii.) and in the Carolingian Capitularies, e.g. Karoli Capit. Eccles. A.D. 789, c. 25; Pertz, vol. i. 58; Capit. Francofurt. A.D. 794, c. 28, ap. Pertz, vol. i. p. 74, "ut non absolute ordinentur," Capit. Excerpt. A.D. 806, c. 7, Pertz, vol. i. 147. In the meantime it had become the custom at all ordinations to major orders to designate the particular church which the ordinand was to serve, and from which he was to derive his income. This is the case in the Pontificals of Ecgbert, St. Dunstan, Vatican ap. Muratori, Rodrad, Rouen, Reims, Noyon, Ratold, and the Gelasian Sacramentary (but the omission in the Missale Francorum and the Cod. Maffeianus is to be noted). But there does not appear to be any direct canonical requirement of a titulus earlier than the end of the 11th century: Conc. Placent. A.D. 1095, c. 15, "decernimus ut sine titulo facta ordinatio irrita habeatur"; at the same time Urban II., under whom this council was held, in writing to the bishop of Toul, leaves it to his discretion to allow such ordinations or not (Append. ad Epist. Urbani Papae II. No. xvii. ap. Mansi, vol. xx. 676).

IV. Literary Qualifications.—It both follows from and confirms the general view of the nature of the clerical office in the primitive church that literary qualifications were viewed as subordinate and non-essential. The Pastoral Epistles require that a bishop shall be "apt to teach" (διδακτικός, 1 Tim. iii. 2, which is paraphrased in Const. Apost. 7, 31, into δυναμένους διδάσκειν τὸν λόγον τῆς εὐσεβείας), but early Christian literature distinctly contemplates the existence of an unlettered bishop (Διατ. Κλήμ. 16 (18), παιδείας μέτοχος, δυνάμενος τὰς γραφὰς ἑρμηνεύειν· εἰ δὲ ἀγράμματος, πραὺς ὑπάρχων καὶ τῇ ἀγάπῃ εἰς πάντας περισσευέτω). For the first four centuries there are no conciliar or other regulations requiring knowledge of letters as a qualification for orders; and Jerome expressly mentions that, in his time, "judicio Domini et populorum suffragio in sacerdotium simplices [i.e. illiterate persons] eligi; saltem illud habeant ut postquam sacerdotes fuerint ordinati discant legem Dei ut possint docere quod didicerint et augeant scientiam magis quam opes" (S. Hieron. Comment. in Aggae, c. 2, v. 11, vi. p. 761). But in the 5th century the altered position of the clergy in reference to the laity, the formation of a liturgy, and the growing tendency to lay stress on formulae, rendered it necessary to lay a stress which had not been laid before on the possession of certain rudiments of education. A Syrian synod in 405 (?) (Mansi, vii. 1181), c. 26, enacts that not even a subdeacon is to be ordained until he is not only otherwise instructed in doctrine, but can say the Psalter; and the Roman council of 465 (?), c. 3, enacts that "inscii quoque litterarum . . . . ad sacros ordines aspirare non audeant." But the first well-established enactments are those of the civil law. Justin. Novell. 6, 4, A.D. 535, enacts that clerks must be γραμμάτων ἐπιστήμονες, at any rate presbyters and deacons; so Novell. 123, c. 12, of clerks without reservation. From the 7th century onwards, and in the later canonists, knowledge of letters, the degree and kind, however, rarely specified, is made an indispensable qualification: 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 19; 8 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 653, c. 8, which specifies the requisite knowledge to be that of "totum psalterium vel canticorum usualium et hymnorum sive baptizandi supplementum"; in England, Dial. Egbert. Eborac. c. 15; among the Culdees of Scotland and Ireland, "Prose Rule of the Céli Dé," in Reeves' The Culdees of the British Islands, p. 95; in the Frankish kingdom, Capit. Francofurt. A.D. 794, c. 20, Pertz, i. 73; in the canonists, Gratian. p. 1, dist. 24, c. 5 = D. Ivon. Carnot. Panorm. 3, c. 21 = ejusd. Decret. 6, c. 21; Burchard Wormat. Decret. 2, 18. The further regulations, themselves also comparatively rare, which specially apply to the higher orders, corroborate the inference that the knowledge of letters which was requisite for admission to the lower orders must at first have been extremely small. 2 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 533, c. 16, enacts that no one can be ordained presbyter or deacon "sine litteris vel si baptizandi ordinem nesciat." Conc. Narbon. A.D. 589 enacts that no bishop is to ordain an illiterate person presbyter or deacon; if such persons have been already ordained, they must be compelled to learn; if any one will not learn, he must lose his stipend. If he is still obstinate, he must be relegated to a monastery "quia non potest aedificare populum." Gregory the Great, about the same time, objects to Rusticus, a deacon who was candidate for the bishopric of Ancona, that he was reported not to know the Psalter, and suggests that the bishop to whom he is writing dum protinus urgeatur in quo alterum perperam fecerit debitorem," where Cujacius, ad loc. Cod. Justin., explains the words in italics, "in eodem tit. puta in auro vel in argento et in eodem modo id est eadem quantitate": Cod. Theodos. lib. xii. tit. 9, 3 = Cod. Justin. lib. x. tit. 73, 3; lib. xi. tit. 64, 5 (a law of A.D. 399), "sciant judices nihil sibi ex privatae rei canone vel eo quod ex iisdem titulis exegerint ad necessitates alias transferre licere"; Cod. Theodos. lib. xii. tit. 28, 12, "per universos," i.e. districts yielding taxable revenues; ibid. lib. xi. tit. 2, 4, tit. 12, 2, "annonarius titulus," i.e. a district yielding taxable corn. cf. "canonici tituli," ibid. lib. xiv. tit. 16, 3, "frumentarii tituli"; ibid. lib. xi. tit. 1, 36, "canonici tituli." Hence the use in the Liber Pontificalis of the districts, i.e. parishes into which Rome was divided for ecclesiastical purposes, and each of which had its proper revenues: e.g. Vit. S. Marcell. p. 31, xxv. "titulos in urbe Roma constituit quasi dioeceses propter baptismum et poenitentiam multorum qui convertebantur ex paganis et propter sepulturas martyrum": cf. ibid. Vit. S. Evarist. p. 6; Vit. S. Leon. p. 26. Hence the mediaeval meaning of ecclesiastical income, e.g. 3 Conc. Lateran. A.D. 1179, c. 5, "Episcopus si aliquem sine certo titulo de quo necessaria vitae percipiat in diaconum vel presbyterum ordinaverit"; Synod. Exon. A.D. 1287, c. 8, "Caveant ad sacros ordines promovendi ut titulum habeant sufficientem"; Sarum Pontifical ap. Maskell, Mon. Rit. vol. iii. p. 156, "Nullus sine vero titulo vel cujus titulus ad non titulum est redactus."

should find out "quantos psalmos minus teneat" (S. Greg. Magn. Epist. 14, 11, vol. ii. p. 1269). No doubt Gregory's personal influence did much to raise the ordinary standard of attainment; and two centuries after his time his own works were ranked with the Gospels, the Epistles, and the apostolical canons, as constituting the proper objects of a priest's study: Conc. Mogunt. A.D. 813, praef.; 3 Conc. Turon. A.D. 813, c. 3; 2 Conc. Cabillon. A.D. 813, c. 1, and elsewhere. So also a knowledge of the calendar was required, e. g. by Hincmar, Capit. Synod. c. 8, A.D. 852. How much knowledge of Scripture was required in the 9th century is shewn by the selection of passages which was framed, in order that candidates might learn it by heart, by Prudentius of Troyes (S. Prudent. Trec. Florilegium, ap. Trombelli Vet. Patr. Opp. Bonon. 1753, from a MS. furnished by Bianchini).

In the East the standard of attainment seems to have fallen very low. 2 Conc. Nicaen. A.D. 787, c. 2, found it necessary to make an explicit regulation that every one who was advanced to the office of a bishop must know the psalter and be able to read the Scriptures and the canons. Still later, the Nestorian canons of Ebedjesu (Tract. vi. c. 4, can. 3, ap. Mai Script. Vett. vol. x. p. 12) enact that no one must be ordained city deacon who does not know the lessons and epistles, but a country deacon may in cases of emergency be allowed who knows only some of the psalter. The implication is that in neither case was it required that he should be able to read, but only that he should know the prescribed portions by heart.

2. Mode of Testing Qualifications. Examination.—It has already been pointed out that the ecclesiastical followed the analogy of the civil organization in requiring definite qualifications in its officers; it is also probable that the same analogy was followed in regard to the mode of testing those qualifications. At the time of election to office, either before votes were recorded or before the election was declared, the returning officer of an ecclesiastical as of a civil community enquired viva voce whether the necessary conditions had been fulfilled. This enquiry was made not of the person elected, but of those who voted for him, or who presented him for admission. It was an enquiry almost entirely into moral fitness. The reason which Cyprian gives for making ecclesiastical appointments in the common assembly of the church is that "in the presence of the people the crimes of the bad and the merits of the good may alike be disclosed, and that the ordination may be regular and legitimate which has been tested by the vote and judgment of all" ("omnium suffragio et judicio examinata," S. Cyprian, Epist. 68, 3, vol. i. p. 1026). In another passage, Cyprian appears to distinguish between the testimony which was given by the clergy and the vote which was given by the people (id. inter Epist. S. Cornel. 10 vol. i. p. 770). This testimony is distinctly described by Basil as the result of previous enquiry and examination (Epist. 54 (181) ad Chorepisc. Migne, P. G. vol. xxxii. 400); and the giving of it formed a feature in almost all rituals of ordination. But whereas in the earliest period the enquiry of the bishop was addressed to and the testimony given by the whole body of the clergy of a church, in the ensuing period two or more deacons presented and bore testimony to a deacon, two or more presbyters to a presbyter. Afterwards the practice which was peculiar to Rome in the time of Jerome (S. Hieron. Epist. 146 (85) ad Evang.) became almost universal in the West. The clergy were represented by the archdeacon who, as the chief officer of the external discipline and activity of the church, would be most likely to be cognisant of the current reputation of any of its members. (The exceptions to this practice are comparatively few in the West; the Salzburg and Cambrai pontificals and Codex Maffeianus direct a presbyter to be presented by two presbyters, and the bishop's questions are addressed to the bystanders, which may mean of all the clergy in the sanctuary.) So important was this function of the archdeacon that Balsamon (Rallé and Potlé, Συνταγ. καν. vol. iv. p. 480) expresses a doubt whether a deacon could be ordained without it. But this public examination tended to become a mere form, and was found to be insufficient. Popular testimony was apt to be partial. The bishop himself was required to take more active steps to ascertain that the ordained was worthy. Chrysostom (Hom. in parab. de dec. mill. talent., Op. ed. Migne, vol. iii. p. 23) warns his fellow bishops that this is one of the things for which they will have to give an account. Justinian (Novell. 137, c. 1) speaks of the scandal which had arisen from clerks having been ordained without due examination. The third council of Carthage, c. 22, and the third of Braga, A.D. 572, c. 3, both lay stress on such examination in addition to the requirement of testimony ("oportet non per gratiam munerum sed per diligentem prius discussionem, deinde per multorum testimonium clericos ordinare"). In order that such an examination might be more effective, Gregory the Great advised Adeodatus to associate with himself "graves expertosque viros" (Epist. iii. 49, vol. ii. p. 660); and this became ultimately the general practice throughout the West. The mediaeval rule was based by the canonists (Gratian, pars 1, dist. 24, c. 5; Ivo Carnot. Panorm. 3, c. 21, Decret. 6, c. 21; Burchard Wormat. 2, c. 1) on a canon of an otherwise unknown council (Conc. Nannetense, al. Manetense, said to have been held in A.D. 895, in the pontificate of Formosus), which, as it to a great extent governs the modern Roman, and also the English, practice, may be quoted here: "Quando episcopus ordinationes facere disponit omnes qui ad sacrum ministerium accedere volunt feria quarta ante ipsam ordinationem evocandi sunt ad civitatem una cum [archi]presbyteris qui eos repraesentare debent; et tunc episcopus a latere suo eligere debet sacerdotes et alios prudentes viros gnaros divinae legis et exercitatos in ecclesiasticis sanctionibus qui ordinandorum vitam, genus, patriam, aetatem, institutionem, locum ubi educati sunt, si bene sunt literati, si instructi in lege Domini, diligenter investigent; ante omnia si fidem catholicam firmiter teneant et verbis simplicibus asserere queant . . . Ita per tres continuos dies diligenter examinentur et sic sabbato qui probati inventi sunt episcopo repraesententur." This examination was in some dioceses supplemented, in the case of a presbyter, by a further public examination at the time of ordination in regard to his willingness to be ordained, and to be obedient to his bishop (so the Mainz and Soissons pontificals, published by Martene; one of the Corbey pontificals, published by Morin: and Hittorp, Ordo Romanus, p. 93); the former of these questions of examination was probably intended to guard against the ordinations of persons against their will (as in the case of Paulinus, S. Hieron. Epist. 51, 60, vol. i. p. 241, or of Bassianus, Acta Conc Chalc. xi. ap. Mansi, vol. vii. p. 278), the latter to secure the often contested rights of bishops over parochial clergy [PARISH].

There was a further test, which was, however, rather negative than positive, in the appeal to the people at the time of ordination. It is probable [see ORDINATION] that originally all appointments to ecclesiastical office were made by popular election; subsequently names were proposed by the clergy or by the bishop, and although the form of a popular election still remained, yet the part of the people was confined to the exclamation ἄξιος, "dignus est"; ultimately that which survived was the appeal of the bishop to the people that, if any one knew any reason why the person elected should not be ordained, he should come forth and declare it. A novel of Justinian (Novell. 123, c. 14, and, in effect, 137, c. 3) regulates the procedure in case of an objection appearing; but the canon law appears only to provide for the general case of a bishop knowingly, or after warning, ordaining an unqualified person (e.g. 3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 6). It is probable that a person who made an objection which he did not succeed in substantiating was liable to the penalty of excommunication which followed all false accusations of clergy (Conc. Illib. c. 75, Agath. c. 31), and also that an objector must himself be a faithful member of the church and of irreproachable character (3 Conc. Carth. c. 8; Conc. Chalc. c. 21); hence the clause, which still remains in the Roman pontifical, in the appeal of the bishop to the people, "si quis &c. . . verum memor sit conditionis suae." But that the checks thus imposed on groundless accusations were not intended to crush enquiry is shewn by the fact that, when the extension of the area of dioceses, and the multiplication of parishes within the limits of a single diocese, made the appeal to the people in the cathedral church at the time of ordination less effective than it had originally been, an additional test was imposed by making a previous appeal to the people of the parish in which the ordinand lived.

Ultimately there were four, and in some cases five, tests which every ordinand had to satisfy. 1. He must have the testimony of the presbyter of his parish. This was originally given viva voce at the time of ordination, and the presbyter or archpresbyter presented the ordinand personally to the bishop ("qui eos repraesentare debent," in the Conc. Nannet. quoted above); afterwards it was given in writing, and the archdeacon presented and bore testimony to all ordinands alike, both those of whom he had personal knowledge and those who had the testimony of other presbyters. 2. He must produce evidence that his intention had been publicly declared in the parish in which he lived, and that no objector had come forward. 3. He must not have been objected to, or, if objected to, must have been cleared from the objection at the time of ordination. 4. He must have been personally tested by the bishop, assisted by other competent persons. (It is possible that the testimony of the archdeacon in the modern English ordinal may partly refer to this examination; but the fact that the Conc. Nannet., which forms the canonical authority for the practice, does not mention the archdeacon, shews that originally the examination by the bishop and the enquiry by the archdeacon were distinct. The earliest mention of the archdeacon in connexion with this examination is in late pontificals: e.g. Cod. Vat. No. 4744.) 5. The public examination by the bishop, which forms part of the modern English ordinal, is an extension, apparently without early precedent, of the examination mentioned above, into an ordinand's willingness to be ordained and to obey his diocesan. In the Roman pontifical it follows ordination, and is treated not as an examination, but as a contract (Pontif. Rom. pars i. tit. 12, §§ 29, 30).

V. CIVIL STATUS, MANNER OF LIFE, AND DISCIPLINE OF PERSONS IN HOLY ORDERS.—(i.) Civil Status: 1. In the pre-Constantinian period of church history the officers of the church had, of course, no distinct civil status. They were liable to the same burdens as all other citizens, whether Christian or pagan; they had to take their places among the decuriones, to act as trustees, and to serve in the army. Nor is there any strong presumption that the discharge of such functions, except where it involved the recognition of the State religion, was exceptionally distasteful. The sentiment of the incompatibility of church offices with active civil life first appears in North Africa. In the busy commercial towns of that thriving district the Christian communities were numerous, and the work which devolved upon their officers was consequently considerable. At the same time such officers were among the most intelligent and most trustworthy citizens. They were consequently in demand for civil offices of trust. But when thus "saeculo obstricti" (Tertull. de Praescript. Haeret. c. 41) their attention was liable to be distracted, and the administration of ecclesiastical affairs to suffer. Such employments, so far as they were voluntarily undertaken and not imposed by the civil power, were therefore discouraged. In addition to this, the analogy between the Christian ministry and the Jewish priesthood was beginning to assert itself in practice, and the frequent outbreaks of persecution made the antithesis between the church and the world exceptionally strong. The writings of Cyprian contain frequent protests against the combination of church office with civil life: he inveighs against commercial bishops (De Lapsis, c. 6): he claims for church officers that they ought "nonnisi altari et sacrificiis deservire et precibus atque orationibus vacare" (Epist. 66 (1), vol. ii. p. 397); and consequently since Geminius Victor had named Faustinus, a presbyter, as his executor, he inflicts upon the former a posthumous punishment, "non est quod pro dormitione ejus apud vos fiat oblatio aut deprecatio aliqua nomine ejus in ecclesia frequentetur" (ibid.).

2. But from the time of the recognition of Christianity by the Empire, several powerful causes contributed to foster the nascent tendency to separate church officers into a class distinct, both civilly and socially, from the ordinary members of the Christian communities.

(a) The first of these causes was the concession to clerks of the immunities from public burdens which had been enjoyed by certain classes of heathen priests, and which continued to be enjoyed by some of the liberal professions. [IMMUNITIES, Vol. I. p. 882.]

But although the existence of these immunities operated powerfully to give clerks a distinct status, and although the enactment of frequent safeguards against their abuse shews that they were largely acted upon, and although, moreover, it was unlikely that anyone who could claim exemption from public burdens would voluntarily undertake them, still it is clear that the concession did not act as a prohibition, and that church officers were still entangled with civil affairs and engaged in commercial pursuits. There is a wide difference between exemption from, and ineligibility for, the discharge of civil functions: the empire granted the former, the church came to impose the latter. But it was not until the Council of Chalcedon that the holding of civil office, or the administration of secular business, became an offence against ecclesiastical law; and it was not until eighty years after that council that the civil law finally prohibited any of the higher municipal officers from being elected presbyters or bishops (Cod. Justin. i. 3, 53 (52), A.D. 532; cf. also Justin. Novell. 123, c. 15).

(b) A second important and concurrent cause was that clerks came to be in certain cases exempted from the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts of law. The granting of this exemption was of itself a recognition of clerks as a distinct class, and the continued existence of it naturally tended to increase the class feeling. The date of the earliest concession is not certain: Haenel, Corpus Legum ante Justinianum latarum, p. 204, gathers from Sozom. H. E. i. 9, Niceph. Call. H. E. vii. 46, S. Ambros. Epist. ii. 13, that it was made by Constantine about A.D. 331. But it is not clear that either Constantine or his immediate successors did more than recognise the validity of church discipline; i.e. of the voluntary jurisdiction to which the members of Christian societies had submitted themselves.

(c) A third cause was that after the time of Constantine the funds of the churches no longer consisted wholly of voluntary and temporary offerings. The churches could inherit and hold property (law of Constantine in 321, Cod. Theodos. xvi. 2, 4). The provincial governors were required to furnish annual provision not only to clerks but also to widows and virgins on the church-roll (Inc. Auct. de Constant. ap. Haenel, Corpus Legum ante Justin. lat. p. 196; the regulation was repealed by Julian but restored by his successor, Sozom. H. E. v. 5; Theodoret. iv. 4). A fixed proportion of the land revenues of every city was assigned to the churches and clergy (Sozom. H. E. i. 8; Niceph. Call. vii. 46: cf. Euseb. H. E. x. 6; Vit. Const. iv. 28). The rich endowments of pagan temples were transferred in some cases to the newly-recognised religion: for example, Constantine gave the church of Alexandria the revenues of the temple of the Sun (Sozom. v. 7); and Theodosius gave the same church the wealth of the temple of Serapis (id. v. 16). It is true that these endowments did not in the fourth century reach all the clergy: for example, Basil speaks of his clergy as gaining their livelihood by sedentary handicrafts (τὰς ἑδραίας τῶν τεχνῶν, Epist. 198 (263)), and of a fellow-presbyter, before his elevation to the episcopate, as working for him (κάμνει οὐ μετρίως ἡμῖν ὑπηρετῶν πρὸς τὸν βίον, Epist. 36 (228)). But the fact of church officers being raised, especially in the great centres of population, such as Constantinople and Alexandria, above the necessity of work, and of their being thus withdrawn from some of the most intimate associations of ordinary life, must have contributed, probably more than any other single cause, to isolate them from the rest of the community.

The result of these and other co-operating influences was that by the close of the fifth century the officers of the Christian church enjoyed a unique position among the citizens of the Empire. Exempt, to a great extent, from public burdens, fenced round with special privileges even in civil procedure, and endowed with revenues which the State had given them special facilities for holding, they became not merely civilly distinct, but the most powerful class in the civilised world. In the East their status remained practically what the early emperors had made it until the final fall of the Eastern empire. But in the West, it was not maintained without a struggle. For example, the law of Valens and Valentinian (Cod. Theodos. xvi. 2, 23) had recognised the jurisdiction of local synods in all ecclesiastical causes: this enactment was repeated, though without its subsequent extensions, in the Visigothic Code; but it is clear from the "interpretatio," and from all the "epitomes," that it was understood to apply only to disputes "inter clericos" (cf. the texts in Haenel, Lex Romana Visigothorum, p. 246). Even when under the Carolingians the Eastern canon law began to be recognised in the West, and to be quoted in Capitularies, it is extremely doubtful whether such a recognition amounted to a re-enactment, and whether the claims of clerks to such a separate civil status as involved separate ecclesiastical jurisdiction were ever allowed. (For the discussion of the question see Dove, de jurisdictionis ecclesiasticae apud Germanos Gallosque progressu, Berlin, 1855; Boretius, die Capitularien im Langobardenreich, Halle, 1864; Sohm, die geistliche Gerichtsbarkeit im fränkischen Reich, in the Zeitschrift f. Kirchenrecht, vol. ix. pp. 193 sqq.)

(ii.) Manner of Life.—The distinction between clergy and laity was of slow growth, and the result of many co-operating causes. Even in divine service it was not strongly defined: in social life it hardly existed at all. Like the successors of the non-juring bishops in the eighteenth century, or like the earlier preachers of the Wesleyan Methodists, the officers of the early Christian communities worked at trades, kept shops, took part in municipal affairs, and wore the dress of ordinary citizens. (See, for examples, Funk, Handel und Gewerbe im Christl. Alterthum, in the Theol. Quartalschrift, vol. lviii. 1876, pp. 371 sqq.; COMMERCE, Vol. I. p. 411.) There was no sense of incongruity in their doing so. The Apostolical Constitutions repeat with emphasis the apostolical injunction, "That if any man would not work, neither should he eat" (2 Thess. iii. 10), and appeal to the example of the Apostles themselves as fishermen, tentmakers, and tillers of the ground. But since every church was, as every Jewish synagogue had come to be after the virtual fusion of synagogues and synedria, a court of discipline; and since the chief function of the officers of the church, as officers of discipline, was to maintain in the Christian churches a higher standard of morality than prevailed in the heathen world, there was from the first the feeling that those who judged others should, in the respects of which they took judicial cognizance, themselves be blameless. The apostolic admonition to Timothy was of universal application, "Be thou an example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity" (1 Tim. iv. 12). If a church officer failed in these respects, it was competent for the church of which he was an officer to remove him. (This is clearly implied in Clem. Rom. i. 44.) But this was obviously an inconvenient form of procedure, especially when the list of offences was undefined; and it was gradually supplanted by the elaborate system of synods, provincial, diocesan, and œcumenical, which has been described above. The general regulations which these synods laid down, present, as far as they have been preserved, an accurate picture not only of the ideal but also of the actual state of the clergy in various parts of Christendom. They are in some cases extremely minute. They probably grew in most instances out of individual cases which arose, the decisions in such cases being framed as general rules for future guidance. They were for the most part only valid in the province or diocese in which they were framed; and valuable as they are in enabling us to arrive at the state of opinion at a particular time in a particular country, they must not be regarded as having had, at least in the first instance, the character of general laws. In later times, when a large number of these decisions and regulations were collected together by Dionysius Exiguus, Ferrandus, and others; and in still later times, when these earlier collections were amalgamated with other elements into a corpus of canon law, the decisions of local councils received an authority which they had not at first possessed: but for the purposes of church history and church antiquities, it is of great importance to bear in mind in each case the circumstances of their origin and the limits of their validity. If these necessary limitations be borne in mind, it will be found that during the first four centuries the ecclesiastical regulations which affected the social life of church officers were comparatively few in number. In the East the most important of such regulations were that clerks should not take usury (Conc. Nicaen. c. 17, Laod. c. 4, Can. Apost. 44); that they should not be present at the immoral masquerades of banquets or marriages (Laod. c. 54); that they should not bathe with women (Laod. c. 30); that they should not dine at club dinners (συμπόσια ἐκ συμβολῆς, Laod. c. 55); or enter a tavern except on a journey (Laod. c. 24, Can. Apost. 54). In North Africa the regulations are mainly to the same effect: clerks must not take usury (1 Carth. c. 13; 3 Carth. c. 16); or go to taverns (3 Carth. c. 27, = Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 40); nor may even their sons exhibit or witness secular games (3 Carth. c. 11). (The minute regulations of the Statt. Eccl. Antiq., frequently cited as 4 Conc. Carth., especially c. 45-63, almost certainly belong to a later period.) In Gaul and Spain the enactments against taking usury are found in four councils of this period—Illib. c. 20; 1 Arelat. c. 12; 2 Arelat. c. 14; 1 Turon. c. 13. The fact that clerks had not yet ceased to trade is indicated by the enactment that bishops, presbyters, and deacons were not to trade out of their provinces nor go about the country in search of the most profitable markets (Illib. c. 18). But although the regulations were neither numerous nor stringent, there is no doubt that by the end of the fifth century the officers of the church, throughout the greater part of Christendom, had become a class socially as well as civilly distinct from its ordinary members. The theory of the church was more conservative than its practice. The form of the primitive "canon," or church-roll, still remained. The various ranks still shaded off into one another. The "order" of the laity still held its place side by side by the "orders" of presbyters, deacons, readers, and widows. But the later conception of the clergy had been formed, and was beginning to express itself. The social distinction between church officers and ordinary members was accentuated by two circumstances, which, though slight in themselves, and in the first instance rather effects than causes, helped materially to increase it: the one was the adoption of a peculiar dress, the other was the adoption of a peculiar mode of wearing the hair (a) The first of these had shewn itself at th beginning of the fifth century, but only in tl form of a tendency to wear garments of a more sober hue than was customary. Jerome discourages it: "vestes pullas aeque devita ut candidas" (S. Hieron. Epist. 52 (2) ad Nepot. § 9). It was succeeded by a tendency to preserve the older forms of dress, instead of following the changes of fashion; and ultimately, chiefly under the influence of the monasteries and the canonical rule, the "habitus laicorum" (Pippin. Capit. Suession. § 3, A.D. 744; Pertz, Legum, i p. 21) was absolutely forbidden [see DRESS, Vol. I. p. 582]. (b) The second mark of distinction was slow in its growth, but strong in its influence. At first all that was insisted upon was that the hair should not be worn long or elaborately dressed; consequently the earlier references to the subject—e.g. Sidon. Apollin. Epist. viii. 9; Arator, Epist. ad Parthen. 69, 70, ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. lxviii. 251—do not prove that what was afterwards known as the TONSURE actually existed. But in the latter part of the sixth century the tonsure appears to have become definitely established as a mark of separation between clergy and laity: this is clear from Greg. Turon. Lib. de Gloria Confessor. c. 32, p. 92; id. Vit. Patr. c. 17, p. 1233; and from the fact that Gregory the Great defends its use on scriptural grounds (Reg. Pastoral. pars 2, c. 7; id. Epist. lib. i. 25, p. 514, quoting Ezek. xliv. 20: but it may be remarked, as an indication of the later origin of the practice, that Jerome in writing upon that passage of Ezekiel makes no mention of it, the words which are found in most editions being confessedly interpolated: S. Hieron. in Ezech. lib. xiii. c. 44, vol. v. p. 547).

In the meantime the inner life and discipline of the class which was thus being formed was largely influenced by the growth and wide extension of monasticism. This influence is especially shewn in the tendency to live in community.

This tendency to live in community has sometimes been traced to much earlier times. But although there are indications that in primitive times all who were on the church-roll, whether as officers, widows, virgins, or poor, shared a common fund and a common meal; there are no indications that they lived together, until in the fourth century church officers began to form a distinct class. The system which afterwards prevailed appears to have originated with Eusebius of Vercelli, † 371, who "gathered together all the clerks into the fold of a single habitation, that those whose purpose in religion was one and undivided might have a common life and a common refection" (S. Maxim. Serm. 23, ap. Muratori, Anecd. Lat. vol. iv., Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. lvii.; see also S. Ambros. Epist. lxiii. c. 66, 82, vol. ii. pars 1, p. 1038; Ps.-Ambros. Serm. 56, vol. ii. pars 2, p. 468, ascribed, perhaps correctly to S. Maximus, ap. Muratori, l. c., and Migne, vol. lvii. p. 886); and probably from the example thus set by Eusebius and strongly approved by Ambrose, it was established by Augustine in his own diocese in North Africa, expressly on the monastic principle of the renunciation of private property by those who thus lived together, and who are hence called "monasterium clericorum" (S. Augustin. Serm. 355 = de divers. 49, Op. ed. Migne, Patr. Lat., vol. v. p. 1570; see also the following sermon). In the course of the next three centuries it seems to have become the prevailing system of clerical life throughout the greater part of the West. The city clergy lived together under the eye of the bishop; they dined at a common table; they even slept together in a common chamber (4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 23, makes special provision for the case of aged or infirm bishops, priests, or deacons, who required separate cells). The country presbyters in the same way were each at the head of a "domus ecclesiae," in which, as the tendency grew up to dedicate boys to the service of the church in their earliest years, they educated such boys and trained them for the higher orders. Those who so lived together, whether in the cathedral city or in the country parishes, appear to have been called "canonici," and to have had their definite portions of the offerings which were made to their respective churches. Occasionally we find that a special endowment was made for the support of their common table (S. Greg. Turon. H. F. x. 16, p. 535 of Baudin, bp. of Tours in the time of Clothair I., "hic instituit mensam canonicorum;" cf. the will of a bishop of Le Mans circ. A.D. 615, ap. Mabillon, Vett. Anal. i. 254). But as the system became general, it was found that neither the ecclesiastical canons nor the personal control of the bishop were sufficient to prevent a laxity of life among those who thus lived together; the "canonici" contrasted unfavourably with the monks who lived under the stern régime of St. Benedict. Consequently it was found advisable to frame a rule of life for "canonici" as well as for monks, and from the middle of the eighth century almost all Western clergy became "canonici regulares" [see CANONICI, Vol. I. p. 282; to which may be added the important dissertation of Muratori, de Canonicis, in his Antiquit. Ital. vol. v. p. 183 sqq.; and a note to one of the canons of the English Legatine Synods in Haddan and Stubbs, vol. i. p. 461, which however admits of some question]. The ideal of this canonical life, or "vita communis," is found not only in the formal rules of Chrodegang (Mansi, vol. xiv. 313, Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. lxxxix. 1097; and in its longer form, Harzheim, Concil. Germ. vol. i. 96; D'Achery, Spicilegium, vol. i. 565), or of Amalarius (Harzheim, l. c., Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. cv. 815), but also in the letter of Pope Urban in the Pseudo-Isidorian additions to the Decretals (Hinschius, p. 143). But unfortunately it has its darker side: the penitential books of the eighth and ninth centuries, even if it be allowed that some of the offences there mentioned are rather imaginary than actual, shew that at any rate in Northern Europe the standard of clerical life had been rather lowered than raised by its dissociation from the common life of the Christian world.

(iii.) Discipline.—There is no evidence of the existence in the earliest period of any special discipline for church officers. The distinction between the law of life which was current among the mass of men, and that which was binding on Christians, existed for all members of the church alike; and although exceptional qualities were required in a church officer, whatever might lawfully be done by any Christian might also lawfully be done by him. Neither in the Pastoral Epistles, nor in any other of the earliest records of ecclesiastical organization, is there any trace of the exceptional rules for church officers which distinguish later canons. But the exercise of the ordinary discipline is surrounded in their case with special safeguards: "Against an elder receive not an accusation but before one or two witnesses" (1 Tim. v. 9).

But with the gradual separation of church officers from the rest of the community there came also to be rules of discipline which were specially applicable to them. These rules may be conveniently considered under two heads: A. Punishable offences; B. Punishments. On most points separate articles will be found elsewhere, and therefore what is given here will chiefly be by way of summary.

A. Punishable offences may be divided into three classes:—(1) Offences relating to marriage and sexual morality, (2) offences relating to ecclesiastical organization and divine service, (3) offences relating to social life.

(1) Offences relating to Marriage and Sexual Morality.—It is especially important to bear in mind, in the case of these offences, what has been said above as to the originally local and temporary character of most of the regulations which exist. The drift of opinion in favour of celibacy was by no means uniform in either its direction or its rate of motion. (a) In regard to the marriage of ordained persons, the following are the chief disciplinary regulations:—Conc. Ancyr. c. 10, enacts that deacons who marry after ordination without having expressly stipulated for liberty to do so at the time of their ordination are to be deposed; Conc. Neoc. c. 1, enacts that a presbyter who marries after ordination is to be deposed; the Apostolical Canons go farther, and say that no clerk can marry after ordination, except readers and singers only (C. A. 26); the Apostolical Constitutions, vi. 17, extend the exception to subdeacons (ὑπηρέτας) and doorkeepers (but, on the other hand, Conc. Chalc. c. 14, speaks of the exception of readers and singers as a custom of some provinces, ἐπαρχίαι, only). These enactments were confirmed by the civil law. A law of Justinian in 530 (Cod. Justin. i. 3, 45) goes so far as to make the children of such marriages, including those of subdeacons, illegitimate; and a novel of the same emperor (Novell. 123, c. 14) subjects the offending clerk to a farther civil penalty (but this penalty was afterwards modified, on the ground of its being too severe, by the Emperor Leo, Const. 79 in Corp. Jur. Civ. iii. p. 814). The leading Western canon on the subject is 8 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 653, c. 7, which enacts that anyone who after ordination either marries or becomes a layman must be deprived of his dignity and secluded for the rest of his life in a monastery; but the existence of an earlier Western canon is indicated by 2 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 533, c. 8, which enacts that a deacon who marries in captivity is to be deposed upon his return: 9 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 655, c. 10, makes the children of such marriages slaves of the church of which their fathers were officers. (b) If a person was ordained who was already married, the Apostolical Canons, c. 5, forbid him to put away his wife (προφάσει εὐλαβείας); and Conc. Gangr. c. 4, anathematizes those who refused to receive the communion from a married presbyter. But Epiphanius, ii. 59, 4, speaks of a canon to the opposite effect, which, however, he admits not to be observed: Socrates, H. E. v. 22, notes, on the other hand, that although there was no positive enactment, many clergy did abstain from their wives, and that in Thessaly a clerk was excommunicated who did not so abstain. A distinction in this respect was afterwards drawn in the East, which with some modifications has remained until modern times, between presbyters and bishops. Justinian enacted in 531 that no person could be made bishop who did not practise married continence (Cod. Justin. i. 3, 48, cf. Conc. Trull. xii. 13; and see CELIBACY, Vol. I. p. 324). In the West, Conc. Illib. A.D. 313, commands all married clerks to abstain and not to beget children under pain of deprivation; so also the doubtful addition to 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 29: 2 Carth. c. 3 = Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 2, gives the prohibition without specifying a penalty: 5 Carth. c. 3 = Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 25, makes the enactment apply to subdeacons and upwards, but not to inferior clerks: 1 Tolet. A.D. 398, assigns the milder penalty of non-promotion; so also 1 Turon. A.D. 441, c. 2; but 1 Araus. A.D. 441, c. 23, Agath. A.D. 506, c. 9, Arvern. A.D. 535, c. 13, revert to the penalty of deposition in the case of priests and deacons: Gerund. A.D. 517, c. 6, 3 Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 2, 5 Aurel. A.D. 549, c. 4 (but not 4 Aurel. A.D. 541, c. 17), Autissiod. A.D. 578, c. 20, and apparently 2 Matisc. A.D. 581, c. 11, 3 Lugd. A.D. 583, c. 1 (all Gallican councils, and all belonging to the century which succeeded the baptism of Chlodwig), include subdeacons in the same penalty. This inclusion of subdeacons is also mentioned by Leo the Great (Epist. 167 ad Rustic. c. 3; Epist. 14 ad Anastas. c. 3), and its adoption in Gaul seems to be due to Roman influence, as Gregory the Great (Epist. i. 44, vol. ii. p. 538) speaks of it as a "mos Romanus" which had recently been imposed on Sicily. The Decretals follow in the same track (S. Siric. ad Eumer. c. 7, Hinschius, p. 521; S. Innocent I. ad Victoric. c. 9, ad Exsuper. c. 1, ad Maxim. et Sever., Hinschius, pp. 530, 531, 544): so also, with strong emphasis upon the enactment, in the Pseudo-Isidorian Epist. Clement. ii. c. 46, Hinschius, p. 48. 2 Conc. Turon. A.D. 567, c. 19, throws upon the rural arch-presbyters (i.e. the later rural deans) the duty of seeing that the other clergy of their districts observe the rule: in case of a breach of it, not only is the offender himself to be suspended, but the arch-presbyter who has neglected to guard against a breach of it is himself to be secluded, and fed on bread and water for a month. (c) In cases where marriage was allowed, digamy in any of its forms was strictly prohibited. In the East the Apostolical Canons (c. 17–19) refuse to allow anyone who has married (1) two wives after baptism, (2) a widow or divorcée, to be on the clergy list (cf. Const. Apost. vi. 17; Justin. Novell. vi. c. 5). But the regulations seem to have fallen into disuse, inasmuch as at the time of the Trullan Council special legislation had again become necessary, and the analogy of the Western church was expressly followed (Conc. Trull. c. 2). In the West there were numerous enactments on the subject:—(i.) 1 Conc. Valent. A.D. 374, c. 1, disallows digamists for the future, but does not interfere with those who were already ordained: 1 Tol. A.D. 398, c. 4, degrades a digamous subdeacon to the rank of a reader or doorkeeper, and deposes a trigamist: Araus. A.D. 441, c. 25, will not allow a digamist to rise higher than the subdiaconate: Agath. A.D. 506, c. 1, will not allow a digamous presbyter or deacon to exercise his functions; so Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 2. (ii.) The wife of anyone who is allowed to marry must be a virgin. 1 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 398, c. 3, enacts that a reader who marries a widow cannot rise higher than the subdiaconate: 1 Turon. A.D. 461, c. 4, enacts that he must in such a case hold the lowest place on the clergy list: Agath. A.D. 506, c. 1, in compassion to those presbyters and deacons who had broken the rule, does not depose them from their office, but will not allow them to minister; but 2 Hispal. A.D. 619, c. 4, deposes deacons in a similar case without hope of restoration: 4 Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 44, orders clerks who have so offended to be separated from their wives. So also in the Decretals: S. Siric. ad Eumer. c. 11, Hinschius, p. 522; S. Innocent. ad Victoric. c. 4, ad Felic. c. 2, ad Ruf. et Euseb. c. 1, Hinschius, pp. 530, 533, 549. That it became not only the law but the usage in the West is a fair inference from the fact that the pseudo-Isidore does not even mention it in the spurious part of his collection. (d) Sexual immorality was at all times punished severely; but the canons are few in number, because the gravity of the offence was so universally recognised as to render the repetition of positive enactments unnecessary: the leading Eastern canons are Conc. Neoc. c. 1, Can. Apost. 25; but Conc. Trull. c. 4, is a remarkable indication of later Eastern usage, inasmuch as it seems to imply that a lesser punishment than deposition had come to be the rule when the woman with whom a clerk committed sin was other than a nun. The earliest Western canon is that of Elvira, c. 19, which inflicts on adulterous bishops, presbyters, and deacons the severe penalty of perpetual excommunication: much later, the Carolingian Capitularies punish an offending presbyter with scourging and two years' imprisonment on bread and water (Karlomanni Capit. A.D. 742, c. 6; Pertz, vol. i. p. 18); but the British churches were more lenient. In the sixth century an offending presbyter or deacon was punished with three years' penitence (Gildae praef. de poenit. c. 1; Haddan and Stubbs, vol. i. p. 113). Theodore's Penitential, i. 9, 1, revives the Apostolical Canon which deposes but does not excommunicate a clerk; cf. Poenit. Egb. v. 1–22, Haddan and Stubbs, vol. iii. p. 418. (c) In some cases the purity of the clerical order was further guarded by punishing clerks for the incontinence of their wives: Conc. Illib. c. 65, enacts that a clerk must put away an offending wife or be himself perpetually excommunicated; Neoc. c. 8, enacts that he must either put her away or cease to exercise his office; 1 Tolet. c. 7, empowers clerks to imprison their erring wives, and to reduce them to penitence by salutary fasting. See also the canon of Photius in reference to presbyters and deacons whose wives had been abused by barbarians, ap. Mai, Scriptt. Vett. vol. i. p. 364.

(2) Offences relating to Ecclesiastical Organization and Divine Service.—These may be divided according as they are connected with (a) the growth of the diocesan system, (b) the growth of the parochial system, (c) the establishment of ecclesiastical courts, (d) ordination, (e) divine service.

(a) It was not without a struggle that dioceses, in the modern sense of the term, were formed, and that the church officers of a particular district or province came to be regarded as an organic unity. The former of these results was chiefly due, as has been pointed out above, to the establishment of the system of synods; the latter was chiefly due to the regulations that a clerk could not be on the roll of two churches at once, and that he could not be transferred from the roll of one church to the roll of another without the consent of his former superior. The earliest enactment to this effect is Conc. Nicaen. c. 16, which laid down the rule that if any bishop appointed to office in his own church a clerk belonging to another church, the appointment (χειροτονία) should be invalid. But the fact that the rule required to be re-enacted again and again shews that it did not easily establish itself: a few years after the Council of Nicaea, the Council of Antioch (c. 3) repeated it, with the addition that the bishop who received another's clerk against his will should be liable to be punished by the synod: Can. Apost. 15 punishes a bishop in a similar case with excommunication; so Conc. Chalc. c. 20. Later on in the East, Conc. Trull. c. 17, after reciting the frequency of violations of the rule, enacts that for the future no bishop shall receive another's clerk without a dimissory letter under pain of deprivation. Still later the Nestorian synod of Patriarch John (Ebedjesu, Tract. vi. cap. 6, can. 8, ap. Mai, Scriptt. Vett. vol. x. p. 116) punishes clerks who so passed from one diocese to another with a year's suspension, and subsequent degradation to the lowest place in their order. In the West, 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 21, deposes presbyters and deacons who transfer themselves to another church: 1 Tolet. c. 12, excommunicates them, unless they are refugees from a heretical to an orthodox church: Milev. c. 15 = Cod. Eccl. Afric. c. 90 (which probably arose out of the case of Timotheus, who had been a reader of Augustine's, but was promoted to the subdiaconate at Subsana, S. August. Epist. 63 (240), Op. vol. ii. p. 231), enacted that no one should abandon the church in which he had been ordained reader: Valent. c. 5, excommunicates and deposes presbyters and deacons who do not adhere to the place assigned to them by the bishop who ordained them; 2 Hispal. c. 3, deals with the case of a clerk who, having been dedicated to the service of the church at Italica, near Seville, had fled to Cordova, and regards such clerks as being on the footing of "coloni agrorum:" 1 Turon. c. 11, 2 Arelat. c. 13, Statt. Eccl. Antiq. c. 27, allow a clerk to migrate with the consent of his bishop: so Conc. Hertford, c. 3, ap. Haddan and Stubbs, vol. iii. p. 119.

(b) It was apparently an early, if not a primitive rule, that the presbyters and deacons of a church could not ordinarily act without the bishop of that church. In the next stage of organization it was enacted that a presbyter or deacon could not detach himself from the church of which he was presbyter or deacon and set up an altar of his own (Conc. Antioch. c. 5). The next step was to provide for the cases in which monasteries or other ecclesiastical institutions were established in a city of which there was a bishop: Conc. Chalc. c. 8, following what it states to be an older tradition, subjects all such institutions to the bishop of the city; Trull. c. 31, 2 Nicaen. c. 10, do the same for private chapels. In the West, 4 Aurel. A.D. 541, c. 7, requires the clerks of "oratoria domini praediorum" to have the consent of the bishop; but the Capitularies, by repeating the rule that "all presbyters who are in a diocese (parochia) must be under the jurisdiction (potestas) of the bishop of that diocese, and must not baptize or celebrate mass without his sanction," seem to imply that the rule had been broken (Pippini Capit. Vern. dupl. c. 8; Pertz, vol. i. p. 26). The regulation that a presbyter could only celebrate the Eucharist in a place consecrated by the bishop is first found in 2 Conc. Carth. c. 9; but it does not appear to have been universally recognised, since it required re-enactment at a late date, viz. in the Liber Pontificalis, Vit. Siric. c. 2 = Decret. Synod. Silvestr. c. 9, in the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals, Hinschius, p. 450; cf. Atton. II. Vercell. Capit. c. 7, ap. D'Achery, Spicilegium, vol. i. p. 403.

(c) A third class of offences consists of those which grew out of the jurisdiction of ecclesiastical courts. The exercise of discipline by the church in ecclesiastical matters must be distinguished from its exercise of jurisdiction in civil or criminal matters. The former was inherent in the original constitution of the Christian communities; the latter was of the nature of voluntary contract. The history of both is intricate, and has yet to be fully written; it must be sufficient to mention here that while the State constantly recognised the ecclesiastical courts as courts of arbitration, and was ready to enforce their sentences when both parties had agreed to be bound by those sentences, the church on its part endeavoured in the West to compel clerks to resort in all cases to its own courts rather than to the ordinary civil courts. This is seen especially in 3 Conc. Carth. c. 9 =

Cod. Eccl. Afric. c. 15, which deposes clerks who resort to secular tribunals in criminal cases, and condemns them to lose their cause in civil cases: so in effect, Conc. Milev. c. 19 = Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 104, Agath. c. 8, 3 Tol. c. 13; and in the Capitularies, Pippini Capit. Vern. dupl. c. 18, Pertz, vol. i. p. 26. In addition to, and also in distinction from, both forms of judicial authority, the bishops came to have an independent and extra-judicial authority, which also was enforced by ecclesiastical penalties. Conc. Agath. c. 2, enacts that clerks who neglected their duty were to be corrected by their bishop; if they pertinaciously disregarded such correction, they were to be struck off the roll and deprived of their pay. Forty years later, Conc. Valent. c. 6, suspends and excommunicates clerks in similar circumstances: still later in the same century Conc. Narb. c. 10, renews the enactment. It is not clear that any of these enactments apply to presbyters, but it is probable that they so strengthened the position of the bishops of the West as to lead them to claim a similar jurisdiction over presbyters. 2 Conc. Hispal. A.D. 619, c. 6, held under Isidore of Seville, restores a presbyter who had been deposed by the sole authority of his bishop, and refers to "priscorum patrum synodalem sententiam" to shew that "episcopus sacerdotibus ac ministris [i.e., deacons] solus honorem dare potest, auferre solus non potest:" cf. Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 23.

(d) Offences relating to Ordination.—The offences which consisted in ordination out of the proper diocese have been mentioned above under (a). The chief other offence was ordination for money, i.e. simony. This was prohibited in the East by the Apostolical Canons, c. 28, under penalty of excommunication of both ordainer and ordained, by Conc. Chalc. c. 2, Trull. c. 22, 2 Nicaen. c. 5: in the West by 2 Aurel. A.D. 533, c. 4; 6 Tolet. A.D. 638, c. 4; Cabill. A.D. 650, c. 16; 4 Brac. A.D. 675, c. 8. (Of its prevalence in France at this period there are many indications besides the repetition of conciliar enactments, e.g. in the Life of S. Eligius, lib. ii. c. 1, ap. D'Achery, Spicil. vol. ii. p. 90, and in the Life of S. Romanus, ap. Martene et Durand, Anecd. vol. iv. p. 1654.) It was also prohibited by the civil law: a law of Leo and Anthemius, in 469 (Cod. Just. 1, 3, 31), punishes it with civil "infamia" as well as loss of the office; a law of Glycerius and Leo (Haenel, Corpus Legum ante Just. lat. 1226, p. 260, from Cod. Vat. Reg. 1997) mentions and reprehends the practice of giving notes of hand to be paid out of the proceeds of the office; cf. Justin. Novell. 56 and 123, c. 16, for the practice, which had grown up but which tended to be simoniacal, of giving presents to the clergy of a church at the time of ordination.

(e) Offences relating to Divine Service and the Religious Life.—i. The Apostolical Constitutions (2, 59) enjoin all the faithful, laity as well as clergy, to go to church twice every day, and the Apostolical Canons (c. 8) and Conc. Antioch. (c. 2) enact that clerks, if present, must communicate; but it appears from the civil law that clerks were rather negligent in this respect (Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 42 (41), 10; 1, 3, 52 (51)); and a century and a half later the Trullan Council thought it sufficient to punish a clerk or layman who, not being hindered from attending, absented himself from divine service for three successive Sundays. The Spanish rule, as given in 1 Conc. Tolet. c. 5, was that any clerk who was in the neighbourhood of a church must go to the daily sacrifice. The Gallican rule, as given in Conc. Venet. A.D. 465 (?), c. 14, punished with seven days' excommunication clerks who were without good excuse absent from the morning office. The Irish rule, as given in the Canons of St. Patrick, c. 7, was that a clerk who did not go morning and evening "ad collectas," was to be excommunicated, unless he were detained by the obligations of servitude ("jugo servitutis"). The North African rule was, that unless a clerk were present at vespers he should lose his pay (Statt. Eccles. Antiq. c. 49). ii. The regulations which relate to the conduct of divine service are not numerous. The Apostolical Canons (c. 3) depose a bishop or presbyter who offers upon the altar milk or honey, or birds or vegetables; or (c. 59) a clerk who reads pseudepigrapha as though they were sacred books; 3 Conc. Brac. A.D. 572, c. 10, excommunicates priests who celebrate mass without a stole on both shoulders; 13 Tolet. A.D. 683, c. 7, deposes clerks who in pique or quarrel strip the altar of its vestments or put out the church lights; Conc. Rom. A.D. 743, c. 13, under Pope Zachary, excommunicates bishops, presbyters, and deacons who celebrate mass with a staff or with covered head; the Nestorian canons of Ebedjesu (Tract. vi. can. 6, c. 2) punish a clerk who officiates without his boots. iii. It was enacted that clerks must not join in divine service with deposed clerks, or heretics, or Jews (Can. Apost. c. 11, 45, 65); or fast on the Lord's day (ib. c. 64); or fail to keep Lent (ib. c. 69); or eat flesh with the blood in it (ib. c. 63).

(3) The enactments which related to the social life of the clergy during the first four centuries have been for the most part mentioned above under (ii.). The following belong to later centuries:—in the East the Trullan Council made a series of enactments which, being for the most part repetitions of earlier enactments, shew that such earlier enactments had fallen into neglect. It provided that clerks should not be the lessors of taverns, c. 9; that they should not take usury, c. 10; that they should not wear unbecoming dress, c. 27; that they should not play with dice, c. 50; nor be concerned in stage-plays and stage-dancing, c. 50; nor keep brothels, c. 86. In North Africa it was enacted that they should wear a becoming dress (Statt. Eccles. Antiq. c. 45); that they should not waste time in walking about the streets (ib. c. 47); and that they should not sing songs at a banquet (ib. c. 62): on the other hand, they were quite at liberty to procure their livelihood by handicraft or agriculture (ib. c. 51–53). In the provincial councils of Gaul and Spain it was enacted that clerks who were engaged in trade must not sell dearer than other people (Conc. Tarrac. A.D. 516, c. 1), or drive hard bargains (3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 27); that clerks must not live with secular persons without the permission of the bishop (2 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 533, c. 9); that they must not frequent banquets at which love-songs were sung (Conc. Venet. A.D. 465, c. 11; Agath. A.D. 506, c. 39); nor sing or dance at banquets (Conc. Autissiod. A.D. 578 (?), c. 40); nor be drunk (Conc. Venet. c. 13, Agath. c. 41); nor bear arms (Conc.

Ilerd. A.D. 523, c. 1); nor keep hunting dogs or hawks (Conc. Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 4; cf. Conc. Forojul. A.D. 796, c. 3; Capit. Generale, A.D. 789, c.15, Pertz, vol. i. p. 69, which adds "jesters" to the list of prohibitions; Hettonis Basil. Capit. 11). In Ireland almost the only social regulation which is contained in the Canons of St. Patrick is that if a clerk becomes surety for a "gentile," and "quod mirum non est," if the gentile cheats the clerk, the clerk must pay his bond, or if he fights the gentile instead, must be excommunicated (Can. S. Patric. c. 8); the later collection of Irish canons repeats the enactments of the Statt. Eccles. Antiq. (see Wasserschleben, die Irische Kanonensammlung, p. 33, &c.). In England the penitentials of Bede, Egbert, and Theodore combine to afford conclusive evidence that the chief social offence against which provision had to be made was drunkenness: there is, perhaps, no more degrading picture of the state of the clergy at any period of the history of the church than that which these penitentials present (e.g., Poenit. Theodor. i. 1, 4, ap. Wasserschleben, Bussordnung der abendl. Kirch. p. 182 sqq., and Haddan and Stubbs, vol. i.).

B. The punishments by which the observance of disciplinary rules was enforced were various; the most important were the several forms of excommunication, degradation, and deposition.

(1) Excommunication.—(a) Temporary: The simplest mode of enforcing obedience was to suspend a clerk from all the privileges of church membership so long as he was recalcitrant (ἀφορίζεσθαι, Can. Apost. passim; ἀκοινώνητος εἶναι, Conc. Nicaen. c. 16; "a communione alienus haberi," 2 Conc. Arelat. c. 3, 1 Turon. c. 3). This did not in early times imply more than that the offending clerk could not remain with the faithful to participate in the communion, and that he consequently lost his share in the offerings. It was a corollary of this sentence that he could not exercise his office (hence Mabillon, Mus. Ital. vol. ii. p. 7, explains the phrase "archiaraphonista [i.e., archicantor] a pontifice excommunicabitur," by "ab officio suspendetur"). Sometimes the period during which a clerk should remain excommunicated was expressed in the canon: e.g. a year (Conc. Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 15; 2 Turon. A.D. 567, c. 19; Narbon. A.D. 589, c. 10); three months (11 Tolet. A.D. 675, c. 8). But more commonly the time was not specified, it being understood that submission would be followed by re-admission to full status. The Apostolical Canons, however, contain a stipulation that the bishop who re-admits a clerk must be the same bishop, if still living, who had excommunicated him (C. A. 28, where Balsamon adds that even if the bishop had died, his place in this respect could only be taken by his successor, or the metropolitan, or the patriarch). In time, and especially in the West, this form of punishment became more severe than it had originally been. A canon of the fifth (?) century, which claims for itself the authority of earlier canons, separates an excommunicated clerk not only from communion but also from all Christian society ("a totius populi colloquio atque convivio") until he submits: so also in the Canons of St. Patrick, c. 28; and even more stringently in the Capitularies (Pippini Capit. Vern. dupl. A.D. 755, c. 9, Pertz, vol. i. p. 26 = Conc. Vern., Mansi, xii. 577; Capit. Ticin. A.D. 801, c. 17, Pertz, vol. i. p. 85). (b) Permanent: For some offences a clerk was permanently ejected from church membership (ἐξωθεῖσθαι τέλεον καὶ ἄγεσθαι εἰς μετάνοιαν, Conc. Neoc. c. 1; βίπτεσθαι ἐκ τῆς ἐκκλησίας, Laod. c. 36; παντάπασιν ἐκκόπτεσθαι τῆς ἐκκλησίας, Can. Apost. 28). This involved complete loss of status; re-admission was only possible through the door of formal and public penitence. Even this was in some cases denied (hence 1 Conc. Araus. A.D. 441, c. 4, "poenitentiam desiderantibus clericis non negandum"), and in the earliest of Western provincial councils the door was shut by express enactment of the canon itself ("nec in fine [sc. in articulo mortis] accipere communionem," Conc. Illib. c. 2, 19; but it may be noted that this severe form of sentence does not appear to have been repeated by later councils).

(2) Suspension and Degradation.—Of these there were several forms and degrees: (a) a presbyter might be suspended from the function of offering the Eucharistic sacrifice, but not from other functions (Conc. Neoc. c. 1); (b) a clerk might be suspended from the exercise of the functions of his office, but retain his rank (Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 43; Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 2; Trull. c. 26: so also S. Basil, Epist. ii. ad Amphiloch. c. 27, id. Epist. iii. ad Amphiloch. c. 70); (c) a clerk might lose his seniority and be placed last on the clergy roll (1 Conc. Turon. A.D. 461, c. 4; Trull. c. 7; 2 Nicaen. c. 5); (d) a clerk might be degraded to a lower order (1 Conc. Tolet. c. 4); (e) a clerk might be cut off from the hope of promotion (Conc. Tauron. A.D. 401, c. 8; 1 Tolet. c. 1; 1 Araus. c. 24; Andegav. A.D. 461, c. 2; Ilerd. c. 1, 5; Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 54; so also S. Basil, Epist. iii. ad Amphiloch. c. 69); (f) a clerk might be deprived of his stipend (3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 7; Narb. A.D. 589, c. 11, 13). (This, which was probably one of the chief effects of excommunication in early times, was retained as a separate and minor punishment, when excommunication came to carry with it greater penalties.)

(3) Deposition.—This was sometimes more and sometimes less than excommunication. In the earliest times it does not seem to have involved more than the reducing of an officer to the ranks in the army. This is implied in the phrases by which deposition is designated: πεπαῦσθαι τῆς τάξεως, Conc. Ancyr. c. 10, 14; καθαιρεῖσθαι τῆς τάξεως, Neoc. 1; καθ. τοῦ κλήρου, Nicaen. c. 17; καθ. τῆς λειτουργίας, 1 Antioch. c. 3; καθαιρεῖσθαι absolutely, Ephes. c. 4, Can. Apost. passim; ἐκπίπτειν τοῦ βάθμου, Ephes. c. 2, Chalc. c. 27; ἀλλότριος τῆς ἀξίας εἶναι, Chalc. c. 2; ἔξω τοῦ κλήρου καθίστασθαι, Cod. Justin. I, 3, 40 (39), 10; "amoveri," Conc. Illib. c. 30; "ab ordine cleri amoveri," 1 Arelat. c. 13; "degradari," Conc. Illib. c. 20; "ab officio degradari," Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 56; "deponi," Illib. c. 51; "a clero deponi," Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 68; "ab ecclesiastico removeri officio," Cod. Eccl. Afric. c. 25; "locum amittere," 2 Conc. Carth. c. 8; "ab imposite officio repelli," 1 Araus. c. 16; "honore proprio privari," Milev. c. 19. The person so removed from office was for the future a layman: his place in church was no longer on the raised steps or seats; he had no longer a voice in the administration of discipline; and he had no longer the larger share of the offerings which fell to the several grades of officers. This is sometimes expressly stated: e.g., Justin. Novell. vi. 5, τὸ λοιπὸν ἰδιώτης ἔστω; S. Basil, Epist. i. ad Amphiloch. c. 3, εἰς τὸν λαϊκῶν ἀνωσθεὶς τάπον; Conc. Trull. c. 21, ἐν τῷ τῶν λαϊκῶν ἀνωθούμενοι τόπῳ; 3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 2, "laica communione contentus ab officio deponatur;" 2 Turon. A.D. 667, c. 19, "depositus ab omni officio clericali inter laicos se observare cognoscat" (but with permission to sit among the readers in the choir). There is no trace of the recognition in early canon law of the opinion which afterwards came to prevail, that a person so deposed was still in posse what he had been before; and that the repeal of the sentence of deposition would restore him at once to all the privileges and powers of his lost place. On the contrary, even so late as the seventh century, and even in cases where the deposition was found to be unjust, re-ordination was necessary ("non potest esse quod fuerat nisi gradus amissos recipiat coram altario," 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 28). One of the earliest instances of the later opinion is in the Capit. Vernense of Pippin, A.D. 753, Pertz, vol. i. p. 23, which allows a degraded presbyter to baptize in cases of extreme emergency. The addition of excommunication to deposition was in early times a separate and cumulative punishment; the Apostolical Canons, c. 24, maintain that the former is sufficient without the latter, even in cases of theft or perjury, on the ground that a man must not be punished twice for the same offence. They allow them to be combined only in the case of simony (c. 28; the interpretation of c. 64, which apparently visits with the same double punishment those who associate with Jews and heretics, is not certain: cf. Balsamon and Zonaras ad loc.).

(4) Other Punishments.—(a) In the sixth century, when the practice of appointing very young persons to minor orders began to prevail, it was sometimes enacted that "juniores clerici" who transgressed the canons should be whipped (Conc. Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 15; 1 Matisc. A.D. 581, c. 8; Narbon. A.D. 589, c. 13; 11 Tolet. A.D. 675, c. 8). The fourth Council of Braga, which is of the same date as the last-mentioned council, goes so far as to allow presbyters to be scourged for grave offences, but discourages the practice which some bishops seem to have had of beating their clergy themselves. So also in the following century a presbyter who commits a sin of the flesh is to be scourged, "flagellatus et scorticatus," before being imprisoned (Karloman. Capit. A.D. 742, c. 6; Pertz, vol. i. p. 17). The civil law recognises the same mode of punishment for clerks below the grade of deacons (Justin. Novell. 123, c. 20; cf. Cod. 1, 3, 8). (b) When the monastic system began to prevail, clerks were sometimes punished by being secluded in a monastery: e.g., Conc. Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 22; 3 Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 7; 4 Tol. A.D. 633, c. 29, 45; 8 Tol. A.D. 653, c. 7. So also in the civil law: Justin. Novell. c. 11, substitutes this punishment for that of banishment, which had been imposed nearly a century and a half earlier by a law of Arcadius and Honorius (Cod. Theodos. xvi. 2, 35). It was sometimes further enacted that clerks who were thus secluded should be confined in solitary cells and fed on bread and water (2 Conc. Turon. A.D. 567, c. 19; 1 Matisc. A.D. 581, c. 8), and that they should be subject to the abbat (Narbon. A.D. 589, c. 6). [E. H.]

ORDERS (Monastic). [Monastery, p. 1229.]

ORDINAL. It is proposed in the present article to give a brief account of the books which contain the early forms of ordination in both East and West. There is no ancient term for such books. The most usual Western term is Pontificale; but on the one hand, the word does not appear until the close of the middle ages, and on the other hand, it is too wide for the present purpose, inasmuch as the books so designated contain not only forms of ordination, but also forms for all offices, e.g. the consecration of churches, in which the presence of a bishop had come to be required. For Pontificale Sicard of Cremona in the 12th century (Mai, Spic. Rom. vol. vi. p. 583, Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. ccxv.) substitutes Mitrale, but this latter word does not seem to have obtained general currency. Ordinale was in earlier use, but with a different meaning. Ralph Higden (Polychronicon, lib. 7, c. 3) speaks of a "librum ordinalem ecclesiastici officii quem consuetudinarium vocant," as belonging to Osmund of Salisbury circ. A.D. 1077; but in the Gesta Abbatum S. Albani, ed. Riley, p. 58, "ordinalibus, consuetudinariis, missalibus" are enumerated separately among the books given to the abbey by abbat Paul, A.D. 1077–1093; an ordinarius liber or ordinarium is mentioned in a charter of St. Wulfran's church at Abbeville in A.D. 1208; it was a book of directions, specifying "quid et quando et quomodo cantandum sit vel legendum, chorus regendus, campanae pulsandae, luminare accendendum," &c. But it has been supposed that there were different ordinaria for the several classes of ministers, and that the ordinarium episcopale was the same as the pontificale. In the absence, therefore, of any precise ancient term, the information in question has been placed under the present heading, as being more expressive than any other to modern English readers.

I. Western Ordinals.—It is not possible in the present state of knowledge to lay down many general propositions in respect to early Western ordinals. The earlier MSS. of those which are known to exist do not appear to have been carefully examined by any scholar of eminence since the time of Muratori, and some of those which have been published, and which are mentioned below as belonging to a certain date, are found on examination to be composite MSS., i.e. MSS. of clearly distinguishable and sometimes widely separated dates, which have accidentally been bound up together. Consequently, almost all facts in relation to ordination which are assigned to certain dates on the authority of printed editions of the several MSS. are liable to correction. It is, moreover, probable that many MSS. remain still unexamined, and that much light may be thrown upon early ecclesiastical usages by fresh discoveries. The following accounts will be confined to those which have been printed: nor even in the case of those which have been specially examined for the purposes of this work will there be any discussion, which must necessarily be elaborate and lengthy, of their origin or approximate date. But even with this limitation it is clear that the printed ordinals belong to several distinct types, and that the type which ultimately survived, and which, being retained in the mediæval service-books, has come down to modern times in the Roman and Anglican ordinals, was not the earliest even of those which still remain.

1. Among the earliest of the remaining types is that which is printed by Mabillon (Museum Italicum, vol. ii. 85) as Ordo Romanus viii. It contains short forms for the ordination of acolytes, subdeacons, deacons and presbyters, and a longer form for the ordination of a bishop.

2. Another type of great antiquity, but whether earlier or later than the preceding is not at present clear, is that which was first printed by Hittorp, de Divinis Catholicæ Ecclesiæ Officiis, Cologne, 1568, p. 88, col. 1 and part of col. 2. This is distinctively Roman, as is shewn by the direction that the pope and clergy are to go in procession from the church of St. Adrian to that of St. Maria in Praesepe. It is important, as separating election from admission to office (i.e. ordination in its later sense) by an interval of two days. It gives no form of either prayer or benediction, and it is confined to presbyters and deacons. It was printed again by Mabillon from a St. Gall MS. (Mus. Ital. vol. ii.) as Ordo Romanus ix. and by Martene (de Antiq. Eccl. Rit. vol. ii.) from a MS. of the Benedictine Abbey of the Trinity at Vendome, also as Ordo ix.; both these editors add to what Hittorp had published an order for the benediction of a bishop; and Mabillon, not Martene, gives an order respecting the four seasons, which is not in accordance with the preceding part of the MS., and is probably a remnant of a distinct rite; this last part is also printed from MSS. at Zurich and Einsiedeln by Gerbert (Monum. Liturg. Alemann. vol. ii. 38; cf. id. Liturg. Alemann. disquis. V. c. 4, vol. ii. 494).

3. Another type of great antiquity, and one which is possibly earlier than either of the two preceding, is that which occurs as a preface or preliminary rubric to the ritual of the ordination of deacons and presbyters in some of the later ordinals (for which see below), viz. Sacram. Gelas. i. c. 20, Missale Francorum, Cod. Maff. ap. Muratori, Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Rodrad, Catalani, Ord. ii. It is remarkable as giving no forms of benediction, nor any mention of vestments, and for the retention of the primitive custom of making the oblations to the bishop himself at the Eucharist, and receiving them back from him when consecrated.

4. The older MSS. of the sacramentaries contain prayers which might have been combined with any of the rituals hitherto mentioned.

(a) That which is known as the Leonine Sacramentary contains prayers without rubrical directions, to be used in (1) the consecration of a bishop, (2) the benediction of a deacon, (3) the consecration of a presbyter. The Veronese MS. which contains the sacramentary is assigned to the 10th century. The authorship of the sacramentary is absolutely uncertain; various conjectures will be found (1) in the preface to the original edition of the work by Bianchini in his edition of Anastasius, vol. iv. Rome, 1735 (whose ascription of it to Leo the Great was withdrawn later in life according to Gerbert, Vet. Liturg. Alem. vol. i. p. 80); (2) in Muratori's Dissertatio de Rebus liturgicis, c. iii. prefixed to his edition of it in his Liturgia Romana Vetus, vol. i. The text will be found not only in the above-mentioned volumes of Bianchini and Muratori, but also in the Ballerini edition of St. Leo M. vol. ii. p. 110 sqq. (reprinted in Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. lx. p. 113 sqq.).

(b) The older MSS. of that which is known as the Gregorian Sacramentary also contain prayers, without a ritual, to be used at the ordination of bishops, presbyters, and deacons. The chief of these older MSS. are (1) one in the Imperial Library at Vienna (No. 1815. 5; formerly Theol. 149), which is described by Lambecius (Bibl. Cæsar. t. ii. c. 5, p. 299) (who supposed, but wrongly, that it was the copy which Hadrian I. presented to Charles the Great), and by Denis (Codd. MSS. Theol. B. P. t. i. pars iii. p. 3032); (2) a Vatican codex, which, with a collation of (3) a codex in the Ottoboni Library, was printed by Muratori (Lit. Rom. Vet. vol. ii.), in which edition the several prayers will be found on pp. 882, 918, 1064.

(c) The MS. which was published by Cardinal Tomasi in 1680 from a MS. of Queen Christina of Sweden, and which since, though its ascription to Gelasius is generally repudiated, has been known as the Gelasian Sacramentary, contains two sets of directions and prayers for ordinations: the one (lib. i. c. 20–23) corresponds to some extent with the Leonine Sacramentary, the other (lib. i. c. 95–99) with the ordinals mentioned below. The text will be found in Tomasi (reprinted in Daniel, Codex Liturgicus, vol. i. p. 208), in Muratori (Liturg. Rom. Vet. vol. ii.); and in Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. lxxiv.

5. The type which ultimately prevailed and which, after the analogy of the sacramentary to which it is usually appended, may be called the Gregorian, is more elaborate, and therefore probably later than the types mentioned above. The most important of the MSS. which have been published, and which can therefore be compared together without great difficulty, are the following: (1) Missale Francorum: a MS. found by Morin in the library of A. Petau at Paris, afterwards bought by queen Christina of Sweden, and now in the Vatican. It is supposed by Morin, on internal evidence, to have been written for the use of the church of Poitiers, and is ascribed by him to the 6th century, between A.D. 511 and 560. Mabillon, who first gave it the name by which it is now known, thinks that it represents the prevalent Frankish ritual, but ascribes it to the 7th century; either date places it earlier than the MS. of any existing Western ordinal, although the type which it embodies is probably later than several of those which have been mentioned above. It contains the ritual for the ordination of doorkeeper, acolyte, reader, exorcist, subdeacon, deacon, presbyter, bishop, virgin and widow. The text is given in Morin, de Sacris Ecclesiæ Ordinationibus, p. 261; Mabillon, Liturg. Gall. lib. iii. p. 301; Muratori, Liturgia Romana Vetus, vol. iii. p. 439. (2) Codex Remensis: a MS. formerly belonging to the abbey of St. Remigius at Reims, printed by Morin, p. 290. (3) Codex S. Eligii: a MS. probably of the 9th century, once in the abbey of Corbey; in Morin's time in the library of St. Germain-aux-Prés, now in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris (No. 12,051). This MS. forms the basis of Ménard's text (Paris, 1642), and also of the Benedictine text (S. Greg. M. Op. vol. iv.), of the Gregorian Sacramentary; the portion which contains the ordinal is printed by Morin, p. 270; for an account of its date see Ménard's preface, and Muratori de Rebus Liturg. c. v. in his Liturg. Rom. Vet. vol. i. p. 110. (4) Pontificale Egberti: which represents the English use, probably of the 8th century, and was published from a Paris MS. of the 10th century by the Surtees Society in 1853 (edited by Mr. Greenwell). (5) Codex Rodradi: a MS. formerly belonging to the abbey of Corbey, dated A.D. 853, and now in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris (No. 12,050); it is compiled with great care, and its compiler gives evidence in his preface of having possessed a critical spirit, which was in advance of his time, and which gives the MS. a high value; it is printed by Morin, p. 278. (6) Codices Vaticani: many MSS. are mentioned in the catalogues, but only three are known to have been published, (a) one of no specified date by Rocca in S. Greg. M. Op. vol. vii. Rome, 1593, and again by Morin, p. 275; (b) one of the 10th century by Muratori, Lit. Rom. Vet. vol. iii. p. 26; (c) one of much later date by Catalani, Pontificale Romanum, append. ad p. 1, tit. 12, Ord. iii. (7) Pontificale S. Dunstani: an English MS. of the 10th century, now in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris, published by Martene, Ord. iii. (8) Codex Coloniensis: of the 9th century, now in the Cathedral Library at Cologne (No. cxxxvii.), which formed the basis of the edition of Pamelius, Missale SS. Patrum Latinorum, sive Liturgicon Latinum, Cologne, 1571. (9) Codex Gemmaticensis or Lanaletensis: a MS. ascribed by Montfaucon to the 7th or 8th century, apparently of English origin, afterwards belonging to the Monasterium Lanaletense (i.e. Llan Alet, near St. Malo, in Brittany); cf. Mabillon, Ann. Benedict. tom. iv. p. 461, afterwards belonging to the abbey of Jumiéges, but now in the public library at Rouen (No. A 27); published by Martene together with the Pontif. S. Dunst., with which it agrees almost entirely; see Gage, Archaeologia, vol. xxv. p. 235, who gives an account of it, and ascribes it at the earliest to the end of the 10th century. (10) Codex Rotomagensis: commonly known as archbishop Robert's pontifical; now at Rouen, but of English origin; sometimes ascribed to the 8th century, but supposed by Gage, Archaeologia, vol. xxiv., to have been written for Aethelgar, archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 989; see Frere, Bibliothèque de la Ville de Rouen, p. 50; published by Morin, p. 282. (11) Codex Gellonensis: ascribed to the 8th century; formerly belonging to the Benedictine abbey of St. Guilfem du Désert, afterwards to St. Germain-aux-Prés at Paris, but now in the Bibliothèque Nationale (No. 12,048); published by Martene, Ord. iv. (12) Codex Ratoldi: so called because of its mention of the abbat Ratold, †986; formerly at Corbey, but now in the Bibliothèque Nationale (No. 12,052); published by Morin, p. 298. (13) Codices Noviodunenses: i.e. of Noyon in Picardy; (a) three MSS. ascribed to the 8th century and published by Martene, Ord. iv.; (b) a MS. sometimes known as Codex Radbodi, ascribed to the 9th century and published by Martene, Ord. vi.; (c) a MS. of the 13th century, published by Martene, Ord. xv. (14) Codex Suessionensis: a Soissons MS. of the 11th century, published by Martene, Ord. vii. (15) Codex Caturicensis, i.e. of Cahors: ascribed to the 8th century, and published by Martene, Ord. v. (16) Codex Bisuntinus: formerly at Besançon, but now at Tours (Montfaucon, vol. ii. p. 1274); it is ascribed to the 11th century, and is published by Martene, Ord. x. (17) Codices Beccenses: two MSS. formerly belonging to the abbey of Le Bec, in Normandy; both of the 12th century; published by Martene, Ord. xi. xii. (18) Codex Senonensis: a Sens MS. of the time of Louis the Pious; published by Morin, p. 294. (19) Codex Bellovacensis: a Beauvais MS., written about A.D. 1000 and published by Morin, p. 327. (20) Codex S. Victoris: a MS. of the 12th century, formerly belonging to the abbey of St. Victor at Paris; published by Morin, p. 329. (21) Codices Moguntini: (a) a Mainz MS. of the 13th century, now in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris; published by Martene, Ord. xvi.; (b) a Mainz MS. ascribed by Morin to the same period, but differing from the former in important particulars; partly published by Morin, p. 336. (22) Codex Salisburgensis: a Salzburg MS. ascribed to the 11th century published by Martene, Ord. viii. (23) Codex Massiacensis: an early and important MS., the history of which is not known; published by Muratori, vol iii. p. 45. (24) Codex Caietanus: a MS. which agrees in many points with the preceding; supposed by Morin to be an Italian, not Roman, ordinal of about the 10th century, and published by him, p. 313. (25) Codex Landolfi: so called from its having belonged to a bishop of Capua of that name in the 9th century; published by Catalani, Pontificale Romanum, append. ad p. i. tit. 12, Ord. i. (26) Codex Barensis: a MS. probably of the 13th century, giving the use of the joint diocese of Bari and Canusium; published by Catalani, ibid. Ord. ii. (27) English Ordinals. Maskell's Monumenta Ritualia, vol. iii. contains an edition of the ordinal according to the use of Sarum from a Cambridge MS. of the 15th century (according to Maskell, ibid. vol. i. p. l, but of the 13th century according to the Cambridge catalogue, No. 1347) with a collation of the Winchester Pontifical (also at Camb. Univ. Library, No. 921) of the 12th century, the Bangor Pontifical (at Bangor) of the 14th century, and bishop Lacey's Exeter Pontifical of the 14th century (since published separately by Mr. Barnes, Exeter, 1847). The only other English ordinals which are known to the present writer to have been published are (1) Cardinal Bainbridge's York Pontifical, in the Cambridge University Library, which was edited by Dr. Henderson for the Surtees Society in 1875; (2) a Sarum Pontifical of the 11th century in the British Museum (Tiberius, c. i.), published by Mr. Chambers, Divine Worship in England in the XIII. XIV. and XIX. Centuries, London, 1878.

Of unpublished and uncollated Pontificals there are many; some are mentioned in the list given by Zaccaria, Bibliotheca Ritualis, vol. i. p. 164; but the catalogues of most great libraries supply instances of others. The most important of unpublished English Pontificals is probably that which is contained in Leofric's Exeter Missal in the Bodleian Library, a MS. of various dates, one part of it containing the date A.D. 969.

II. Eastern Ordinals: 1. Greek.—The earliest

Greek ordinal, the date of which is extremely obscure, but which probably represents a primitive type, is that which is contained in the eighth book of the Apostolical Constitutions, and which prescribes the ritual for the ordination of bishops, presbyters, deacons, deaconesses, subdeacons, and readers. (The best modern texts are those of Lagarde, Const. Apost. Leipzig, 1862, and of Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Graecorum Hist. et Mon. vol. i. pp. 45–75.)

ii. Next in importance is the ritual which is given, interwoven with a mystical explanation, by St. Dionysius Areopagita de ecclesiastica Hierarchia, c. v., which should be compared with the scholia of St. Maximus, and the paraphrase of George Pachymeres, both of which are usually printed with it. (The text will be found in Migne, Patr. Graec. vol. ii.; and Morin, de Sacr. Ordin. p. 52.)

iii. The later ordinals seem to have taken their final shape in the course of the 8th and 9th centuries; they have not yet been thoroughly investigated, but the differences between the MSS. which have hitherto been collated are considerably less than those which are found between the Pontificals of the Gregorian type in the Western church. The chief MSS. are the following: (1) Codex Barberini, of the 9th century, formerly in St. Mark's Library at Florence; printed by Morin, vol. i. p. 64; J. A. Asseman, Cod. Liturg. Eccles. Univ. vol. xi. p. 103. (2) Codex Bessarion: of the 10th century, given by a Cretan presbyter to cardinal Julian at the council of Florence; afterwards in possession of cardinal Bessarion, who gave it to the monastery of Crypta Ferrata, near Rome, of which he was abbat; printed by Morin, i. p. 74, J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 125. (3) Codex Paris: not earlier than the 14th century; in the Bibliothèque Nationale; printed by Morin, vol. i. p. 83; J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 147. (4) Codex S. Andr. Vall.: of uncertain date, in the library of the church of St. Andrea Vallensis at Rome; printed by Morin, vol. i. p. 91, J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 166. (5) Codices Vat.: one of the 12th century, containing the offices for the ordination of reader, singer, subdeacon, deacon, deaconess, the other containing those for presbyter, bishop, abbat; printed by Morin, vol. i. p. 97, J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 179. (6) Codex Leo Allat.: of much more recent date, and possibly more Syrian than Greek; printed by Morin, vol. i. p. 104, J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 196. The other editions of the ordinals are less precise in stating the MSS. authorities upon which they are based; the chief of them are Habert's Ἀρχιερατικόν, Liber Pontificalis Eccl. Graecae, Paris, 1643, and Goar's Εὐχολόγιον, sive Rituale Graecorum, Paris, 1647 (the notes to which are valuable). A convenient edition for general reference, but useless for scientific inquiry, is that which is contained in Daniel's Codex Liturgicus, vol. iv. fasc. ii. Leipzig, 1853.

iv. Coptic.—The Coptic ordinal, which may be presumed to retain the chief traditions of the later church of Alexandria, was first published in its present form by Gabriel, son of Tarik, patriarch of Alexandria, in 1141. It has been printed in the West from several different MSS. which do not materially differ: (1) The greater part of it was first translated into Latin by father Kircher, from a MS. which was sent to the Propaganda, and published by Bartold Nihulius at Cologne in 1653, in the Συμμικτά of Leo Allatius; this was reprinted by Morin, de Sacr. Ordin. (2) The offices for the ordination of a bishop, metropolitan, and patriarch, which had been omitted by Kircher, were printed by Renaudot, Liturg. Oriental. vol. i. from a Paris MS. and the office for a patriarch also from Ebnassal, Epitome Canonum, A.D. 1239, and from Abulbireat Lampas tenebrarum, saec. xiv. (3) A later version from other Paris MSS. is given by Vansleb, Histoire de l'Église d'Alexandrie, Paris, 1677, p. 4, sect. 2. (4) J. S. Asseman translated the offices for a reader, subdeacon, deacon, presbyter, and bishop from a Vatican MS., and published them in his Dissertazione dell' origine dei Copti, &c. 1733, which was reprinted by Mai, Script. Vet. vol. v. pars ii. § 5. An orthodox Copt, Raphael Tuki, published in 1761, under the auspices of the Propaganda, an edition of both the euchologion and the pontifical from MSS. which he found at Rome; a Latin version of this is published, with a collation of other editions, in Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium, vol. ii. Würtzburg, 1864.

iii. Jacobite.—The ordinal of the Jacobite Syrians, which probably retains the main features of that of the church of Antioch, is said to have been arranged by Michael the Great about A.D. 1190. It has been published in three forms, between which there are considerable differences. (1) By Morin in Syriac and Latin; (2) by Renaudot, Perpetuité de la Foi de l'Église Catholique from a MS. in the Grand Ducal Library at Florence. (3) It is also found as a collation with the Nestorian ordinal in J. S. Asseman, Bibliotheca Orientalis, vol. iii. p. 2. Probably older than any of these ordinals in their present form are the canonical directions which are given by Gregory Abulfaradsch (Bar-Hebraeus), who in the 13th century formed a collection of canons, a Latin version of which by J. A. Asseman is published in Mai, Script. Vett. Nov. Coll. vol. x. pars ii.

iv. Maronite.—The Maronite ordinal so nearly resembles the Jacobite ordinal as to have been sometimes identified with it. It was first printed by Morin, but imperfectly, inasmuch as the MS. which he used was a Diaconicon and not a full Pontifical. It has since been fully printed (1) by J. A. Asseman, Cod. Liturg. vol. ix. x. from a collation of ancient MSS. supplied by a Maronite patriarch; (2) by Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium, vol. ii., who has reprinted Asseman's text, with the addition of a collation of some important materials which had been left in MS. by Renaudot.

v. Nestorian.—The Nestorian ordinal ascribes to itself a higher antiquity than any of the other Oriental ordinals. It bears the names of the patriarchs Marabas I. †552, and Jesujab †660 of Cyprian, bishop of Nisibis, fl. 767, and of Gabriel, metropolitan of Bussorah, circ. 884. It has been printed (1) by Morin from a Vatican MS. in both Syriac and Latin, the Latin version being however to some extent untrustworthy; (2) by J. S. Asseman, Bibliotheca Orientalis, vol. iii. p. 2, from the same and other Vatican MSS., but with an amended Latin version; (3) by J. A. Asseman, Cod. Liturg. vol. xiii.; (4) by G. P. Badger, The Nestorians and their Rituals, London, 1852, from MSS. which differ in many, but comparatively unimportant, points from those which were used by the two Assemans; (5) by Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium, vol. ii., who has reprinted both the text of the Assemans and that of Badger. [E. H.]

ORDINARY OF THE MASS. The definition of ordinarium (-ius) is liber continens ordinem divini officii. In reference to the Mass this would imply the fixed framework of the service into which the variable parts, proper to the day or season, are fitted, and by popular usage is taken to mean the whole of the service, except the canon. I. Names for Ordination.

The Greek and Latin words which were used to express either the whole or part of the series of processes which in English are commonly grouped together under the word ordination, are so numerous and so significant as to throw considerable light upon the conception which was entertained as to the nature of the processes themselves. It is therefore necessary to treat of them with some minuteness of detail. i. Some of them are words which were in ordinary use to denote civil elections or appointments; ii. Others are ordinary words for promotion to dignity; iii. Others express only the fact that a person was ranked in the κλῆρος or ordo; iv. Others connote a special sacredness in the office itself, and the performance of sacred rites in admission to it.

i. Words denoting appointment or election: (1) χειροτονεῖν (χειροτονία): this word is used (a) in the New Testament, Acts xiv. 23, χειροτονήσαντες δὲ αὐτοῖς κατ' ἐκκλησίαν πρεσβυτέρους: 2 Cor. viii. 19 (of Titus), χειροτονηθεὶς ὑπὸ τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν; (b) in subapostolic Greek, St. Ignat. ad Philad. c. 10; (c) in the Clementines, Clement. Epist. ad Jacob. c. 2; (d) in the Apostolical Constitutions, e.g. 2, 2, 27; 7, 46; and the Apostolical Canons, e.g. 2, 36; (e) in the Canon Law, e. g. Conc. Ancyr. A.D. 314, c. 13: Neocaes. A.D. 315, c. 3: Nicaen. A.D. 325, c. 16, 19: Antioch, A.D. 341, c. 2; (f) in the Civil Law, e.g. Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 42 (41), § 9; Novell. Justin. 6, c. 4. Its meaning was originally "to elect," but it came afterwards to mean, even in classical Greek, simply "to appoint to office," without itself indicating the particular mode of appointment (cf. Schömann, de Comitiis, p. 122). That the latter was its ordinary meaning in Hellenistic Greek, and consequently in the first ages of church history, is clear from a large number of instances: e.g. in Josephus, Ant. 6, 13, 9, it is used of the appointment of David as king by God, id. 13, 2, 2, of the appointment of Jonathan as high priest by Alexander: in Philo, 2, 76, it is used of the appointment of Joseph as governor by Pharaoh: in Lucian, de morte Peregrini, c. 41, of the appointment of ambassadors: in inscriptions, e.g. Le Bas et Waddington, No. 42, of the appointment of municipal officers; and so also of civil appointments in ecclesiastical writers, e.g. in Sozomen, H. E. 7, 24, of the appointment of Arcadius as Augustus by Theodosius; in Isidore of Pelusium, Epist. 2, 264, of the appointment of military officers. In later times a new connotation appears, of which there is no early trace; it was used of the stretching out of the bishop's hands in the rite of imposition of hands. But the 12th century canonist who affirms this to be the contemporary meaning, admits also that the word was used in earlier times in reference to election (Zonaras, ad Can. Apost. 1). About a century later the earlier meaning so completely passed away, that Balsamon in his commentary on the same passage of the Apostolical Canons, contradicts Zonaras by denying its existence. (For the ultimate identification of χειροτονεῖν and χειροθετεῖν, see below.) (2), καθιστάνειν (κατάστασις): this is the most common word. It is first found in Clem. R. 1, 42 (of the Apostles), καθίστανον τὰς ἀπαρχὰς αὐτῶν . . . . εἰς ἐπισκόπους καὶ δ., and it is afterwards found in all classes of ecclesiastical literature: e.g. Clement. Hom. 3, 64: Διατ. Κλήμ., 17; St. Iren. adv. Haer. 3, 2, 3: Conc. Ancyr. c. 10, 18, Nicaen. c. 4, Sardic. c. 11, 15, Laod. c. 11, Chalc. c. 2: Const. Apost. 2, 1: Euseb. H. E 2, 1: Socrat. H. E. 1, 9: S. Athanas. Hist. Arian. c. 75, p. 308. It is the ordinary classical and Hellenistic word for appointment, without any religious or ecclesiastical connotation. (3), προχειρίζεσθαι (προχείρισις): e.g. Const. Apost. 6, 23, εἰς ἱερωσύνην: id. 7, 31, ἐπισκόπους καὶ πρεσβυτέρους καὶ διακόνους: Conc. Nicaen.

c. 10; Socrat. H. E. 1, 9; 2, 6; 7, 2; Euseb. H. E. 2, 1: Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 48 (47). The word is common in later classical Greek in the sense of "to elect," e.g. Polyb. 3, 97, 2: 6, 58, 4. Lucian, Toxar. c. 10; and this is sometimes its meaning in ecclesiastical Greek: but its more usual meaning in ecclesiastical Greek is "to propose a name for election," as is clearly shewn, e.g. by Socrat. H. E. 1, 9: προχειρίζεσθαι ἢ ὑποβάλλειν ὀνόματα (in the synodical letter of the council of Nicaea), id. 2, 6, where it is co-ordinated with σπεύδειν = "favere": in later Greek this became its ordinary meaning, e.g. Nicetas Paphlag. Vit. S. Ignat. Constant. ap. Migne, P. G. vol. cv. 501, says "many having been proposed for election (προχειριζομένων), but some having failed of their object for one reason, some for another": cf. the notes of H. Valois to Euseb. Vit. Constant. iii. c. 62, and of Hase to Leo Diaconus, Hist. vi. 6. An instance of its use in this sense in secular Greek occurs in an inscription at Corycus in Cilicia, ap. Le Bas et Waddington, No. 1421. (4) προβάλλεσθαι: e.g. Conc. Chalc. c. 2; Socrat. H. E. 2, 37, 42: 5, 8, 21: 6, 11: in its classical sense of "to propose a name for election," and hence almost identical with προχειρίζεσθαι. (5) ὁρίζεσθαι: 1 Conc. Antioch. c. 17: probably from its use in the New Testament, e.g. Acts, 17, 31. (6) constituere: e.g. St. Cypr. Epist. 24: 49: 65, 3: in clerico ministerio constituti, id. 66; probably, as in classical Latin, e.g. Cic. pro Deiot. c. 9, Suet. Tib. c. 65, equivalent to καθιστάνειν, and equally colourless in its meaning: but co-ordinated with eligere in S. Hieron. Dial. c. Lucif. c. 9.

ii. Words implying promotion to dignity: (1) προελθεῖν: Const. Apost. 6, 17; Conc. Trull. c. 6. (2) προάγεσθαι: Conc. Ancyr. c. 12, Nicaen. c. 1, Laod. c. 26, Trull. c. 6. (3) ἀναβαίνειν: Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 53 (52): cf. Socrat. H. E. 1, 9, προσαναβαίνειν εἰς τὴν τιμήν. (4) promoveri: ad clerum, Conc. Illib. A.D. 305, c. 80: ad ordines, 3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 6. (5) conscendere: ad gradum presbyterii, Cod. Lugd. 269, ap. Haenel Corp. Legum ante Justin. lat. p. 238. (6) praesumi, provehi, praeferri; 1 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 511, c. 4; Cassian, Collat. 4, 1, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. xlix. 585.

iii. Words implying place in the κλῆρος, or ordo: (1) κληροῦσθαι: S. Iren. 3, 2, 3; Euseb. H. E. 5, 28; Socrat. H. E. 1, 8. (2) ἐν κλήρῳ τάττεσθαι, κατατάττεσθαι, Const. Apost. 8, 3; Conc. Trull. c. 38. (3) ἐναριθμεῖσθαι: τῷ τάγματι τῶν ἱερατικῶν S. Basil. Epist. 54 (181), ap. Migne, P. G. xxxii. 400. (4) καταλέγεσθαι: i. e. to be assigned a place in the κατάλογος (Conc. Chalc. c. 7; cf. 1 Tim. v. 9). (5) ordinare (ordinatio): found in almost all writers from Tertullian onwards: e. g. Tertull. de Praesor. Haeret. c. 41; Clement. Recogn. 3, 65; 6, 15; S. Cypr. Epist. 33; 68, 3; S. Ambros. Epist. 63, 65; Conc. Illib. A.D. 305, c. 30; 1 Arelat. A.D. 314, c. 2; 1 Carth. c. 8; 1 Tolet. c. 2; and the Civil Law, passim. The earlier classical meaning of the word had already been narrowed in its civil use, from administration in general to the appointment of magistrates: e. g. Suet. Dom. c. 4; Vespas. c. 23; so, as late as Carolingian times, e. g. in the Capit. Langobard. A.D. 782, § 2, ap. Pertz, Legum, vol. i. p. 42. The secular use which comes nearest its ecclesiastical use is in the army, where "ordinati" = "qui ordinem adepti sunt, id est, centuriones facti" (Corpus Inscr. Lat. ed. Mommsen, vol. iii. no. 830). It was used of the appointment, not only of clergy, but also of monks and abbats; e. g. Poenit. Theod. 2, 3, 3, in Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, &c., vol. iii.

iv. Words denoting admission to office, and especially to sacred office. (1) χειροθετεῖν (χειροθεσία): first found in Clem. Alex. Paed. 1, 5, p. 104, ed. Pott; and Origen in Matth. vol. iii. p. 660, ed. Delarue, of Christ putting His hands on the young children: so, also, in a general sense, in Doctrin. Orient. c. 32, ap. Clem. Alex. ed. Pott, p. 964. Its earliest uses in reference to the clergy are probably Conc. Neocaes. c. 9, Nicaen. c. 8, 19, 1 Antioch. c. 17, Const. Apost. 2, 32; frequently afterwards. But it is difficult to determine accurately the time at which χειροθετεῖσθαι came into general use in reference to ordination, because the texts of the MSS., especially of writers and councils of the 4th century, vary so much between χειροτονία and χειροθεσία as to make the determination of the reading, in the present state of criticism as applied to patristic Greek, a matter of great uncertainty. Instances of such variations will be found in the MSS. of Conc. Antioch. c. 21; St. Basil, Epist 217 (3) ad Amphiloch. c. 51, p. 325; Conc. Chalc. c. 15. No doubt, after χειροθεσία was once introduced, χειροτονία tended to be identified with it, as is clear from a comparison of Isidore of Pelusium, Epist. 1, 26 with id. Epist. 2, 71, where the two words are used interchangeably of the same person in reference to the same thing. That the earlier meaning of χειροτονία still survived, is clear from its use a few years afterwards in Theodoret; e. g. Quaest. in 3 Reg. c. 8, int. 27, of God's appointment of Solomon; id. in Epist. ad Rom. c. 4, v. 17, of the appointment of Abraham as πατέρα πάντων; but that the original distinction between the words was afterwards completely lost, is shewn by the somewhat clumsy attempt of Symeon of Thessalonica to invent a new one (de Sacr. Ordin. c. 156, p. 138). It need hardly be pointed out that the identification of the two words is of great significance in regard to the history of the conception of ordination. (2) ἱερᾶσθαι (Sozom. H. E. 1, 23), or ἱεροῦσθαι, whence the designation of those who are in major orders as οἱ ἱερωμένοι (sometimes written ἱερώμενοι); e. g. Justin. Nov. 3, 2, 1; Socrat. H. E. 1, 11. The use of the word in the sense "to be ordained," as well as in its classical sense, "to serve as a priest," is made certain by its use in the active in an inscription ap. Richter, Griech. u. Lat. Inschriften, ed. Francke, p. 134, cf. ib. p. 138.

(3) consecrari (consecratio): S. Ambros. Epist. 63, § 59, vol. ii. p. 1037, of Aaron and Eleazar, probably as a translation of ἁγιάζειν; of Christian bishops, presbyters, and deacons, S. Leon. Magn. Epist. 6 (4), c. 6, vol. i. p. 620; of an abbess, Poenit. Theod. 2, 3, 4, ed. Haddan and Stubbs; of a virgin, ib. 2, 3, 8; Can. Eccles. Afric. c. 16; Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 11. (4) benedici (benedictio): levitica, Conc. Araus. A.D. 441, c. 23; 5 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 549, c. 6; Conc. Autissiod. A.D. 578, c. 20, 2 Conc. Caesaraugust. A.D. 592, c. 1; of a widow or virgin, Poenit. Theod. 2, 3, 7.

II. Nature of Ordination.

It is evident, from the foregoing enumeration of facts, that most of the phrases which were in use in the earlier period to denote appointment to office in the church, were also in use to denote appointment to office, or promotion to dignity, in the empire. It may reasonably be inferred that they had in the former case meanings analogous to those which they had in the latter; and since the evidence which exists in regard to the former is abundant, whereas that which exists in regard to the latter is scanty, the one may fairly be used to throw light upon the other. In the absence of any convenient manual to which reference could be made, it is necessary to mention here the leading facts which have been established in regard to it.

1. The most common mode of appointment to office in the earlier empire, as under the republic, was that of popular election. The form of such an election was preserved long after the substance had disappeared; and it was preserved in the provinces after it had practically ceased to exist at Rome. In the case of two provincial towns of Baetica, Salpensa and Malaca, bronze tablets containing the original regulations for election have been preserved. They are especially important in relation to the present subject, as shewing (1) the conditions which were imposed as to the eligibility of candidates, (2) the importance of the presiding officer. That officer had the function of examining the candidates in set form, before votes were recorded: he could refuse to take account of votes which were given for a candidate who did not satisfy him: he could, in default of other candidates, himself nominate candidates, and declare them to be duly elected: and, as at Rome, the election was only complete when he formally announced it (renunciavit). Hence, an officer who was really elected by popular vote was technically said to be made (creatus) by the presiding officer. (See on the whole subject, Mommsen, Die Stadtrechte der lateinischen Gemeinden Salpensa und Malaca, Leipzig, 1855, and also in the Abhandlungen der König. Sächs. Gesellsch. der Wissensch. bd. 3; Marquardt, Römische Staatsverwaltung, bd. 1, pp. 464–474, where references will be found to a large number of other authorities.)

2. Gradually free election by the people, subject only to the veto of the presiding officer in the case of legal ineligibility on the part of a candidate, was superseded by election by the senate, subject only to a formal approval on the part of the people. This became the case at Rome so early as the time of Tiberius (Tacit. Ann. i. 15), and by the 4th century had become the prevailing, though not the universal, rule throughout the empire (Ulpian. Dig. 4, 1, 3, 4; Cod. Theodos. 11, 30, 53: 12, 6, 20; Cod. Just. 7, 62, 2: 10, 31, 46, make popular election invalid; but from Cod. Theod. 12, 5, 1 it may be gathered that popular election was still the rule in Africa, since the magistrates are cautioned to procure the election of suitable persons: this is also to be inferred from Renier, Inscriptions d'Algérie, no. 4070, where a municipal officer specially mentions his election by the Ordo, as though it were exceptional). The continuance of the formal appeal to the people is shewn so late as the end of the 3rd century, in the account of the election of the emperor Tacitus (Vopisc. Tacit. c. 7). Of course under the imperial régime the part which the senate played in the actual selection of candidates tended to become no more free than the part of the people; but the important fact is that the form of election by the senate remained until late times, and that even after the disintegration of the empire the greater civil appointments were made, not directly by constitutive nomination, but indirectly through the form of "commendatio" (cf. the letters of Theodoric to the senate, ap. Cassiodor. Variar. e.g. lib. 5, Epp. 22, 41).

3. From the earliest times the chief officers of state had possessed and exercised the right, which must be carefully distinguished from the right of commendatio, of nominating certain of their subordinates without the necessity of even a formal submission of the names to either the senate or the people. The right had been jealously guarded, and in some cases restricted, but it had never passed away, and the emperors were able to make, especially in the provinces, a large number of direct appointments without violating any constitutional forms. It is recorded among the many virtues of Alexander Severus that he voluntarily limited his own privilege in this respect by consulting the people before making any important provincial appointment, "hortans populum ut si quis quid haberet criminis probaret manifestis rebus;" and it is interesting to note that, although himself a heathen, he adduces as a reason for the course which he pursued the example of appointments in the Christian church (Lamprid. Alex. Sever. c. 45. On the general question of appointment by superior officers, see Mommsen, Römisches Staatsrecht, bd. i. pp. 181–192, bd. ii. pp. 860–873).

The facts which exist in reference to early ecclesiastical appointments corroborate in a striking manner the general presumption that, since the same words were used for them as for civil appointments, the same modes of appointment prevailed.

1. Of the existence of appointment by popular election some proofs have been given elsewhere. [BISHOP, Vol. I. p. 213; ELECTION, p. 599.] But as in the Roman municipalities, so also in the Christian churches, popular election, though a condition of appointment, did not of itself constitute appointment. Just as a civil appointment was not valid until the officer who presided at the election had accepted and declared it, so it was also in the case of ecclesiastical appointments. "The seven" were chosen by the church, but they were appointed by the apostles; the word used of the former is ἐξελέξαντο, of the latter, καταστήσομεν (Acts vi. 3, 5). This distinction, which has been often ignored, is of great significance. Nor is it the only point of analogy between civil and ecclesiastical elections. Just as, on the one hand, popular elections were not constitutive, so, on the other hand, they were not absolutely free. Checks of two kinds existed—(1) conditions were imposed on the eligibility of candidates, and means were taken to ascertain that these conditions were complied with; (2) the approval of other persons or bodies was required to make the election valid. The operation of the former of these checks resulted in the gradual establishment of a complicated series of qualifications, and of a system of examination, with a view to test qualifications. [ORDERS, HOLY: iv. Qualifications for: Examination for.] The operation of the second check was shewn in the gradual narrowing of the function of the laity from election to express or tacit approval. Just as in the empire, the senate at Rome, or the curia in a municipality, came to interfere in popular elections, and ultimately to render them nugatory; so pari passu in the church, appointment by election passed into appointment by co-optation, and ultimately into appointment by nomination of either the bishop or the civil power.

2. The second mode of appointment which existed in the empire thus tended to become the prevailing mode in the church. It had no doubt existed in the earliest times, for Clement of Rome speaks of the successors of the apostles as having been appointed by other distinguished men with the consent of the whole church (ὑφ' ἑτέρων ἐλλογίμων ἀνδρῶν συνευδοκησάσης τῆς ἐκκλησίας πάσης, Epist. 1 ad Cor. c. 44); but its employment seems to have been local and limited. The function which Cyprian assigns to the African and Spanish clergy in ecclesiastical appointments, is that of consenting or giving testimony, not that of nominating or appointing (cf. especially Epist. 68, 3, i. p. 1026, which is important because it expressly applies to the appointment of deacons as well as of bishops); and it is clear from the case of Cornelius that this was the case also at Rome (id. Epist. 10, i. p. 770). But in the 4th century it is clear from the synodical letter of the council of Nicaea to the church of Alexandria, that in that church the right of the people to elect was limited by the right of the clergy to propose names (προχειρίζεσθαι ἢ ὑποβάλλειν ὀνόματα). The council punishes the Melitian clergy (who had supported Arius) by depriving them of that right, but allows them to succeed to the vacancies caused by death among the orthodox clergy provided that they are found worthy, that the people elect them, and that the bishop of Alexandria votes for them and confirms the election (Socrat. H. E. 1, 9; Sozom. H. E. 1, 24). It was probably this right of proposing names for election which in the case of the clergy of the Christian churches, as beyond question in the case of the Roman municipalities, resulted in the virtual election by the clergy, subject only to approval, by acclamation or by silence, on the part of the people. The fourth canon of the same council has sometimes been interpreted as being a formal substitution of co-optation for popular election in the case of bishops (cf. Hefele, Councils, E. T. vol. i. p. 384; Van Espen, Jus Eccles. p. 1 tit. 13, n. 10); and in the course of the next quarter of a century the council of Laodicaea (c. 13) expressly enacted that the elections of those who are to be appointed to the priesthood (by which Zonaras and Balsamon understand the presbyterate, Aristenus the episcopate) are not to be entrusted to popular assemblies (τοῖς ὄχλοις). At the beginning of the following century, Theophilus of Alexandria gives the election to the clergy (πᾶν τὸ ἱερατεῖον), the approval of the candidates (δοκιμάζειν) and their formal appointment (χειροτονεῖν) to the bishop. The part of the people consists, as in later times, only in their bearing public testimony at the time of appointment (S. Theophil. Alexandr. can. 6; Migne, P. G. vol. lxv. 40). The existence of this mode of election at the time, probably somewhat later, when the eighth book of the Apostolical Constitutions was written, is clear from the mention of a presbyter as having been advanced to his rank "by the vote and decision (ψήφῳ καὶ κρίσει) of the whole clerus" (Const. Apost. viii. 15; cf. the expression in the same book, c. 4, "nominated and approved," ὀνομασθέντος καὶ ἀρέσαντος).

3. The third mode of appointment which existed in the empire existed also in the church, but to a more limited extent. Some officers were appointed by the mere nomination of a superior officer. An archdeacon was appointed by bishop, a singer by a presbyter. But the number of such officers was small; the original democratical constitution of the church shewed itself in the jealous limitation of such appointments. In all but a few cases the nominations were in the form of a "commendatio;" they were subject to the approval of either the clergy or the people, or both. And just as under the empire, this form of nomination was frequently in the form of a letter or a speech, setting forth the virtues of the person to be appointed, so it was also in the church. An interesting example of such a speech is that which Sidonius Apollinaris made at the election of a bishop of Bourges, and which he has himself recorded. It concludes by giving the form of nomination: "In nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti Simplicius est quem provinciae nostrae metropolitanum civitatis vestrae summum sacerdotem fieri debere pronuntio," and by asking the people to signify their assent. (Sidon. Apollin. Epist. 7. 9, p. 190.)

As the organisation of the Roman empire became gradually weaker, while that of the church grew stronger and more centralized; as the power and importance of the episcopate increased and that of the presbyterate diminished; and as, moreover, a new group of ideas clustered round the primitive conception of the clerical office, the whole system of appointments to office underwent significant modifications. But in the altered types which tended to prevail in the East and West respectively, the old elements were still present, though in varying degrees, and these elements have been so far ignored and overlaid in subsequent times, that it is important to shew in detail the extent to which they once existed.

i. There was always, in the case at least of those which had been from the beginning the chief grades of ecclesiastical office, viz. those of bishop, presbyter, deacon, and reader, either the reality or the semblance of an election. To a few offices, e.g. those of archpresbyter, archdeacon, acolyte, and doorkeeper, the bishop could probably appoint proprio motu. But in the other cases he was only the executive officer of the community. He was in the position of the returning officer at an election to a seat in the empire. He had the right of rejecting unworthy candidates, in certain cases the right of proposing candidates, and in all cases the right of renunciatio or declaration of election. But the church, i.e. either the clergy and laity acting together, or the clergy alone, or the laity alone has always exercised on the one hand the right of presenting persons for appointment, on the other the right of veto. Both these rights are survivals of the older right of election by direct vote. That older right was gradually limited and nullified by the operation of a regulation which had been introduced as a safeguard. In the course of the 4th century it had become the rule that no ecclesiastical election was valid unless the bishop or bishops had voted with the majority.[a] In the election of a bishop the votes of at least three neighbouring bishops were required; in the election of a presbyter the vote of the bishop of the church in which the election took place was sufficient. (That this is the true interpretation of the second apostolical canon is admitted by both Zonaras and Aristenus, who explain χειροτονεῖν by ψηφίζειν. Balsamon's view, which is based on the later practice, is contradicted not only by historical facts, but by his own interpretation of Conc. Laod. c. 13, which he makes to refer to presbyters as well as to bishops.) It is easy to see how this regulation operated in course of time to throw the election practically into the hands of the bishops; the bishops came thus to fulfil a double function, they both elected, subject, as will be shewn below, to testimony and to veto, and admitted to office. But it is important to note that between these two functions there was a recognised difference. In two of the oldest Western ordinals the election, as represented by the summons to objectors to come forward, and the "advocatio" or call to office, take place on Wednesday and Friday, the imposition of hands and the benediction take place on the following Saturday. (Hittorp, Ord. Rom. i. p. 88; Mabillon, Ord. Rom. ix. p. 90.) In later ordinals the separate elements are combined in a single service; but even in them there is a clear distinction between the declaration of election ("eligimus" &c., see below) and the subsequent "benedictio" or "consecratio."

But since election, except in the case of bishops (for which see BISHOP, Vol. I. pp. 213, sqq.), became in later times a mere form, it will be advisable here to shew briefly the extent to which it existed. For this purpose we shall take the unimpeachable testimony of the ordinals of both the Eastern and Western churches, in preference to collecting historical examples, or citing more or less rhetorical passages from ecclesiastical writers.

(a) Election of Presbyters.—In almost all Western ordinals the bishop begins the office for the ordination of presbyters by announcing the fact of their election to the people: "By the help of our Lord God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ, we elect N. to the order of the presbyterate. . . ." (Cod. Vat. ap. Murat. vol. iii. p. 31; Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Noviom. Caturic. Suession. S. Elig. Becc. Corb. a.; Hittorp, Ord. Rom. Vet. ii. p. 91; Catalani, Ord. ii.)[b] That this formula was regarded, even until comparatively recent times, as the declaration of an actual election, is shewn by the fact, that when a presbyter was appointed by the pope's mandate it was omitted. (Cæremoniale Ambrosianum, published by order of S. Carlo Borromeo, p. 69, ed. Milan, 1619.) The later English ordinals are more explicit than other Western ordinals in recognising the two factors of the electoral body, "electi sunt a nobis et clericis huic sanctas sedi famulantibus" (Sarum, Exeter, and Winchester ordinals in Maskell, Mon. Rit. vol. iii. pp. 155, 160); and this explicit recognition is preserved in the modern Roman pontifical, where the bishop addresses the presbyters-elect as "quos ad nostrum adjutorium fratrum nostrorum arbitrium consecrandos elegit" (Pontif. Rom. p. 1, tit. 12, § 5). No doubt election became a fiction; how or when it began to become so is uncertain. Historical references to it occasionally appear in comparatively late writers, e.g. Venantius Fortunatus (?) in the Life of Medard of Noyon (c. 3, Migne, P. L. vol. lxxxviii. p. 536) says "presbyterii officium electus excepit, probatus obtinuit," and it is clear that it was the rule at the time when the Liber Diurnus was compiled, inasmuch as that book contains a formula for a papal precept requiring a bishop to proceed to the ordination of a presbyter without election ("sine suffragatione;" Lib. Diurn. Rom. Pontif. c. 5, tit. 1, ed. Garnier, p. 91). In the subsequent address to the people, asking for their prayers, the election is attributed to the grace of God, the assumption being made, as e.g. in Acts i. 24, 26, that election is an indication not so much of human choice as of the divine will; so Sacram. Leon. Pontif. Ecgb.; Catalani, Ord. i. In the later Eastern ordinals this is almost the only trace of election which has survived; e.g. in the Maronite ordinal, according to Asseman and Renaudot, ap. Denzinger ii. p. 151; in the Nestorian, according to both Asseman and Badger, ap. Denzinger, ii. p. 236, 267; in the Coptic, according to Kircher and Vansleb (but not according to Asseman) ap. Denzinger ii. p. 12. But that this is only part of the earlier Eastern practice is shewn by the fact that the eighth book of the Apostolical Constitutions (c. 15), which is peculiarly Eastern in its character, speaks of a presbyter, in the formula for his ordination, as having been elected by the vote of the whole clergy.

(b) Election of Deacons. In the earliest ordinal of the Gregorian type, the Missale Francorum, the deacons are expressly stated to be elected by the clergy, and the assent of the people is requested. The election is claimed as a special privilege of the "sacerdotes," but the bishop desires to know whether the people judge the ordinand to be worthy: "et si vestra apud meam concordat electio, testimonium quod vultis vocibus adprobate." After the prayer which follows, the bishop adds "commune votum [the word in its mediaeval sense is equivalent to the Greek ψῆφος, the English 'vote;' see Ducange, s.v.] communis prosequatur oratio." In almost all the later western ordinals, the bishop begins the office for the ordination of deacons with the same formula, mutatis mutandis, as in the case of presbyters, declaring their election; so e.g. Cod. Vat. ap. Muratori, Pontif. S. Dunst. Noviom. Caturic. Suession. Becc. S. Elig. Hittorp Ord. Rom. ii. p. 91; so also in the modern Pontif. Rom. p. i. tit. ii. § 3.

[a] The principle which this involves was known to the civil law, which may possibly have borrowed it from the Christian practice: Julian enacted that no one should become a public teacher or a physician without a "decretum curialium, optimorum conspirante consilio." Cod. Theodos. 13. 3. 5 = Cod. Justin. 10. 52. 7.

[b] For an account of the ordinals and other authorities which are thus designated here and throughout the present article, see ORDINAL.

And although in that declaration of election the co-operation of the church is not expressly mentioned, it is clearly implied in the formula which follows it, as it follows the corresponding declaration in the Missale Francorum, "commune votum communis oratio prosequatur" (so Cod. Maff., Pont. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Noviom. Caturic. Suession. Becc. Mogunt. Corb. i., Hittorp Ord. Rom. ii.; Catalani, Ord. ii. iii. and in the modern Pontif. Rom. p. i. tit. ii. § 5).

(c) Election of Subdeacons. It is not certain whether during the first nine centuries subdeacons were elected in the same way as presbyters and deacons, or whether they were, as subordinate officers of the church, appointed by the bishop. The doubt is chiefly caused by the variety of reading in the earliest Western ordinals in the general formula of declaration of election which has been already mentioned. Some of them insert the word "subdiaconii," others omit it. The insertion of the word can be easily accounted for, at the period to which most of the ordinals belong, by the struggle of the subdiaconate to be ranked among major orders; the omission is difficult to explain if subdeacons, like deacons and presbyters, had been elected from the beginning. It may be added that the modern Roman Pontifical speaks of them in the litany which precedes this ordination as "electos" (p. i. tit. 10, § 7).

(d) Election of Readers. The most remarkable example of the conservation of the primitive practice of election is in the case of readers. All the ancient Western ordinals mention it, and almost all refer the election, not to the bishop, but to the "fratres," i.e. probably to the body of the clergy, "eligunt te fratres tui ut sis lector in domo Dei tui," so Miss. Francorum, Sacram. Gelas. c. 96, Cod. Vat. ap. Murat. Cod. Maff. Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Noviom. Caturic. Bisunt. Becc. Mogunt.; English ordinals ap. Maskell; Catalani, Ord. ii. i. (corrupted to "diligunt" in id. Ord. ii. iii.) Hittorp Ord. Rom. ii. p. 89 (so also the Cambray Pontifical and one Noyon Pontifical) has "elegerunt," which is important as making it clear that the bishop's office was rather ministerial than co-operative.

ii. There was always the testimony of the church to the fitness of the candidate. It was necessary to have, not merely "suffragia," but "testimonia." This had been insisted upon from the earliest times. The pastoral Epistles require a bishop to have "a good report of them which are without" (1 Tim. iii. 7; see S. Chrysost. ad loc.) Cyprian speaks of Cornelius as having been made bishop "de clericorum paene omnium testimonio," as well as "de plebe quae tunc adfuit suffragio" (S. Cypr. Epist. 10. i. p. 770); and he apologises for having ordained Aurelius as a reader in his retirement on the ground of exceptional merit, "exspectanda non sunt testimonia humana cum praecedunt divina suffragia" (id. Epist. 33. ii. p. 320). The eighth book of the Apostolical Constitutions enacts, that after a person has been elected bishop, and presented for ordination, and formally identified as being the person elected, the further question must be put "whether he is attested by all as being worthy" (Const. Apost. 8, 4). So also Leo the Great lays down the rule, "exspectarentur certe vota civium, testimonia populorum; quaereretur honoratorum arbitrium, electio clericorum" (S. Leon. Magn. Epist. 10. ad Episc. per prov. Vienn. i. p. 637, cf. ibid. p. 639). And it was one of the accusations against Chrysostom at the synod of the Oak, that he had ordained persons "without testimony" (ἀμαρτύρως Phot. Bibl. cod. 59, p. 17). The Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua, c. 22, require the "civium conniventia et testimonium," and 3 Conc. Brac. A.D. 572, c. 3, requires "multorum testimonium."

The ordinals continued the primitive requirement, and through them it has descended to modern times. It is almost always twofold, being a requirement of the separate testimony of the clergy and of the people; and since each of these requirements had its own form, it will be convenient to describe them separately.

(a) Testimony of the Clergy.—The Greek ordinal is apparently the only one which has preserved the primitive custom of asking for the viva voce testimony of the assembled clergy. The Western ordinals were framed in their present form after the archdeacon had become the officer who stood at the head of the clergy and next to the bishop. Consequently the voice of the clergy is expressed through the archdeacon. When he comes forward in the name of the church ("postulat sancta mater ecclesia Catholica ut hunc praesentem [subdiaconum] ad onus [diaconii] ordinetis"), the bishop asks "scisne illum dignum esse?" to which the archdeacon replies, "quantum humana fragilitas nosse sinit, et scio et testificor ipsum dignum esse ad hujus onus officii." This is the formula (1) in the case of presbyters and deacons (Cod. Maff. ap. Murat. vol. iii. p. 62; Pontif. S. Dunst. Corb. i. Mogunt.; English ordinals ap. Maskell; Catalani, Ord. ii. iii. and in the modern Roman Pontifical, p. 1. tit. 12, § 3): but in Hittorp Ord. Rom. ii. p. 93, the enquiry is made of the presbyters who present the candidate. (2) In the case of subdeacons the corresponding formula does not appear in the existing ordinals (unless it be implied in the general formula which is given in Hittorp Ord. Rom. ii. p. 88), and its disappearance tends to confirm the doubt which has been expressed above, whether subdeacons were elected by the church and not rather appointed by the bishop. (3) In the case of readers and other minor orders, Hittorp's Ordo Romanus, ii. p. 88, preserves a formula which resembles that of the modern English ordinal: the bishop says, "vide ut natura, scientia, et moribus tales per te introducantur, immo per nos tales in domo Domini ordinentur personae per quas diabolus pellatur et clerus Domino nostro multiplicetur."

In later times the testimony of the clergy, signified through the archdeacon, had to be supplemented by the testimony of the parish priest and the schoolmaster of the candidate. The former was sufficient as long as the persons to be appointed were members of the church of the city in which the ordination took place, or had been trained under the eye of the archdeacon in the diaconium. But after the area of the see had become extended, and young men were entrusted to the care of parish priests (2 Conc. Tolos. A.D. 529, c. 1), the testimony of the latter was required, perhaps originally in place of, but afterwards in addition to, that of the archdeacon. A still later regulation required the further testimony of the master of the school at which the candidate had been educated. (Both these requirements are retained in the modern Roman Pontifical, p. 1, tit. 2, § 4, following Conc. Trident. Sess. xxiii. c. 5.)

(b) Testimony of the Laity.—The Western ordinals agree in requiring the testimony of the laity to the fitness of anyone who is appointed presbyter or deacon. The primitive rule seems to have been to consult the laity three days before the appointment was consummated by admission to office; so Mabillon, Ordo ix. ap. Mus. Ital. vol. ii. p. 90; Hittorp, Ord. Rom. i. p. 88. But the later, and perhaps also occasionally the earlier, practice was to require the testimony to be given at the time of admission. The testimony was sometimes positive and sometimes negative. In the earliest of the later ordinals, the Missale Francorum (so Hittorp Ord. Rom. ii.) the bishop charges the people not to be silent, but to say openly what they think about the actions, character, and merits of those who are to be ordained presbyters, and requires them "electionem vestram publica voce profiteri." (It is remarkable that the same formula, with but slight changes of phrase, is preserved in the modern Roman pontifical, p. 1, tit. 12, § 4.) Nor does he proceed with the ordination until the testimony has been given: (it may be inferred from the analogous form at the ordination of bishops that the answer was expressed by "Dignus"). But the majority of ordinals require only negative testimony: they prescribe that an appeal shall be made to the people at the time of the declaration of election, and in continuation of the formula "By the help of our Lord God. . . ." (see above, under "Election of Presbyters.") "If anyone has anything against these men, let him in God's name, and for God's sake, come forth with boldness and say it." This is the prescribed form in the case of presbyters and deacons, in Cod. Vat. ap. Murat.; Pontif. Ecgb. St. Dunst. Noviom. Caturic. Suession. Becc. Mogunt.; Catalani, Ord. ii. iii., English ordinals ap. Maskell. In the case of readers, whose office, as being in primitive times the first step above the laity, had to be guarded with special care, the ordinals enact that the bishop is to address the people, "setting forth their faith and life;" so Sacram. Gelas., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Cod. Maff., Pontif. Ecgb. Rem. Rodrad., Catalani, Ord. ii.

In later times it became a rule of the Western church that this testimony of the people should be asked for, not only at the time, and in the church of ordination, but also in the church in which the ordained resided, and that the parish priest should testify to having so asked for it. But the rule was not embodied in a canon earlier than the council of Trent, sess. 23, c. 5, and the fourth (provincial) council of Milan under St. Carlo Borromeo.

iii. There was also a declaration of appointment, corresponding to the civil renunciatio. In the Western church this was almost the only relic of the primitive election, and the form of declaration has been given above as an indication of the existence of election. But all the Eastern churches agree in giving considerable prominence to this element in ordination. 1. They all have a formula corresponding to the western formula, "By the help of our Lord God . . ." but different in its form, inasmuch as what in the one is regarded as the act of the church, is in the other regarded as the act of divine grace: ἡ θεία χάρις ἡ πάντοτε τὰ ἀσθενῆ θεραπεύουσα καὶ τὰ ἐλλείποντα ἀναπληροῦσα προχειρίζεται τὸν δεῖνα τὸν θεοφιλέστατον [διάκονον] εἰς πρεσβύτερον. The primitive character of this formula is proved by its being found, with unimportant variations, not only in all MSS. of the Greek ordinals, but also in all Oriental ordinals, for both presbyters and deacons. 2. All except the Greek ordinals have a much more elaborate formula, by which not only the appointment but also the admission of the newly ordained person is said to be complete. The Coptic formula in the ordination of a presbyter may be taken as typical. The bishop says, "We call thee into the holy church of God;" the archdeacon thereupon makes proclamation, "N. presbyter at the holy altar of the holy catholic and apostolic church of God of the Christian city M.;" the bishop confirms the archdeacon's words: "We call thee, N., presbyter of the aforesaid holy altar, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." This is, with unimportant variations, the formula for both presbyters and deacons, among Copts, Jacobites, Maronites, and Nestorians, (for the rituals in detail, see Denzinger, vol. ii. pp. 9, 13, 67, 71, 73, 86, 91, 127, 232). It is remarkable that the Greek ordinals preserve no trace of it; but it is important to note, that a trace of it exists in Hittorp, Ord. Rom. i., Mabillon, Ord. Rom. ix., where, after describing the consultation of the laity three days before final admission to office, it is said that the ordinands are called up, from the lower level of the laity to the raised floor of the sanctuary ("advocantur sursum et statuuntur in sinistra parte altaris, usque dum pontifex missam compleat").

What, if any thing, besides this public declaration of appointment, was necessary in the earliest period to constitute the person appointed a church officer, is not always clear. Under the civil regime, which was reflected in so many ways upon the ecclesiastical organization, renunciatio was followed, either immediately or after a defined interval, by performance of the duties of the office. A Roman consul designatus dressed himself in his official dress, went in state to the Capitol, took his seat on the curule chair, and held a formal meeting of the senate; by doing this he became consul de facto; the whole process was a usurpatio juris; the ceremonies and forms with which it was accompanied were no more of the essence of the process than were its accompanying festivities of the essence of a Roman consensual marriage (Mommsen, Römisches Staatsrecht, Bd. i. p. 503). In a similar way in the early church the declaration of appointment to office was followed by the public performance of the duties of that office. Even to the present day, in the chief Western rituals the newly-ordained deacon performs the deacon's function of reading the Gospel; in the Roman ritual the presbyter not only takes his place in the presbytery, but is "concelebrant" with the bishop, i.e., he is associated with him in the celebration of the eucharist: in the Greek ritual, the reader performs his proper function of reading, and the subdeacon, who in early times was a kind of under-servant, washes the bishop's hands. But between the renunciatio and this first public performance of duties, certain ceremonies came to intervene. To these ceremonies the canonists and theologians of the middle ages attached great importance, and the canonists and theologians of later times have for the most part assumed them to be essential. But in the period with which the present work mainly deals, they held a very different place from that which has since been assigned to them.

III. Rites of Ordination.

The ceremonies which were interposed between appointment to office and the usurpatio juris, or public entrance upon office, were mainly of two kinds—(a) prayer, accompanied in most cases by imposition of hands; (b), the formal delivery of the insignia and instruments of office. (a) It was both natural and fitting that any appointment should be accompanied by prayer, and prayer accordingly is found to accompany almost all appointments from the earliest beginning of ecclesiastical records. The significance of the rite is clearly expressed by St. Augustine: "quid aliud est manuum impositio quam oratio super hominem" (de bapt. c. Donat. 3, 16); and even the ultra-mysticism of Dionysius Areopagita finds no other meaning in it than that of fatherly sheltering and subjection to God (De Eccles. Hier. 5, 3, 3). But there had been from the first a connexion between the imposition of hands and the χαρίσματα, or "spiritual gifts;" and under the influence of the sacerdotal ideas of the 4th century this connexion became so strong that Basil, speaking of some schismatics, says: παρὰ τῶν πατέρων ἴσχυον τὰς χειροτονίας καὶ διὰ τῆς ἐπιθέσεως τῶν χειρῶν αὐτῶν εἶχον τὸ χάρισμα τὸ πνευματικόν (S. Basil, Epist. ad Amphiloch. 188 (canonica i.) vol. iv. p. 270). This led to a restriction of the rite of imposition of hands to the higher orders of clergy. It ceased to be part of the ceremony of admitting deaconesses (hence the great variety of interpretations of Conc. Nicaen. c. 19; cf. Van Espen and Hefele, ad loc.), or subdeacons (except among the Armenians), or readers (except among the Nestorians). And at last, in the 12th century, the theory of the connexion of the rite with the gift of the Holy Ghost was so firmly impressed upon Western Christendom, that some ordinals put into the bishop's mouth at the time of imposition the words which have been retained in the English ordinal, "Receive the Holy Ghost;" (see below in the account of the ritual of the ordination of a presbyter; for a long series of patristic references see Morin, pars iii. p. 141).

(b) The history of the rites of delivering to the persons ordained the insignia and instruments of their office is less clear, but their origin is obvious. 1. The ceremony of admission to office was followed by the performance of the duties of the office. It was natural that the presiding officer should formally deliver to the newly ordained person the INSTRUMENTA [p. 862] of such a performance. A reader had to read: the book was delivered to him, and he read. A subdeacon had to wash the bishop's hands: a pitcher and towel were delivered to him. A deacon had, in southern countries, to drive away insects from the oblations upon the altar: a fan was delivered to him. [FLABELLUM.] The delivery of the eucharistic vessels to a presbyter is probably of late date; it is not found in the oldest Western ordinals (see below, Ordination of Presbyters, § 12); and it was probably limited in the first instance to the cases in which a presbyter was ordained, not to presbyterial rank in the cathedral, but to take charge of an outlying church; it was thus part of the ceremonies not so much of ordination as of institution or induction. But it must be noted, that almost all writers on the subject call attention to the much smaller stress which was laid upon these rites in the East than in the West. In the latter the opinion came to prevail in the schools, that the physical contact of the instruments by the ordinand was of the essence of the sacrament (S. Thom. Aq. Summa, pars iii. qu. 34, art. 5); whereas in the former (a) the instruments were delivered after the ordination was finished, (b) no formula of delivery was prescribed (see Catalani, ad Pontif. Rom. p. i. tit. 5, § 3; Morin, de Sacr. Ordin. pars iii. exerc. ii.). 2. The delivery of vestments is sometimes traced back historically to the time of Gregory Nazianzen, who says that when ordained bishop he was vested by his ordainers in a long tunic or alb (τὸν ποδήρη) and a mitre (τὴν κίδαριν, S. Greg. Nazianz. Orat. x. in seipsum, vol. i. p. 241). But the extreme scantiness of subsequent allusions to such a rite, and the absence of any mention of it, not only in the Apostolical Constitutions, but also in Dionysius Areopagita, tend to shew that, even if it existed, little stress was laid upon it. Its significance was originally the same as that of the vesting of one who was newly baptized. Nor was it the only point of close analogy between the ceremonies of baptism and those of ordination. The vesting in vestments, which became so important a part of the ordination ceremony in both East and West, and of which the details will be found below, is apparently of much later origin. The first certain mention of it is in 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 28, and it is absent from several of the most ancient Western ordinals. It grew up with the growth of a distinction between clerical and lay dress; its use can be traced in several instances to the influence of the regular upon the secular clergy; and its significance was determined by the mystical ideas which gradually attached themselves to the vestments which were worn at the celebration of the eucharist.

We now proceed to give an outline of the ritual which was observed in both the election on appointment and the admission of the several orders below the order of bishop [for which see vol. i. p. 221]. It has been necessary to append in the case of the Western rituals, the precise evidence which exists for the antiquity of the several rites: for in no department of Christian antiquities has there been a stronger tendency to assume that rites which prevailed in the 13th century prevailed also in the 8th, and that rites which prevailed in the 8th century are part of primitive Christianity. In the case of the Eastern rituals, references only are given to the authorities in which they will be found, because in the present state of knowledge on the subject it is impossible to determine with even approximate accuracy which of the several rites are ancient, and which are of later growth.

1. OSTIARIUS. Western Rites.—(Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 9; Sacram. Gelas. i. 95, Amalarius, de Eccl. Off. lib. i. 7; all Western ordinals of the Gregorian type; but not Mabillon, Ord. viii. ix.) The majority of ordinals direct that the candidate shall be instructed by the archdeacon in his duties (so Sacram. Gelas., but not Anglo-Norman ordinals, except the Rouen Pontifical, nor Catalani, Ord. i., nor the Cambrai and Mainz Pontificals). At the suggestion of the archdeacon (not mentioned in Catalani, Ord. i.) the bishop is to give to the candidate the keys of the church (Sacram. Gelas., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Noviom. Caturic. Suession. Bisunt. Rem. add "from the altar") saying, "So act as one who is to give account to God for the things which are opened by these keys." The deacon (Pontif. Corb. Rem. Radbod. Bisunt., St. Elig. Becc.), or the archdeacon (Cod. Maff., Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Bisunt., English ordinals ap. Maskell) delivers to him the door of the church (this is not mentioned by Sacram. Gelas., nor in Cod. Vat. ap. Murat.; but the Soissons Pontifical, the Cod. Radbod., and a Tours Pontifical mentioned by Martene, vol. ii. p. 18, not only mention it, but add a formula, apparently borrowed from the description of the office of the ostiarius in Isid. Hisp. de Eccl. Off. ii. 14, Hraban. Maur. de Instit. Cleric. i. 12, to the effect that the power is thereby delivered of admitting the good and rejecting the bad). A preface and form of benediction usually follow, without any rubric as to the point of the service at which they are to be used. In Cod. Radbod. they are placed before the delivery of the keys, which is probably their proper place. Some of the later ordinals, e.g. those of Mainz and Cambrai (see also the Pontif. Roman) add, that after touching the keys the ostiarius is to go and ring the bell. When bells came into general use in churches, it naturally became the duty of the ostiarius to attend to them, for the preface, which probably belongs to an earlier time, implies that it was his duty to mark the "distinctionem certarum horarum, ad invocandum nomen Domini," i. e. the canonical hours of prayer.

3. READER. I. Western Rites.—(Statt. Eccl. Antiq. c. 8; Sacram. Gelas. i. 96. Isid. Hispal. de Eccl. Off. ii. 11; Hrab. Maur. de Instit. Cleric. i. 11; and all ordinals of the Gregorian type.) The bishop is to make an address to the people, setting forth the faith, and life, and ability of the person ordained; he is then to deliver him the book out of which he will have to read (so Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Codd. Maff. Rem. Rodrad. et al.: "codicem apicum divinorum;" Isid. Hisp., Albin. Flacc., Hrab. Maur.: "codicem Esaiae prophetae;" Cod. Ratold.: "lectionarium;" Pont. Mogunt., English ordinals: "lectionarium prophetiarum;" Cod. Colbert. = Martene, Ord. xvii.), saying, "Take, and be a reader of the Word of God, destined, if thou fulfil thine office faithfully and usefully, to have part with those who have ministered the Word of God" (so all Codd., omitted in Missale Franc. only). The bishop then makes the declaration of election ("pronuntiatio," Cod. Maff., "electionem," Pontif. Bisunt.); "Thy brethren elect thee" ("have elected" Pontif. Camerac. Noviom., Hittorp, Ord. Rom. ii.) to be a reader in the house of thy God; and recognize thy office and fulfil it, for God is able to give thee abundant grace" (so almost all Codd., omitted in Pontif. Radbod., Suession., Salisb., Bangor., Sarum.). Then follows in all ordinals a prayer for God's blessing on the newly-ordained reader.

II. Eastern Rites.—1. Greek. The Apostolical Constitutions (viii. c. 21) direct that a reader shall be ordained (χροχείρισαι) by imposition of hands, with a prayer that God will give him the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of Prophecy. The later Greek rituals will be found in the Euchologium ed. Goar, p. 233, ed. Daniel, vol. iv. p. 547; Codd. Bessar. Barber. Paris. Vat. Allat. ed. Morin, p. 71 sqq., ed. J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 120 sqq.; Sym. Thessal. de Div. Ordin. c. 158 ap. Migne, P. G. vol. clv. p. 366.

2. The Coptic are found in the Apostolical Constitutions in Coptic, ed. Tattam, c. 35; Morin, p. 505; Mai, Script. Vet. vol. v. pars ii. p. 209; Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 2); the Jacobite in Greg. Barhebraeus, Nomocan. viii. 8; Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 66; the Maronite in Morin, p. 388; J. A. Asseman, vol. ix. p. 20; Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 115; the Nestorian in Morin, p. 442; J. S. Asseman, vol. iii. pars ii. p. 793; J. A. Asseman, vol. xiii. p. 1; Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 227, with a collation of the rituals given by Badger, p. 262.

3. SINGER. I. Western Rites.—(Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 10; Cod. Maff., Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Caturic. Rotom.; Catalani, Ord. ii.; Hittorp. Ord. Rom.; Isid. Hisp. de Eccl. Off. 2, 12; Hraban. Maur. de Inst. Cler. 1, 11; but omitted from many ordinals.) "A psalmist—i. e. a singer—after having been instructed by the archdeacon, can undertake the office of singing without the cognizance of the bishop, at the sole bidding of a presbyter, the presbyter saying to him, 'See that what thou singest with thy mouth thou believest with thine heart, and that what thou believest in thine heart thou approvest in deed.'" (In addition to this form, the pontificals of Ecgbert and St. Dunstan insert the words "sive psalmistarum" in the preface to the benediction of a reader, from which it may, perhaps, be inferred that when a singer was ordained by a bishop, the same form was used as for a reader, as was the case in the Greek church.)

II. Eastern Rites.—1. Greek. (In most MSS. of the later Greek ordinals there is no distinction between the ordination of a singer and that of a reader; but there is a separate ritual in Cod. Leo Allat. ap. Morin, p. 104; J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 196.)

2. The Coptic is found in Vansleb, Hist. de l'Eglise d'Alexandrie, p. 4, sect. 2, c. 7, Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 83: not in Kircher, Morin, or Asseman; the Jacobite in Renaudot, ap. Denzinger, vol. ii. 66, not in Morin; the Maronite in Morin. p. 384; J. A. Asseman, vol. ix. p. 231; Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 108. The Nestorians have no special ritual for the ordination of a singer.

4. EXORCIST. Western Rites.—(Statt. Eccl. Antiq. c. 7; Sacram. Gelas. i. c. 96, and all ordinals of the Gregorian type; Isid. Hisp. de Eccl. Off. 2, 13; Hraban. Maur. de Inst. Cler. 1, 10; Amalarius, de Eccl. Off. 1, 9.) Some ordinals direct that the bishop, sitting with his mitre on his head, shall declare the duties of an exorcist (so Cod. Maff.; Pontif. Mogunt. Winton. Sarum. Exon.). All ordinals direct that the person ordained shall receive from the bishop a book of exorcisms, the bishop saying, "Take and commit to memory, and have power of imposition of hands upon one possessed, whether catechumen or baptized." A preface and prayer for God's blessing on the exorcist follow. (The Soissons pontifical makes this precede the delivery of the book, which is probably

5. ACOLYTE. Western Rites.—(Statt. Eccl. Antiq. c. 6; Sacram. Gelas. i. c. 95, and all ordinals of the Gregorian type; Mabillon, Ord. Rom. viii. in Mus. Ital. vol. ii. p. 85, reprinted in Migne, P. L. vol. lxxviii. p. 999.) The ancient ritual which is given by Mabillon directs only (1) that the clerk shall be vested in a chasuble and stole; (2) that the bishop shall put a bag over the chasuble (i. e. a bag for receiving and carrying the eucharistic offerings); (3) and that the bishop shall pray, "By the intercession of the blessed, and glorious, and ever-virgin Mary, and the blessed apostle Peter, may God save, and guard, and protect thee. Amen." The ritual of all other ordinals is as follows:—1. The bishop, sitting mitred in his chair, is to mention the duties of an acolyte (so Cod. Maff., Pont. Mogunt., and English ordinals ap. Maskell, except Pont. Bangor.; but the majority of ordinals merely direct that the bishop (or archdeacon, Missal. Franc.) shall previously instruct the person ordained in his duties. 2. The archdeacon (Sacram. Gelas., Statt. Eccl. Ant., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Missale Franc., Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Corb. i. Rodrad. Rotom. Rem.; see also Amalarius, de Eccl. Off. 2, 10) or the bishop (Cod. Maff., Cod. Turon. ap. Martene, vol. ii. p. 19, Pontif. Bisunt. Camerac., Mogunt., English ordinals ap. Maskell, Catalani, Ord. i.) is to deliver to him a candlestick and candle. Some ordinals give no form of words (so Sacram. Gelas., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Missale Franc., Pontif. Rotom. Rem. Rodrad. Ecgb. S. Dunst.). Others give the form, "Take the candlestick and candle, and know that thou art charged with lighting the lights of the church" (so Cod. Maff., Pont. Bisunt. Mogunt., English ordinals ap. Maskell). Others give the form, "Take this bearer (gestatorium) of light that by it ye may have power to chase away the darkness of the adversaries, and faithfully to find the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into this world" (so Pontif. Corb. i. Ratold. Suession.). A further direction is sometimes given that the bishop is to say the words, the archdeacon to deliver the candlestick (so Pontif. Salisb. Camerac.). 3. The acolyte is then to receive an empty pitcher from the bishop (so Pontif. Bisunt. Camerac. Mogunt. Exon. Winton.), or from the archdeacon (Pontif. Sarum.: other ordinals do not say from whom—e. g. Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Cod. Maff., Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Noviom. Becc., Catal. Ord. i.) with the words, "Receive this pitcher to pour out wine at the Eucharist of the Blood of Christ" (so Sacr. Gelas., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Missal. Franc., Pont. Ecgb. Corb. i. Rem. S. Dunst. Ratold. Noviom. "and water" is added in Cod. Maff., Pont. Salisb. English ordinals ap. Mask., and sometimes in the following prayer, though not in this address, e. g. Catalani, Ord. i.). 4. A preface follows in many ordinals (not in Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., nor in Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Ratold. Noviom. Salisb. Bisunt.), and a prayer for blessing in all (except Sacram. Gelas.); but the forms of prayer vary, some ordinals giving one prayer (so Missale Franc.), some two (so e. g. Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Ratold. Noviom.), some three (so e. g. Cod. Maff., Pontif. Mogunt., and English ordinals ap. Mask.).

6. SUBDEACON. I. Western Rites.—Statt. Eccl. Antiq. c. 5; Sacram. Gelas. i. c. 96, and all ordinals of the Gregorian type; Isidor. Hisp. de Div. Off. 2, 10; Amalarius, 1, 11; Hrab. Maur. 1, 8; Mabillon, Ordo Rom. viii. in Mus. Ital. vol. ii. p. 85, reprinted in Migne, P. L. vol. lxxviii. p. 1001). The ancient ritual given by Mabillon directs that the person to be ordained shall be brought forward (apparently vested in a chasuble) and that he shall swear on the Holy Gospels that he is not guilty of any of the four classes of carnal sins (i.e. sodomy, adultery, deuterogamy, sin with a consecrated virgin); when he has done so the archdeacon or the bishop shall give him the holy cup, and say over him the same prayer as over an acolyte (see above). The ritual of the later ordinals is as follows: 1. The bishop, sitting mitred in his chair, declares the duties of subdeacons (Cod. Maff. and English ordinals ap. Maskell, except Pontif. Winton., which directs that the candidate shall previously have been instructed in his duties by the bishop; not in the majority of ordinals). 2. The bishop shall deliver to the person to be ordained an empty paten and chalice. 3. The archdeacon shall deliver to him an empty (Pontif. Sarum says "full") pitcher, a basin, and a towel. 4. The bishop shall say, "See of what the ministry is delivered to thee: if hitherto thou hast been tardy at church, henceforth thou must be busy; if hitherto sleepy, henceforth thou must be wakeful; if hitherto drunken, henceforth thou must be sober; if hitherto immodest, henceforth thou must be chaste. . . ." (This address is not found in Sacram. Gelas., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat.; in Catalani Ord. i. it is in later writing; it is placed before the delivery of the chalice and paten in Missal. Franc., Pontif. Rodrad. Rem. Senon. Ratold. Ecgb. Noviom.; it is placed after the delivery, but without any express rubric as to the point at which it should be spoken, in Cod. Maff., Pontif. S. Elig. Rotom. S. Dunst. Radbod. Salisb. Bisunt. Becc. Camerac.; it is expressly placed after the delivery in Pontif. Mogunt.) Then follows a preface and prayer of benediction (so all ordinals, except Pontif. Radbod., which places these before the delivery of the paten and chalice). Three other rites are sometimes found; (a) the bishop gives the subdeacon a maniple; so Cod. Maff., which gives the formula of delivery, "Take the maniple, by which is designated the fruit of good works;" so, with a different formula, Pontif. Suession.; so also, without a formula, Pont. Ecgb. and the later English ordinals, but not the intermediate English ordinals, viz. the Rouen, St. Dunstan's, and Winchester Pontificals; (b) the bishop vests the subdeacon in a tunic (Pontif. Camerac. Mogunt.; Catalani Ord. ii.; English ordinals ap. Maskell, except the Winchester Pontifical); in the Exeter Pontifical only the subdeacon who is to read the epistle is vested in a tunic; (c) the bishop delivers to the subdeacon the book of the Epistles; the earliest mention of this is in an Arles Pontifical of the 13th century (Martene, de Antiq. Eccl. Rit. vol. ii. p. 20), nor is it found in any of the sacramentaries or ordinals to which reference has been made in this article.

II. Eastern Rites.—1. Greek. The Apostolical

Constitutions (viii. c. 20) direct that in ordaining a subdeacon the bishop shall lay his hands upon him, and pray that God will give him grace worthily to handle the eucharistic vessels. The directions of the later Greek rituals are to be found in the Euchologium (ed. Goar, p. 244, ed. Daniel, vol. iv. p. 550; Codd. Bessa. Barber. Paris. Vat. Allat. ed. Morin, p. 71 sqq., ed. J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. p. 118 sqq.; Sym. Thessal. de Sacr. Ordin. c. 162, ap. Migne, P. G. vol. clv. p. 367).

2. The Coptic in Morin, p. 505, J. A. Asseman ap. Mai, vol. v. pars ii. p. 210; Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 4; the Jacobite in Greg. Barhebraeus, vii. 8, ap. Mai, vol. x. pars ii. p. 52; Denzinger, vol. ii. pp. 67, 79; the Maronite in Morin, p. 392; J. A. Asseman, vol. ix. p. 34; Denzinger, vol. ii. p. 121; the Nestorian in Morin, p. 444; J. S. Asseman, vol. iii. pars ii. p. 801; J. A. Asseman, vol. xiii. p. 9; Denzinger, vol. ii. pp. 229, 263.

7. DEACON. I. Western Rites—(Sacram. Leon. ed. Muratori, Lit. Rom. Vet. vol. i. p. 686, ed. Ballerin. p. 112; Sacram. Gregor., Codd. Vat. i. Othobon. ap. Muratori, vol. ii. p. 1066; these two sacramentaries contain preface and prayers only, without rubrical directions, and both agree; Sacram. Gelas. l. c. 20, 22, has a short ritual and prayers, which correspond with those of the other two sacramentaries; Sacram. Gelas. l. c. 25, has a short canon, = Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 3; the full ritual is found in the other ordinals of the Gregorian type, e.g. Cod. Rem. ed. Morin, de Sacr. Ord. pars ii. p. 290; Cod. Vat. ii. ed. Murat. vol. iii. p. 3; Cod. Maff. ibid. p. 55; and in the editions of Menard, p. 235, Benedict. p. 223 = Migne, P. [illegible]. lxxviii. p. 221; another ritual is given in [illegible]llon, Mus. Ital. vol. ii. p. 85.) i. The oldest ritual is probably that which occurs as a prelimin[illegible] rubric in Sacram. Gelas. i. c. 20, Missale Fr[illegible], Cod. Maff., Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Rod[illegible], Catalani Ord. ii. Hittorp, Ord. i.; it is in entire harmony with primitive customs, and the ceremon[illegible] prayers which follow it must be regarde[illegible] later expansions of it. (This is rendered almost certain by the form of the rubric in the Rouen Pontifical.) The bishop declares the election in the form given below; then follows a litany; when it is concluded, all rise from their knees, and the persons elected go up to the bishop's chair; the bishop gives a blessing upon their office; they then go down, and stand in the proper place of their order ("hac, sc. litania, expleta ascendunt ad sedem pontificis et benedicit eos ad quod vocati sunt, et descendunt et stant in ordine suo"). Afterwards the newly ordained deacons are to give their offerings (sc. of bread and wine) into the hand of the bishop, and to receive them back from him consecrated. (This important relic of the primitive communion is given in Pontif. S. Dunst., Cod. Maff., and Catalani Ord. ii. in the case of deacons; see below for its place in the ordination of presbyters.) ii. A probably less ancient ritual is that of Mabillon's Ordo viii. The subdeacon who is to be promoted to the diaconate stands, vested in a chasuble, a white tunic, sc. dalmatic, and holding a stole in his hand, before the steps of the altar; after the epistle (which is to be from 1 Tim. iii. 8) and the gradual he is divested of the chasuble, and the bishop having said a prefa[illegible]ce, a litany is said, all being prostrate. After the litany the bishop says the prayer of consecration; the new deacon kisses the bishop and priests, and vested in his dalmatic stands at the bishop's right hand. iii. The later ordinals, with the exceptions of Mabillon, Ord. ix., Hittorp, Ord. i., as noted above, combine in one service the declaration of election and the admission to office, but at the same time preserve a clear distinction between them. (a.) Declaration of Election.—Several ordinals preserve the form of presentation by the archdeacon: "Our holy mother the Catholic church demands that thou shouldest ordain this present subdeacon to the burden of the diaconate;" the bishop asks, "Dost thou know him to be worthy?" the archdeacon replies, "As far as human frailty allows, I both know and testify that he is worthy of the burden of this office;" then the bishop says, "By the help of our Lord God and our Saviour Jesus Christ we elect this person to the order of the diaconate." This is the form in Codd. Maff. S. Dunst. Suess. Corb. Ratold, and in the modern Pontif. Rom.; Pontif. Vat. ap[illegible]urat. Ecgb. Noviom. Catur. Becc. Rodrad. Rotom. Rem. Senon. omit the form of presentation, but give that of election; the Mainz and later English pontificals (except Pontif. Bangor.) give this form at the beginning of the ritual of a general ordination, and apparently for all orders; the words are slightly different. The Winchester Pontifical introduces an address to the ordinands between the presentation and the election. (b.) Admission to Office.—(The order of the several ceremonies is not certain; that of Cod. Maff., which is almost identical with that of the modern Pontif. Rom., will be followed here.) 1. The bishop, standing, addreses the people, "Let the common vote be followed by a common prayer . . .;" this address is said in Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Missale Franc., Pontif. Petav. Rotom. Rem. Ratold, S. Dunst. Noviom. Becc. to be "ad consummandum diaconum" (or "diaconatus officium"); it is more commonly placed, but without any rubrical directions, after the prayer of benediction; but the Cambrai Pontifical and the modern Roman Pontifical agree with the Cod. Maff.; the Mainz Pontifical places it after the first imposition of hands; the later English pontificals, except Pontif. Winton. omit it. 2. The preface follows, i. e. a short "bidding prayer" which is nearly the same in all ordinals, but which in Sacram. Leon. G. Codd. Vat. et al., is broken up into a preface and a prayer. 3. Then follows the prayer of benediction: "Adesto quaesumus omnipotens Deus, honorum dator, ordinum distributor, officiorumque dispositor . . . super hos famulos tuos quaesumus, Domine, placatus intende; quos tuis sacris servituros in officium diaconii suppliciter dedicamus . . . emitte in eos, quaesumus, Domine, Spiritum Sanctum quo in opus ministerii fideliter exequendi munere septiformis tuae gratiae roborentur . . ." This prayer is found with slight variations in Sacram. Leon. Gelas. and all Codd. of Sacram. Gregor. including Codd. Othobon. Vindob. and in all the ordinals. 4. The bishop lays his hand upon the deacon's head. (a) The bishop does this alone, no mention being made of priests in Missale Francorum, Pontif. Corb. Rem. Ratold. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Radbod. Salisburg. Bisunt. (β) The bishop alone lays his hand on the deacon's head, but the other priests touch the bishop's hand, or touch the deacon's head near the bishop's hand, in Sacram. Gelas. i. c. 95, Pontif. Rotom. Catur. Becc. Noviom. i. ii.; cf. also Amalarius 2, 12, Durandus, Rational. 2, 9, 14. (γ) The bishop lays both hands on the deacon's head in Cod. Maff., Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Noviom. Mogunt. (δ) The point of the service at which this is to be done is not specified in Sacram. Gelas., Missale Franc., Pontif. Rotom. Rem. Ratold. Catur. Salisburg. Bisunt. Becc. Radbod. Noviom. i. ii. (ε) It takes place at the utterance of the words "emitte in eos . . . " in the prayer of benediction, in Cod. Maff. (ζ) It takes place before the preface, and the bishop in laying on his hands says, "Spiritus Sanctus superveniet in te et virtus Altissimi sine peccato custodiat te in nomine Domine," in Cod. Mogunt. only; or he says "Accipe Spiritum Sanctum," in the later English ordinals ap. Maskell (but not the Winchester Pontifical) and some later French ordinals ap. Martene, ii. p. 21, no authority being earlier than the 13th century. (η) It takes place after the vesting in the stole and before the preface, in Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. 5. The bishop vests the deacon with a stole upon his left shoulder; this ceremony is, however, not mentioned, either expressly or by implication, in the majority of early ordinals, viz. in Sacram. Gelas., Missale Franc., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Pontif. Rem. Rodrad. Senon. Noviom. i. Radbod.; its place in the ritual is (α) sometimes at the beginning, Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst.; (β) sometimes after the benediction, Pontif. Rotom. Caturic. Becc. Noviom. ii. Mogunt. English ordinals ap. Mask.; (γ) sometimes not specified, Pontif. Corb. Ratold. Bisunt. The formulae with which it was accompanied vary: (α) "Receive a white stole from the hand of the Lord . . . " Codd. Maff., Pont. Mogunt. (as an alternative form); (β) "Receive the yoke of the Lord, for His yoke is easy and His burden light," Cod. Suession.; (γ) "By this sign we humbly impose on thee the office of a deacon, that thou mayest be a support of the divine table, as it were a pillar of its columns, and that thou mayest serve blamelessly as a herald of the Heavenly King," Pontif. Corb. Ratold. Bisunt. Winton.; (δ) "Receive the stole, fulfil thy ministry, for God is able to give thee an increase of grace," Pontif. Salisburg. Camerac. Noviom. ii. Mogunt.; in English ordinals ap. Maskell, "In the name of the Holy Trinity receive the stole of immortality, fulfil," &c.; (ε) a much longer form is given in Pontif. S. Dunst. Catur. Becc. and Winton, "In the name of the Holy Trinity and One God, receive the stole which the Lord has prepared for thy receiving through the service of our humility and through our hands, by which thou mayest know that the burden of the Lord God is laid on thy shoulders, and that thou art bound to humility and to the administration of the church, and by which thy brethren may learn that thou hast been ordained a minister of God . . . ;" (ζ) no form is given in Pontif. Ecgb. 6. The bishop delivers a book of the Gospels to the deacon, with the words "Receive the power of reading the Gospel in the church of God, as well for the living as for the dead" (Cod. Maff., Pontif. Radbod. Suession. Becc. Catalani Ord. ii., later English ordinals ap. Mask.), or with the words "Receive this volume of the Gospels, and read and understand, and deliver to others, and do thou fulfil it in deed" (Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Becc.) This ceremony is not found in Sacram. Gelas. or in any of the early ordinals except that of Ecgbert. Martene, vol. ii. p. 21, says that it was for a long time peculiar to the English church. 7. The bishop vests the deacon in a dalmatic, saying, "The Lord clothe thee with a vestment of salvation, and wrap thee in a garment of gladness, through Jesus Christ our Lord," Cod. Maff., Pontif. Salisb. Sarum. Bangor. This ceremony is not found in any early ordinal; the Besançon Pontifical limits its use to those who come to be ordained from monasteries; and Martene, vol. ii. p. 22, says that it was not used in the case of secular until about the 12th century. The Bangor and Exeter Pontificals limit its use to the deacon who was about to read the Gospel. 8. The bishop kisses the new deacon, Cod. Maff., Pontif. Salisburg. Bisunt. 9. The hands of the deacon are anointed with the holy oil and chrism, and with a benediction; this rite is only found in English or Norman ordinals, viz., Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Becc. Rotom., but not in the later English ordinals, ed. Maskell. 10. The newly ordained deacon, or if there be more than one, either one appointed by the bishop (English ordinals), or the last ordained (Pontif. Mogunt.) reads the Gospel; this custom is not mentioned by any ordinals except those just specified, but its early existence is not only in accordance with the analogy of other ordination rituals, but is also indicated by its mention in Mabillon's Ordo ix.

II. Eastern Rites.—1. Greek. The Apostolical Constitutions (viii. c. 16) direct that in ordaining a deacon the bishop shall lay his hands upon him in the presence of the whole presbytery and the deacons, and shall pray that God will lift up the light of His countenance upon His servant who is ordained (προχειριζόμενον) to the diaconate, and grant that ministering acceptably in his office he may be deemed worthy of a higher degree. Another ritual is given in S. Dionys. Areop. de Eccl. Hierarch. 5, 2, p. 236. The later rituals are to be found in the Euchologium, ed. Goar, p. 249, ed. Daniel, vol. iv. p. 552; Codd. Bessar. Barber. Paris. Vat. Allat. ed. Morin, p. 68 sqq., ed. J. A. Asseman, vol. xi. pp. 111 sqq.; Sym. Thessal. de Sacr. Ordin. c. 169, ap. Migne, P. G. vol. clv. pp. 372 sqq.

8. PRESBYTER. I. Western Rites.—(Sacram. Leon. ed. Muratori, Lit. Rom. Vet. vol. i. p. 687, ed. Ballerin. p. 113, and Sacram. Gregor. Codd Vat. i. Othobon. ap. Muratori, vol. ii. p. 1064, contain prayers only, without a ritual; Sacram. Gelas. i. c. 20 contains a short ritual and prayers, id. c. 95 a canon=Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 3; the full ritual is found in all other ordinals of the Gregorian type, e.g. Cod. Vat. ap. Murat. vol. iii. p. 36, Cod. Rem. ap. Morin, p. 290, and in the editions of Menard, p. 237, Benedict. p. 224 = Migne, P. L. vol. lxxviii. p. 224; other rituals are given in Mabillon, Mus. Ital. vol. ii. pp. 86, 90; Hittorp, Ord. Rom. pp. 88, 93.) i. The earliest ritual which has been preserved is that which, as mentioned above in the account of the ordination of a deacon, is given as a preliminary rubric in the Missale Francorum, Sacram. Gelas., and other early ordinals. The ordinands are presented to the bishop, who, after receiving the testimony of the presenter, declares the election in the form given below, "By the help of our Lord God," &c. A litany is then said; when it is finished all rise, and the persons elected go up to the bishop's chair; the bishop gives a blessing upon their office; they then go down and stand in the proper place of their order. The gospel is then read, and afterwards the newly-ordained presbyters give their offerings (sc. of bread and wine) into the hand of the bishop, and receive them back from him consecrated. (This last important rite is found in Pontif. Corb. Suession. Camerac., Cod. Maff., Catalani, Ord. ii.; see below, § 16.) ii. Mabillon's Ordo Romanus viii. gives the following directions: "The archdeacon holding him leads him to the steps of the altar, divests him of the dalmatic, and so vests him in a chasuble, and leads him again to the bishop. And there, saying over him another prayer, he consecrates him presbyter, giving a kiss to the bishop or to the other priests, and stands in the rank of presbyters, and Alleluia is said, or the tract and gospel." iii. The majority of ordinals combine in one service, as in the case of deacons, the declaration of election and the admission to office.

a. Declaration of Election: 1. Two deacons conduct the ordinand, vested as a deacon, to the presbyters; then two presbyters receive and conduct him to the bishop's chair (Cod. Maff., Pontif. Salisb. Camerac.; but instead of presentation, the Mainz Pontificals require the ordinands to be summoned, "Let those who are to be ordained presbyters to the title of St. N. come forward;" the Besançon Pontifical adds the name of the priest who witnesses to and presents him).

2. A deacon (Cod. Maff.) or the archdeacon (Pontif. S. Elig. Ratold. S. Dunst. Suession. Salisburg. Noviom. Mogunt.) or the priest who presents (Cod. Bisunt.) addresses the bishop, "Our holy mother, the catholic church, demands that thou shouldst ordain this present deacon to the burden of the presbyterate." The bishop asks, "Dost thou know him to be worthy?" The presenter replies, "As far as human frailty allows, I both know and testify that he is worthy of the burden of this office" (Pontif. Mogunt. S. Dunst. S. Elig. Catalani, Ord. ii. iii.; Hittorp, Ord. ii.; cf. S. Hieron. Epist. 146 (85); but Cod. Maff. uses the plural, "Illis attestantibus").

3. The bishop then addresses the people, and asks their testimony. Sacram. Gelas., Pontif. Rodrad. Rotom. Senon. Ecgb. Caturic. simply say "data oratione;" but Pontif. Rem. Noviom. Vat. ap. Murat. add the form of address, which concludes by asking the people openly to give their testimony ("ideo electionem vestram debetis publica voce profiteri"). Apparently in the place of this address to the people, the Salzburg, Soissons, Cambrai, and Mainz pontificals have a public examination of the ordinand: "Dost thou wish to receive the degree of the presbyterate in the name of the Lord? Dost thou wish, as far as thou art able, and human frailty permits thee, to remain in that degree? Dost thou wish to be obedient to thy bishop to whose diocese thou art to be ordained, in all things lawful, according to the canonical statutes?" (Cod. Maff. is singular in having no mention of either the address or the examination.)

4. The bishop then makes the declaration of election: "By the help of our Lord God and our Saviour Jesus Christ we elect this person to the order of the presbyterate. If any one has anything against him, in God's behalf and for God's sake, let him come boldly forth and say it. But, nevertheless, let him be mindful of his condition." (The retention of this form "si quis" . . . after the request for direct testimony, is probably a relic of the earlier practice, which is found in Mabillon, Ordo ix., where the form is appended, not to the declaration of election, but to the announcement by the reader of the intention to elect four days previously to the actual admission.)

5. The bishop proceeds: "Let the common vote be followed by a common prayer" . . . whereupon a litany is said (so Cod. Maff.).

6. The bishop lays his hand (both hands, Pontif. Mogunt.) upon the head of the ordinand, and all the presbyters who are present place their hands near the hands of the bishop (so all Codd. except the Mainz Pontifical, which implies that they do it after the bishop). (a) Some ordinals direct that while this is being done the prayers following shall be said (Cod. Maff.). (b) The Mainz Pontifical directs that the bishop shall say, "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and may the power of the Highest keep thee without sin." (c) The later English ordinals ap. Maskell direct that the bishop shall say nothing. (d) A Toulouse Pontifical of uncertain date, quoted by Morin, de Sacr. Ordin. pars ii. p. 340 (cf. ib. pars iii. p. 135), says that in some churches the bishop said, "Receive the Holy Ghost; whosesoever sins ye remit," &c. This is added in the Exeter, Bangor, and Sarum pontificals as a separate rite immediately before the post-communion. It is found also in Catalani, Ordo ii., where it is placed after the delivery of the paten and chalice, and where the words are in the plural. It is found also in the same place, written by a later hand, in the margin of the Cod. Maff., where the words are first given in the singular, and then in the plural ("quo singulis facto ad ultimum dicat in generali, Accipite," &c.). But no mention of the rite is found in the earlier English ordinals, or in any ordinal earlier than the 12th century, or in any of the great liturgical writers of the middle age, Amalarius, Hrabanus of Mainz, Ivo of Chartres, or Hugo of St. Victor. Nor was there any canonical authority for its use until the council of Trent. 7. The prayers which follow are alike, with only verbal variations, in all ordinals (including the Leonine and Gelasian sacramentaries). 8. The bishop then says the preface (or "consummatio presbyteri"). "Let us make a common prayer, brethren, that these who are elected for the help and advantage of your salvation may receive the benediction of the presbyterate. . . ." The prayer of benediction follows, "Sanctificationum omnium Auctor cujus vera consecratio, cujus plena benedictio est: tu, Domine, super hos famulos tuos quos presbyterii honore dedicamus manum tuae benedictionis infunde..." (Sacram. Gelas., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Pontif. Ecgb. Rem. Noviom. S. Dunst. Catur. Rotom. Ratold. Winton. Mogunt; the benediction is found without the preface in Cod. Maff. and in the Besançon, Sarum, and Exeter Pontificals.) Both forms are placed (1) as here, immediately after the prayer of consecration, in the earliest ordinals, i.e. Missale Franc., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Pontif. Ecgb. Rem. Noviom.; (2) after the vesting in the chasuble and before the anointing of the hands, Pontif. Camerac. Noviom. ii. Mogunt.; and without the preface, Cod. Maff.; (3) after both the vesting and the anointing, Pontif. S. Dunst. Catur. Becc. Some ordinals omit the mention of either form, so Pontif. S. Elig. Radbod. Rodrad. Thuan. and Sacram. Leon.

9. The bishop then turns the stole, which has hitherto been worn over the left shoulder only, over the right shoulder, saying, "Receive the yoke of the Lord, for His yoke is easy, and His burden light" (Pontif. Maff. Salisb. Camerac. Mogunt., English ordinals ap. Mask.); in Pontif. Ecgb. this rite takes place apparently at the beginning of the ritual, or as in Pontif. S. Dunst. Caturic. Rotom. before the prayer of consecration. The formula in Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. is, "The Lord put the stole of justice round thy neck, and the Lord keep thy mind from all taint of sin." In Mabillon, Ord. ix., after the benediction, the archdeacon takes the stoles from the tomb of St. Peter, where they had been placed the day before, and vests the new presbyters in them. Many of the earliest ordinals omit the mention of this rite; sc. Sacram. Gelas., Missale Franc., Codd. Vat. ap. Murat. S. Elig. Rodrad. Rem.; Maskell, Mon. Rit. vol. iii. p. 208, thinks that it was a remnant of the primitive use of the British church, and that it was thence introduced into France and other countries.

10. The bishop then vests the presbyter in the chasuble; this rite is omitted in Sacram. Gelas., Missale Franc., Pontif. Rodrad. Radbod., but the mention of it in both Mabillon's ancient ordinals (Ord. viii. ix.) as well as in the ordinals mentioned below, leaves little doubt as to its antiquity. Some ordinals, as has been just mentioned, place it before the "consummatio presbyteri;" and its place in relation to the anointing of the hands also varies, most ordinals placing it in the order which is followed here; but Pontif. S. Dunst. Rotom. Caturic. Becc. place it before the anointing. The formulae with which the rite was accompanied vary: a. Pontif. Bisunt. "The Lord clothe thee with the garment of innocency;" b. Pontif. Suess. Salisb. Mogunt. Sarum. "Receive the priestly vestment by which is betokened charity; God is able to give thee an increase of grace;" c. Cod. Maff., Pontif. Exon., combine the two preceding formulae, Pontif. Camerac. gives them as alternatives; d. Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Pontif. S. Elig. Rem. Rotom. S. Dunst. Noviom. Becc. Thuan. "The benediction of God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, descend upon thee, and mayest thou be blessed in the order of the priesthood, and mayest thou offer pleasing victims to Almighty God for the sins and offences of the people." (This form of benediction is elsewhere placed at the end of the ritual, before the kiss of peace; so Cod. Maff., Pontif. Camerac. Suess. Salisburg. Winton.; its use at this point serves to shew that at one time the vesting in the chasuble was the last of the rites of ordination.)

11. The bishop then anoints the presbyter's hands with the chrism, or oil and chrism, or oil of the catechumens, with a prayer that "whatsoever they blessed might be blessed, whatsoever they sanctified might remain sanctified." (a.) This rite is found in almost all ordinals; but not in Sacram. Leon. or in Codd. Vat. Othob. of Sacram. Gregor. or in Pontif. Rodrad: it is mentioned by two French liturgical writers of the 9th century, Amalarius of Metz, †837, de Eccl. Off. 2, 13, and Theodulphus of Orleans †821, Capit. ad Presb. i., Migne, P. L. vol. cv. p. 193; the earliest canonist who speaks of it is Burchard of Worms (†1025), Decret. xx. c. 55, Migne, P. L. vol. cxl. p. 620, but the recognised body of canon law distinctly disallows it, quoting a response of pope Nicholas I. to the archbishop of Bourges in 864, who says that it is not a custom of the Roman church and that he has never heard of its being practised in the Christian church (Gratian, Decret. 23, c. 12, Migne, P. L. vol. clxxxvii. p. 134, Ivo. Carnot. Decret. 6. 121); this must be held conclusive, at any rate as to its not being a general practice in the 9th century; but afterwards it no doubt became general, for Innocent III. insists upon it, and objects to the Greeks for their omission of it (Innocent III. Epist. lib. 7. 121; Migne, P. L. vol. ccv. 407). It is important to note that even the Pseudo-Isidorian authorities for the rite (Epist. Anacleti, c. 18, ap. Hinschius Decretales Pseudo-Isidorianae, p. 75; Epist. Clement. iii. c. 58, ibid. p. 53, to which may be added the spurious Comment. in lib. I. Regum, ascribed to Gregory the Great, lib. 4, c. 5; Migne, P. L. vol. lxxix. 278) refer only to bishops; at the same time they clearly shew that the origin of the rite was the growing tendency to institute an analogy of ceremonies between the Old and the New Testament. (b.) Several ordinals direct that the hands shall be blessed before being anointed, and give a form of benediction for the purpose; Pontif. Ratold. S. Elig. Rotom. Caturic. Becc. (c.) The Mainz Pontifical directs that while the rite of anointing is going on the hymn "Veni Sancte spiritus" shall be sung, and also, if the number of persons ordained require it, the hymn "Veni Creator;" in the Soissons Pontifical the hymn "Veni Creator" is apparently sung immediately after the anointing; and in the English ordinals ap. Maskell, except the Winchester Pontifical, immediately before it. There is no mention of either hymn in other ordinals. (d.) In addition to the anointing of the hands, a group of English and Norman pontificals direct the anointing of the head; so Pontif. Ecgb. S. Dunst. Caturic. Rotom. Becc., but not elsewhere.

12. The anointing is followed by the delivery of the "patenam cum oblatis et calicem cum vino" (Pontif. Mogunt. has "calicem pro sacramento praeparatum, superposita hostia") with the words "Receive power to offer sacrifice to God and to celebrate mass, as well for the living as for the dead;" so Cod. Maff., Pontif. Radbod. Salisb. Bisunt. Camerac. Mogunt., English ordinals ap. Maskell, Catalani Ord. ii.; but there is no mention of the rite in the oldest ordinals e.g. in Missale Franc., Pontif. Rem. Ecgb., Cod. Vat. ap. Murat.; nor in Isidore or Amalarius; nor is it implied in 4 Conc. Tol. c. 27. It probably arose from the practice of which a record is preserved in the directions which are given in Mabillon's Ordo ix. for the ordination of a parish priest at Rome. After the conclusion of the whole service ("expletis omnibus, missa rite completa"), the pope is to give to the new presbyter the priestly vestments, and the instruments of the mass, gold or silver, wine, corn, and oil, with which a procession is made to his parish, both the pope and the people accompanying him.

13. One ordinal, Cod. Maff., directs that if the presbyter is a "presbyter cardinalis," i.e. a parish priest, the pope shall give him a ring, saying, "To the honour of our Lord Jesus Christ and the Apostles Peter and Paul, we commit to you the church N., with its clergy and people;" this is probably the earliest form of institution.

14. The benediction follows in Codd. Maff. &c.; see above, § 10; the Sarum, Exeter, and Bangor Pontificals place it at the end of the whole office, after the communion; the Winchester Pontifical places it here.

15. The newly-ordained presbyter then gives the kiss of peace to the bishop, and to all the clergy who are present, Codd. Maff. Suession. Camerac.; the Mainz Pontif. places this rite before the benediction, and directs that the bishop shall go round to each of the newly-ordained presbyters, saying, "Pax tibi, frater, ora pro me:" the English ordinals, except Pontif. Winton., also place it immediately before the benediction, but transfer both rites to the post-communion office.

16. The communion office then proceeds: a deacon reads the Gospel: the newly-ordained presbyters make their offerings to the bishop, and receive them back from him consecrated: so Pontif. Suession. Camerac., Cod. Maff. ap. Muratori, vol. iii. p. 56, directs this generally in the case of both presbyter and deacon, but ibid. p. 68, where the ritual is of cardinal presbyters, in the later Roman sense, it directs specially that they shall offer two lighted tapers, two loaves, and two bottles (amphorae) of wine, and omits the clause which follows in the earlier rubric, "et ab eo consecratas accipiant." Mabillon's Ordo ix. directs that from these oblations the "novitii presbyteri" shall communicate for eight ensuing days. The rite is an important relic of the primitive communion, in which the bread and wine were offered to the bishop, then blessed by him, and then distributed. The rite itself fell into disuse, but one of its effects survived in the rule which is mentioned in the Soissons Pontifical, and which prevailed in some dioceses, that a presbyter should keep the bread which was consecrated at the time of his ordination for forty days, taking a portion of it every day. The rite probably survived also in the rubric of the later ordinals, that the newly consecrated presbyters should receive the host from the hands of the consecrating bishop.

17. A still more important relic of the primitive communion survived, and possibly survives still, in the theory that in this celebration the newly-ordained presbyters were "concelebrant" with the bishop. The only other instance of the survival of the same rite is that which is mentioned by Innocent III., de Sacramentis, c. 25, Migne, P. L. vol. ccxvii. 873, of the cardinal presbyters at Rome being celebrant with the pope; and it is to be noted that the significance of the rite was appreciated by mediaeval canonists, e.g., Durandus in iv. Sent. dist. 13, qu. 3, who, in spite of the statement of Innocent III., denied its existence. The elements of the historical consideration of the question will be found in Morin de Sacr. Ordin. pars iii. exercit. 8, p. 158; Catalani in Pontif. Rom. p. 1, tit. 12, § 17.

II. Eastern Rites.—1. Greek. i. The rite which is described in the Apostolical Constitutions is simply this: "In ordaining a presbyter, O bishop, put thy hand upon his head, the presbytery and the deacons standing by thee, and in praying say, . . ." (then follows a prayer that he who "by the vote and election of all the clergy has been advanced to the presbyterate" may be filled with the spirit of grace and counsel; with this prayer the ritual ends). ii. Dionysius Areopagita says that the ordinand "bends both knees before the holy altar, and has the hand of the hierarch upon his head, and in this way is consecrated by the hierarch with the invocations which make him a priest (ταῖς ἱεροποιοῖς ἐπικλήσεσι ἁγιάζεται)." Then, as in the case of deacons, follows the sign of the cross, the sacred proclamation of election (ἀνάῤῥησις), and the consummating salutation. iii. The later rituals will be found in the Euchologium, ed. Goar, p. 292; ed. Daniel, vol. iv. p. 556; Codd. Bessar. Barber. Paris. Vat. Allat. ed. Morin, p. 66, sqq.; ed. J. A. Asseman. vol. xi. p. 108, sqq.; Sym. Thessal. de Sacr. Ordin. c. 179, ed. Migne, P. G. vol. clv. 386).

IV. Time and place of Ordination.

I. TIME OF ORDINATION.—(1) Season of Ordination: There is no evidence of the existence in the earliest period of any fixed rule as to the season of the year at which appointments to ecclesiastical office might take place, and there is strong reason to believe that entrance upon office followed immediately upon appointment. The non-existence of any such rule is rendered almost certain (a) by the fact that when in the Western church in later times a rule was laid down it became necessary to invent an early authority (the decretal of Gelasius) in order to support it; (b) by the fact that in the Greek church, even to the present day, ordinations may take place at any time (except that in Lent they are limited to Saturdays and Sundays).

Several limitations of the season of ordination gradually arose in the Western church, and the rule which ultimately became established by the canon law was neither the earliest nor the only one.

1. Zeno of Verona († 380) speaks of Easter (i.e. probably Easter Day and Easter Eve) as being a special time for the promotion of clerks (ministri), and the reconciliation of penitents (S. Zenon. Veron. lib. 2, tract 50, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. xi. p. 506).

2. Leo the Great (Epist. ix. (xi.) ad Dioso. Alexand. vol. i. p. 628) has a passage which has given rise to some controversy. He says that ordinations to the priesthood or the diaconate ought not to take place on any chance day, but "post diem sabbati ejus noctis quae in prima sabbatis lucescit:" (a) According to one view, these words are to be understood as allowing ordinations only at Easter (i.e. on Easter Eve and Easter Day). In support of this view is the fact, that Leo only allowed baptisms to be celebrated at Easter and Pentecost (Epist. xvi. c. 3, i. p. 719). (b) According to another view, the words allow ordinations on Saturday night, or on the morning of any Lord's Day. This view is rendered almost certain by another passage, in which Leo, writing to Anastasius of Thessalonica, objects to the practice of limiting the restriction to the Lord's Day to the ordination of bishops, and of ordaining presbyters and deacons on any day (Epist. vi. (iv.) i. p. 610). A further corroboration of this view is the complaint which, in writing to the emperor Marcian, he makes against Anatolius; it is, that the latter had ordained a presbyter on a Friday; but nothing whatever is said about the limitation of ordinations to a particular season. (Epist. iii. ad Marcian. Imp. i. p. 1185. On the whole question see the notes of Quesnel, and the Ballerini to the passage of Leo first quoted above; and also Quesnel, Dissert. vi. de jejunio sabbati, reprinted by the Ballerini in their edition of Leo, vol. ii. p. 1069, and by Migne, P. L. vol. lv. p. 627.)

3. The ordinary practice of the bishops of Rome, which however does not appear to have been erected into a rule, and which probably grew up in the period intervening between Leo the Great and the establishment of the four seasons, was to hold ordinations in December (see Anastasius Bibliothecarius, Liber Pontificalis, passim, but especially Bianchini's ed. vol. iii. § 72; Amalarius de Div. Off. 2, 1; but Mabillon, Mus. Ital. vol. ii. p. ciii, Catalani, Com. in Pontif. Rom. pars i. tit. ii. § 12, mention various exceptions to the practice).

4. Out of the rule or usage that both ordainers and ordained must fast at the time of ordination, arose the usage which appears to have become a rule in the course of the 8th century, that ordinations must take place at the Ember seasons, i.e. at the fasts in the first, fourth, seventh, and tenth months. The rule is given in the majority of ordinals in the form "mensis primi, quarti, septimi, decimi, sabbatorum die in xii. lectionibus;" so Sacram. Gelas., Pontif. Rom. S. Dunst. Rodrad. Vat. ap. Murat. Elsewhere the particular weeks are specified, as being the first week of the first month, the second of the fourth, the third of the seventh, the fourth of the tenth; so Pontif. Egb., Hraban. Maur. de Instit. Cler. ii. 24; Conc. Mogunt. A.D. 813, c. 34, quoted as an authority by Gratian, Dist. 76, c. 2; Mabillon's Ordo ix. agrees with the preceding, except that it specifies the Saturday before Christmas; so Amalarius, de Eccl. Off. 2, 1. But although it became customary to speak of four seasons only, it is clear that ordinations in Lent were not limited to a single Saturday. In probably the oldest existing MS. which contains the rule (Fragm. Cod. Vat. ap. Muratori. Lit. Rom. Vet. vol. iii. p. 17) any time "a quinquagesima incipiente usque quinto decimo die ante pascha," appears to be allowed; and the Pseudo-Isidorian decretal, upon which subsequent usage made the rule to rest, specifies the Saturdays at the beginning and in the middle of Lent (S. Gelas. i. Epist. ix. ad Episc. per Lucan. c. 13 = Decret. General. ap. Hinschius, Decret. Pseudo-Isid. p. 652; cf. Gratian, Dist. 75, 7; D. Ivon. Carnot, Decret. 6, 74). It is, however, clear, that even after the general reception of this decretal there was some variety of usage; and the rule which ultimately prevailed, and which is recognised in the modern Roman Pontifical, appears to combine the rule of the four seasons with the earlier rule of holding ordinations at Easter.

The earliest certain instance of the observance of the four seasons as times of ordination, is in Paul the Deacon's account of Chrodegang of Metz (circ. 766) as having ordained presbyters, "as is the custom of the Roman church, on the Saturdays at the four seasons" (Paul. Diacon. de Ordine Episc. Metens. ap. Migne, P. L. vol. xcv. p. 710); but they had been previously recognised by the Roman Council of 743, c. 11, under pope Zachary; and not long afterwards the Frankish capitularies gave them a civil sanction (Statt. Rhispac. et Frising. A.D. 799, c. 7, ap. Pertz, Legum, vol. i. p. 78).

It may be convenient to add, that the modern Roman rule allows (a) the tonsure to be conferred at any time, (b) minor orders on any Sunday or double festival, (c) major orders at the times stated in the above-mentioned decretal of Alexander III.

(2) Day of Ordination.—It may be gathered from what has been said above, that even before ordination came to be restricted to certain seasons of the year they were limited in the Western church to a certain day of the week. It is antecedently probable that the more important appointments and admissions to church offices would take place on Sundays, and there is therefore reason to suppose that the Greek practice, to which Leo the Great (see above) bears witness, of ordaining bishops on Sundays, is primitive. It is difficult to trace the origin of a similar limitation in the case of presbyters and deacons. But it is in entire harmony with the general view of the nature of ordination which has been given above, that the evening of Saturday rather than Sunday should have been the customary time. The performance of the sacred functions to which they were called immediately succeeded their appointment and recognition. If the functions themselves were performed early on Sunday morning, the appointment and recognition of the officers would naturally take place on Saturday evening. Hence the Western rule, which is embodied in the Gelasian expression "die Sabbati circa vesperam."

(3) Place of Ordinations in Divine Service.—Inasmuch as admissions to ecclesiastical office in primitive times consisted in a public recognition of the officer who had been elected or appointed, followed by a performance of the duties of his office, it was natural that such admissions should take place under circumstances which admitted of such performance.

In the Western church it seems to have been customary that admissions to major orders should take place during divine service; but not even the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals give any authority for the custom, and according to Hallier, de Sacr. Elect. p. 969, later canonists sometimes inserted the words "intra missam" into a letter of the Pseudo-Anacletus in order to obtain the appearance of such authority. The custom is, however, assumed by the ordinals, all of which (but not the Missal. Franc.) direct that the declaration of election to major orders shall be made immediately after the introit ("postquam Antiphonam ad Introitum dixerint"); so Sacram. Gelas. Cod. Vat. ap. Murat., Pontif. Rem. Ratold S. Dunst. S. Elig. Senon. Noviom. Caturic. Salisb. Rotom. The place of the ceremonies of admission is less precisely defined: (1) The oldest rubric (see above, Ordination of Deacons, i.) appears to make the benediction follow immediately upon the litany which follows the declaration of election. (2) Mabillon's Ordo, viii. and almost all ordinals place the ceremonies of ordination between the epistle and gospel, before the Alleluia or Tract. (3) The Sarum Pontifical expressly places the ordination of subdeacons before the epistle, which the new subdeacon reads. (4) The Pontif. Ratold. Casanat. are apparently alone in placing all ordinations before the epistle. The majority of ordinals give no directions as to the time of admission to minor orders. The Pontif. S. Elig. places them "post communionem," the Sarum Pontifical during the lessons, before the mass proper begins.

In the Greek church there are early indications that the celebration of the Eucharist immediately followed admission to major orders, e. g. Clement. Recogn. 6, 15; Dionys. Areop. de Eccl. Hier. 6, 3, 5; although even so late as the beginning of the 9th century it is not spoken of as though it were a universal rule; e. g. by S. Theodor. Stud. Epist. lib. 2, 101. But all MSS. of the ordinals agree in making ordinations to the lectorate and subdiaconate take place outside the liturgy, and in making ordinations to major orders take place at a definite point in the liturgy. The ordination of deacons is placed after the oblation and the opening of the doors; that of presbyters after the cherubic hymn.

In the other Eastern churches there is less uniformity of usage. The Nestorian Ordinal expressly provides for the case of ordinations (except those of bishops) which are not accompanied by a celebration of the Liturgy. The Coptic ordinal places all ordinations, except to the episcopate, immediately before the preface of the anaphora. The Jacobite and Maronite ordinals place ordinations after the consecration of the elements. (For a more precise account see Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium, vol. i. p. 144.)

II. PLACE OF ORDINATION.—There does not appear to have been in the earliest times any rule as to the place in which ordination, in the sense of appointment, might be made. From the nature of the case, when appointments were made by popular suffrage, they were made in a popular assembly; hence Origen (Hom. in Levit. 6, c. 3, vol. ii. p. 216) argues from the public appointments of priests by Moses. But when they were made by the bishop or the Ordo, they were necessarily, in some cases, made under circumstances which did not admit of the gathering of an assembly in a definite place. As, for example, when, with the tacit consent of the people and the other members of the Ordo, Cyprian, and those who were with him, appointed Aurelius and Celerinus (S. Cypr. Epist. 33, 34, vol. ii. p. 320, 324). The stress which Cyprian elsewhere lays on the necessity of ordinations being made in public (id. Epist. 68, 3, vol. i. p. 1026 = Synodal letter of the council of Carthage to the clergy and people in Spain), shews that the freedom which existed as to the place of appointment was in danger of being abused, but it shews also that such freedom existed. The only conciliar regulation on the subject, which is found in the first five centuries, is that of the Conc. Laod. c. 5, which enacts that χειροτόνιαι (i.e. appointments, according to both Balsamon and Zonaras) should not take place in the presence of ἀκροώμενοι (prob. = catechumens, but according to Hefele, Councils, E. T. vol. ii. p. 301 = the class of penitents so named. See vol. i. p. 151, AUDIENTES). The reason for this rule was, that the faults of persons were freely canvassed on such occasions; and that it was inexpedient that any, except full members of the church, should take part in the election. When special buildings came to be set apart for assembly and worship, ordination naturally took place in them; and Gregory Nazianzen is indignant because the ordination of Maximus the Cynic, which was begun in a church, was finished in a private house (S. Greg. Nazianz. Poem. de vit. sua v. 909; cf. Greg. Presb. Vit. S. Greg. Nazianz. Migne, P. G. vol. xxxv. p. 282). But the point was not the sacredness of a church, but its publicity; even Theophilus of Alexandria does not do more than insist that ordinations shall not be made in secret (λαθραίως), and that when the church is at peace they shall consequently be made in church (S. Theophil. Alex. can. 7, ap. Pitra, i. 648).

The earliest regulation as to ordinations in the sense of admission to office, and the earliest positive enactment as to ordinations in any sense, is that of the civil law. Justinian (Novell. 6, c. i. 9, and c. 4, A.D. 535) enacts that admissions to ecclesiastical office must take place in the presence of all the people as a guarantee of the purity of the election. The absence of an earlier regulation, whether ecclesiastical or civil, is shewn by the fact that the later canonists were compelled to invent one; i.e. they inserted the word manifeste in Conc. Chalc. c. 6 (Gratian, Decret. 1, Dist. 70; D. Ivon. Carnot. Panorm. 3, 27). Of the very doubtful Syrian council, which is sometimes assigned to A.D. 405, and of which the canons are printed by Mansi, vol. vii. 1181, no account need be taken. When ordinations came to take place in a church, it was natural that they should, as a rule, take place in the cathedral church. At the same time there has never been any rule limiting them to the cathedral church.

In later times, when the ceremonies of admission to holy orders were interwoven with the liturgy, it was enacted that they should take place, not merely in a church, but before the altar. There is a probability that this had come to be the rule in the early part of the 7th century, inasmuch as 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 28, in providing for the readmission to office of a clerk who had been unjustly deposed, provides that the ceremonial of his original ordination shall be repeated, and this is to take place "coram altario." But the first direct enactment to this effect is that of the ordinals, which are probably at least a century later.

The rule of the modern Roman Pontifical is, that the tonsure and minor orders may be conferred in any place whatever ("quocunque loco," "ubicunque," Pontif. Rom. pars 1, tit. 2, §§ 13, 14); but the ritual assumes throughout that the place will be a church. Ordinations to holy orders must take place either in the cathedral, or, if any other place in the diocese, in the "ecclesia dignior" of the place (ib. § 22).

V. Minister of Ordination.

In the earliest period of church history when, as has been shewn above, the important element in ordination was not the act of admission to office but the act of appointment to it, the question as to who could ordain is practically identical with the question which has been already answered, as to who could take part in an appointment. The presumption is that, at least in the three primitive offices of presbyter, deacon, and reader, the whole church acted together. There was always a nomination, an election, an approval, and a declaration of election. The two latter of these functions, in the church as in the empire, devolved on the presiding officer, who, in the church, as also in the empire, frequently added to them the further function of nomination or "commendatio." But when, in course of time, a church ceased to be a complete, self-contained and organic unity, and had outlying churches dependent upon it, or was itself merged in a larger organization, and when greater importance came to be attached to the recognition by a church of its newly-appointed officer, and to the prayer for blessing upon his office, there grew up an abundant crop of questions, partly as to the limits of the rights of dependent churches to make appointments without reference to the mother church, and partly as to the limits of the rights of independent churches to act without reference to the general confederation of churches, and partly as to the unity or the plurality of the channels through which divine grace flowed, some of which questions are still unsolved, and many of which have, at various times, been the cause not only of theological controversy but of political disturbance. It is, of course, impossible here to do more than indicate the chief facts which must be taken into consideration in any general view of the subject; and, for the sake of clearness, the word ordainer will be used in its narrower sense of one who can admit to ecclesiastical office, whether the person admitted be appointed by himself or by others.

1. Ordainers of Presbyters. — i. The earliest evidence is presumably that of 1 Tim. iv. 14, where the giving of the "gift" (χάρισμα) to Timothy, is said to have been accompanied with (μετά) the "laying on of hands of the presbytery." But the evidence is ambiguous, inasmuch as it is uncertain (1) what was the precise office which Timothy filled; (2) whether the presbytery acted alone, or whether the presence of an apostle or other president is assumed, though it is not mentioned. ii. Early patristic evidence is for the most part ambiguous, on account of the ambiguity of the terms employed; e.g. in Firmilian's letter to Cyprian (S. Cyprian. Epist. 75, 7, vol. i. p. 1161), "majores natu qui et baptizandi et manum imponendi et ordinandi possident potestatem," where manum imponendi may possibly refer only to confirmation after baptism, and ordinandi only to election. iii. That the bishop and presbyters acted together is rendered probable, partly by the general character of the relations between bishops and presbyters [PRIEST], and partly by the fact that the Western church, which in many similar respects has been more conservative of ancient usages than the Eastern, has to this day retained the co-operation of bishops and presbyters in the ceremony of imposition of hands (see above: Ordination of Presbyters). iv. That the bishop could in certain cases act alone, is a probable but not a proved hypothesis. Its probability chiefly arises from the fact that in the Apostolical Constitutions, and in all eastern ordinals, though the clergy, and especially the archdeacon, as the representative of the clergy, have a place in the ritual, the bishop alone imposes his hands. v. Whether presbyters could act alone is a keenly disputed, but as yet unsolved question: (a) The case of Ischyras, who was ordained presbyter by the presbyter Colluthus of Alexandria, and whose ordination was subsequently disallowed, would hardly have been possible if the point had previously been ruled in the negative by competent authority. (For the detail of the controversy, see the letter of the Mareotic clergy to the synod of Tyre, ap. S. Athanas. Apol. c. Arian. c. 75, vol. i. p. 152): (b) The early canon (Conc. Ancyr. c. 14) which forbids chorepiscopi to ordain (χειροτονεῖν) presbyters or deacons, also forbids city presbyters to do so, except by commission from the bishop; assuming that ordination is here used in its later sense, the canon is a clear admission that presbyters are disqualified from ordaining presbyters, not by any defect inherent in their office, but on the ground which is assigned by the Apostolical Constitutions, of church order (αὕτη γάρ ἐστι τάξις ἐκκλησιαστικὴ καὶ ἁρμονία. C. A. 3, 11). It is interesting to compare with this the statement of the great antiquarian and canonist of the West in the seventh century: "sola propter auctoritatem summo sacerdoti ordinatio et consecratio reservata est, ne a multis ecclesiae disciplina vendicata concordiam solveret, scandala generaret" (Isidor. Hispal. de Eccl. Off. 2, 7): (c) In later times presbyters were no doubt disqualified, and so far did the notion of their disqualification go, that 2 Conc. Hispal. A.D. 619, c. 5, disallows the ordination of certain presbyters upon whom a bishop had laid his hands, but to whom, at the same time, a presbyter and not the bishop had given the benediction. In this respect even the dispensing power of the pope was regarded as being limited: he could commission a presbyter to confer minor but not major orders, "qui habent immediatam relationem ad corpus Christi" (St. Thom. Aquin. in IV. Sent. dist. 25, qu. 1, art. 1 = Summa Theol. suppl. in p. iii. qu. 38, art. 1). vi. The question of the right of chorepiscopi to ordain presbyters is also one of great difficulty: (a) In the fourth century chorepiscopi are found only in the East, and were probably no more than the parish priests of rural parishes; they were the first attempt at ecclesiastical organization in the direction which afterwards resulted in the parochial system; their rights in respect of ordination, which may, however, in this case mean only appointment, are strictly defined by Conc. Ancyr. A.D. 314, c. 8, 1 Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, c. 10, which give them an original right of ordaining readers, subdeacons, and exorcists, but only a deputed right of ordaining presbyters and deacons. (b) The origin and status of the French chorepiscopi of the 8th and 9th centuries is much more obscure; and the question of their right to ordain was probably the chief cause of the forgery of the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals. The genuine writings of Isidore (de Eccl. Off. lib. 2, 6) repeat the rule of the council of Ancyra, and allow chorepiscopi to ordain presbyters with the consent of the city bishop on whom they depend. But in the 9th century there appears to have been on the one hand a claim on the part of certain chorepiscopi to dispense with the necessity of such consent, and on the other hand a contention that not even with such consent could they ordain either presbyters or deacons. The controversy is one of great interest, because it involves the whole question of the validity of non-episcopal ordination; but the points involved are too intricate, and the literature too extensive, to be more than mentioned here. (The elements of the controversy will be found in the spurious letters of Damasus, de vana corepiscoporum superstitione vitanda, ap. Hinschius, Decret. Pseudo-Isidor. p. 509, of Leo the Great, ibid. p. 628 (printed also among St. Leo's works as Epist. 88, ad Germaniae et Galliae Episc., on which see Quesnel's dissertation, which is reprinted by both the Ballerini and Migne), and of John III. ibid. p. 715; in the letter of Leo III. in answer to Charles the Great's mission of Arno of Salzburg, ap. Caroli Magn. Capit. tit. iv. ed. Mansi, xiii. p. 1059; in the treatise of Hrabanus Maurus, Opusc. ii. ed. Migne, P. L. vol. cx. p. 1195, Labbe, Concil. Append. ad vol. viii.; in the letter of Nicholas I. to the archbishop of Bourges (S. Nicol. Epist. append. i. ep. 19, 1, ap. Mansi, vol. xv. 390, Migne, vol. cxix. p. 884); and in a number of synodical decrees or capitularies, the most important of which is that of the council of Meaux, A.D. 845, c. 44 (Mansi, vol. xiv. p. 829). The controversy has been reviewed by most writers on the clerical office, e.g. by Morin, de Sacr. Ordin. pars iii. exercit. 4, and by Natalis Alexander, Append. ad diss. de Episcop. super Presb. Eminentia. The best account of its history is in Weizsäcker, Der Kampf gegen den Chorepiscopat des fränkischen Reichs, Tübingen, 1859. The ultimate result of the controversy was, that in the Western church chorepiscopi ceased to exist except in name, and that the city bishops finally established their claim to be the sole channel through which the spiritual status of presbyters could be conferred.

2. Ordainers of Deacons.—What has been said above as to the competency of others than bishops to ordain presbyters, applies also, for the most part, to the case of deacons. The special closeness of the connexion between the episcopate and the diaconate gave an especially strong claim to the former to admit the latter to office. The case of Felicissimus, who was made ("constituit") deacon by Novatus (S. Cyprian, Epist. 49, vol. i. p. 728), shews that the appointment, which, from the peculiar circumstances of the case, may be held to include the admission of a deacon by a presbyter, though viewed with great disfavour, was not regarded as invalid; but the whole tendency of ecclesiastical discipline was opposed to such ordinations, and mediaeval canonists held that not even a papal dispensation could authorise them.

3. Ordainers of Minor Orders.—i. The right of city or diocesan bishops to admit to minor orders is undisputed. ii. That chorepiscopi could admit as well as appoint to minor orders, is a probable inference from Conc. Ancyr. c. 14, and Conc. Antioch. c. 10. It was allowed in the later controversies to which reference has been made above. iii. That presbyters can admit to minor orders of their own mere motion is uniformly denied; but that they can do so by commission is as uniformly asserted; e. g. by Gelasius, Epist. ad Episc. Lucan. c. 8 = Decret. General. ap. Hinschius, p. 651; see S. Thom. Aquin. Summa, suppl. in p. iii. qu. 38, art. 1, and Hallier, de Sacr. Elect. et Ordin. p. 568. iv. Abbats, provided (a) that they are presbyters; (b) that they have received episcopal benediction as abbats, can ordain readers in their own abbey according to 2 Conc. Nicaen. c. 14—a regulation which was adopted in Western canon law. (Gratian, Decret. p. i. dist. 69, c. 1; Ivo, Decret. p. 5, c. 376, 1; see also Innocent III. Epist. ann. xiii. 127, Migne, P. L. vol. ccxvi. 314.)

4. Ordainers of Clerks.—The Apostolical Constitutions, dealing probably with the period in which each church was complete in itself, do not allow presbyters to ordain even clerks (C. A. 3, 20) But in the West, when the parochial system established itself, and the rectors of rural parishes came to have a sphere of work and authority which was in many respects independent of the bishop, presbyters stood in a very different relation to the lower orders of clergy. In the 7th century they were not only allowed to admit clerks, but encouraged to do so (Conc. Emerit. A.D. 666, c. 18); and almost all the ordinals of the Gregorian type agree with Statt. Eccl. Ant. c. 10 in enacting that a singer may enter upon his office "absque scientia episcopi, sola jussione presbyteri."

VI. Re-ordination.

It is probable that in the earliest period each church defined for itself, in individual cases, the conditions upon which a person who had forfeited his office should be restored to it, or upon which the officer of another church should have his status recognised. It is also probable that, although the honorary rank which was frequently given sometimes became substantive, the state of things which is forbidden by Can. Apost. c. 68, once actually existed, and that an officer of one church who sought office in another had to undergo a second election and a second admission to office. When the age of councils began, the rules which were laid down, either for a group of churches or for the catholic church throughout the world, ordinarily specified the penalty which was incurred by a violation of them. The chief of these penalties were, a declaration of invalidity (ἄκυρος ἔστω ἡ χειροτονία), and a requirement to cease from office (πεπαύσθω ὁ τοιοῦτος τοῦ κλήρου, καθαιρείσθω). The offences to which they were affixed were chiefly, (a) violation of rules of ecclesiastical organisation, by having been ordained out of the proper church, or by other than the proper bishop; (b) simoniacal ordination; (c) ordination while in a state of lapse or heresy. [For a detailed account of the several offences, see ORDERS, HOLY: Qualifications for: Discipline of.] A person who was so deposed, or whose ordination was so declared to be null, could not become a church officer again without again going through the processes which he had gone through incompletely in the first instance: for example, Conc. Nicaen. c. 8 enacts that returning Cathari shall receive imposition of hands: id. c. 19 enacts that returning Paulianists must be both re-baptized and re-elected (ἀναβαπτισθέντες χειροτονείσθωσαν). This continued to be the practice of the church. For example, when some of the Arian clergy wished to return to the catholic faith, it was enacted that they might be admitted to office by the bishop "cum impositione manus benedictione" (1 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 511, c. 10; Conc. Cæsaraug. A.D. 592, c. 1): so in the following century, of those who were ordained "a Scottorum vel Britonum episcopis," who held schismatical views on the questions of tonsure and Easter (Poenit. Theodor. ii. 9, 1, ap. Haddan and Stubbs, vol. iii.): and so also in the following century, of those who were ordained by "episcopi ambulantes" (Pippin, Capit. Vermer. A.D. 753, § 14, ap. Pertz, Legum, vol. i. p. 23); and for those who had been unjustly degraded 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 28, prescribes the ritual of reordination.

But early in the history of the church, there had resulted from the Donatist controversy a belief in the minds of many theologians that the grace which was conferred at ordination, like that which was conferred at baptism, was inalienable; and that, in spite of lapse, the one as well as the other remained till death, and might, moreover, be communicated to others. This belief is expressed with some emphasis by St. Augustine: e.g. de Baptismo c. Donat. i. 1, vol. ix. p. 109; contra Epist. Parmen. ii. 23, vol. ix. p. 70, and is either stated or implied in Cod. Eccles. Afric. i. 27 (on which see Schelstrat ap. Van Espen, in loc.); id. c. 48; 5 Conc. Carth. c. 11; and it was again strongly asserted by Gregory the Great, Epist. ii. 46 ad Joann. Ravenn.; see also S. Leo Magn. Epist. 18 (14) ad Januar. p. 731. An isolated but important factor in the discussion is the existence of a Galatian inscription of A.D. 461, Corpus Inscr. Græc. No. 9259, which gives a record of one who was twice presbyter (δὶς γενόμενος πρεσβύτερος).

VII. Literature.

The literature of ordination is extensive, but the following will be found to be the most important references: 1. The early authorities and ordinals, for which see ORDINAL. 2. The early mediæval antiquarians, Isidore of Seville (de Ecclesiasticis Officiis), Albinus Flaccus (Alcuin) (de Divinis Officiis), Amalarius (de Ecclesiasticis Officiis), Hrabanus Maurus (de Institutione Clericorum) (which four treatises, with others, will be found printed together in Hittorp. de Divinis Catholicæ Ecclesiæ Officiis, Cologne, 1568). 3. The French liturgical writers of the 17th century: Hallier (de Sacris Electionibus et Ordinationibus), Paris, 1636; Morin (de Sacris Ecclesiæ Ordinationibus), Paris, 1655; Thomassin (Ancienne et Nouvelle Discipline de l'Eglise), ed. i. Paris, 1677; Martene (de Antiquis Ecclesiæ Ritibus), ed. i. Rouen, 1700 (quoted above from the Bassano edition of 1788), to which may be added Catalani's notes to his edition of the Pontificale Romanum, Rome, 1751 (reprinted at Paris in 1851).

ORDO. A directory for the due performance of any sacred rite. An ordo might (1) contain directions only, or (2) it might give the prayers also. [LITURGICAL BOOKS, p. 1008.]

For several centuries the prayers in the sacramentaries were not accompanied by sufficient directions for their proper use. The rubrics in the liturgies of St. James and St. Mark are very few and brief compared with those of the present Greek office. The same difference is observable when we compare the Gelasian Sacramentary and the earlier copies of the Gregorian with the later copies of the latter; and so again when we compare the old Gallican missals, disused from the 8th century, with the Hispano-Gothic, which was in use, and undergoing changes, down to the end of the eleventh. This paucity of directions would cause great inconvenience, especially when ceremonies were multiplied to the degree of which St. Augustine complains (Ep. 55, ad Januar. 19, § 35), and a supplementary book of instructions in ceremonial would be found equally necessary with that from which the prayers were learnt. In the West this want was met by the compilation of a book to which, before long, the conventional name of Ordo attached itself. In Gaul, in the 8th century, each priest was required to describe his own practice in writing, and to present this "libellus ordinis" to the bishop in Lent for his approbation, "rationem et ordinem ministerii sui, sive de baptismo, sive de fide catholica, sive de precibus et ordine missarum" (Capit. Karlomanni, A.D. 742, in Baluz. Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 824). In the same age, about 730, as it is supposed, appeared the "libellus ordinis Romani," or "Ordo Romanus," a directory for the use of the bishops of Rome and its suburbicarian dioceses (Ord. Rom. i. § 28; Mus. Ital. ii. 17) in the first instance, but which became, in time, so far as it could, a guide to all the priests who used the Roman offices. Mabillon has printed three libelli de Missa Pontificali (Ord. i. ii. iii. u. s. 1–60), which may be called three editions, differing little in age, of the same directory; two others, de Missa Episcopali (v. vi. 64–76), which, from the celebrant being called episcopus as frequently as pontifex and from other indications, appear to be intended for the use of any bishop; one "Ordo Scrutinii ad electos, qualiter debeat celebrari" (vii. 77–84); and two concerning the ordination of the clergy (viii. ix. 35–94)[ORDINAL]; all of which were, in the judgment of the editor, "written before the 9th or 10th century" (Comment. Prævv. ix.). One of the libelli de Missa Episcopali above-mentioned, speaks of the strictly Roman book from which it was derived as Romanus Ordo (O. vi. 8, p. 73); and under this name a directory authorised by Rome was adopted in Gaul towards the end of the 8th century: "Unusquisque presbyter missam ordine Romano cum sandaliis celebret" (Capitularia Reg. Franc. v. 371). Penitents were to be reconciled, "sicut in sacramentario, et in Ordine Romano, continetur" (ibid. vii. 202, and Canones Isaaci Ling. i. 35). Amalarius of Metz, about 820, wrote a commentary on parts of Ordo ii. (Mus. Ital. ii. 42–51) under the title of "Eglogae in Ordinem Romanum," first printed by Baluze (Capit. Reg. Fr. ii. 1352); then by Mabillon (u. s. p. 549), in the body of which he also names the libellus absolutely "Romanus Ordo." He also frequently refers to this, and to the apparently earlier form of it, Ordo i. (u. s. 3–40) in his work De Ecclesiasticis Officiis. There it is "Libellus Romanus" (i. 17; iii. 27), "Libellus Romani Ordinis" (i. 30), or "Libellus qui continet Romanum Ordinem" (i. 21). In his treatise, De Antiphonario, he again calls it simply "Romanus Ordo" (c. 52). There also he recognizes the existence of more than one such directory: "Scripta quae continent per diversos libellos Ordinem Romanum" (ibid.).

That the Ordo Romanus was later than the sacramentary, and ancillary to it, is evident from a reference to the latter in Ordo i. On Wednesday in holy week the bishop "dicit orationes solemnes, sicut in sacramentorum (libro) continetur" (c. 28, p. 19). But at length many of the directions of the Ordo were incorporated with the sacramentary, and thus became "rubrics." Compare, for example, the rubrics peculiar to Codex Eligianus, from which Ménard prints (Opp. S. Greg. tom. iii. 62, 64, Wednesday in holy week; 65, Maundy Thursday, &c.) with Ord. Rom. i. § 28, 30, &c. The earliest Ordo was at least re-written after the time of Charlemagne, whom it thus mentions: "Sabbato tempore Adriani institutum est, ut flecteretur pro Carolo rege" (24, comp. § 28). Usher supposes that it was originally compiled about 730 (Cave, Hist. Lit. in v. Ordo Rom.).

(2) An office of prayer, with its rubrics, was also called Ordo. Thus in the Besançon sacramentary of the 7th century, "Incipit Ordo Baptismi" (Mus. Ital. i. 323); in a Roman sacramentary of the 9th, "Ordo vero qualiter catacizantur (sic) est ita" (Cod. Gellon. in Marten. Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. i. 18; Ord. 6); "Ordo ad infirmum caticuminum (sic) faciendum vel baptizandum" (ibid. Ord. 7); "Incipit Ordo ad poenitentiam dandam" (Ex eod. cod. u. s. i. vi. 7; Ord. 6), etc. Ratio was sometimes used in the same sense; as, "Incipit Ratio ad dandam poenitentiam" (ibid. i. vi. 3, Ord. 2; sim. Ord. 10), "Ratio qualiter Domus Dei consecrandus est" (Pontificale Ecgberhti, 26; ed. Surtees Soc.).

Literature.—In 1561, George Cassander printed at Cologne four ancient "Libelli Ordinis Romani;" A. "Ordo Processionis ad Ecclesiam sive Missam secundum Romanos;" B. "Ordo Processionis quando Episcopus festivis diebus Missam celebrare voluerit," &c.; C. "In nomine Domini incipit Liber de Romano Ordine, qualiter celebrandum sit Officium Missae;" D. "Incipit Ordo Ecclesiasticus Romanae Ecclesiae, vel qualiter Missa celebratur." In 1568, Melchior Hittorp reprinted these at Cologne in his collection of tracts, De Divinis Eccl. Cath. Officiis, in the order, as compared with that of Cassander, A, B, D, C. To these he added a very long "Ordo Romanus Antiquus de reliquis Anni totius Officiis ac Ministeriis," compiled from several "libelli ordinis" of very different dates, as it appears, probably by Bernold of Constance, A.D. 1666, which was republished from another MS. with considerable variations by Martin Gerbert, Monum. Vet. Liturgiae Alemannicae, P. III. p. 186, typis San. Blas. 1777. The libelli of Cassander reappeared in the Mus. Ital. of Mabillon, with two others within our time, if we mistake not, and many later. His order is that of the apparent dates; D (much enlarged); A; C; iv. "Fragmentum Vet. Ord. Rom. Missa Pontificali" (complete at the end of Amalarius, Eclogae, Baluz. Cap. Reg. Fr. ii. 1361; whence Mabill. u. s. 559 and 61); v. "Ordo Rom. u. s. de Missa Episcopali (primus);" B. L. A. Muratori has transcribed the earliest of these (Mabill. i. Cass. D) into his Liturgia Romana Vetus (tom. ii. p. 973) from Mabillon. Gerbert also gives D (the first part of Mab. i.) in his Monum. u. s. p. 144, from a MS. of the 9th century. [W. E. S.]

OREMUS (δεηθῶμεν). This is the signal, or invitation, to the people to join in spirit in the prayer which is to follow. In the West, except in Spain and perhaps Gaul, both the invitation and the prayer were uttered by the priest, who was said respectively orationem indicere and dare. In the East it belonged to the deacon's office to "bid" the prayers; and the earlier and full form, of which the Clementine Liturgy and that of St. James give several examples, consisted in the deacon announcing the topics of prayer to the people clause by clause, while they responded Κύριε ἐλέησον, or some corresponding ejaculation, at the close of which the priest summed up the petitions in a collect. It is possibly a trace of a similar custom that we find in the Gelasian Sacramentary for certain days (e.g. lib. i. 41, Ordo de feria vi. passione Domini) such directions as these: "Sacerdos dicit Oremus, et adnuntiat diaconus Flectamus genua. Et post paululum dicit Levate. Et dat orationem." Similarly, Ordo Romanus I. (Mabillon, Mus. Ital. tom. ii. p. 22, &c.). That in Africa the priest bade the prayers may be inferred from St. Aug. Ep. 217, ad Vitalem, § 2 (Migne, tom. ii. 978), where he says "quando audis sacerdotem Dei ad altare exhortantem populum Dei orare pro incredulis," &c. In Spain and Gaul it appears that the deacon gave the invitation, while the priest pronounced the prayer (cf. Isid. Hispal. de Eccles. Off. lib. ii. cap. 8: "Ipsi (sc. diaconi) clara voce in modum praeconis admonent cunctos, sive in orando, sive in flectendo genua, sive in psallendo, sive in lectionibus audiendo"; and immediately afterwards "illi (sacerdoti) orare, huic (diacono) psallere mandatur." The sermon attributed to Caesarius of Arles, among the Sermones Supposit. of St. Augustine, tom. v. app. Serm. 286, §§ 1, 7, suggests the same conclusion. [PRAECO; PROSPHONESIS.]

In the present Mozarabic Liturgy, "Oremus" is only said twice, viz. before the "Agyos," and before the Capitulum, which introduces the Lord's Prayer.

It is worth while to notice the occurrence of the word in the Roman Missal, just before the offertory, where no spoken prayer follows it. This probably marks the place of some variable prayer, answering (it may be) to the Ambrosian Oratio super sindonem, which has become disused. (See Pseudo-Alcuin de Div. Off. cap. 'de Celebratione Missae,' and Amal. de Eccles. Off. lib. iii. cap. 19.)

The ordinary use of the word in any of the offices is to mark the beginning of a set prayer, to be said by the priest aloud, in which the people only concur by the concluding "Amen," in contradistinction to some other form of prayer, e.g. by versicles and responses, or some other act of worship.

ORGAN. The name "organum" was at first not restricted to a particular instrument, but appears to have nearly become so by St. Augustine's time. Commenting on Psalm cl. he says: "Nam cum organum vocabulum graecum sit, ut dixi, generale omnibus musicis instrumentis, hoc cui folles adhibentur alio Graeci nomine appellant. Ut autem organum dicatur, magis Latina et ea vulgaris est consuetudo." And—"Quamvis jam obtinuerit consuetudo ut organa proprie dicantur ea quae inflantur follibus." So from his enarr. on Psalm lvi. (our 57th), "non solum illud organum dicitur quod grande est et inflatur follibus, sed quicquid aptatur ad cantilenam," we also learn that organs were of considerable size. In the same comment he applies the term "organum" to the cithara and the psalterium.

For a full account of the history of this instrument the reader must be referred to Dr. Rimbault's portion of Hopkins and Rimbault's excellent work on this subject. There it is conclusively proved that the first epoch which distinguishes the antique organ from the mediaeval one, viz., the invention of the keyboard, is very nearly synchronous with that which distinguishes antique from mediaeval music, the invention of the stave, being about the end of the 11th century. Up to this time it would appear that organs only differed in size and number of pipes, and in the appliances for supplying wind. The article "Hydraula" in Smith's Dict. Greek and Rom. Antiq. gives the earliest form of it.

Athenaeus says that it was invented by Ctesibius, of Alexandria, from a contrivance applied to a clepsydra, in order to announce the hours at night. This contrivance is attributed to Plato, but it seems very doubtful, because it is only said of him as a tradition (λέγεται), and Aristoxenus was not acquainted with the thing; he, being not far removed from Plato's date, and professedly writing on music, would be likely to have known of such an invention of Plato's (if it were so). The organ of Ctesibius is of course much later (Athen. Deipn. iv. 23).

The organ is simply a development of the Syrinx or Pandean pipe, and in its earliest form consisted of a small box into the top of which a row of pipes was inserted; the wind was supplied from the performer's mouth by means of a tube at one end; and any pipe was made to sound by means of drawing a slide which would open the hole in which the pipe was placed; the slide being pushed in again, the hole was closed, and the communication between the pipe and the box being thus cut off, the sound immediately ceased. In modern organs, for these slides have been substituted valves or pallets.

The first object seemed to be to augment the sound, by multiplying the number of pipes which would be in unison with each other; and Ctesibius has the reputation of having invented, or rendered practicable, the perforated slide, which enabled the performer to have the pipes more under command. This will be best understood by the following figure, which represents the holes in which the pipes stand.

. . . . . .

[This would be now technically called an organ of three stops.]

Each of the slides mentioned before would cover one of the vertical columns in the above figure, and Ctesibius's slides would cover one of the horizontal rows; the modern analogue of the latter is the "register" or "stop." If three cards be taken pierced with holes exactly as in the figure, and the one be kept whole, and the others divided into sections containing respectively a vertical column and a horizontal row, so as to be movable, and the three be placed over each other, the action will be clearly seen.

The increase in the number of pipes required also artificial methods for supplying wind; the bellows was adopted, and by the time of the emperor Julian the Apostate had become so large as to be made of a bull's hide. This appears from an epigram of his:

'Αλλ' ὑπὸ ταυρείῃ προσορᾶν σπήλυγγος ἀήτης
Νάρθεν αἰτηρῶν καλάμων ὑπὸ ῥίζαν ὀδόντας.

Thus the organ became a complicated instrument. Tertullian (de Animâ, xiv.) uses it as a similitude for the many members composing one body. "Specta portentissimam Archimedis munificentiam, organum hydraulicum dico, tot membra, tot partes, tot compagines, tot itinera vocum, tot compendia sonorum, tot commercia modorum, tot acies tibiarum, et una moles erunt omnia." It would seem from this that the organ was constructed so as to be played in the various modes, Dorian, Lydian, &c., and thus supplied with pipes all the sounds of the complete "system"; if the "modi" here be understood to include the "Genera," we should have an organ of a compass of three octaves and a tone, with some quarter-tones in it; but it might be much smaller than this. The "compendia sonorum" would appear to be slides, to cut off the wind altogether, or from some of the ranks of pipes, i.e. our modern "stops" (the horizontal rows in the figure given above); and the "itinera vocum" would probably be the row of pipes belonging to the same note (the vertical columns in the figure).

So St. Augustine (on Psalm cl.): "Quibus fortasse ideo addidit organum, non ut singulae sonent, sed ut diversitate concordissima consonent, sicut ordinantur in organo." Thus the organ would be likened to a whole combination of different musical instruments.

The wind was supplied either directly from a bellows worked by hand (in some cases worked by the weight of a man standing on it), constituting a "pneumatic" organ; or the wind from the bellows was subjected to a water pressure to steady its supply, constituting an "hydraulic" organ. The latter sort was at first considered the better, but afterwards it was superseded by the other.

Vossius (de Poematum Cantu) says that the use of hydraulic organs had ceased at the time of Cassiodorus (6th century), and this author is cited as mentioning organs as in common use. He gives the following quotation from Claudian:

> "Vel qui, magna levi detrudens murmura tactu,
> Innumeras voces segetis modulatur aheneæ,
> Intonat erranti digito penitusque traball
> Vecte laborantes in carmina concitat undas."

From this it appears that the pipes were frequently made of bronze, and the sound produced by drawing the slides.

This practice was continued as late as the time of St. Dunstan; the pipes are then described as "aereae fistulae" (W. Malmesb. Vita S. Aldhelmi).

Vossius tells us that the barbarians tried unsuccessfully to make hydraulic organs, and so usually they were made pneumatic, with leather bellows, but that the hydraulic ones were still considered superior. He quotes Cassiodorus's description of one: "organum est quasi turris quaedam diversis fistulis fabricata, quibus flatu follium vox copiosissima destinatur [var. lect. distinetur]; et ut eam modulatio decora componat, linguis quibusdam ligneis ab interiori parte construitur, quas disciplinabiliter magistrorum digiti reprimentes, grandisonam efficiunt et suavissimam cantilenam."

There is a very singular poem representing an organ, by Publilius Porphyrius Optatianus (4th century); something in the style of the "Altars," "Easter Wings," &c. of George Herbert. One thing seems to be clear from this poem, that the longest pipe, and therefore the bass of the organ, was at the performer's right hand, precisely contrary to our present arrangement, but analogous to that of the harp, so far as the right hand of the performer is concerned. This arrangement was probably adopted as corresponding to that of the strings of the lyre. It appears from the latter part of this poem that the pipes were made of bronze, and arranged in ranks in a quadrangular form, as in the figure given above, and these appear to have been the slides worked by the performer, to open and shut the holes in which the pipes were placed; the wind being supplied by a number of youths each in charge of a bellows.

A representation preserved in Gori's Thesaurus Diptychorum (said to be from a MS. of the time of Charlemagne) seems to agree with this very well. King David on a throne, playing a lyre, is accompanied by three men on a trumpet, a sort of violin or barbiton, and a set of bells (or perhaps cymbals); and further off is a pneumatic organ, with the performer (seated at the extreme right, in the semicircular part of the drawing) working the slides, and another blowing the bellows. It would seem most probable that the king is viewing one end of the organ, so as to see both the organist and the bellows-blower, they being on opposite sides of the instrument. This would put the longest, i.e. the bass, pipes opposite the organist's right hand. (See cut No. 1.)

At this end of the organ appear to be two other slides, and these would seem most probably to be registers or stops, running under a rank of pipes such as that shown in the drawing; there would, therefore, be another similar rank behind these; this organ would be of two stops, unless some more were understood. The slides worked by the performer would run transversely to the ranks of pipes, and each slide would open two (or perhaps more) pipes of the same sound. The performer seems to be pulling one slide out and pushing another in, thus passing from one note of his tune to the following note. He had, previously to his performance, it would seem, gone to the bass end of the instrument, and drawn out two stops.

The use of organs in churches is, on the authority of Platina and others, ascribed to pope Vitalian (658–672); but Lorinus gives it a higher antiquity. "Julianus, unus de auctoribus catenae in Job multo antiquior Vitaliano et Gregorio magno, ait cum pietate organa usurpari posse, et jam in templis usum illorum fuisse cum scriberet." "In Concilio Coloniensi praecipitur sic adhiberi organorum in templis melodiam, ut non lasciviam magis quam devotionem excitet, et ut praeter hymnos divinos canticaque spiritualia, quidquam resonet ac repraesentet. Pontifex in Capella, et graves quidam relligiosi, eorum abstinent usu." But in England the contrary practice obtained, as the monastic churches were generally provided with organs, as appears from the account of the death of king Edgar (Sir H. Spelman, Glossary, s. v. Organ): but it does not appear that they were in use in any other churches. (Compare MUSIC, p. 1346.)

In 797 an organ was sent to king Pepin, by the emperor Constantine (tract by an unknown author, quoted in Hawkins, Hist. of Music, p. 238), and an hydraulic one was erected at Aix-la-Chapelle in 826, for Louis the Pious, by one George, or rather Gregory, a Venetian, after the Greek manner (Vossius, de Poematum Cantu); but though the writers of that age had praised Gregory's undertaking, they did not say whether it was a success. An organ was also sent to Charlemagne, by the Caliph Haroun Alraschid, and was probably placed in one of the churches of Aix-la-Chapelle.

S. Aldhelm (de Laude Virginum) is quoted in proof that the external pipes of organs in Saxon times were gilded. The quotation hitherto given consists of the last three lines of the following extract:—

> "Si vero quisquam chordarum resputt odas
> Et potiora cupit quam pulset pectine chordas
> Quis Psalmista pius psallebat cantibus olim,
> Ac mentem magno gestit modulamine pasci
> Et cantu gracili refugit contentus adesse,
> Maxima millenis auscultans organa flabris,
> Mulceat auditum ventosis follibus iste,
> Quamlibet auratis fulgescant caetera capsis."

It appears to the writer of this article that the contrary is rather proved—that the beautiful appearance arising from gilding, &c., refers to other instruments, and that the organ had to appeal for its adoption to considerations of sound only, and had the disadvantage of an unpleasing appearance. Certainly the representations of it are not very attractive to the sight. But this passage does prove that organs in the 7th and 8th centuries were large, although "millenis" must be considered somewhat indefinite. So St. Augustine, "quod grande est" above. Not much later than our period an organ was erected at Winchester, with fourteen bellows and 400 pipes, 40 to each key. This also had the "lyric semitone," and it would seem most probable that its compass was

It was blown by 70 (?) men, and played on by two monks: "Et regit alphabetum rector uterque suum," which apparently means that one managed the slides that caused the pipes to speak, and the other managed the ranks of pipes to be used; in modern parlance, one playing on the keyboard, the other shifting the stops; only these were later improvements (see Wolstan's poem, quoted in Hopkins and Rimbault, p. 16); or it might possibly mean that the set of slides was distributed between these two men to manage, the one, perhaps, taking the lower portion, and the other the upper, making, in fact, a duet performance, which might be a very considerable advantage in accompanying the plain-song, when we remember that every sound produced involved the drawing of a slide and pushing it in again.

The accompanying engraving (No. 2) from the Utrecht psalter represents an organ of the 8th century; a better and larger instrument is represented in an Anglo-Saxon MS. now in the Library of Trinity College, Cambridge, and is engraved in Hopkins and Rimbault's Book on the Organ, p. 18.* (See cut No. 3.)

It is there described as a pneumatic organ; but the writer cannot help thinking that the cylinders in the basement are intended to hold water, and thus make it an hydraulic organ.

The smaller of these contains eight pipes, apparently arranged in two tetrachords, to each of which is assigned an organist; which somewhat bears out the supposition of a duet performance mentioned just above; the most plausible supposition for the compass seems to be—

No. 2. Organ. From Utrecht Psalter. Westwood's Facsimiles of Anglo-Saxon and Irish MSS.

No. 3. Organ. From MS. Psalter of Eadwine, in Trinity College Library.

* The earliest known representation of this instrument seems to be that on the south bas-relief of the pedestal of the obelisk of Thothmes, still standing in the Atmeidan or Hippodrome of Constantinople. It dates from A.D. 390. See Texier and Pullan, Byzantine Architecture, p. 18. [R. St. J. T.]

the synemmenon and diernymenon tetrachords. The other has ten pipes, which might be imagined to be—

If this be true, the bass pipes had got placed at the performer's left hand, as we have got them now. It is not at all evident how these men were conceived as playing; they are placed behind the organ, and of course the slides they had to manipulate are out of sight; possibly the artist may be representing them as about to commence, and giving directions to their four bellows-blowers to give them plenty of wind to start with. ORIENS, bishop of Auscium, commemorated May 1. (Usuard. Mart.); ORIENTIUS (Hieron. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Mai. i. 61.) [C. H.]

ORIENTATION. A term applied to the situation of churches, with the sanctuary, or part containing the altar, towards the east.

One of the earliest traces of orientation is found in the Apostolic Constitutions (ii. 57), "And first let the house be oblong, turned towards the east, the pastophoria on either side towards the east." It is asserted, indeed, by Mabillon (de Liturgia Gallicana, i. 8), when speaking of the ancient churches, that "they all used to end in an apsis or bow, and used to look towards the east." This statement, however, needs some qualification. For the church of Antioch is described by Socrates (Hist. Eccl. lib. v. cap. 22), who says that "it had its position inverted; for its altar looks not towards the East, but towards the West." Paulinus speaks of the orientation of a church, not as the universal or obligatory usage, but only as "morem usitatiorem." On the whole, it appears that the eastern position of the altar was the rule, but that there were exceptions to it from very early times. For the origin of this usage, see EAST, p. 586.

In the attempt to form an opinion upon the subject we must not lose sight of the fact that others besides Christians have had a rule of the kind. There is an elaborate discussion of the point in the Lexicon Universale of Hofmann (s. v. Occidens). He shews, upon the authority of Josephus, that both in the tabernacle and in the temple the arrangements of the structure were such as to cause the Jewish worshippers to face, not towards the east, but towards the west, in the functions of religion. Maimonides (On Prayer, cap. xi. 1, 2) traces the usage to a still higher antiquity, finding evidence in Scripture itself that such was the position adopted by Abraham upon Mount Moriah—a position which amongst the Jews was not confined to tabernacle and temple, but extended likewise to synagogue and prayer-house. He adds a reason of the usage—that inasmuch as the gentile heathen faced toward the east, it was proper that the people of God should adopt the opposite position. Under this head the following passage from a vision of Ezekiel is relevant: "And he brought me into the inner court of the Lord's house, and, behold, at the door of the temple of the Lord, between the porch and the altar, were about five and twenty men, with their backs toward the temple of the Lord and their faces toward the east; and they worshipped the sun toward the east" (Ezek. viii. 16). There is some difficulty in harmonizing the statements of Vitruvius and other pagan writers of authority as to the orientation of the altar, the sacred image, and the worshipper in the temples of the heathen. But the following passage of Clement of Alexandria may perhaps be taken as giving a clear and accurate account of their usage: "The most ancient temples (of the pagans) looked towards the west (i.e. had their entrance towards the west), that those who stood with their face towards the image might be taught to turn towards the east" (Strom. vii. 7, § 43). Hence the practice of orientating a church may be, in its origin, one of those many customs which Christianity found current in the pagan world, and which by a wise economy it took up and turned to its own purpose. A long discourse on the entire subject will be found by those who wish to pursue it farther in the Annals of cardinal Baronius (Ann. 58, c. 105). [H. T. A.]

ORLEANS, COUNCILS OF (AURELIANENSIA CONCILIA). (1) A.D. 511, by order of Clovis; on the tenth day of the fifth month according to some MSS. which the rest make July (shewing that the Gallican year began then in March), as the authors of L'Art de vérif. les Dates observe, presided over by Cyprian, metropolitan of Bordeaux, who subscribed first, with thirty-one bishops, all of whose sees are given, after him, the bishop of Orleans as low down as last but two. The Isidorian collection, however, may be thought to discredit this order. The number of canons passed was likewise thirty-one; "dont quelques uns," say the same authorities, "entreprennent sur la jurisdiction civile. Tel est le quatrième qui ordonne que les fils, les petits-fils, et les arrière-petits-fils de ceux qui ont vécu dans la cléricature, demeureront sous le pouvoir et la jurisdiction de l'évêque. Les pères de l'assemblée dans le cinquième reconnaissent que toutes les églises tiennent du Roi les fonds dont elles sont dotées; c'est là, si l'on croit un moderne, le fondement de la Régale. On ne pouvait guère la tirer de plus loin." In the earlier part of the fourth, which they inadvertently call the sixth canon, it is ordained that no secular person shall be taken for any clerical office, except by command of the king or with consent of the judge. Of the rest, the first three prescribe rules for different persons who have taken sanctuary. By the eighth, any bishop knowingly ordaining a slave unknown to his master is mulcted to his master of twice his price. By the ninth, a deacon or presbyter committing a capital crime, is to be removed from his office and from communion. By the sixteenth, bishops are bound to relieve the poor, sick, and disabled, to the utmost of their power. By the eighteenth, no brother may marry the widow of his deceased brother. By the nineteenth, monks are to obey their abbat, and abbats the bishops. The twenty-sixth says: "cum ad celebrandas missas in Dei nomine convenitur, populus non ante discedat quam missae solennitas compleatur; et, ubi episcopus fuerit, benedictionem accipiat sacerdotis." The twenty-seventh: "rogationes, id est, litanias ante ascensionem Domini ab omnibus ecclesiis placuit celebrari; ita ut praemissum triduanum jejunium in Dominicae ascensionis festivitate solvatur." . . The last: "episcopus, si infirmitate non fuerit impeditus, ecclesiae cui proximus fuerit die Dominico deesse non liceat." A short letter from these bishops to the king is preserved, begging him to confirm what they had decreed, if it met with his approval. Many more canons are given to this council by Burchard and others. (Mansi, viii. 347–72.)

(2) A.D. 533, or 536 according to Mansi, June 23; by order of the kings of France, when twenty-one canons on discipline were passed, to which Honoratus, bishop of Bourges, subscribed first, Leontius, bishop of Orleans, second, with twenty-four bishops and five representatives of absent bishops after them. As regards their matter, the seven first relate to bishops, metropolitans, and councils; the eighth and ninth to deacons and presbyters; the tenth and eleventh to marriage. By the thirteenth, abbats, guardians of shrines (martyrarii), recluses, and presbyters, are inhibited from giving letters of peace (epistolia: which is, however, the correction of Du Cange, for apostolia, which he cannot explain). "Presbyter, vel diaconus sine literis," says the sixteenth, "vel si baptizandi ordinem nesciat, nullatenus ordinetur." The seventeenth and eighteenth are directed against deaconesses, of whom no more are to be ordained. By the nineteenth, Jews and Christians may not intermarry. By the twentieth, Catholics who go back to idolatry, or partake of meats offered to idols, are to be excluded from church-assemblies. By the twenty-first, abbats refusing to obey bishops are to be excluded from communion. This council is not given in the Isidorian collection. (Mansi, viii. 835–40.)

(3) A.D. 538, May 7, the preface to which seems hardly consistent with so short an interval between this and the last council; and this, on the other hand, is given in the Isidorian collection. It was attended by nineteen bishops, of whom the metropolitan of Lyons subscribed first, and the bishop of Orleans last, and by the representatives of seven absent bishops. Thirty-three canons on discipline were passed, most of them testifying to a general neglect of the canons from the metropolitan downwards, and some of them not easy to understand. [COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 419.] The thirtieth forbids Jews to mix with Christians from Maundy Thursday till Easter Monday. The thirty-first threatens the civil judge with excommunication who permits heretics to rebaptize Catholics with impunity, because, say the bishops, "it is certain that we have Catholic kings." (Mansi, ix. 9–22.)

(4) A.D. 541, when the metropolitan of Bordeaux presided and subscribed first of thirty-eight bishops, the last being the bishop of Orleans, and the twelve following him the representatives of absent bishops. Thirty-eight canons were passed; but it is to be observed that neither this nor the next council is included in the Isidorian collection. The first and second canons relate to Easter. The fifteenth and sixteenth shew that paganism was not yet extinct in France; the seventeenth that there were priests and deacons who were married men, though it prohibits their living as such; the twentieth decrees: "Ut nullus saecularium personarum, praetermisso pontifice, seu praeposito ecclesiae, quemquam clericorum pro sua potestate constringere, discutere audeat, vel damnare . . ." The twenty-seventh renews the tenth canon of the preceding council of Orleans "three years before," and likewise the thirtieth of that of Epaune A.D. 517, against incestuous marriages. (Mansi, ix. 111–22).

(5) A.D. 549, Oct. 28, convened by king Childebert, when, according to some manuscripts, the bishop of Lyons, according to others, the bishop of Arles subscribed first, and the other second; forty-eight more bishops and twenty-one representatives of absent bishops complete the list; but the bishop of Orleans was not among them, having been unjustly banished, though he was restored here. Twenty-four canons were passed, the first of which is somewhat after date, directed against the followers of Eutyches and Nestorius. The second ordains, "Ut nullus sacerdotum quemquam rectae fidei hominem pro parvis et levibus causis a communione suspendat . . ."; the ninth, "Nullus ex laicis absque anni conversione praemissâ episcopus ordinetur. . .", and the twelfth, "Nulli viventi episcopo alius superponatur aut superordinetur episcopus; nisi forsitan in ejus locum, quem capitalis culpa dejecerit." The fifteenth relates to a hospice (xenodochium) founded at Lyons by the king and his consort (Mansi, ix. 127–40).

(6) A.D. 638, "ou environ," say the authors of L'Art de vérif. les Dates, but it is variously fixed, and the sole authority for it is a vague statement by Audoenus, archbishop of Rouen, in his Life of St. Eligius, to the effect that an un-named heretic was confuted in a meeting of bishops at Orleans, due to the exertions of that saint previously to his being made bishop. It can hardly pass, therefore, for a sixth council. (Mansi, x. 759–62.)

It is mentioned by Caesarius of Arles, among the things which he forbids to be introduced into convents, "plumaria et acupictura et omne polymitum vel stragula, sive ornaturae" (Reg. ad Virg. c. 42; Patrol. lxvii. 1116; cf. Recap. c. 11, ib. 1118). ORPHANAGE (ὀρφανοτροφεῖον, orphanotrophium). From the very first the duty of assisting the orphan, among the other classes of destitute and helpless persons, was recognised as incumbent on the Christian. St. Ignatius (Ep. ad. Smyrn. cap. vi.) mentions it as one of the marks of the heterodox that "they care not for the widow, the orphan, or the distressed." Again and again in the Apostolical Constitutions exhortations are given concerning them to the bishop to protect them, to individual Christians to remember them in their charity and, if possible, to adopt them. The way in which they are enumerated in the Clementine Liturgy in the Deacon's Litany, along with "Readers, singers, virgins and widows," suggests that perhaps there may have been some sort of formal "church roll" kept of them, and it is obvious that so long as the church was a proscribed and persecuted religious body, her provision for them could not have gone beyond some such institution as this. With the time of Constantine came endowments for this and similar purposes, which he formally permitted, and himself set the example of giving. (Euseb. H. E. x. 6, and Vit. Const. iv. 28). It was looked upon as a fitting duty for a cleric to undertake the guardianship of orphans, and in managing their affairs even to mingle in secular business (Conc. Chalced. c. 3). Clerics seem commonly to have been at the head of orphanages and hospitals (Zonaras in can. 8, Conc. Chalced.). At Constantinople the orphanotrophus, who was necessarily a priest, and who was a public guardian of the orphans, was an official of high rank. [HOSPITALS.]

By a Frankish capitulary (Conc. Germ. ii. 29) immunities are granted to orphanages expressly, along with other charitable foundations; shewing that by the beginning of the 9th century such institutions were widely recognised.

Both at Rome and Constantinople orphans from the orphanage were employed as choristers; so that in some Greek rituals (see Goar, p. 359) the word ὀρφανοί is used for "choir-boys," and at Rome (see Anast. Biblioth. in Vita Sergii II.) the orphanotrophium came to be used as the Schola Cantorum. [C. E. H.]

OSTIANUS, presbyter and confessor in Vivarois; commemorated June 30. (Usuard. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. v. 578.) [C. H.]

OSTIARIUS (θυρωρὸς, πυλωρὸς, ὀστίαριος). It is argued by Bingham (Antiq. iii. 6) that the order of ostiarii was introduced at Rome in a time of persecution, the earliest mention of them being in a letter of Cornelius, bishop of Rome, in the 3rd century (Euseb. Hist. vi. 43). The order has been laid aside in the Greek church from the time of the Trullan council (A.D. 692). But whatever may have been the date of the introduction of the ostiarius as a functionary of the church, the word was certainly used in a very similar sense in pagan times. For not only was there an ostiarius (the modern concierge) at the entrance of a private house under the Roman empire; but while the basilica was still a court of justice it had an officer (ostiarius) whose duty it was to regulate the approach of the litigants to the judge, and whose name still survives in the French term huissier, and the English usher, applied to officials who are charged with similar duties. (See Hofmann, Lex Univ. s. v.) [Compare DOORKEEPER.]

The definition of his duties given by Charlemagne (Fragm. de Ritib. Vet. Eccl.) is as follows: "Ostiarius ab ostio ecclesiae dicitur, quod ita debet praevidere, ne ullo modo paganus ingrediatur ecclesiam, quia suo introitu polluit eam. Debet etiam custodire ea quae intra ecclesiam sunt, ut salva sint." The first duty then of the ostiarius was to keep the door of the church, but only that one through which the men entered. The door through which the women passed was kept by a deaconess (Constit. Apost. ii. 61, quoted by Mede, Opp. p. 327). The object of this guardianship was to prevent the entry of improper persons. Martene observes from St. Augustine that the ostiarii of the Donatists would admit no one to their churches till they had enquired of him to which communion (sc. orthodox or Donatist) he belonged (de Eccl. Rit. i. viii. 8, 10). In the ancient Roman church a custom prevailed of the ostiarius asking every one for a certificate of faith (libellum fidei) before admitting him into St. Peter's. To the great church of Constantinople there were attached no fewer than seventy-five ostiarii (Suicer, Thesaurus, 1417).

In the fragment of the letter of pope Cornelius to Fabius of Antioch, the Ostiarii are spoken of with exorcists and lectors as amounting to fifty-two. (Migne, p. 743.)

The ostiarii were termed an ordo, the word used of their appointment was ordinare; and this "ordination" was solemnly performed by the bishop, with a service which appears to have been substantially the same in all the ancient Rituals and Pontificals. See ORDINATION, III. ii. 1, p. 1510.

By the synod of Laodicea (cent. 4) the ostiarii were forbidden, in common with all other clerics, to enter a public house (can. 24). From another canon (22) of the same council, it might be inferred that the duties of the ostiarius were at times performed by other orders. "The minister (subdeacon: Hefele) may not leave his place at the door." [See DOORKEEPERS, p. 574.] [H. T. A.]

OSTIARIUS (MONASTIC), the porter of the monastery; sometimes called "janitor," or "portarius."

The gatekeeper or doorkeeper was an important personage in the monastery, entrusted as he was with the twofold responsibility of keeping the monks from going out, unless with the abbat's permission, and of allowing strangers to come in. Being thus the medium of communication between the monastery and the world outside, it was imperative that he should be a man of trustworthiness and discrimination. The very lowliness, in one sense, of the office made it all the more honourable among those whose professed aim and object in life was self-abasement (Rufin. Hist. Monach. c. 17).

The importance of keeping the members of the monastery within its walls was admitted generally, in accordance with the old Benedictine rule that each monastery ought, if possible, to have its garden, mill, bakery, supply of water, and necessary trades within its precincts (Bened. Reg. c. 66). Only one way of egress was permitted, or at most two. Much depended on the porter being discreet (Bened. Reg. c. 66). He was to be a man not only advanced in years but grave and sedate in character, dead to the world; with a younger and more nimble monk to carry messages for him if necessary (Ib.). By the rule of Magister there were to be two porters, both aged men, one to relieve the other (Reg. Mag. c. xcv.). In the Thebaid in such esteem was the office held that the porter was to be a presbyter (Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. lxxi.). Sometimes, in earlier days, when visitors were not so numerous, the porter had also the superintendence of the guest-chamber (hospitium) and of the outer cloisters, as well as of the abbat's kitchen. (Martene, Reg. Ben. Comm. c. 66.)

Sometimes, indeed, the porter was promoted to be abbat (Martene, u. s.). Benedict gives an especial emphasis to the chapter in his rule ("De Ostiario"), by ordering it to be read aloud repeatedly, that ignorance might never be pleaded for its infraction.

The porter's cell was to be close to the gateway (Ib.). He was to inspect all comers through a small barred window or grating in the door, bidding those whom he thought worthy to wait within the door, and the rest without, till he could learn the abbat's pleasure. Every night at the hour of compline he was to take his keys to the abbat or prior. When called away to chapel, to refectory, or to lection, he was to leave the gate locked, neither ingress nor egress being allowed at those times. It was part of his duty to distribute the broken meat and other scraps of food after meals to the mendicants waiting outside the door, and to see that the horses, dogs, &c., of strangers were duly attended to. (Ib.)

Benedict speaks of visitors knocking at the door or crying out to be let in. Some ...ntators have imagined that he speaks ...y of the rich and the poor (Ib.). ...rection that the porter is to reply "Deo Gratias," or "Benedic," has been similarly explained as meant for these two classes respectively. Another reading is "Benedicat." "Benedic" or "Benedicat" is supposed to be intended for a priest-porter, "Deo Gratias" for a layman; or the latter to be used on first hearing the knock or cry, the former on accosting the applicant (Ib.; cf. Augustin. Enarrat. in Pss. cxxxii.). Anyhow, this curious trait of monastic manners recalls the primitive salutation of Boaz and his reapers in the story of Ruth in the Old Testament. The words were to be spoken gently, reverently, affectionately.

It was one of the luxities of later ages that this important office was not unfrequently delegated to a lay-brother, technically styled a "conversus," or sometimes to a mere layman. Even so strict an order as the Cistercians allowed one of the two porters in their larger abbeys to be a lay-brother. (Martene, u. s.)

There was an official in nunneries whose duties corresponded very closely with those of the "ostiarius." It was specially enacted in the anonymous Rule, ascribed by some to Columba, that the "ostiaria" or porteress should be not only aged and discreet, but not given to gossipping. (Reg. Cujusdam, c. iii.) [I. G. S.]

The council of Chalcedon (c. xi.) ordered that those who were poor and needed assistance should travel with certificates founded on investigation, or with letters of peace from the church (μετὰ δοκιμασίας ἐπιστολίοις εἴτουν εἰρηνικοῖς ἐκκλησιαστικοῖς μόνοις). The context seems to indicate that this canon refers to the clergy. Similarly the council of Antioch (c. vii.) desires that no one should entertain strangers without letters of peace (εἰρηνικῶν). Zonaras, commenting on the 11th canon of Chalcedon, says (p. 104) that εἰρηνικαὶ ἐπιστολαὶ are those which are given to bishops by their metropolitans, and to metropolitans by their patriarchs, when they have occasion to go to the court of the emperor; and also those which are given by their own bishops to clerics who wish to remove to another city and to be entered on the roll of the clergy there, in accordance with the 17th canon of the Trullan council. The term used in this canon is, however, ἀπολυτικαί, dimissory. See COMMENDATORY LETTERS; DIMISSORY LETTERS. (Suicer's Thesaurus, s.v. Εἰρηνικά.) [C.]

PAENULA. 1. Etymology. — Although it would seem that this word is not used at all in ecclesiastical Latin[a] as the name of a Christian vestment, still the corresponding Greek word, variously spelt, is the recognised name in the Greek church for the vestment known in the west as a chasuble [CASULA], and the same thing is denoted in the Syrian churches by a word directly formed from the Greek. Moreover, although the word paenula is not used in this way, yet apparently the paenula itself resembled in shape, even if it was not quite identical with, the casula and planeta. We shall therefore briefly discuss in our article the history of the Latin word itself.

It first, however, becomes a question whether the Latin word is derived from the Greek, or the Greek from the Latin, or whether both are to be referred for their origin to a third language, as the Phoenician. The absence of any very satisfactory derivation in either Greek or Latin would be, as far as it goes, in favour of the third view, were anything reasonable forthcoming. We do, indeed, find in Hebrew פַּיְנוֹן, for a kind of outer garment (Talm. Jer., Kelim, c. 29; cited by Buxtorf, Lexicon Chaldaicum, col. 1742), but this is most probably merely a reproduction of Pallium; and in any case there is no evidence to justify us in including it in the list of words that passed from Phoenician into Greek and thence into Latin.

It has been very commonly asserted, with reference to St. Paul's use of the word in 2 Tim. iv. 13, a passage to which we shall refer at length presently, that it is to be taken as one of the many Latin words occurring in the New Testament. This view seems to us to be entirely untenable, from the fact that the Greek word can be traced back nearly to the time of Alexander the Great, a period at which it cannot be fancied that Greek adopted any words from Latin. The word occurs in a fragment of the Iphigenia in Tauris of Rhinthon, a writer of comedies, or rather burlesque tragedies, in the time of Ptolemy I. As this seems the earliest adducible instance of the use of the word, we shall cite the passage with its context from the Onomasticon of Julius Pollux (vii. 60; p. 288, ed. Bekker); ἡ δὲ μανδύη ὁμοιόν τι τῷ καλουμένῳ φαινόλῃ· τίνων δὲ ἐστίν, ὡς μὴ περιερχώμεθα Κρῆτας ἢ Πέρσας, Αἰσχύλος ἐρεῖ·

Διβυρνικῆς μίμημα μανδύης χιτών, καὶ αὐτὸς δὲ ὁ φαινόλης ἔστιν ἐν Ῥίνθωνος Ἰφιγενείᾳ τῇ ἐν Ταύροις, ἔχουσα καινὰν φαινόλαν κἀπαρτίαν.

It will be observed that the citation is in Doric Greek, Rhinthon being a native of either Tarentum or Syracuse.[b]

The word φαινόλης continued to exist in Greek in its ordinary sense, quite apart from Christianity. It occurs in the digest of Epictetus given by Arrian (lib. iv. c. 8; vol. i. p. 637, ed. Schweighaeuser). Again, we find in the Oneirocritica of Artemidorus, a work written about the time of Antoninus Pius, that the ὁ λεγόμενος φαινόλης is associated with the χλαμὺς or μανδύας as to its significance in dreams (lib. ii. c. 3; p. 135, ed. Reiff). About the same time, or a little later, Athenaeus uses the word:—σὺ σὺ εἶ ὁ καὶ τὸν καινὸν καὶ οὐδέπω ἐν χρείᾳ γενόμενον φαινόλην, εἴρηται γὰρ, ὦ βέλτιστε, καὶ ὁ φαινόλης, εἰπών, "Παῖ Λεῦκε, δός μοι τὸν ἄχρηστον φαινόλην" (Deipn. lib. iii. c. 5).

We shall next cite from the Greek lexicographers. Here, it will be observed, we meet with a diversity both in form and meaning; for, besides its use for an outer garment, it is also stated to mean a roll of parchment, and a case or coffer. Whether this difference is to be explained by assuming the existence of two originally distinct words, φαινόλης and φαιλόνης, does not appear, nor does it matter for our present purpose.[c] As far as we are concerned, there can be no doubt from the spelling consistently found in the above cited examples, and from the unvarying form of the Latin, that the original and proper spelling of our word is φαινόλης; the other spelling being either that of another word, or a mere metathesis for the former. It will be observed that the lexicographers give some support to the former hypothesis. Thus Hesychius gives φαιλόνης· ἢ λητάριον [leg. εἰλητάριον] μεμβράϊνον, ἢ γλωσσόκομον: and φαινόλα· τὸ ὕφασμα, οὕτως [here probably the name of Rhinthon has dropped out before the citation from him] ἔχουσα καινὰν φαινόλαν.[d] Suidas gives three

[a] We find in Isidore of Seville (Orig. xix. 24; Patrol. lxxxii. 691), "Penula est pallium [here evidently a mere general term for an outer garment, like ἱμάτιον] cum fimbriis longis;" but here the word is of course not used by him as an ecclesiastical term, but merely in its ordinary sense. Also in an old Latin version of the letter of the Patriarch Nicephorus cited below, which is given by Baronius (Annales, ad ann. 811), we find φαινόλιον rendered by penula. The translator (probably Anastasius Bibliothecarius) was doubtless influenced by the similarity of the word, but the instance cannot be supposed to afford the least support to the belief that the paenula was the name of an ecclesiastical vestment in the Western Church. Binterim (Denkw. iv. 1. 208) remarks that "the planeta was also called paenula by the ancients," but he gives no evidence for this assertion, and it does not seem very likely that any is adducible.

[b] Tertullian asserts (Apol. c. 6) that the Lacedaemonians invented the paenula, so as to be able to enjoy the public games in cold weather. This statement, though probably not worth much, is interesting as connecting with a Dorian people a word which first meets us in a Dorian poet.

[c] Some have connected the former with φαίνομαι (e.g. Etym. Magn. [παρὰ τὸ φαίνεσθαι ὅλον], Salmasius [note in Spartian., infra, "transluceus et perlucida tunica"], Suidas s. v.; and it may be added that we have φαινολὶς in Sappho [ὔσσερε πάντα φέρεις, ὅσα φαινολὶς ἔσκεδε' αὔως]), deriving the latter from φελλός.

[d] It may be noted here, that we find the word in another passage of Hesychius: ἀμφιωτούς· χιτῶνας ἢ φελλώνας· forms, φαιλόνης· ἢ γλωσσόκομον ἢ ωκος, οἱ δὲ παλ Ῥωμαϊκὴ στολή. Magnum defines words as the firs φαινόλης also as S worth noting, tha ν precedes the Λ of garment, those ν have either no it at the end, a It is of course q existence of two yet explain each garment (so Salma ever, the latter spe with various modif for the Greek nam Again, passing thi whether the word The line of Rhinthon Latin, it is true, is in ης would natur which would be fem reason for making i κοχλίας, γαυσάπας, by the feminine cha later Greek citat Whether there is a καινόν, 'which misr in Hesychius, or w was in η, and the l sible to say. Similarly, the Etymologicum Magnum defines φελόνης in almost the same words as the first of the above three, and φαινόλης also as Suidas had done. It is perhaps worth noting, that while spellings in which the ν precedes the λ are always defined in the sense of garment, those in which the λ precedes the ν have either no mention of garment, or have it at the end, as if a subsequent addition. It is of course quite possible to assume the existence of two originally distinct words, and yet explain each as the name of some kind of garment (so Salmasius, l. c.). In any case, however, the latter spelling, as well as the former, with various modifications of the vowels, occurs for the Greek name of the Christian vestment. Again, passing this point, it seems doubtful whether the word is ὁ φαινόλης or ἡ φαινόλη. The line of Rhinthon makes it tne feminine, and the Latin, it is true, is feminine [but the termination in ης would naturally be replaced by one in a, which would be feminine, if there were no special reason for making it masculine; so, e.g. χάρτης, κοχλίας, γαυσάπας, all masculine, are replaced by the feminine charta, cochlea, gausapa], but our later Greek citations make it masculine. Whether there is a misreading in Rhinthon for παινόν, which misreading has been reproduced in Hesychius, or whether the old termination was in η, and the later one in ης, it is impossible to say. As regards the variation in spelling of the first syllable between αι and ε, we can hardly doubt that the ε is a mere corruption, especially when the Latin spelling is considered, where, whether we write the diphthong ae or the vowel e, the first syllable is uniformly long.

2. Use of the word in Latin.—We shall next, before considering the Christian usage of the word, examine its use in Latin. Here we find it freely used from the time of Plautus onwards, to indicate a warm, heavy outer garment, for travelling or cold weather. This covered the whole person, having merely a hole for the head to pass through; and thus it did not require sleeves, but fell over the arms. The general impression left from a considerable series of passages (see Forcellini, s. v.) is that the garment was one which would not be worn by a person in the higher ranks of life, save under the special circumstances given above, though it would be worn as an ordinary dress by slaves and the like. Our earliest instance is from Plautus (Mostellaria, iv. 2. 74), where a slave is told that it is only his paenula that saves his back from a beating. Considering the source whence Plautus's comedies were drawn, the fact that the Latin word is first traced to him is not without significance. Our next trace is found in one of the fragments of the Satires of Lucilius (lib. xv. frag. 6; cited, as also the two following instances, by Nonius Marcellus, xiv. 3). In one of the farces (fabulae Atellanae) of Pomponius Bononiensis, one character bids another, "paenulam in caput induce, ne te noscat," referring presumably to the hood, with which the paenula, like most other similar dresses, was furnished [Hood]. Varro again is cited, "non quaerenda est homini, qui habet virtutem, paenula in imbri."

In Cicero the word is used several times. In his speech pro Milone (c. 10; cf. c. 20), he tells how Milo, when on his way from Rome in a carriage, having his wife with him, and wearing a paenula (paenulatus), on being attacked, springs from the carriage and casts aside his paenula, which would only fetter his arms. In his speech pro Sextio (c. 38), he speaks of the paenula as a garment worn by mule-drivers. Cicero also uses the phrases scindere paenulam, attingere paenulam alicujus, to indicate respectively over-urgent civility, and "taking a man by the button-hole" (Epp. ad Atticum, lib. xiii. 33). We have said that the paenula was a warm, heavy garment, and thus Horace (Epist. i. 11. 18) speaks jokingly of it as a thing which no one would dream of wearing in hot weather. It was generally made of wool (paenula gausapina: Martial, Epig. xiv. 145), but sometimes of leather (paenula scortea;[e] ib. 130). Martial (v. 27) contrasts paenulatus with togatus, as indicating a lower rank in society. Juvenal (Sat. v. 79) makes the parasite, when on his way to dinner with his patron on a stormy night, complain of his dripping paenula. It seems also to have been used as a soldier's overcoat (Suetonius, Galba, c. 6; Tertullian, de Cor. Mil. c. 1). In travelling, indeed, the paenula might be made to serve the purpose of a blanket by night, as well as a cloak by day (Seneca, Epist. lxxxvii. 2).

The Historiae Augustae Scriptores furnish us with several instances of an interesting kind. Spartianus tells of Hadrian that, when tribune, he lost his paenula, which he took as an omen of his future imperial dignity, since tribunes wore a paenula to keep off the rain, but emperors never (c. 3, where see the notes of Salmasius and Casaubon). Again, Lampridius mentions that Commodus (c. 16), after the death of a certain gladiator, ordered the senators[f] to come to the spectacle, not in the toga, which was white, but in the paenula, which was, as a rule, dark-coloured. Lampridius remarks that this was "contra consuetudinem," that is, doubtless the wearing of the paenula was still not common among the better classes, except under special conditions. Indeed of this a further proof is given by Lampridius, in the life of Alexander Severus (c. 27), in that this emperor gave special permission to senators to wear the paenula in Rome, as a protection against cold, but did not extend this permission to matrons, who were only allowed to use it on a journey. This need not be assumed to contradict the remark of Spartianus given above, for we may suppose Alexander to be permitting the wearing of this dress as a warm cloak at the discretion of the wearer, whereas before it needed bad weather to justify its use, and was thought to be a kind of undress, so that emperors never used it. Lampridius, in his life of Diadumenus, the poor little son of Macrinus, Κρῆτες φελλώνην λέγουσι. There is perhaps something wrong with the text, but it seems hardly safe with this reading to conclude that φελλώνης is a Cretan word. See Alberti's note, in loc., and Suicer s. v.

[e] Seneca (Nat. Quaest. iv. 6) seems to distinguish the paenula from the scortea, but this probably only implies that wool was the ordinary material.

[f] It seems desirable to substitute senatores for spectatores, the reading of the MSS.

who was Augustus before he was ten years old, tells (c. 2) how, on the child's assumption of the name Antoninus, the father had prepared for distribution to the people "paenulas coloris rosei" [here probably equivalent to russei; cf. Trebell. Vit. Claudii, c. 14], which were to be called Antoninianae.

We pass over here a passage of Tertullian, till we have spoken of the use of the word by St. Paul, and shall next refer to a law in the Theodosian code, published in A.D. 382, as to the dress to be worn by senators and others. In this senators are forbidden to assume the warlike garb of the chlamys, but are ordered to wear the peaceful dress of colobium and paenula. It is added that officials "per quos statuta complentur ac necessaria peraguntur" are also to use the paenula. Penalties are provided in case of disobedience (Cod. Theodos. lib. xiv. tit. 10, l. 1, where see Gothofredus's note).

3. Use of the word by St. Paul.—We must now consider the use of the word by St. Paul (2 Tim. iv. 13), "The cloke that I left at Troas with Carpus, when thou comest, bring with thee, and the books, but especially the parchments." The word here translated "cloke" by the E. V. is found variously spelt in the MSS. as φελόνης, φαιλόνης, φαιλώνης, and φελώνης, the first being undoubtedly the true reading. It will be observed that in all these cases the λ precedes the ν. The old Latin version (Sabatier, in loc.; cf. also Tertullian, de Orat. 15; de Cor. Mil. 8) and the Vulgate render the word by paenula, evidently thinking it the same word; but the Peshito translates it by حصة حفظا (a case for books).[5] Again, Chrysostom (Hom. in loc.; vol. xi. p. 780, ed. Gaume) mentions this view, "by φελόνης here he means the outer garment (ἱμάτιον). But some think it means the case (γλωσσόκομον) where the books lay." Jerome, too (Epist. 36 ad Damasum, § 13, vol. i. 167), says, "volumen Hebraeum replico, quod Paulus φελόνην juxta quosdam vocat." It is impossible, however, to speak here with any great degree of certainty. The only independent evidence, apart, that is, from this passage, for the meaning of "case," is apparently that of the Greek lexicographers, but possibly these have only cited Chrysostom. Then, too, it may be said that the notion of the "case" may have been suggested merely by the context, still, it might have been thought, if the word were merely the name of a well-known garment, it would be a somewhat unlikely mistake for a translator to make. Further, the rendering of the Peshito is the more worthy of notice, seeing that in ecclesiastical Syriac the word "phaino"[a] (فينا) has been directly derived from the Greek as the name of the vestment.

If we assume that the apostle is using the word in the sense of a garment, then increased point will be given to the urgent wish (v. 21) that Timothy should come before winter, the aged apostle feeling the need of extra warm protection against the cold. Here the matter might have been allowed to rest, as one incapable of positive solution, seeing that there is much to be said for either view, were it not that some writers (Cardinal Bona [Rer. Liturg. i. 24·8] and others) have gravely argued that the apostle here desires Timothy to bring the chasuble he had left behind him. We have seen that there is a respectable amount of evidence for explaining the word as not meaning a garment at all, but, waiving this, positively the only direct evidence for the above theory is that this word in a modified spelling (φαινόλιον, &c.) is the technical Greek word for a chasuble. Chrysostom, however, took it for an ordinary outer garment; and this is significant, when taken in connexion with the so-called Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, where the word φαινόλιον occurs for the ecclesiastical vestment, shewing, as it does, that at the end of the 4th century the word had not been restricted into its special eucharistic meaning, otherwise St. Chrysostom would hardly have expressed himself as he does. Again, nearly two hundred years before the time of St. Chrysostom, we find Tertullian shewing very distinctly the views of his time (de Oratione, c. 15). He has been speaking of certain practices as belonging to superstition rather than to religion, and thus mentions that it was the custom of some to lay aside their paenula before engaging in prayer, as the heathen did in their idol temples. But for this there is no authority, "unless," he adds ironically, "anyone thinks that Paul, from having engaged in prayer at the house of Carpus, had thus left his paenula behind him. God, I suppose, does not hear men clad in a paenula, Who yet heard effectually the three saints in the furnace of the king of Babylon, as they prayed in their sarabaras and turbans." Tertullian here laughs at the idea of St. Paul's having taken off his paenula to pray. The notion of this garment having been one specially put on for the eucharistic service is evidently utterly foreign to the sense of the passage. The gist of Tertullian's remark is merely, "What a foolish notion it is of these people to think it unseemly to go to church in a paenula!" He could hardly have spoken in this way, had he thought, or had people generally in his time thought, that St. Paul's paenula was really a sacrificial vestment.[b] It may be added here that in a commentary on the 2nd Epistle to Timothy appended to the works of Jerome, but apparently spurious, the theory is broached that this paenula was an offering from some convert, which was to be sold for the apostle's benefit (Comm. in loc. vol. xi. 429). This too is utterly foreign to any notion of a chasuble. Of course the spuriousness or genuineness of this document makes little matter to our present purpose, which is to show the general way in which the passage was anciently understood.

Again, as regards the identity of the term with the word in later Greek, this of itself will not count for much, when we consider of how many other vestments this might be said,

[5] Another very important version, the Memphitic, is practically of no avail to us here, inasmuch as it merely reproduces the Greek word, and there is no independent evidence as to the sense in which it uses it.

[b] It is amazing to find that Sala, the editor of Cardinal Bona, can gravely remark (vol. ii. 238, ed. Turin, 1749), "fuerunt itaque Tertulliani aevo qui Pauli penulam orationis vestem seu sacrificalem putarent." Comment on such perversity is superfluous.

where yet the use was certainly not identical, the word casula itself being a very marked instance; and further, it does not seem that there is a certain case of the use of the term in its technical sense before the time of Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople in the 8th century. In the absence of direct evidence for the early use of the word in its special sense, the testimony derivable from liturgies of uncertain date cannot, it is evident, be allowed to count for much. If, on so feeble a case as the above, some are disposed to believe that St. Paul refers to his chasuble, we must allow that their credulity has been developed at the expense of their judgment.

4. Ecclesiastical use of the word.—The name of the vestment appears in later Greek under various spellings, φαινόλιον, φενόλιον, φενώλιον, φελόνιον, φελώνιον, φαιλώνιον, &c. From this has been formed, as we have already remarked, the ordinary Syriac term for the vestment, phaino. [We may take this opportunity of remarking that perhaps in Syriac too, as well as in Greek, the word was not strictly confined to its technical ecclesiastical sense. We find it in one of the poems of Ephraem Syrus, used metaphorically for the body, our 'mortal coil' wherewith we are clothed (Bickell, S. Ephraemi Carmina Nisibena, xxiv. 79). Here Hades is represented as saying of the Saviour, "as at the wedding feast He changed water into wine, so has He changed the garment of the dead (ܦܓܪܐ ܕܡܝܬ) into life."] In Sclavonic the Greek word occurs as pheloni. In the Arabic versions of the Coptic liturgies the name for this vestment is generally al-bornos, a word familiar to us from Eastern books of travels, and perhaps sometimes also tilsam (Renaudot, Liturg. Orient. Coll. i. 161, 162, ed. Francof. 1847), though the former word appears to be used sometimes in the sense of an alb, and the latter probably stands as a rule for something akin to an amice. In the Armenian church the eucharistic vestment now is to all intents and purposes a cope, save that it has no hood. Its native name is shoochar (Fortescue, Armenian Church, p. 134). The Armenians are attacked by Isaac, catholicos of Armenia in the 12th century, in the second of two bitter invectives, in that they do not use the φελόνιον, making no distinction of vestments in the Eucharist[1] (Orat. 2, § 25; Patrol. Gr. cxxxii. 1236).

We have previously remarked that there is no certain direct mention of the φενόλιον before the time of Germanus. We do not mean by this that there is no evidence for the use of this vestment in the Greek church before that time, for we shall presently mention some art-remains which figure it at a much earlier period, but that the literary notices are not trustworthy. Dr. Neale (l. c.) quotes in proof of its antiquity from the life of St. Marcian, priest and oeconomus of the Great Church (Constantinople), who is said to have lived in the time of his namesake, emperor of Rome (ob. 457 A.D.), but he omits to state that this life is written by Symeon Metaphrastes (ob. after 975 A.D.). Again, Theophylact Simocatta, writing early in the 7th century, says (Hist. vii. 6; p. 280, ed. Bekker) that after the death of John, patriarch of Constantinople, they only found as his effects σκίμποδα ξύλινον καὶ σισύραν ἐξ ἰρίου ἐς τὰ μάλιστα εὐτελῆ φαιλώνην τε ἀκαλλῆ. Considering the context here, it seems much more likely that the φαιλώνης was merely the patriarch's outdoor cloak.[2]

We next refer to Germanus (appointed patriarch of Constantinople in 715 A.D.). He describes (Hist. Eccles. et Mystica Theoria; Patrol. Gr. xcviii. 394) the ungirdled phelonion as metaphorical of Christ bearing His cross. From a remark a few lines lower down, in which he compares it to the purple robe put on our Lord (ἐμφαίνει τὴν ἀπὸ κοκκίνου πορφύραν), we may infer that this was the colour of the vestment. A century later, Nicephorus (patriarch of Constantinople, 806–815 A.D., when he was deposed), when writing to pope Leo III., sends as a present a pectoral cross, a seamless white sticharion, and chestnut-coloured phenolion[1] (στιχάριον λευκὸν καὶ φαινόλιον κάστανον ἅβραφα), and an epitrachelion and enchirion (Patrol. Gr. c. 200).

As regards early Eastern pictures of this dress (for the West is not now in question, for there the corresponding vestment appears first as planeta and then as casula), we may refer first to mosaics existing in the vault of the church of St. George at Thessalonica. These have been figured from coloured drawings taken on the spot, in Texier and Pullan's Byzantine Architecture (reproduced in Marriott's Vestiarium Christianum, plates xviii.–xxi.), who give arguments to show that the church was built by Constantine himself during his first stay at Thessalonica. In the first three of these, at any rate, the figures are clad in what seems to be a φαινόλης of a reddish or purplish colour. One figure represents Philip, bishop and martyr, and another a presbyter Romanus, but there are also, with but slight differences of garb, the well-known brother physicians, SS. Cosmas and Damian, and Eucarpion, soldier and martyr. This fact has an important bearing on the question of the early use of a special eucharistic vestment in the East, if the garment afterwards specially used was in the 4th century worn by laymen. Among the surviving mosaics of the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople are some believed to be of the 6th century representing 4th century bishops. These are clad in white sticharia and phenolia, with omophoria (Marriott, p. lxxv.). As an example of a different type, we may refer to an illustration figured by Assemani from a Syriac MS. of the Gospels dated 586 A.D. (Bibl. Med. plate iii., and cf. p. 2; reproduced by Marriott, plate xxviii.). This represents Eusebius of Caesarea and Ammonius of Alexandria, the former wearing a garment which may be a [1] Neale (Eastern Church, Introd. p. 309 n.) seems to imply that Isaac censures the Armenians for having changed the shape of the eucharistic vestment from what we should call a chasuble into what we should call a cope. Any one who will look at the passage itself will see that he finds fault with them for not using a eucharistic vestment at all.

Acta Sanctorum, Jan., vol. i. p. 612.

[2] This too is Hefele's view (op. cit. p. 196).

[1] Hefele (p. 196) justly points to this as evidence that at this time the vestments of the Roman and Greek churches were much more similar than they afterwards became.

phenolion, but whether we are to view this as representing the every-day dress or the dress of official ministration, there is nothing to shew.

The form said on the putting on of the phenolion before celebrating the Eucharist runs, in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, οἱ ἱερεῖς σου, Κύριε, ἐνδύσονται δικαιοσύνην, καὶ οἱ ὅσιοί σου ἀγαλλιάσει ἀγαλλιάσονται, πάντοτε, νῦν . . . (Goar, Euchologion, p. 80). The word phenolion is also used in the Greek church as the name of the special vestment of a "reader," who, on being made a sub-deacon, has it replaced by the stichárion (ib. 236, 244.) A phenolion was also worn as a special privilege by the archdeacon of the clergy attached to the palace of Constantinople, on the Sunday of the Adoration of the Cross (see the article), but only on that one occasion (Codinus Curopalata, c. 9).

5. Literature.—For the materials of the foregoing article, we are largely indebted to the various lexicons cited, especially Ducange, Glossarium Graecum, s. vv.; Suicer, Thesaurus Ecclesiasticus, and Forcellini. The examples in the last are given in chronological order by Marriott (Vestiarium Christianum, App. C). Reference may further be made to Hefele's learned and temperate essay, Die liturgischen Gewänder, in his Beiträge zur Kirchengeschichte, Archäologie und Liturgik, vol. ii. pp. 195, sqq. PAGANISM (IN CHRISTIAN ART). In a former article [FRESCO] attention has been called to the intimate connexion between early Christian art and that of the pagan community in which the church arose, and from which its first members were gathered. It will be unnecessary to repeat what has been there said of the absence of any strict line of demarcation between the system of decoration adopted by the adherents of the new faith, and those to which they had been accustomed as members of a heathen society, and the rarity of anything in their earliest pictorial and sculptural representations distinctive of the religion they had embraced, which rendered primitive Christian art little more than the continuation of that which they found already existing, purified and elevated by the influences of their new faith.

In the same article reference has been made to the manner in which distinctly mythological personages were pressed into the service of the church, and, a new spirit being breathed into old forms, objects, persons, and scenes, to which the mind was familiarised in connexion with pagan myths, were made the channels of conveying to the initiated the higher truths of which they became the symbols, and "all that was true and beautiful in the old legends found its fulfilment in Christ, and was but a symbol of His life and work."—(Farrar.)

It remains now briefly to shew how this principle was carried out in detail, and mythological types and classical forms were made the exponents of Christian doctrine.

We have at the outset to distinguish between (1) that class of subjects which contained a fundamental religious idea common to Paganism and Christianity, which, dimly shadowed forth in the one, received its full development in the other; and (2) those in which the resemblance is merely formal and external, the mythological representations supplying a vehicle for Christian ideas. To these we may add (3) the still more abundant class in which classical forms and ideas are used simply as ornamental accessories, without any symbolical reference.

I. The first class in which a subject from pagan mythology is used typically to depict some Christian truth is a very small one. The deep-seated foulness of the myths of classical antiquity, on which the early Christian writers were never weary of enlarging, caused a natural revulsion of the Christian mind from them, and rendered them, generally through their associations, quite unsuited for conveying sacred truths.

(1) The only subject borrowed from Pagan mythology which gained any general acceptance in Christian art, is that of Orpheus taming the wild animals by the notes of his lyre. Almost from the beginning, the power of Orpheus in subduing the ferocity of savage beasts and gathering them round him in mutual harmony, was regarded as typical of the all-conquering influence of Christ's Gospel in taming the fierce passions of the human heart, and uniting warring and discordant tribes in one common homage to their universally-acknowledged Master. (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. ii. p. 357, c. 14.) The myth of Orpheus was thus regarded as an adumbration of the words of Christ (John xii. 32), "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me," and a parallel to the well-known prophecies of Isaiah, in which the same symbolism is adopted (Is. xi. 6–9, lxv. 25). In this reference the Orphic myth is not unfrequently alluded to by the writers of the early church (Clem. Alexandr. Cohort. ad Gentes, c. 1; Euseb. de Laud. Constant. c. xiv.; Greg. Nyss. in Hexaem. c. 7; Chrysost. Homil. xii. c. ii., Genes. Homil. xxiii. in c. vi.; Homil. xix. in c. ix.; Cassiod. in Ps. xix.; cf. Lactant. Inst. vii. 24). Orpheus is still more often alluded to by the Fathers, and the writings ascribed to him, in common with the Sibylline verses, quoted as affording testimony to the unity of God and other points of Christian truth (Theophil. Autol. iii. 2; Just. Mart. Cohort. ad Graec. c. 15, de Monarch. c. 2; Clem. Alexandr. Strom. v. 12, 14; Lactant Instit. i. 5, 6; Aug. Contr. Faust. xiii. 15, &c.) We cannot, therefore, be surprised that he should become a favourite subject of early Christian art. The most remarkable representation of Orpheus is that from the ceiling of a cubiculum in the cemetery of St. Callistus, of which a woodcut is given, Vol. I. p. 696 (Bosio, p. 239; Bottari, ii. tav. lxiii.; Aringhi, i. 547; Garrucci, Pitture, tav. 25; Perret, i. pl. xxxiv. bis, p. 35). The subject occupies the central octagonal panel of the ceiling, the surrounding panels containing alternately landscapes and scenes from the Old and New Testaments. Orpheus displays the hieratic type of a young man in a high Phrygian bonnet, and loose frock, his legs clothed with anaxyrides, embroidered with a chlamys. He sits among trees, holds his lyre in his left hand, and beats time with his right foot. A lion, tiger, horse, peacock, and other birds and beasts stand round him. An arcosolium from the same cemetery presents the same subject with very slight variations (Bosio, 255; Aringhi, i. 563; Bottari, ii. tav. lxx.; Garrucci, Pitture, tav. 30; Perret, vol. i. pl. xx. p. 30). The subject has been only once found in marble; on a sarcophagus discovered at Ostia, the corresponding panel containing Tobias, or a fisherman (Northcote, pl. xx.; Martigny, sub voc. from Visconti). It occurs also on a lamp (Perret, vol. iv. pl. xvii. No. 1, p. 118), and on a gem given by Mamachi (Orig. iii. 81, note [2]), from the Museo Vettori, and others specified by Piper (Mythologie und Symbolik. i. 123). No example of the subject is found in mosaic or in miniatures.

(2) The Sirens were introduced into Christian typology as emblems of temptations to sensual indulgence, to which the man of God, symbolised by Ulysses, was exposed as he traversed the waves of the troublesome world on his way to the shore of everlasting rest (Maxim. Turin. Homil. i. de pass. et cruce Domini; Hippolyt. Philosophum. viii. 1), and which he was enabled to overcome by the cross of Christ, as Ulysses fastened himself to the mast. One such representation only has come down to us, and that not certainly Christian. It is a fragment of a sarcophagus discovered by De Rossi in the cemetery of St. Callistus, assigned to the 3rd century, and described by him (Bulletino, 1863, p. 35; Roma Sott. i. tav. xxx. p. 5; Martigny, Dictionn. art. Ulysse; Northcote, pp. 232, 298). Ulysses sits weeping in his vessel with two companions. The three sirens stand around, in the form described by Isidore (Orig. xi. 3, 30), half woman, half bird, with wings and claws; one holding a lyre, one a flute, and the third singing from a roll of music. The cruciform arrangement of the monogram Tyranio suggests, but does not prove, the Christian origin of the sculpture.

(3) The Hermes Kriophorus of pagan art certainly supplied the original type of the Good Shepherd in its countless repetitions. [SHEPHERD, GOOD.] The syrinx, or Pandean pipes, which is one of the most frequent accessories of the figure in Christian as in pagan art, was regarded as typifying the music of the Gospel, which recalls the wanderers and guides the sheep in the right way. (See the quotations given by Garrucci, Vetri, p. 63.) The face and form of the Good Shepherd, as of other representations of Christ, appear often to be borrowed from those of the young beardless Apollo (Piper, u. s. pp. 79, 100–105; Munter, Sinnbilder, i. 64, ii. 7; Raoul-Rochette, Tableau des Catacombes, p. 161 ff.)

II. As examples of the second class of subjects where pagan mythology only supplies the form of the representation as a vehicle for Christian ideas, and the resemblance is external only, the most remarkable are Hercules carrying off the apples of the Hesperides, and the chariot of the Sun God, as respectively furnishing formal types of the Fall, and of the ascent of Elijah. The resemblance between the Hercules subject and its Christian correlative is too striking to allow any doubt that the one was borrowed from the other (Piper, i. 66 ff.). Another part of the same myth, Hercules feeding the fabled dragon with cakes of poppy-seed, appears to have furnished the motive for the representation of the apocryphal story of Daniel killing the dragon at Babylon (see woodcut, Vol. I. p. 579).

Equally marked is the resemblance between the fire-horsed chariot in which Elijah is represented ascending to heaven, and the ordinary representations of Apollo, or Phoebus, as the Sun God in his rising. In the absence of distinctive accessories it is hardly possible to determine which of the two subjects is intended. This difficulty is sometimes increased by the introduction of the Jordan as a river god, with his urn, in the Scriptural event (Piper, u. s. pp. 75–77). The correspondence of the two has also been confirmed by the accidental resemblance of the words Elias and Helios (ἥλιος). (Sedul. Carm. Pasch. lib. i. v. 184). This symbolical representation of the Jordan by a river god with his urn occurs also elsewhere. There are remarkable instances in the mosaics of the baptism of Christ in the baptisteries at Ravenna.

III. Little need be said upon the use of ornamental accessories, derived from heathen art, such as winged genii, victories, armed females, centaurs, caryatides, telamones, pegasi, hippocampi, and the like. It would be misapplied ingenuity to endeavour, as has been sometimes done, to affix an allegorical meaning to each of these objects, the introduction of which may be satisfactorily attributed to the fancy of the painter or sculptor, who being perhaps still a pagan, and certainly one who had learnt the principles and practice of his art in pagan schools, found it impossible to divest himself of its traditions, and satisfied both himself and his employers by discarding everything that was essentially profane, or which could give rise to an impure imagination. As Raoul-Rochette has remarked (Tableau, &c., p. 214), "it is no cause of surprise if in the design of these monuments, the thoughts of the early Christian artists went back to the traditions of paganism, so that in the execution of subjects drawn from Holy Scripture, their hand, by the blind force of habit, reproduced a large number of the details of profane art, especially in costume, furniture, ornament, and architecture, which were indifferent in themselves, and to which they had been so long accustomed." Thus, in the words of Kugler, "many modes of expression of an innocent nature belonging to ancient art, though closely associated with the old idolatry, long maintained their position for purposes of decoration," and that with so little individuality of character that in many cases by nothing in the occurrence in some part of the design of some decidedly Christian symbol, its non-pagan origin can be ascertained (Raoul-Rochette, Tableau des Catacombes, pp. 120–122; Pelliccia de Christ. Eccl. Polit. tom. iii. pp. 230–234, ed. Neapol. 1779; Northcote, Rom. Sott. p. 196). There is not one of these decorative forms of such frequent occurrence in early Christian art as the vine, together with scenes connected with its cultivation, and the ingathering of the grapes. The examples are too common to particularize; but we may refer to the very lovely vine of the Callistine catacomb, "of an antique style of beauty" (Kugler) [of which there is a woodcut FRESCO, Vol. I. p. 695]; and the vintage scenes from the baptistery of St. Costanza [MOSAICS, Vol. II. p. 1322]. In this we have an instance of the way in which a purely conventional mode of ornamentation was adopted by Christians, and clothed with a religious signification, full of spiritual teaching to the initiated, of Christ the "True Vine," and believers as fruitful "branches" in Him.

We have yet to speak of the cases in which direct pagan subjects occur, to which it is difficult if not impossible to assign any esoteric Christian meaning. The fact that these are found entirely on sarcophagi and gilded drinking glasses, never in mosaics or the wall-paintings of the catacombs, suggests the probable conclusion that the articles on which they occur are of heathen origin, and were used by Christians from the absence, in the early period of the church, of artists of their own faith capable of fabricating them. This must have been especially the case with sarcophagi. Those who needed them were compelled to resort to heathen sculptors' workshops, and to content themselves with selecting those which did the least violence to the new faith. In this way we may account for the occurrence of pagan sarcophagi in Christian burial-places. "We have abundant evidence," writes Professor Westwood (Parker, Archaeology of Rome; Tombs, p. 39), "not only that pagan sarcophagi were used for the burial of Christians, but also that subjects of a pastoral or pagan character were adopted on the sarcophagi of the earlier Christians, to which symbolical meanings were attached, whereby in the minds of the uninitiated their Christian destination would never be suspected. In the words of Mabillon (Iter. Ital. § 10, p. 81), "Sic profanis tumulis Christiani non raro quasi propriis usi sunt.'" As examples, we may name one found in the cemetery of St. Agnes, bearing the epitaph of a Christian virgin named Aurelia Agapetilla, designated "ancilla Dei," which is ornamented with a figure of Bacchus, surrounded with naked Cupids, and the genii of the seasons (Boldetti, p. 466), and two given by Millin (Voyage au Midi de la France, iii. 156, 158, pl. xxvi. 4, xxxvii. 3), on one of which is carved the Forge of Vulcan. On another, given by Northcote (p. 261), Cupid and Psyche are represented side by side with a Good Shepherd, who is overturning a basket of fruit. The conversion of ancient carved marbles into articles for the use of the Christian church, such as fonts, holy water basins, alms-boxes, which at one time largely prevailed, has proved rather misleading from its having been supposed that their present use was necessarily contemporaneous with their first execution.

Some of the gilded glasses extracted from the catacombs bear scenes from pagan mythology, and the figures of heathen deities, Hercules, Minerva, Achilles, Serapis, &c. On others are depicted subjects which are incapable of a Christian interpretation, and which it is difficult to conceive could have been executed by a Christian artist. One, given by Perret (iv. pl. xxx. no. 82), represents a naked female waited on by winged genii, one of whom holds a mirror. Others have the genius of death winged, either leaning on an inverted torch (Garrucci, 201, 5; Buonarruoti, xxviii. 2), or arrested in full career by the meta or goal, indicating the end of life (ibid.). The pronounced pagan character of these glasses renders it difficult to assign them a Christian origin, and though both Garrucci and Wiseman are of opinion that this art was confined to the Christians alone, they bring forward no grounds for this view, which is primâ facie improbable, such as to forbid us to regard them as the work of pagan artists for the use of their co-religionists.

The very curious wall-paintings of a decidedly pagan character, in the cemetery of Praetextatus, first published by Bottari (tom. ii. preface, p. v, pp. 192, 218) and given by Perret (vol. i. pl. lxx.–lxxiv.) and by Parker (Archaeology of Rom. Catacombs), to which a Christian origin was assigned by Raoul-Rochette and other writers, are now proved to belong to one of the Gnostic sects. The sepulchral chamber they decorate is that of Vincentius, a priest of a deity named Sabasis or Sabasius, and his wife Vibia, whose death preceded his own. They embrace four scenes:—(1) Abreptio Vibiæ, the soul of Vibia carried off by Pluto in his quadriga, and the descensio, her descent to Hades. (2) Her judgment before the throne of Pluto (Dis pater), seated with his wife Abracura (ἀβρὰ κούρη), the three Fates (Fata Divina). Vibia is introduced by Mercury, and accompanied by Alcestis. (3) Inductio Vibiæ, her introduction to the mystic banquet by the Angelus bonus, a youth crowned with flowers, and her taking her place with the other guests at a sigma-shaped table (Bonorum judicio judicati). (4) The funeral banquet given by Vincentius in her honour to the priests of Sebasius (septe[m] pii sacerdotes). The pagan character of the whole is so pronounced that it is difficult to understand how these paintings could have been supposed to have a Christian origin.

PAGANISM, SURVIVAL OF. Enquiry in connexion with this subject may be simplified by treating it under three heads: (I.) Paganism as a form of public worship supported, recognised, or tolerated by the civil power. (II.) As a popular belief existing in open contravention of state authority and in avowed antagonism to Christianity. (III.) As interwoven with the religion, discipline, and ceremonial of Christian communities, or discernible in their everyday life and practice. [For pagan influences on education, see SCHOOLS.]

Some of the principal facts relating to (I.) are given under IDOLATRY, but it will be of service here to pass under review, somewhat more generally, the influences that successively determined the relations of paganism to the ruling power under the empire—a part of the subject intimately connected with (II.) and (III.).

(I.) The earliest sentiments of paganism with respect to Christianity appear to have been those of indifferent tolerance. When, however, the true character of Christianity began to be better understood, as that of an avowedly aggressive and intolerant creed—aggressive, that is to say, in that all other beliefs were regarded by its followers as hostile, and intolerant in that it professedly aimed at the overthrow of all other religions—the attitude of the civil power altogether changed. [MARTYR.]

The conversion of Constantine and the edict of Milan (October 28, 313), extending state recognition to Christianity, materially modified all the pre-existing conditions of paganism, which from this time presents itself under a different aspect. A considerable difference is also now discernible in the conditions under which it continued to exist in the East and those which surrounded it in the West—a distinction of no little importance in the later history of paganism, and one to which we shall have occasion again to refer.

The edict of Milan[a] marks the inauguration of the principle of universal toleration; everyone was thereby permitted publicly to profess whatever religion he chose. It gave to the Christians and to all alike, "et Christianis et omnibus," full and open freedom, "potestatem liberam et apertam," "sequendi religionem quam quisque voluisset" (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. x. 5). Constantine, though protecting Christianity, at the same time maintained the priests of the ancient religion in the enjoyment of their customary privileges (Cod. Theod. XII. i. 21, A.D. 335; XII. x. 2, A.D. 337; Haenel, 1204, 1278). When his palace was struck by lightning, he sent to consult the pagan augurs; he himself continued to be saluted by the title and represented in the attire of Pontifex Maximus (Mionnet, Médailles romaines, ii. 236); and the statement of Zosimus (iv. 36), that the same honour was accepted by his successors until the time of Gratian, proves that the title still carried with it, in the eyes of many, a certain amount of prestige. Other facts point with equal force to the tenacity with which the forms and fashions of paganism continued to pervade official and ceremonial observance. A panegyric addressed to Constantine in the year 321, by Nazarius, is full of allusions to the pagan mythology. A law enacted in the same year, while condemning magical rites, nevertheless gives direct sanction to the use of charms and incantations against snow or hail (Cod. Theod. IX. xvi. 3; Haenel, p. 868). In the year 331, a date which has been assigned as marking the decisive overthrow of pagan worship (Beugnot, Hist. de la Destruction du Pag. i. 175), from the fact that it witnessed the almost complete destruction of the temples in Africa, we find Anicius Paulinus, the prefect of Rome, restoring the temple of Concord (Gruter, Inso. totius Orbis Romani, i. 100). Constantine, after his death, received the honours of apotheosis and the appellation of "Divus" (Eutropius, x. 10).

A politic regard for popular feeling, as associated with time-hallowed observances, appears to have led the civil authorities still to sanction or permit many of the traditional formalities and solemnities of paganism, but in the meantime public sentiment itself was undergoing a great change. Of this a remarkable proof is afforded in the fact that the tombs of the dead (which among purely pagan communities were always regarded with superstitious veneration and invested with a peculiar sanctity) now began to be frequently plundered and desecrated. The symbols and adornments of these structures, which reflected the ancient religious belief, appear to have excited at once the contempt and cupidity of the Christians, who converted the materials to the commonest uses, even carrying them away for building purposes. An edict of Constantius II. promulgated A.D. 340, enacts that those guilty of such sacrilege, without the cognisance of the proprietor, shall be condemned to work in the mines (Cod. Theod. IX. xvii. 1; Haenel, p. 874). A subsequent law prescribed the punishment of death; but in the year 349 (ib. IX. xvii. 2) this was mitigated to the imposition of a fine.

Legislation now appears as largely dictated by a twofold regard: (1) for the responsibilities involved in the profession of the Christian faith by the state, (2) for the feelings of the Christian majority among the people; while, on the other hand, there is ample evidence, especially in the West, that respect for the prejudices of what was still a powerful minority often caused successive enactments to remain almost a dead letter. It would accordingly appear probable that, for a lengthened period, repressive legislation was virtually inoperative. Thus, in the year 341, we find that pagan sacrifices were formally forbidden—"cesset superstitio, sacrificiorum aboleatur insania" (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 2; Haenel, p. 1612). The proof, however, that such sacrifices were still publicly offered is so incontrovertible that Labastie conjectures that reference is here intended only to private sacrifices and the magical rites with which they were frequently associated. But such an hypothesis is rendered highly improbable by the language of an edict promulgated in 346, which, while directing that the temples without the city walls shall be permitted to remain uninjured, distinctly implies that those within the city precincts were marked out for destruction; and even the reservation in favour of the former is justified solely on the ground that the public games and Circenses had originated with the worship that was associated with certain temples, and that it was "not fitting that those should be overthrown from whence the Roman people derived the celebration of ancient festivities" (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 2, 3; Haenel, p. 1612).

A similar difficulty attaches to two enactments, purporting to belong to the years 353 and 356, forbidding sacrifices of every kind under penalty of death; for here again Beugnot proves, from the evidence of inscriptions, that throughout the reign of Constantius II. the temples were open and sacrifices offered, not only in Rome, but throughout the Western empire. Of this contradiction, Beugnot can find no other explanation than that afforded by the supposition of Labastie, that the above laws, though probably drawn up during the reign of Constantius, remained unpromulgated, and, being subsequently found by Theodosius among the state papers, were inserted by him in the code with conjectural dates.

During the reigns of Julian (361–363), Jovian (363–364), and of Valentinian in the West (364–375), and Valens in the East (364–378), the state theory appears to have been that of general tolerance and strict impartiality with respect to religious belief (Gieseler, Kirchengeschichte, I. ii. 21, 22); but we have evidence that the imperial power still cherished a certain sympathy with many pagan practices [MAGIC, VI. 2). The coins and medals of the period bear the figures of many of the pagan deities, especially those of Egypt (Beugnot, i. 271, 272). It is stated by Anastasius Bibliothecarius that in the reign of Valentinian, an emperor whose Arian sympathies divided and weakened the Christian party, paganism assumed so aggressive a demeanour that the clergy were afraid to enter the churches or the public baths—"neque in ecclesias neque in balnea haberent introitum" (Vitae Rom. Pontif.; Migne, Patrol. cxxviii. 31). It is, however, not a little remarkable that an edict of the same emperor, of the year 368 (Cod. Theod. XVI. ii. 18) presents us, for the first time, with the term "pagani" as applied to the adherents of the old religion. At Rome, we have abundant evidence that this party was still powerful. Prudentius (cont. Symmach. i. v. 545) can congratulate only six families of senatorial rank on having embraced the new faith (the Anicii, the Probi, the Paulini, the Bassi, the Olybrii, and the Gracchi), and Augustine (Conf. viii. 2) distinctly implies that in the time of Simplicianus, the teacher of St. Ambrose, the majority of the Roman nobility were strongly opposed to Christianity. Even Gratian (367–383) appears to have proclaimed almost perfect liberty of conscience, except with regard to some minor sects, whose tenets were supposed to involve obligations incompatible with fidelity to the state (Soz. H. E. vii. 1; Migne, Series Graeca, lxvii. 1418). But in the year 382 he ordered that the statue of Victory, "custos imperii virgo," should be removed from the Curia; he also forbade the offering of the "hostiae consultatoriae" (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 7), and refused, for himself, the title of Pontifex Maximus. It is evident from the language of Zosimus (iv. 36) that this last act was interpreted by the pagan party itself as a formal renunciation of the ancient union between the supreme spiritual and the supreme temporal power, and as intimating the imperial repudiation of all claims of paganism on the latter.

The enactments of Theodosius (378–395) may be considered to mark the real commencement of the downfall of paganism, but their influence was still almost entirely limited to the East. The emperor had the sagacity to perceive how largely unity in religion might be made to conduce to the object towards which his whole policy was directed—the establishment of the unity of the empire. "We will," says the edict of April 27, 380, "that all the nations subject to our sway be of that religion which the divine apostle Peter (as the faith introduced by him and preserved to the present time declares) handed down to the Romans" (Cod. Theod. XVI. i. 2; Haenel, p. 1476). A law of the year 381 (ib. XVI. vii. 1) enacted that those who had relapsed into paganism should forfeit the right to dispose of their property by will; this enactment was confirmed two years later (ib. XVI. vii. 2); in the year 385 the inspection of entrails and all magical rites were forbidden under pain of death; a law of February 391, promulgated in the first instance at Milan, forbade sacrifice to idols, or even to enter the temples (ib. XVI. x. 10; Zosimus, IV. xxxiii. 8); while the same law, as promulgated at Constantinople in the November of the following year, visited such practices with the penalty of death (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 12; see also IDOLATRY). It is stated by Theodoret (Eccl. Hist. v. 20; Migne, Series Graeca, lxxxii. 1055) that Theodosius also decreed the demolition of the temples, but no such law is extant, and the assertion must at least be looked upon as of doubtful authority. We have it, however, on the authority of Libanius that the prefect Cynegius was instructed to close the temples in Egypt, where both the Greek and the Egyptian worship still numbered many adherents (Orat. pro Templis, p. 194).

The distinction, above referred to, between East and West now becomes of primary importance. Generally speaking, the evidence would seem to shew that legislation which was severely enforced in the former division of the empire was practically inoperative in the latter. In the East, paganism, being unidentified with any political party, and possessing no influence over the executive power, was incapable of any organised resistance. Instances, indeed, are to be found, even so late as the 5th century, of pagans occupying posts of high office—as, for example, that of Optatus, who was prefect of Constantinople in the year 404 (Socrates, H. E. vi. 18; Migne, Series Graeca, lxvii. 337); but these are of rare occurrence, and whatever influence the pagan party still possessed was mainly limited to the schools. Hence, even so early as the commencement of the 4th century, Lucian, the celebrated teacher of Antioch, who suffered martyrdom under Maximin, affirms that "whole cities and the greater part of the world" are already of the Christian faith (Milman, Hist. of Chr. ii. 276), a statement which, the evidence already adduced shews, could have been even approximately true only with reference to the Eastern provinces. In the West, on the other hand, and especially in Rome, where the hereditary dignities and offices, and the whole historical associations of the city, were closely interwoven with the ancient religion, paganism maintained its ground with remarkable tenacity. Theodosius himself evidently recognized this broad distinction; for though he is accused by Zosimus (v. 38) of persecuting the ancient ritual, he neither closed the temples nor proscribed the pontiffs in the West. Finlay (Greeks under the Empire, p. 160) considers that the attachment of the Roman aristocracy to paganism proved the ruin of the Latin provinces; while those of the East were saved by the unity of their religious faith.

At the commencement of the reign of Honorius (395–423), temples to Jupiter, Mercury, Saturn, the Mater Deûm, Apollo, Diana, Minerva, Spes and Fortuna, and Concord, were still standing in Rome, and many of the old religious ceremonies and festivals continued to be observed. An edict of the year 399, promulgated at Ravenna, while forbidding the pagan worship, prohibited the destruction of the temples; it was the imperial pleasure, it stated, that edifices which gave so much adornment to the public thoroughfares should be preserved—"publicorum operum ornamenta servari" (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 15).

It is not accordingly until the year 408 that paganism can be regarded as having been rigorously suppressed in the West. In the December of that year an edict of Honorius, addressed to Curtius, prefect of Italy, forbade all payments ("annonae") to the maintenance of the ancient worship, enjoined that all images in the temples, if any still remained, should be removed, and that the temples themselves should be converted to secular uses and the altars destroyed (ib. XVI. x. 20).

In Africa this legislation appears to have been put in force with exceptional severity, and three out of the five edicts directed in the reign of Honorius against paganism relate to that province. Augustine (de Civ. Dei, xviii. 54) testifies to the actual execution, by the imperial officers, Gaudentius and Jovius, of these enactments: pagan priests who had failed to quit Carthage by a certain day, were compelled to retire to their native towns or villages, and all property devoted to the support of the pagan worship was confiscated.

The testimony of contemporary writers to the general overthrow of paganism now becomes explicit and unanimous. Zeno, bishop of Verona towards the close of the 4th century, speaks of "nearly the whole world" as already Christian (ad Cor. I. vii. 29; Migne, xi. 304); Jerome, writing a few years later (A.D. 403), says "the golden Capitol is dishonoured; all the temples of Rome stand begrimed with smoke and covered with cobwebs; the city is stirred to its foundations, and the populace stream past the half-demolished shrines on their way to the tombs of the martyrs" (Epist. cvii.). Augustine, in Africa, declares that God has willed the overthrow of Gentile superstition, and that He has already to a great extent completed His purpose. "Ye behold," he says, in one of his epistles, "the temples, some fallen into ruin, some overthrown, some closed, some converted to other uses; and the idols themselves broken, burnt, shut up from view, or actually destroyed" (Epist. ccxxxii.). The language of Theodoretus in the East is still more emphatic; he avers, with something of Oriental exaggeration, that the temples had been so utterly destroyed, that their very fashion had faded from memory, and men no longer knew how to construct an altar, while their materials had been consecrated by being used for the tombs of the martyrs (Sermo de Martyr.; Migne, Series Graeca, lxxxiii. 1034). An edict of Theodosius II. of the year 423, assumes that paganism is virtually extinct—"paganos qui superstunt, quamquam jam nullos esse credimus, promulgatarum legum jamdudum praescripta compescant" (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 22); but the appearance of subsequent repressive enactments, e.g. one of the year 425 (Append. to Cod. Theod. p. 17), forbidding that pagans should practise at the bar, exercise military functions, or own Christian slaves, proves that the exceptions were still numerous.

Even after this time not a few traces of pagan practices are discernible in a form that directly challenged the attention of the state, and are perhaps to be explained as existing by sufferance, the Christian legislator deeming that concessions like these might be made to the prejudices of the vanquished party without detriment to the security of the true faith. Instances of this kind are the public festivals and rejoicings on the kalends of January, practices especially condemned by Maximus of Turin, and by Chrysoloras, bishop of Ravenna in 430. The former expressly complains, that though Christian rulers enacted salutary laws for the protection of religion, the magistrates gave themselves no trouble to see that these laws were carried out (Migne, Patrol. lvii. 610). The watching of the flight of birds, and the shaking of the lots in the urn at the election of consuls, were still practised under Valentinian III.; and even so late as the reign of Anthemius (A.D. 467–472) representations of pagan deities appear on the coinage of the empire (Vaillant, Numismata Impp. Romanorum, iii. 629).

An edict of Theodoric, of the year 500 (Lindenbrog, Cod. Leg. Ant. p. 255), directing that all persons found sacrificing according to the rites of paganism shall be put to death, marks the culminating point of repressive legislation in the West; although, when taken in conjunction with undeniable evidence of the continued existence of paganism, even this enactment is regarded by Beugnot as a menace, rather than designed to be really carried into execution; and he adduces in support of this view the complete absence of any trace of judicial proceedings in Italy against the supporters of the ancient religion (Hist. de la Destruct. de Paganisme, i. 282).

On the whole, the commencement of the 6th century must be looked upon as the period when the severance between the civil power in the empire and the pagan faith was first really carried into complete effect, and the closing of the schools of Athens by Justinian, in the year 529, marks the formal repression of the old philosophy, between which and Christian doctrine it had at one time seemed possible that a reconciliation might be effected. The destruction at nearly the same time of a temple to Apollo that had long stood on Monte Cassino, to make way for St. Benedict's celebrated monastery, typifies a corresponding revolution in the religious life.

II. The survival of paganism as a popular belief, in open contravention of state authority and in avowed antagonism to Christianity.—This, again, requires to be distinguished according as it presents itself (i) as a survival of the ancient Greek or Roman mythology; (ii) as the religion of Teutonic or other barbarous nations.

(i) Paganism being, as the word denotes, the faith of the villager, its later history is to be traced almost exclusively in districts comparatively isolated from intercourse with the great centres of civilisation. The force of the term is illustrated by the observation of Orosius, that "as aliens from the city of God, living near cross roads and villages in country districts, they are called villagers or gentiles"—"qui alieni a civitate Dei ex locorum agrestium compitis et pagis pagani vocantur sive gentiles" (Migne, xxxi. 3). Similarly Prudentius (contra Symmachum, iv. 620) speaks of the defenders of the ancient faith as "pago implicitos." Of its persistence and reappearance in such localities, long after the civil power had pronounced it extinct, we have frequent, and often startling, evidence. The triumph of Christianity was very far from being a continuously progressive overthrow of the old superstitions. Not to advert to those cases in which the new faith itself became altogether extinct, as in Africa before the advance of Mahometanism, there are not a few instances of its temporary disappearance in comparatively limited districts, through the relapse of the population into paganism. Generally speaking the following conclusions are probably sound: (1) That where a break in the recorded episcopal succession presents itself, paganism regained the ascendancy during the period represented by this vacancy. "If," says Gregory of Tours, when referring to the succession in his own diocese, "any one should inquire why only one bishop, namely, Litorius, is to be found in the period extending from the death of bishop Gatianus to St. Martin, let him know that, owing to the resistance of the pagans, the city of Tours was long deprived of all priestly benediction" (Hist. Fr. i. 43). (2) That where, in the history of a community or of a city, we find no trace of a bishopric or of a monastery, paganism probably continued to hold its ground.

The language of St. Augustine, who speaks of the faith as "toto terrarum orbe diffusa, exceptis Romanis et adhuc paucis Occidentalibus," points to a distinction which may be regarded as valid during the greater part of our period. In the 6th century the pagan party in the East (the παῖδες Ἑλλήνων, as they were termed) became subject to persecutions scarcely less cruel than those which the Christians encountered under Diocletian. John Malalas [Chronographia; Migne (S. G.), xcvii. 449] states that in the year 561 there was a great persecution (διωγμὸς Ἑλλήνων μέγας), and that the property of many adherents of paganism was confiscated; while a decree forbade them to exercise their political rights as citizens. He also tells how certain gamblers (τινες τῶν κυττιστῶν) who had been guilty of blasphemy (βλασφημίας δειναῖς ἑαυτοὺς περιβαλόντες) were sentenced to have their hands and feet cut off, and in this state were paraded naked on camels through the streets of Constantinople, while their books and the images of their gods were burnt at the Cynegium.

In the Italian prefecture, on the other hand, where the presence of the barbarian conqueror (still either pagan or Arian) secured for the Roman paganism a certain toleration, the ancient religion was long cherished and its rites practised. At Rome it found support in the political traditions and associations of the aristocratic party, and in the rural districts of Italy was protected by a genuine, though bigoted, devotion to the national worship. Even Christian historians admit that in these latter regions idolatry still reigned in the 4th century, and that the work of evangelization was attended with considerable peril. In the mountainous districts of the north, Saturn and Diana continued to receive the homage of the peasantry, and the first preachers of Christianity encountered a martyr's fate (Beugnot, i. 284). The inhabitants of the valleys of Piedmont stubbornly defended the faith of their ancestors; Valens and Valentinian were saluted by the Venetians as the "divini patres" (Muratori, i. 264, no. 4). At Turin and Brescello, statues were erected to Julian (Marmora Taurinen. i. 249). At Milan, where the influence of St. Ambrose was paramount paganism almost disappeared; but a tractate of Maximus of Turin (Migne, Patrol. lvii. 721), written nearly half a century later, "Contra Paganos," proves the extent to which it prevailed in the surrounding districts. Etruria, which Christian historians have represented as completely converted during the reign of Constantine, appears by the testimony of Ammianus Marcellinus (b. xxvii. c. 3) and that of Zosimus (v. xlv.) to have been a stronghold of the art of divination in their time, and to have supplied all Italy with diviners. At Florence, distinguished by its worship of Mars, a tradition prevailed that if the statue of that deity were dishonoured evil would befall the city (Villani, i. lx.); and, out of deference to superstitious feeling, the statue was placed on the bank of the Arno, where it long continued to receive the homage of the citizens. At Volaterra the pagan worship, protected by the powerful family of the Caecinae, maintained its ground, and was professed with impunity (Rutilius Numat. i. v. 453). In the central portion of the peninsula, the evidence of inscriptions and of pagan writers reveals the existence of the pagan element at Sestinum, Rimini, Spoleto, Alba, Ostia, Praeneste, &c. (Symmachus, Epist. i. 43; Ammian. Marc. b. xix. c. 10; Macrobius, Sat. i. 23). The south, owing in a great measure to the inaccessible nature of the country, long remained pagan. Naples was distinguished by its adherence to the national faith (Benevent. Ant. Thes. i. 118). The insularity of Sicily exercised a similar influence, and inscriptions at Drepanum and Marsala shew that these cities were still unchristianized so late as the reign of Valens and Valentinian (Siciliae Inscript. Collect. pp. 27, 36). Beugnot (i. 289) considers that paganism continued to be dominant in the island until supplanted towards the end of the 5th century by the worship of the Virgin, which, after the third general council at Ephesus, was largely introduced (Cronologia univ. della Sicilia, p. 601).

The islands of the Western Mediterranean long remained altogether pagan. Rutilius (i. v. 375) speaks of the worship of Osiris as prevailing in Elba, while that of Hercules appears to have predominated in Sardinia (Graevius, Thesaur. xv. 58).

In the province of Africa, where the intimate relations with Rome gave rise to a similar state of religious feeling, a spirit of indifference seems long to have tolerated the ancient worship of the country. The deities to whom special reverence was paid were the Tyrian god, Melcarth (identified by some writers with the Libyan Hercules), together with Saturn and Celeste. Salvian (de Gub. Dei, Migne, liii. 178) represents even Christians of his time as uniting with pagans in ceremonies instituted in honour of this goddess. In Mauritania and Numidia, we meet with other names, probably those of the legendary heroes of the country. At Utica, Apollo; at Carthage, Ceres and Proserpine, were principally worshipped. But the most noticeable feature of these provinces, and one which long survived the open worship of pagan deities, was the devotion of the people to superstitious arts, such as magic, sortilegy, augury, &c. At the same time paganism itself exhibited a bold front—a fact partly attributable to intercourse with Rome, partly to the Donatist schism, whereby the influence of the Christian party was seriously impaired. The spirit of the Donatists is illustrated by their admiration of the character and policy of Julian, who, they asserted, was the only emperor who had exhibited the impartiality that became the civil power (August. cont. Epist. Parm. i. 12; Migne, xliii. 47). But even so late as the year 408, we find the pagan party at Calama, in Numidia, celebrating the kalends of June, "contra recentissimas leges;" "tam insolenti usu," says Augustine, "ut quod nec Juliani temporibus factum est." They finally betook themselves to plundering a neighbouring church, and murdered a monk—conduct which Augustine admits appeared to have the secret sympathy of the principal inhabitants of the place (Epist. 91; Migne, xxxiii. 316–7).

In Spain the resistance to Christianity appears to have been feeble. The absence of a distinct national religion probably favoured the introduction of the new faith, the previously existing worship having included the deities of different lands, the gods of the capitol together with those of Phœnicia, Greece, and Carthage. We find, however, evidence of a strong Roman element.[b] From the reign of Constantine to that of Valentinian, the list of the magistrates of the province is noticeable, as presenting us with the names of families distinguished by their adherence to paganism (Masdeu, v. 507). St. Pacian, bishop of Barcelona, who died towards the end of the 4th century, declares that many of the inhabitants of his diocese are still given to idolatry (Migne, xiii. 1084); and Macrobius speaks of the Occitani, a people near Cadiz, as worshipping in the same century, "cum maxima religione," a statue of Mars, whom they adored under the name of Neton (i. ix.). Beugnot, who differs from Masdeu and Milman on this question, considers the early conversion of the province to have been little more than nominal, and calls attention to the articles of the council of Elvira as indicating the existence of many pagan usages and, at best, but a very impure form of Christianity (i. 313–4).

In the Gauls, the language of St. Jerome, "Gallia monstra non habuit," implying the absence of idolatry, must be understood as applicable only to the southern portion of Transalpine Gaul; and even in this region, where Roman institutions and Roman civilization long held their ground after they had been overthrown on the parent soil, the ancient faith was cherished with remarkable tenacity. In Brittany, the place of these traditions was supplied by Druidism, and in the north-east by Teutonic paganism. St. Martin, in the 4th century, appears to have been the first whose efforts at evangelization were crowned by any substantial success. "Before his arrival," says Sulpicius Severus, "none, or scarcely any, worshipped the true God; where he overthrew temples, he immediately erected monasteries or churches" (Migne, Patrol. xv. 167). Gregory of Tours, in his life of Simplicius, bishop of Autun, narrates how the worship of Cybele still reigned in the bishop's diocese, and that it was customary to carry her statue round the fields and vineyards in order to render them productive. In the north, his friend Wulfilaich describes the destruction of a statue of Diana, worshipped by the inhabitants of Trèves, in the last quarter of the 6th century (Hist. Franc. viii. xv.); and St. Kilian, in the year 689, found that at the court of Dagobert II., king of East Francia, the same golden image, "in summa veneratione habebatur" (Act. SS. Boll. Juill. p. 616). Mercury was an object of special veneration in Elsass (Mone, ii. 343). Temples to Jupiter, Mercury, and Apollo existed at Rouen in the 7th century, and were still visited by worshippers (Martène, Thes. Nov. iii. 1656, b.). The conversion of the Franks to Christianity was a far more gradual process than the example of Clovis may appear to suggest. The superstitions of the nation were widely spread by them in Gaul, and a kind of fusion seems to have taken place between the religion of the conqueror and that of the conquered. Beugnot considers that in no part of Europe were idolatrous rites and practices more prevalent subsequent to the introduction and partial acceptance of Christianity. Hincmar (ad Epis. de Jure Metrop. Migne, cxxvi, 200) states that in the time of Charles Martel the Christian faith had almost died out, both in Austrasia and Neustria, large numbers of the eastern Franks never having received baptism. The worship of the Teutonic gods was maintained under the names of Greek or Roman divinities; Odin became Mercury; Thor, Jupiter; Frigga, Venus. To this practice we may attribute the singular error of Gregory of Tours, who represents Clotilda, when endeavouring to convert Clovis, as referring to the objects of her husband's worship under the names of the deities of the Greek mythology. In the year 743, the council of Lestines, in condemning many pagan superstitions still rife, refers to "sacra Jovis et Mercurii" (Mansi, xii. 385); but here the design appears to have been simply to denote, under classical names, the Teutonic deities, for a form of abjuration drawn up for the people in the vernacular substitutes the names "Thunaer ende Uuoden."

In England, where Celtic Christianity was driven, with the native population, into Wales, the different kingdoms were indebted for their evangelization each to a different source; and the work of conversion to even nominal Christianity was not completed until nearly a century from the time of the landing of Augustine. Kent and Essex relapsed into paganism. Mercia, under Penda, remained pagan until 633. Bede states that up to the time of Wilfrid's mission in 681, "all in the province of the South Saxons were strangers to the name and faith of God" (Eccl. Hist. iv. 12).

It is observed by Mone (Gesch. des Heidenthums, ii. 51) that it was the policy of the evangelizers of northern Europe to choose, as a centre of their operations, districts where the worship of the pagan gods was maintained with greatest vigour; a policy imitated by Charles the Great in relation to the Saxons. The see of Paderborn, like Boniface's monastery at Fulda, was erected among an almost entirely heathen population. The provisions of the Capitulary of Paderborn, A.D. 785 (de Partibus Saxoniae), bear witness to this fact; and it is inferred by Beugnot that the stringent character of these enactments, when compared with the milder legislation relating to similar superstitions in Gaul, proves the more stubborn adherence of the Saxons to their national faith. It may be observed that these provisions were again promulgated as late as the year 1035, by Conrad II. against the pagan practices of the Wends.

III. Paganism (i) as interwoven with the religious rites, discipline, and ceremonial of Christianity; or (ii) as discernible in the every day life and practices of professedly Christian communities.

This part of the subject belongs mainly to the period distinguished by Beugnot as the third and concluding stage of the fall of paganism in the West, commencing with the reign of Valentinian III. and terminating with that of Charles the Great. After the fall of Rome before Alaric, in 410, the attitude of the state in relation to paganism was little altered; but great concessions appear to have been made by the church with the design of facilitating the work of conversion. The policy which dictated these concessions may be referred to a threefold sentiment:—(1) the desire to mitigate the resentment of those who asserted that the fall of Rome was attributable to the neglect of the worship of her ancient gods; (2) to a sense of the common danger to Christianity and pagan civilization alike, presented in the triumph of the barbaric invader; (3) to a belief in the approaching end of the world—an event which, as we learn from Tertullian (Apol. 42) and other writers, was believed by the Christians themselves to be destined to follow on the fall of Rome, and which rendered them doubly anxious to waive such points of difference as, although of small doctrinal importance, still constituted serious obstacles to pagan conversion.

(i) The observation of Chrysostom, that the devil, "finding himself unable to win the Christians to idolatry, took a round-about way to seduce them," points to the existence of many pagan practices among Christians even in that father's time; but a large number of usages in the ritual and observances of the church cannot be traced farther back than the 5th century. The language of some of the fathers seems, it is true, often to imply a spirit of unsparing extermination; but it is certain that a much larger amount of compromise actually prevailed than theory countenanced. Among the Teutonic nations especially, there was a disposition on the part of the earliest evangelisers to be satisfied—at least in the first instance—with a series of conversions little more genuine than those effected in India and Ceylon in the 15th century by Francis Xavier and the Jesuits; and even where more real results were gained, it was often found expedient to leave many distinctly pagan usages unchallenged for a time. It is perhaps in harmony with the distinction above indicated, as observable in the Christian policy prior and subsequent to A.D. 410, that the line of conduct authorised by Gregory the Great in his instructions to Mellitus [IDOLATRY, p. 811], and that recommended by bishop Daniel to Boniface in Frankland (Epist. xiv.; Migne, lxxxix. 707–710), is in strong contrast to that already referred to as pursued by St. Martin in Gaul. Heathen temples with their surrounding precincts were often permitted to stand uninjured, the idols being removed, and the buildings consecrated to Christian uses; while minor observances were suffered, either by connivance or tacit assent, to continue, which, with the lapse of time, were regarded as having gained the direct sanction of the church.

Among the Latin races, the worship of Mithra, the Sun-god, appears to have survived that of nearly all the other gods of the Roman mythology. M. Gaston Boissier (La Religion romaine, ii. 417) considers that, at the time of the fall of the empire, paganism, as it existed in Italy, recognised scarcely any other deity. Pope Leo the Great states that many Christians in his time adored the rising sun from lofty heights, "partim vitio ignorantiae, partim paganitatis spiritu;" and that some Christians did this under so mistaken a notion of religion, that even when ascending the steps of St. Peter's at Rome they were wont to turn and make their obeisance to the sun (Migne, Patrol. liv. 94). Maximus of Turin reproaches those whom he addresses with culpable indifference to idolatry as practised by others. He says that if their attention were drawn to an idol, they would say it was no concern of theirs, "causa mea non est, non me tangit" (Migne, lvii. 610). Pope Gregory, writing to queen Brunehaut, urges her to put a stop to idolatry and the worship of trees; for he hears, he says, that Christians who go to church still worship daemons (ibid. lxxvii. 939). Agila, ambassador from the Gothic monarch Leuvichildus to king Chilperic, informed Gregory of Tours that his people held the worship of idols to be perfectly compatible with that of the God of the Christians (Hist. Franc. v. 44; Migne, lxxi. 256). Grimm indeed observes that both among the Anglo-Saxons and the Northmen the same idea prevailed (Deutsche Mythol. p. 7); and Bede (Hist. Eccl. ii. 15) states that Redwald, king of East Anglia, had in the same temple an altar on which to offer Christian sacrifice, and another, a smaller one, on which to offer victims to devils. The canon of the council of Elvira (A.D. 325) forbidding all who have received baptism, and are of years of discretion, to enter a temple in order to participate in idolatrous worship, under penalty of being refused the sacrament of communion at death, is, however, sufficient proof that the action of the church was very early directed against such gross misconceptions, which appear to have been, for the most part, confined to semi-barbarous nations.

A more interesting and instructive inquiry is that which relates to those pagan elements which became permanently interwoven with Christian belief and practice, and were even defended by many of the great teachers of the church. The controversy between Jerome and Vigilantius, and that between Augustine and the Manichaean Faustus, offer valuable illustration of this portion of the subject. Vigilantius attacked the adoration of saints, the veneration paid to martyrs and their relics, and the custom of placing lamps before their shrines. Faustus declared that the Christians had really in no way abandoned the pagan mode of life. They had merely substituted their Agapae for the Pagan sacrifices; their martyrs for idols; they still appeased the shades of the dead with wine and meat offerings, and celebrated along with the pagans the ancient festal days—the Kalends and the Solstitiae. It appears unquestionable that both Jerome and Augustine admitted the pagan origin of these customs, but maintained their utility, and especially vindicated their retention on the ground of expediency; but both Augustine and Theodoret disclaimed the notion that it was the design of the church in any way to deify the martyrs, whom it honoured and revered solely as instruments of the divine power. (Milman, Hist. of Christianity, bk. iii. c. xi.; bk. iv. c. ii.; Neander, Church History (in Clark's series), iii. 452–3; Gieseler, Kirchengesch. (ed. 1845), i. ii. 333–5.)

It is the opinion of Baur (Kirchengesch. i. 536–7) that the veneration of martyrs and their relics (from whence he derives the invocation of saints) is to be traced to the hero-worship of pre-Christian times; Neander, on the other hand, claims for the celebration of the memory of the great lights of the church "a purely Christian root," but holds that it received a different character by becoming "estranged and diverted from the original Christian spirit" (u. s. iii. 448). The earliest instance of the practice is probably the celebration of the anniversary of Polycarp's passion at Smyrna (Ruinart, Act. sinc. Martyr. pp. 35, 43). The dove which, it was said, had been seen to rise from the martyr's body is compared by Baur to the mounting eagle which proclaimed the apotheosis of the Roman emperors. Tertullian (de Cor. c. 3) speaks of "oblationes pro defunctis, pro natalicii[s] annua die;" and Cyprian (Ep. 34) of the "martyrum passiones" and their "anniversaria commemoratio." See, on the whole subject, MARTYR, p. 1127; PATRON SAINT; RELICS.

The worship of Mary, as practised by the Collyridians, is looked upon by Neander (u. s. iii. 458) as directly traceable to that of Ceres. This sect, which was represented by a number of women who emigrated from Thrace and settled in Arabia, were wont, on a certain day, to carry about in cars (ἅμαξαι), similar to those used in pagan processions, cakes or wafers consecrated to the Virgin, which they first presented as offerings, and subsequently ate. This practice Neander derives from the customary cake-offerings at the heathen feast of the harvest, the Θεσμοφόρια.

Direct participation in pagan festivals seems to have been not uncommon under the pretext of a semi-religious observance, though frequently condemned by the Fathers. "I have," says St. Ambrose, "a grave complaint against you, brethren. I speak of those who, though celebrants along with us of Christ's birth, join in the festivals of the Gentiles; and, after that heavenly banquet, have prepared for themselves a feast of superstition. . . . . He who seeks to share in divine things must not associate with idols." (Serm. vii.; Migne, xvii. 399). Augustine, when reproving the Christians of Carthage for joining in like festivals, represents the pagan party as asking, "Why should we abandon our gods whom the Christians worship as well as ourselves?" (Opera, ed. 1577, x. 9 b). A discourse of Petrus Chrysologus, bishop of Ravenna in the year 450, implies that participants in these festivals sometimes endeavoured to exculpate themselves by denying the affinities of such celebrations to pagan practices. They pleaded that their observance of the Kalends, for instance, was "a new mode of rejoicing, not an ancient error," "novitatis laetitia non vetustatis error," and that it was "anni principium, non gentilitatis offensa" (Hom. 155; Migne, liii. 611). Pope Gelasius, towards the close of the 5th century, expressly stigmatised this combination of Christian and pagan customs as "adulterous," and, in condemning all participation in the Lupercalia, seriously remonstrates with those who imagine that such observances are of any real efficacy in securing the favour of the gods (Baronius, Annal. vi. 522). The change of the commencement of the year from January to Easter is asserted by Beugnot to have been the result of the church's desire to break with such pagan traditions. In the year 567, at the second council of Tours, it was forbidden to celebrate the Kalends, the Feralia, or the Terminalia (Mansi, ix. 865; Hefele, iii. 27). But even so late as the 9th century, Rabanus Maurus, who speaks of Christianity as covering the whole earth, "in toto orbe dilatatam" (Opera, vi. 172), asks in a homily "Contra Paganicos Errores," how they can hope to rejoice at the eternal banquet of the saints, who do not here loathe the unlawful feasts of the pagans? How shall they sing with angels the praises of God in eternal light who here keep evil sport ("funestos ludos") in honour of idols? (ibid. v. 606). Modern fairs and feasts ("feriae" and "festa") bear witness to the tenacity of these traditions.

In Christian ritual itself not a few observances have been referred with considerable probability to a pagan origin. The custom of facing the east in worship, derived in the first instance from Persian notions of sun worship (see supra 154.), appears to have been borrowed from Greek and Roman practice (Aeschylus, Agamemnon, 502; Vergil, Aeneid, viii. 68; Ovid, Fasti, iv. 777, with Mr. Paley's note). The "ter injectus pulvis" has passed into the Christian burial service; while the letters D. M. on the tombs of the early Christians point to the tenacity of pagan traditions in connexion with the state of the departed (Northcote and Brownlow, Roma Sotterranea, p. 26). Lacerda, in commenting on the line, "Spargens rore levi et ramo felicis olivae" (Verg. Aeneid, vi. 230) considers that the act therein denoted represents the origin of sprinkling with holy water, a practice which Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 62; Migne (S. G.), vi. 80) declares to have been introduced, at the instigation of daemons, into the Christian ritual in imitation of the true baptism proclaimed by the prophets. "Epitaphia," or funeral orations over the dead, such as we frequently meet with in the writings of the Fathers, are distinctly traceable to pagan precedent. [FUNERAL SERMONS.]

Among those observances which distinguish Roman Catholic ritual from Lutheran or Protestant, a large number are undoubtedly of pagan origin—a connexion which Conyers Middleton's celebrated Letter from Rome was especially designed to point out. The use of incense is condemned by Tertullian and other early writers as a pagan practice [INCENSE]. We learn from different writers (Origen, cont. Cels. viii. 17; Min. Felix, Octav. c. 10; Arnobius, bk. vi.) that the absence of images in their churches was made a reproach by paganism against the Christians, and Augustine expressly states that the introduction of these visible objects of adoration was regarded as unlawful in his day, and speaks of the adoration paid to them as a kind of insanity (ad Ps. cxiii.; Migne, xxxvii. 1183–1185). The earliest mention of pictures in churches has reference to the 4th century, and their introduction is expressly forbidden by the 38th canon of the council of Elvira, A.D. 324. Epiphanius, in the same century, tells us (ap. Jerome, Epist. 51; Migne, Patrol. xxii. 253) that he felt it to be his duty to destroy a hanging "velum tinctum atque depictum," which he found suspended in a church in Palestine, representing Christ or one of the saints. Theodoretus Cyrensis (Graec. Affect. Curatio, Migne (S. G.), lxxxiii. 922) refers with express approval to the practice, prevalent in his day, of suspending votive offerings (ἀναθήματα) in the churches over the tombs of the martyrs, on escape from danger or recovery from sickness; similarly, those who were childless presented such offerings in the hope of being blessed with offspring; those already parents, to secure the divine blessing on their children.

The little chapels with images of the Virgin that so frequently meet the eye of the tourist in Southern Germany or Italy cannot but recall to recollection the "Compitales" or deities who presided over cross-roads, and whose statues and shrines adorned the points of junction. The asylum afforded by pagan temples to fugitives from justice or from their foes offers perhaps too vague and general a resemblance to the right of sanctuary to be regarded as necessarily the origin of the latter, which may with equal or greater probability be referred to Jewish precedents.

(ii) Among the vestiges of pagan belief discernible in the everyday life and practice of Christian communities may be included many observances of a harmless character and little moral significance. The Roman custom of presenting gifts at the commencement of the new year is still observed, and the expression of good wishes on the same occasion is alike a pagan and a Christian usage (Ovid, Fasti, i. 175). The use of bridecakes at weddings (the Roman confarreatio), the palatine bay and oak on our coinage, the names of the months, which even the decree of Charles the Great could not permanently alter, all distinctly recall a like origin.

Of such customs, one, the "strenae" (modern "étrennes") degenerated into a serious abuse, which the church did its best to suppress. [NEW YEAR'S GIFTS, p. 1381.]

As proof that the great majority of the superstitions of the age were a direct inheritance from paganism, we may cite the following illustration. Amid the loss of much that the ancient astronomers had bequeathed to posterity, the discovery of the real cause of eclipses appears to have been faithfully preserved; and in his Natural History, Pliny takes occasion to extol this triumph of science over superstition, and warmly urges philosophers to like achievements. As his writings continued to be studied throughout the greater part of the middle ages, this philosophical solution of a constantly recurring phenomenon was never lost sight of by the educated few, and hence the teachers of the church are frequently to be found rebuking the vulgar superstition which led the common people to assemble and utter cries on the occasion of a lunar or solar eclipse, in order to prevent the moon or sun from being totally devoured. Discourses directly levelled against this practice are to be found in the writings of Maximus of Turin (Migne, vii. 337), and of Rabanus Maurus (Opera, ed. Colv. v. 606), with which compare Tacitus (Annal. i. 28). On the other hand, as Pliny expressly states that earthquakes portend calamity (Hist. Nat. ii. 81–86) so the Fathers shared this belief with the multitude. St. Ambrose declares that the death of Theodosius was foretold by earthquakes, by "mountains of rain and an unwonted darkening of the sky" (Migne, xvi. 1386). The pages of Gregory of Tours are in this respect as superstitious as those of Livy. Four suns portended a great defeat in Auvergne (Hist. Franc. iv. 31); blood flowed from broken bread (ibid. v. 34); it rained blood near Paris until men threw aside their stained garments in horror (ib. vi. 14); a bright body resembling a lofty beacon appeared in the heavens to foretell the death of Gondebald (vii. 11). (See also de Mirac. St. Martin, Bouquet, Script. ii. 469.) The belief in astrology [ASTROLOGERS], which Pliny (Nat. Hist. ii. 5) notices as fast gaining ground in his time, could never be entirely eradicated throughout the period here treated.

It must nevertheless be admitted that the voice of the church was generally strongly pronounced against the more childish and irrational forms of the belief in omens. "Thou seest," says St. Basil, "how wrong a thing it is to look for omens; yet many Christians deem it no harm (ἀδιάφορον) to listen for sounds and to give heed to signs" (Comment. in Isai. c. ii.; Migne, Series Graeca, xxx. 247). He instances such trivial circumstances as striking one's foot against some object on leaving the house, or finding one's garment caught, and admonishes Christians rather to take note of the proofs of divine wisdom and goodness exhibited in the natural world. St. Chrysostom refers to the belief that to meet a cripple or a one-eyed person, when starting on a journey, was a bad omen (Hom. ad Pop. Antioch.); St. Eligius, in the 7th century, enumerates a large number of similar superstitions, such as the belief that to allow one's flocks to pass by hollow trees or near pits gave them over to the power of evil spirits. He dissuades women from wearing amber about their necks, and from invoking Minerva, and rebukes the folly of hesitating to set about new undertakings at the time of full moon (Migne, lxxxvii. 528).

Trial by the ordeal of heated iron [ORDEAL] was probably a survival of the custom adverted to in the lines—

> ". . . . et medium, freti pietate, per ignem > Cultores multa premimus vestigia pruna."
> (Verg. Aen. xi. 787, 788.)

The following Indiculus Superstitionum et Paganiarum, or list of superstitions and pagan observances condemned at the council of Lestines,[4] in the year 743, is probably a fairly complete enumeration of the practices prevalent at that time, which the church condemned either as pagan or Christian superstitions or as abuses connected with religious worship.

(1) "De sacrilegio ad sepulchra mortuorum." (2) "De sacrilegio super defunctos, id est, dadisse." The first article appears to have reference to the desecration of tombs in the search for hidden treasure, and to unlawful rites over the places of interment; the second to pagan observances, such as drinking and riotous banqueting, and throwing into the fire whatever the deceased had been accustomed to hold most dear (cf. Mansi, xii. 340). (3) "De spurcalibus in Februario." It was a common practice among Teutonic nations to celebrate the lengthening of the days in February by feasts at which swine were offered. These feasts were called "Spurcalia," and in Holland and Lower Germany the month of February is still known as "Sporkelmaend" (Hefele, Conciliengesch. iii. 506). (4) De casulis, id est, fanis." Probably small temples in country districts, constructed of wood, and often converted to purposes of debauchery. (5) "De sacrilegiis per ecclesias." Hefele compares a statute of St. Boniface (Mansi, xii. 385) forbidding the introduction of seculars and young women into the churches as singers and also the holding of feasts within the walls. (6) "De sacris sylvarum, quae nimidas vocant." Here Wurdtwein, in Migne (lxxxix. 810) explains "quasi Nympharum sacra." Eckhard, however, thinks that we have here a reference to sacrifices at which nine heads of horses were offered, and prefers to read "nuinhedas." A capitulary of Charles the Great, of the year 794, directs that "sacred" groves and trees shall be hewn down. (7) "De his quae faciunt super petras." To offer sacrifices on rocks was a frequent practice, and is forbidden by numerous synods; St. Eligius, we are told by St. Audoen (Vita, ii. 15) enjoined, "Nullus Christianus ad fana, vel ad petras, vel ad fontes, vel ad arbores . . . vota reddere praesumat." (8) "De sacris Mercurii vel Jovis." On the occurrence of the names of gods of the Roman mythology as objects of veneration among the Germans, see observations in II. ii. We may, however, compare Tacitus (Germ. c. 9), "Deorum maxime Mercurium colunt." (9) "De sacrificio quod fit alicui sanctorum." The newly-converted Germans appear to have often substituted saints and martyrs for their own gods as objects of veneration. See capitulary 5 of Germanic council of 742 (Mansi, xii. 313). (10) "De phylacteriis et ligaturis" [see LIGATURAE]. Alcuin, some fifty years later, appears to have found it necessary to remonstrate against the wearing of relics by way of charms (Epist. ed. Dümmler, pp. 719, 721). (11) "De fontibus sacrificiorum." Offerings to the supposed divinities of fountains and streams were a common practice. Mone (Gesch. d. Heidenthums, ii. 270) states that the inhabitants of the districts watered by the Elbe and the Main were accustomed to worship the genii of those rivers, and, whenever the year gave promise of a season of fertility, would cast wheat, oats, and barley into the stream in acknowledgment of the favour shewn by the river-god. (12) "De incantationibus." The formulae or mystic sentences uttered by the pretenders to magic. (13) "De auguriis vel avium vel equorum vel bovum sterrora vel sternutationes." Tacitus (Germ. c. 20) says that it was peculiar to the race to observe the prognostications and warnings given by horses. (14) "De divinis vel sortilegis." The "divini" foretold events from signs over which they had no control; the "sortilegi," from objects which they carried with them, e.g. sticks and straws [SORTILEGY]. "Auspicia sortesque, ut qui maxime, observant" (Tac. Germ. c. 10). (15) "De igne fricato de ligno, id est, nodfyr." "Nodfyr" (Germ. "Nöthen") was fire produced by friction, and was held to possess mysterious virtues. To jump over it was thought to be a preservative against misfortune; garments placed in its smoke were supposed to secure the wearer from fever. This superstition was especially condemned by Boniface at the Germanic council of A.D. 842 (Mansi, xii. 315; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, II. ii. 564). (16) "De cerebro animalium." The council of Orleans (A.D. 541) forbade that oaths should be sworn over the head of any animal. (17) "De observatione paganorum in foco vel in incoatione rei alicujus." The embers on the hearth and the ascending smoke were supposed to give indications of future events. Artists, in representing the sacrifice of Cain and of Abel, were wont to represent the smoke from the former as blown about by different currents, while that of the latter ascended undisturbed in a spiral column (Migne, Patrol. lxxxix. 810). (18) "De incertis locis quae colunt pro sanctis." Besides places generally recognised as holy, there were supposed to be many others of a like character (Germ. "Unstätte") of which the knowledge was withheld from mortals, but by passing over which unadvisedly they would be liable to be punished by the infliction of some malady. (19) "De petendo, quod boni vocant sanctae Mariae." Eckhard (Rerum Franc. bk. xxiii.) reads "petenstro," "bedstraw," and understands by "boni homines" simple-minded people. Thyme and the yellow lady's bedstraw are still termed in Germany "Mother of God's bedstraw." Hefele considers that the superstitious use of the plant may be traced in the custom still prevalent in Catholic countries of offering bunches of herbs on the Ascension of the Virgin. (20) "De feriis, quae faciunt Jovi vel Mercurio." Seiters supposes that Boniface here intended to forbid the naming of the days of the week after the heathen gods: e.g. Thunaer (Donnerstag), Thursday; Woden (Woenstag), Wednesday; Freja (Freitag), Friday. Binterim suggests a more probable explanation by quoting Tacitus: "Deorum maxime Mercurium (Woden) colunt, cui certis diebus humanis quoque hostiis litare fas habent" (Germ. c. 9). "De lunae defectione, quod dicunt vince luna." We find in Maximus of Turin (Migne, lvii. 334), in St. Eligius (ibid. lxxxvii. 528), and Rabanus Maurus (Opera, v. 606), discourses designed to dissuade their hearers from the folly of uttering outcries on the occasion of a lunar eclipse. It was supposed that by these demonstrations the moon was assisted in escaping from being altogether devoured. (22) "De tempestatibus et cornibus et cocleis." Referring apparently to the belief in "weather-makers," and to superstitions practised with drinking vessels and spoons. (23) "De sulcis circa villas." Hefele observes that a trench round a house was supposed to be a protection against witches; the annotator in Migne (lxxxix. 810) supposes that allusion is designed to superstitious rites observed on the occasion of making such trenches. (24) "De pagano cursu quem vrias nominant scissis pannis vel calciamentis." Eckhard here reads, "Scyrias," from Ecy = Scu = Schuh. There is probably allusion intended to a pagan custom of running about on the first of January with torn garments and shoes. (25) "De eo, quod sibi sanctos fingunt quoslibet mortuos." Much as the Germans ascribed at pleasure a place in their Walhalla to departed heroes, so they appear to have assumed the right to canonise departed Christians. This assumption we find again forbidden at the council of Frankfort in the year 794. (26) "De simulacro de consparsa farina." On certain days the Germans were accustomed to make honey cakes representing figures of their gods. Hefele states that in Westphalia the cakes made at the time of Carnival are still known as "Heidenwecke." (27) "De simulacris de pannis factis." Little figures of the gods cut from mandrake and then dressed up in rags. (28) "De simulacro quod per campos portant." A ceremony probably resembling the Latin Ambarvalia. (29) "De ligneis pedibus vel manibus pagano ritu." The custom of offering in the churches wooden models of feet and hands by those who, in answer to their prayers, had been cured of any affection of those parts. Theodoretus Cyrensis (u. s.) speaks of the custom of offering gold and silver eyes, feet, and hands, though without condemning the practice. (30) "De eo quod credunt quia feminæ lunam commendent, quod possint corda luminum tollere juxta paganos." Here some read "comedant," and consider that allusion is designed to a belief similar to that referred to in Tibullus, "Hanc ego de cœlo ducentem sidera vidi." Maximus of Turin, in his 101st homily (Migne, lvii. 337), remonstrates with those "qui putarent lunam de cœlo magorum carminibus posse deduci," and implores them that, putting aside this pagan error, "præetermisso errore gentili," they will accept a view more consonant with Christian enlightenment.

Similarly, a capitulary of Charles the Great, of the year 768, requires "ut populus Dei paganias non faciat," and enumerates as "spurcitiæ gentilitatis" profane sacrifices to the dead, sortilegy and divining, phylacteries, auguries, incantations, and offerings of victims, which last, it states, "foolish men are wont to offer close to churches, in pagan fashion, in the name of the holy martyrs and confessors of the Lord" (Pertz, Leg. i. 33).

Features of a more general character, pointing to a low conception of Christian morality, such as the settlement of disputes by duelling, authorised by the code of Gondebald, king of Burgundy in the 6th century (see ORDEAL), the avenging of murder by murder, as recorded on the part of bishop Gewelib in the 8th century, and facts of a like nature, are often more justly to be regarded as distinct traditions of paganism than merely as evidence of a corrupt or imperfect Christianity.

PALLA ALTARIS. [ALTAR CLOTH.]

PALLADIUS, anchoret in Syria, 4th century; commemorated Jan. 28. (Cal. Byzant.; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 841.) [C. H.]

PALLAIRE, POLAIRE, POOLIRE. When books were few in the ancient Celtic church, and required careful preservation in accompanying their owners from place to place, they appear to have been deposited in leathern satchels or wallets which could be attached to the back by thongs in travelling, and hung upon pegs on the wall (Todd, Obits Ch. Cn. Dubl. p. lxxi.) when a house was reached. For these the two distinctive names of Polaire (Pallaire, Poolire) and Tiag (tiagha) were used, apparently according to the size. The former was comparatively small, often a case for manuscripts or for only one book, like the case in which the Book of Armagh now lies, and which is very richly embossed and covered with figures and the usual Irish interlacing patterns. The latter was of coarser material (as of sealskins, Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 86, c. 93, 130, c. 9, calling it sacculus and pera) and of greater capacity, a wallet to hold not only several books, but relics also and sacred utensils. Evidently the writer of the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 123, c. 38) is in error when he says St. Patrick left at the church he had newly founded at Kellfine, "libros, unà cum scrinio in quo SS. Petri et Pauli reliquiæ asseruabantur, et tabulis in quibus scribere solebat vulgo Pallaire appellatis" (Reeves, S. Adamnan. lxiii. n. ᵛ, 115–117, 359; Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 332–340; O'Curry, Lect. Man. and Cust. Anc. Irish, i. pp. cccvii.–viii., iii. 113–117). [J. G.]

PALLIUM. We find this word in a great variety of uses in ecclesiastical Latin. Before proceeding to these, however, we shall first note its classical acceptance as equivalent to impar, a term for an outer article of dress similar to, but not the same as, the toga.[a] We may describe it as being, to all intents and purposes, a square or oblong blanket; for though it was occasionally found of linen and other materials, wool was by far the most common. These blankets were, as a rule, manufactured in their natural state, and so were usually white, or the ordinary colour of the raw material, though sometimes dyed into special tints.

Such an article of dress would, of course, be inconvenient if the wearer had to run or to engage in active work, and therefore he would throw it over his shoulders. Thus we find one of Plautus's characters, a parasite, saying (Captivi, v. 1. 12): "Conjiciam in collum pallium, primo ex me hanc rem ut audiat," that is, I will throw back my pallium to be able to run quickly with the news. Accordingly, in the next scene (l. 9), he is observed coming "conlecto pallio" (cf. also Terence, Phormio, v. 6. 4). In connexion with this, a curious mistake has been made by St. Isidore (Etymol. xix. 24. 1): "Pallium est quo ministrantium scapulae conteguntur, ut dum ministrant expediti discurrant." Plautus: 'Si quid facturus es appende in humeris pallium, et purgat, quantem valet, tuorum pedum pernicitas.' Dictum autem pallium a pellibus, quia prius super indumenta pellicia veteres utebantur, quasi pellea sive a palla per derivationem (leg. diminutionem"). Here it will be seen that Isidore treats as the normal state of things that which was exceptional.

Besides this special sense of the word pallium, it is used by Isidore in the same chapter quite as a general term for a garment, e.g. the toga is pallium purum forma rotunda (§ 3); the paludamentum is insigne pallium and p. bellicum (§ 9); the paenula is p. cum fimbriis longis (§ 14); the lacerna is p. fimbriatum (ib.); and the praetexta p. puerile (§ 16).

A third use of the word in patristic Latin is to designate the coarse outer garment of monks and of others who affected to imitate the austerities of monastic life. Thus pope Celestinus I. (ob. 432 A.D.), speaks of such as being "amicti pallio" seemed thereby to claim a sanctity not rightly theirs (Epist. 4 ad Episc. Vien. et Narb. c. 2; Patrol. l. 431). Salvianus again says to an unworthy monk, "licet sanctitatem pallio mentiaris" (adv. Avaritiam iv. 5; Patrol. liii. 232). To take a different type of example, when Fulgentius became bishop of Ruspe, he retained his former monastic habit. His biographer tells us that "subtus casulam nigello vel lactineo pallio circumdatus incessit," and that, when the weather permitted, he wore a pallium alone within the monastery (Vita, c. 37; Patrol. lxv. 136.

Again we meet with the word pallium in the phrase pallium linostimum, which we have already discussed [MANIPLE].

We come now to the most important use of the word as a special vestment of archbishops, bestowed upon them as a mark of increased dignity by the Roman see, indicative of vicarial powers (vices apostolicae sedis) thereby bestowed. The discussion on the history of this privilege in detail will be found under the article POPE; our business here is merely to describe the vestment and to give a slight general sketch of the history.

The pallium consists of a narrow band, which surrounds the neck like a ring, and hangs down before and behind. The appearance, therefore, presented, would be that of the letter Y.

This band has long been made of white wool, ornamented with dark crosses.[b] It is thus kindred with the ὠμοφόριον worn by Greek prelates [OMOPHORION], in reference to which we cited an allusion from Isidore of Pelusium, as early as the beginning of the 5th century. It may be noted that the wool for the pallium is, and has long been, furnished by the lambs which are reared in the convent of St. Agnes at Rome. In the Life of Gregory the Great, however, by John the Deacon, reference is made on the occasion of the translation of his body to his pallium as being "bysso candente contextum" (lib iv. 80). Whether this is exceptional, or is to be taken as indicating a difference in Gregory's time, does not appear, probably the latter.

A little further on (c. 84), the same writer, in minutely describing the ancient picture of Gregory, says of the present vestment: "Pallio mediocri, a dextro videlicet humero sub pectore super stomachum circulatim deducto: deinde sursum per sinistrum humerum post tergum deposito, cujus pars altera super eundem humerum veniens proprin rectitudine, non per medium corporis, sed ex latere pendet." This description would give a result pretty similar to the Greek omophorion. This similarity may be seen from a comparison of Plates 25 and 41 in Marriott's Vestiarium Christianum. Further, it may be inferred from John's language that between the age of the picture and his own, the pallium had undergone a slight change of shape. We may gather a notion of what the pallium was like in the 9th century from the notice by Amalarius (de Eccl. Off. ii. 23; Patrol. cv. 1098), from which we should conclude that it had then assumed, or was assuming, its later shape. Illustrations of the varying shape of the pallium at different epochs are given in Marriott's work. Thus we have the famous 6th century mosaic in the church of St. Vitalis at Ravenna (Plate 28, figured in this Dictionary under DALMATIC[c]); a figure of St. Peter, with a pallium in a 9th century mosaic (Plate 33); for the 10th century, we may refer to the figure of Egbert of Trèves (Plate 42); for the 11th, to a fresco representing St. Clement of Rome (Plate 43), and to a picture of Dunstan, from a MS. in the British Museum (Plate 44). De Rossi has figured in his Roma Sotterranea two eight-century frescoes from the Roman catacombs (copied by Marriott, Plates 30, 31). Here are represented early prelates (e.g. Xystus and Cornelius, bishops of Rome), wearing planetae, over which are white oraria [STOLE], passing over the left hand which, so covered, holds the book of the gospels. It must be considered doubtful, however, how far these are to be considered instances of pallia or mere oraria.

We shall now mention very briefly a few instances of the bestowal of the papal pallium. The earliest example which is adduced is, perhaps, one recorded by Anastasius Bibliothe-

[b] These are now four in number, but formerly were as a rule more numerous. Millin, however (Voyage en Italie, i. 108; cited by Martigny, Dict. des Ant. chrét. s. v. Pallium), mentions a figure of Celsus, archbishop of Milan, on his sarcophagus, in which the pallium has but a single cross. The same holds also for the pallium, if it be a pallium in the Ravenna mosaic we have referred to below.

[c] It may be considered open to doubt, perhaps, whether this is really a pallium.

carius of Marcus, bishop of Rome (ob. 336 A.D.), though it is possible that the reference is of a different kind—"hic constituit ut episcopus Ostiensis, qui consecrat episcopum urbis [i.e. Rome], pallio uteretur, et ab eodem episcopo [leg. episcopus] urbis Roma consecraretur" (Vitae Pontif. 49). It will be observed that we have here got the case of a bishop, not an archbishop; but the honour may at first have been given with rather more latitude, for we find Gregory the Great bestowing the pallium on Syagrius, bishop of Autun. It is to be noted that in the letter in which Gregory sets this forth, he distinctly calls attention to the permission of the emperor —"serenissimi domini imperatoris [Maurice] . . . prona voluntas est, et concedi hoc omnino desiderat" (Epist. lib. ix. 11; cf. ib. 108: vol. iii. 936, 1013).

Saving the rather doubtful case of the bishop of Ostia, the earliest instance of the bestowal of the pallium is that granted by Symmachus (ob. 514 A.D.) to Theodore, archbishop and metropolitan of Laureacus in Pannonia (Epist. 12; Patrol. lxii. 72). In this case no mention is made of the imperial authority. On the other hand we have a letter written by pope Vigilius in 543 A.D. to Auxanius, archbishop of Arles, in which he defers granting the pallium till the pleasure of the emperor shall have been ascertained. In a subsequent letter, written two years later, the imperial sanction having been given ("pro gloriosissimi filii nostri regis Childeberti Christiani devotione mandatis"), the honour is granted (Epp. 6, 7; Patrol. lxix. 26). Other instances are those of Caesarius, archbishop of Arles, on whom the pallium was bestowed by Symmachus (Vita Caes. lib. i. 30; Patrol. lxvii. 1016), and Virgilius, also of Arles, to whom it was granted by Gregory the Great (Epist. lib. v. 53; Patrol. lxxvii. 782). Into the famous dispute as to the rescript of Valentinian in connexion with the pallium of the bishops of Ravenna, it is not our intention to enter.

In several of these cases the recipient had been some time in possession of his see on receiving the pallium, which thus became an exceptional distinction, conferred when the Roman see wished to bestow such. As this was one of the countless ways which went to the building up of the papal power, we need feel no surprise at the new phase of things which meets us in the 8th century. The pallium is now no longer an exceptional honour, granted to this or that archbishop, but a badge, the acceptance of which implied the acknowledgment by the wearer of the supremacy of the apostolic see. Thus we find in a letter written by St. Boniface in 745 A.D. to Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, the declaration on his part of willingness to obey the see of Rome, and that "metropolitanos pallia ab illa sede quaerere" (Epist. 63; Patrol. lxxxix. 763). Indeed we find from some letters of pope Zacharias to Boniface (743 A.D.) that the latter had already made application for pallia for several of the metropolitans under him. (Epp. 5, 6; ib. 925.)

One step more alone remains. Pope Nicholas I., in his Responsa ad consulta Bulgarorum (866 A.D.), orders (c. 73; Labbe, viii. 541) that no archbishop may be enthroned or may consecrate the eucharist till he shall have received the pallium from the Roman see.

Another point may be briefly touched upon, namely, the question of the pallium Gallicanum as distinct from the pallium Romanum. It has been seen that under whatever conditions the pallium was bestowed, it distinctly took the form of a gift vouchsafed at the will of the Roman see. This being the case, it is not easy to understand the order of the council of Macon (581 A.D.) that no archbishop shall presume to say mass sine pallio (can. 6; Labbe, v. 968). To suppose that this means that archbishops are prohibited from celebrating mass till their position is, as it were, ratified by Rome, is, considering time and place, an anachronism, and the language of the canon taken per se would never lead to such a conclusion. Hence many have held (e.g. Hefele, infra, p. 217), and it would seem with much justice, that this Gallican use is distinct from, and exists side by side with, the special papal pallium; that it was simply a mark of archiepiscopal rank, which was to be specially worn at mass, just as each other order would be required to wear its own peculiar badge. A possible illustration of this may be found in a fragment, edited by Martene and Durand, which dwells on the vestments in use in the Gallican church, including the pallium (Thes. Anecd. v. 99; cited by Marriott, p. 204).

PALM. The great beauty of the date-palm in all stages of growth, and under all circumstances of background and association, has made it, like the vine or the corn-ears, one of the natural symbols of Divine blessing. The righteous shall flourish as a palm-tree (Ps. xci. 13) may be taken as a typically Eastern use of the tree as an emblem.

As may be supposed, the palm branch is found most frequently in sepulchral monuments and inscriptions, and is frequently added to the monogram or chrisma as an emblem of the victory of the faith (Bosio, p. 436, and Martigny's Woodcuts, p. 498). In Bottari, pl. xxii. (Aringhi, vol. i. p. 289), it is beautifully used as a pillar to divide the surface of a sarcophagus into compartments or panels. Also Aringhi, i. pp. 295, 297, 301 (where the fruit is indicated, see infra), and, perhaps, at p. 307. At p. 321 the heads of two apostles, probably St. Peter and St. Paul, are ornamented each with the whole crown or foliage of a palm. It is unquestionably the sign of martyrdom in the widest sense of the word—that of persistent testimony borne to Christ, and consummated by death. It is admitted on all hands, that, though the palm accompanies the martyr, it does not indicate that the bearer actually suffered violent death in will and deed (see Rev. vii. 9, and Gregory the Great in Ezech. bk. ii. hom. xvii., where the palm branches are

The palm or palm branch appears frequently in Christian mosaics and wall-paintings. The most beautiful decorative use is made of the whole tree at Ravenna, in the church of S. Apollinare Nuova, where a long procession of male and female saints is represented along the wall above the columns of the central aisle, in the richest mosaic, white figures on gold ground, shod with scarlet and bearing small crowns in their hands lined with the same colour. They are separated by palms, with scarlet bunches of dates hanging from beneath their crowns like barbaric earrings, exactly as in nature; and the purity and brilliancy of the effect may be imagined (see Ricci's series of photographs). The Augustan frescoes of the Doria Pamphili Villa (Parker, Photographs, no. 2696–2705) contain a palm tree admirably drawn from nature, with graphic and exact resemblance. It is found in mosaics in St. Cecilia's at Rome, and SS. Cosmas and Damian. It is used as an arcosolium picture in Marchi, tav. xli. The phoenix, as a symbol of the resurrection, and, perhaps, with a certain play on its name, often appears with the palm, as in the mosaic of St. Cecilia, and on the sarcophagus in Bottari, tav. xxviii. xxii. (see woodcut). Martigny says that both symbols are used with the portrait of St. Paul because he was a special preacher of the Resurrection. It seems simply as if the name phoenix conveyed ideas of both objects at once to the painter or carver, and he naturally put both into his work. For the Palm on Lamps, see Bottari, t. ccviii.; on vessels supposed to contain the blood of martyrs, see Aringhi, ii. 642 (found in the confessio of St. Cecilia's church), Bottari, tav. cc. cci. ccii. PALM SUNDAY. [See HOLY WEEK, p. 780.] The feast of palms (Βαΐων ἑορτή) was celebrated in the East as early as the 5th century, for it is twice mentioned in the life of Euthymius, who died A.D. 472 (Vita Euth. auct. Cyrill. Scythop. 11, 103; Monum. Graec. Cotel. 210, 287), but no mention of a procession with palms occurs until we enter a much later period. In the West Isidore of Seville (610) speaks as if Palm Sunday were a great day, but he mentions no use of palm branches on it. He merely explains that "the day is celebrated" on account of the event recorded in St. Matthew xxi. 8–11, &c. (De Offic. i. 28). The next Latin writer who refers to the feast is our countryman Adhelm (A.D. 709), but he merely tells us that in his church the Osanna was sung by a double choir (De Laud. Virginit. 30). A manuscript Ordo Officii, which Mabillon, from the character, supposes to have been written about 800, speaks of a "Letania, et cum ipsa intrant ad missam majorem (Annal. Vet. 151, ed. 2). This order was observed in a German monastery. It describes a procession, but its antiquity is probably less than Mabillon supposed. Amalarius (A.D. 812) speaks of olive branches being carried, but does not say in procession (De Eccl. Off. i. 10). If he means a procession, he probably alludes to some of the churches only of his province. For there is no reference to any such custom in the earlier forms of the Ordo Romanus (see especially Ordo i. in Mus. Ital. ii. 18, 30), nor in the early sacramentaries, some of which do not even recognise a benediction of the branches, or flowers (so Missale Gothicum, Liturg. Gall. 235; Miss. Gall. Vet. 346; Sacr. Gelas. in Liturgia Rom. Vet. Murat. i. 546; Sacr. Greg. ibid. ii. 51; Opp. Greg. v. 101, ed. 1615; but one is given in the Besançon rite, Mus. Ital. i. 390; in the Codex Othobon. of the Greg. Sacr. Mur. u. s. &c.). Rabanus of Mentz, A.D. 847 (De Instit. Cleri. ii. 35) merely repeats Isidore; nor do we find any certain mention of a procession after the Ordo Officii above mentioned, until we come to Pseudo-Alcuin in the 10th century.

A similar rite is observed among the Greeks but at their matins. Codinus: "On the Feast of Palms, while the matins are yet being sung, a procession (περίπατος) takes place, and there must be a litany (λιτή), according to custom, and the emperor must walk with the procession" (De Offic. xi. 4). The lampadarius leads the way with a burning torch; a deacon bearing the gospels follows; then come the bishop and priests carrying icons; and some of the people walk after them (Codin. x. 5). During the procession an idiomelon is sung, which is said to have been composed by the emperor Theophilus, 829–842 (Cedrenus, Hist. Compend. ii. 118, ed. Nieb.), viz.

"Come forth ye ne[illegible] ... ye people; look upon the kingdom of heaven. The gospel comes as a figure of Christ." The procession ended, matins are resumed, but the palms (βαΐα) are retained through the service (Goar, 745). Prayers used at the distribution of the palms before the procession may be seen in the Euchologion (744). [W. E. S.]

PANAGIA (Παναγία). One of the ordinary titles of the Blessed Virgin in the Greek church. It probably came into use some time in the 7th century. In the discussions about the word Θεοτόκος, in the 5th century, she is styled ἡ ἁγία πάρθενος. So too in the sermon of an uncertain author, Pseudo-Chrysost. Hom. de Legis latore, p. 416 (Migne, tom. vi. 410), which is probably assignable to the 6th century, she is still only ἡ ἁγία, as in the words ἴχομεν τὴν δέσποιναν ἡμῶν τὴν Θεοτόκον, τὴν ἁγίαν ἀειπάρθενον Μαρίαν. But in the letter of Sophronius, patriarch of Jerusalem, read at the sixth general council, C. Constant. III. A.D. 680 (Hardouin, tom. iii. col. 1268), the title παναγία occurs several times. It is true that the same epithet is found repeatedly in a set of eleven prayers to the Virgin, in Greek, attributed to St. Ephrem (Op. Gr. iii. pp. 542, &c.), but the whole cast of these prayers obviously belongs to a time far later than that of St. Ephrem.

There is also a monastic ceremony called Panagia, at which a triangular shaped piece of blessed bread is elevated, and partaken of, after a meal with certain prayers, by all present; and a cup of wine is likewise distributed to all with a thanksgiving and special invocation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, whence the name of the ceremony is said to be derived (Du Cange, Gr. Gloss. s. v. and Symeon of Thessal. quoted by Goar, Euchol. pp. 867, 868). Although in this exact shape the ceremony belongs to a time later than our limits, it is very likely a relic of some primitive observance, some memorial of the original institution, into which other significance has become imported. PANCRATIUS (1), bishop of Taormina, said to have been a disciple of St. Peter and to have seen our Lord; commemorated Feb. 9 (Basil. Menol.). Ap. 3 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard, Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Apr. i. 237); July 9 (Cal. Byzant., Daniel. Cod. Liturg. iv. 262). [C. H.]

(2) Youth, beheaded under Diocletian; commemorated at Rome on the Via Aurelia, May 12 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed., Wand., Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 17). In the Sacramentary of Gregory the natale of Pancratius is observed on May 12, and he is named in the collect. In the Sacramentary of Gelasius he is commemorated on the same day, with Nereus and Achilleus, but only these last two are named in the collects. (Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. i. 646, ii. 84.) [C. H.]

PANEGYRICON (Πανηγυρικόν). One of the Greek office-books, containing "Readings" appropriate to the various festivals, collected out of the writings of approved authors, generally recording the acts and virtues of the saints, whence its name. It is therefore not unlike the Western "Legenda." There is no authorized collection, therefore the book is not printed; but different copies are found in manuscript in different churches, varying considerably in their contents according to the diligence or piety of the collector. [C. E. H.]

PANNUTIA (Pannucea). This is a name for a garment covered with patches (panni), and is so used by Isidore (Etym. xix. 22; Patrol. lxxxii. 687), "quod sit diversis pannis obsita." [R. S.]

PANSOPHIUS, martyr at Alexandria under Decius; commemorated Jan. 15 (Cal. Byzant.; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 996); Jan. 16 (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

PANTALEON (1), martyr under Maximian; commemorated July 28 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard., Wand., Vet. Rom. Mart.; Florus, ap. Bed. Mart.); celebrated by the Greeks under the name of Panteleemon, martyr and physician, the unmercenary, July 27 (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. vi. 397; Daniel, *Cod. (3) Martyr with Diodorus and Claudianus under Decius; commemorated Feb. 4 (Basil. Menol.). The Hieron. Mart. has a Papias with some of the same companions on Mar. 6, as also have the Roman Martyrology and the Bollandists (Feb. iii. 627) on Feb. 26.

(4) Bishop of Hierapolis, friend of Polycarp, the disciple of St. John; commemorated Feb. 22. (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 285.)

PAPPIUS. [Papias (2).]

PARABOLANI, an inferior order of church officers who fulfilled the duty of hospital attendants and nurses to the sick poor, whom they relieved from the alms of the faithful, "deputantur ad curanda debilium aegra corpora" (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. Tit. ii. de Episc. et Cler. leg. 43). Binterim attributes the establishment of these functionaries as a distinct order to the peace of the church under Constantine (Denkwürdigkeit, vi. 3, 26). Previous to this time the care of the sick and the burial of the dead, as we see from Dionysius's graphic account of the plague at Alexandria (Euseb. H. E. vii. 22), was fulfilled by the brethren generally as a duty of Christian love, without any enrolment into a separate body. It is evident, from the laws of the Theodosian code, that the "parabolani" were ranked among the "clerici," but in a very subordinate capacity. They were to be chosen from the poorer classes, and there was an express prohibition against men of rank being admitted into the confraternity. The name was probably derived from παραβάλλεσθαι (periclitari), from the courage with which they hazarded their lives in time of plague and contagious sickness, like the παράβολοι, or bestiarii, who exposed themselves to the risk of death in fighting with wild beasts in the amphitheatre (cf. Socr. H. E. vii. 22, and Valesius' notes; Niceph. H. E. xiv. 3; Acta SS. Abdon. et Rennes apud Saicer). The idea that it was a satirical name (from parabolae = mere talk), given to physicians and those who undertook the care of the sick, because they promised much and performed little, if seriously proposed, needs no refutation (Du Cange, sub voc.; Bingham, iii. ix. 3). However excellent the original purpose of this order, too soon, in the words of Baronius, "ex charitate officium transivit in factionem," and the parabolani appear as a factious and turbulent body, taking a noisy and prominent part in all religious controversies, and causing so much trouble to the civil power, that special laws had to be passed to restrain and regulate them. In the quarrel between Cyril and Orestes, A.D. 415, the parabolani, zealously espousing the cause of their bishop, threw the city of Alexandria into such confusion that the inhabitants despatched an envoy to Theodosius II., begging him to issue a prohibition for the bishop to leave Alexandria, as his was the only authority by which their violence could be checked. In consequence of this petition, Theodosius issued an edict addressed to Monaxius, the prefect of the pretorium, Sept. 28, 416 A.D., removing this turbulent body from the authority of the bishop, and placing them directly under the prefect, giving him the power of dismissing them for riotous conduct, and of filling up all vacancies caused by death. The number was at the same time limited to 500, and they were to be selected from the poorer classes. The interruptions to public business caused by their obstreperous behaviour, and their intimidation of witnesses and jurors, were guarded against by an inhibition against their attending the law courts at all. Any judicial complaint or legal business they might have was to be transacted for them by their "syndic" or attorney. They were also prohibited from attending, as a body, the games and shows and appearing on any public occasions, as being disturbers of the peace of the community. This measure proved exceedingly distasteful to the clerical party at Alexandria, whose influence with the feeble emperor proved powerful enough to induce him, in seventeen months' time, to repeal the chief provisions of his former enactment by a fresh edict, dated Feb. 3, 418 A.D. In this the number was raised from 500 to 600, they were again placed under the bishop's jurisdiction, and the ranks were to be filled from those who had previously filled the office but had been disbanded by the prefect, or who were known to be skilful in their care of the sick. Their rank was at the same time somewhat raised. They might be selected from any class, excepting the "honorati" and "curiales." At the same time the clause prohibiting their appearance in the circus, the courts, and on public occasions was confirmed (Cod. Theod. u. s. leg. 42, 43, vol. vi. p. 82, with Gothofred's notes). We find the parabolani again as a body of noisy fanatics, ready for any acts of violence, at the "Latrocinium" of Ephesus, 449 A.D., where six hundred of them appeared as the tools of the brutal Barsumas to coerce malcontents to support his measures (Labbe, iv. 251). The reputation of the parabolani as a dangerous class, formidable to the civil magistrates, however useful when restricting themselves to their appropriate duties, is evidenced by the legislation of Justinian, which confirms the prohibition to their appearing as a body on public occasions. (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. iii. de Episc. et Cleric. leg. 18; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, vi. 3, 26 ff.; Bingham, Origines, bk. iii. ch. ix. § 1–4; Gothofred, Annotat. in Cod. Theod. vol. vi. p. 82; Baronius, Append. ad tom. v. p. 691.)

[E. V.]

PARACLETICE (Παρακλητική, βιβλίον παρακλητικόν). One of the principal and most necessary of the Greek office-books. It is arranged on the principle of the Octoëchos, but extended so as to contain the Troparia of the whole Ferial office for the year. By some writers it is attributed to Joseph of the Studium (died A.D. 883); by others to another Joseph, surnamed Melodus (see Leo Allat. de Libris Eccles. Graec. p. 283). Two derivations are given for the name: viz. either quasi consolatorius, because its contents tend to the consolation of the penitent; or quasi invitatorius, because they largely consist of invocations.

The course of the Ferial office depends not so much upon the season of the year as upon the Tones (ἤχοι), of which there are eight, arranged to follow one another in regular sequence, beginning with the week after Easter week, after which they recur again, and so on. Each Tone has its own Troparia, and governs the service at all the Hours for its week. Thus the entire set of variations of the service is finished in a period of eight weeks. There are proper tables to shew how these periods of eight weeks, with their Tones, fall in different years, according to the date of Easter. By referring to these tables the proper Tone for the week in which any given day falls may be found; and then the paracleticè gives the proper Troparia for the different offices of the day. [C. E. PARADISE (παράδεισος, from a Persian word meaning a park or pleasure-ground) is used (1) in inscriptions to designate the place in which the dead in Christ wait the final judgment. It is said (Martigny, Dict. p. 577, 2nd ed.) not to occur earlier than the end of the 4th century, when (A.D. 382) it is found in the epitaph of Theodora (De Rossi, Roma Sott. i. 141, No. 317). But, without the actual use of the word "Paradise," the dwelling of a soul in bliss is often indicated by pictures or symbols of the last resting-places of the faithful. An arcosolium of the cemetery of Cyriaca shews an oranti standing between two figures, who draw back the curtains on each side; this is supposed to typify the entrance of a soul into the rest of paradise (De Rossi, Bullet. 1883, p. 78). A painting in the cemetery of Petronilla (Martigny, p. 639) is thought to represent the reception of a soul into Paradise by Petronilla. The soul admitted to the joys of Paradise is sometimes represented as a female figure standing between two trees in an attitude of contemplation (Perret, Catacombes, v. pl. v.; De Rossi, Roma Sott. i. 95), often accompanied by the words IN PACE. This inscription appears in the representation of Dionysus (said to be of the 3rd century) in the cemetery of Soter (De Rossi, Roma Sott. iii. tav. i.), where the departed appears in the midst of a garden full of fruits and flowers, where birds seem to flit from branch to branch. On some sarcophaguses (as in Bottari, Sculture, xix.; Millin, Midi de la France, lxv. lxviii.) trees or vines form columns separating the different groups; these are thought by some to typify Paradise. Occasionally the promised land is typified by the two spies bearing a great bunch of grapes between them on a pole (Millin, lix. 3; Garrucci, Vetri, ii. 9). And again the soul is typified by a bird sitting on a tree (Lupi, Severae Epitaphium, tav. xvii. p. 137), or in the midst of flowers. See the epitaph of Sabinianus (Martigny, p. 576). The flowers and leaves, which often enclose representations of the Lord in glory, as in some of the ancient mosaics of Rome and Ravenna, are thought to refer to Paradise [MOSAICS, p. 1337]; and figures of saints in basilicas are frequently placed in the midst of a Paradise indicated in the same manner. The same kind of symbolism is found in gilded glass (Buonarroti, Osservazione sopra alcuni Frammenti di Vetro, xviii. xxi.; Garrucci, ix. 8). The rich dress in which many female figures are represented on sepulchral monuments is thought by many to indicate the "splendour of Paradise" (τρυφὴ τοῦ παραδείσου) of which the liturgies speak. The banquets which are so often represented on the walls of sepulchral chambers are also very commonly supposed to typify Paradisiacal joys (Polidori, Conviti Effigiati, in the Milan Amico cattolico) (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v. Paradis).

(2) The word Paradise is sometimes used to designate the quadrangular space enclosed by a cloister, often used as a burial-ground. Comp. NARTHEX, p. 1379. [C.]

PARAGAUDA, PARAGAUDIS (παραγαῦδις). This is a species of ornamental fringe attached to a dress. We find in the Theodosian Code (lib. x. tit. 21, l. 1) a law of Valens prohibiting the use of "auratae ac sericae paragaudae auro intextae" to private persons. A law of Theodosius the Great (ib. l. 2) repeats the prohibition in stronger terms. The word is also used, by a natural extension, for the dress so ornamented (see Gothofredus's note in loc.). As there is no special Christian connexion of the word, it is needless to give further instances. It is apparently oriental, but the derivation is unknown. [R. S.]

PARALYTIC MAN. Two cures of the palsy (besides that of the centurion's servant) are circumstantially narrated in the gospels—one of the sufferers at the Pool of Bethesda (John v. 2–17), the other of him whom his friends lowered through the roof in the crowded assembly of Capernaum (Matt. ix. 1–8; Mark v. 21; Luke viii. 40, v. 17–26). The former is by far the more frequently represented—almost always in the act of carrying away his bed, or "that whereon he lay," which is sometimes a Greek couch, sometimes a somewhat modern stump-bedstead. See Rohault de Fleury, L'Évangile, pl. li. figs. 1–5, Bottari, tav. xxxix., and BETHESDA, p. 201, for a cut from a Vatican sarcophagus. See also Rohault de Fleury, pl. liii. for many varieties of the grabatum, two from ivories at Ravenna and at Cluny. A scribe or apostle is sometimes present (Bottari, xxxi.). The other paralytic sufferer is seen as lowered through the roof by cords in a sarcophagus photographed by Mr. Parker (2906), and engraved in Bottari, l. pl. 39. See Westwood, Early Christian Sculptures, p. 23. But the most graphic and excellent representation is in the upper course of mosaics in St. Apollinare Nuova at Ravenna (Rohault de Fleury, L'Évangile, pl. xliii.). De Fleury gives two other examples from 9th and 11th century MSS. nos. 510 and 70 in the Bibliothèque nouvelle.

PARAMENTA. A general word signifying ornaments, or decorations; from parare. It might be applied to the tapestry with which a church is adorned for a festival; to the coverings of the altar; to the sacerdotal vestments; or (in a still narrower sense) to the orphreys, or apparels, of a vestment. The authorities for its use all seem to be late.
[C. E. H.]

PARAMONARIUS, an ecclesiastical official, the nature of whose duties seems to have been different at different times and places. The word occurs but rarely, and there is little in the context of the passages where it is found to indicate the position occupied. The first place where it occurs is in the second canon of the council of Chalcedon, where the "paramonarius" (or, according to another reading, "prosmonarius") is ranked with the "oeconomus" and "ecdicus" (church advocate) as one of the subordinate officers of the church, whose post was sometimes the object of a simoniacal bargain. In this passage it is considered by the best authorities to mean a "villicus" or bailiff, who managed the estates of a monastery or church. "Monasterii administer." (Bevereg. Pandect. Can. tom. i. p. 112; ii. p. 109; annotat.; Justellus, Bibl. Jur. Canon, tom. i. p. 91; Suicer, sub voc.) It is also explained in the same manner by Gothofred in his annotations on a law of the Justinian code (de Episc. et Clericis, l. 46, sect. 3), where the paramonarii are associated with the xenodochi, ptochotrophi, nosocomi, &c., as administrators of church property. Du Cange, on the other hand, considers the office to be one of lower grade, identical with that of the mansionarius in the Western church, concerned with lighting the candles, opening and shutting the doors, and other servile duties. The word is so rendered by Dionysius Exiguus, and explained in the margin by ostiarius, and the quotations given by Du Cange (sub voc.) prove that it was used in this inferior sense in the West in mediaeval times (Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. iii. ch. xiii. § 1; Bevereg. Pandectae, u. s.; Justellus, u. s.).

PARAMONUS and 370 martyrs under Decius; commemorated Nov. 29. (Cal. Byzant.)

PARAPHONISTA. This word occurs frequently in the early Ordines Romani published by Hittorp, and by Mabillon, Museum Ital. tom. ii. The four principal singers in the Schola Cantorum at Rome were named paraphonistae. The first in number of these (prior scholae) precented the anthem. It was the duty of the fourth, who was called archiparaphonista, to keep the pope informed of any matter that concerned the choir, what anthems were to be sung, &c. The choir-boys were sometimes called infantes paraphonistae.

PARATORIUM, a designation of the prothesis or credence table in the Ordo Romanus, also called oblationarium, "because when the offerings were received preparation was made out of them for the Eucharist" (Bingham, viii. vi. 22). [PROTHESIS.] It also stood for the Secretarium Ecclesiae or Sacristy. "Calicem subdiaconus dat acolyto et illa revocat in Paratorium." Ordo Romanus, "Reponitur liber in paratorio quodam sive in secretario" (ibid.). See Ducange, Const. Christ. S. Soph. cc. 67, 68. PARENTS. [FAMILY.]

PARIS, COUNCILS OF (1), A.D. 360 (al. 362), where the Arian formula, concocted at Rimini, published at Nice, and reaffirmed at Constantinople, from which the word "Homoousios" had been eliminated, was condemned in a synodical letter addressed to the Easterns, and preserved in the 11th Fragm. of St. Hilary. (Mansi, iii. 357–359.)

(2) A.D. 555 (al. 551), at which Saffaracus, who subscribed to the 5th council of Orleans as bishop of Paris, being convicted of various crimes by his own confession, was deposed. (Mansi, ix. 739–742.)

(3) A.D. 557, in the pontificate of Pelagius I., like the former one, when ten canons were passed, all relating to church discipline, and most of them re-enactments; e. g. the eighth, which says, "Let no bishop be ordained against the will of the citizens; but him only who has been elected with fullest choice of the people and clergy. Neither let any see be filled up by the power of the prince, nor any potentate whatsoever, against the will of the bishop of the metropolis, or his suffragans." Six more canons are given to this council by Gratian and others, which, as Mansi shews, embody rules of the ninth and following centuries. (Ib. 752.)

(4) A.D. 573, when Pappolus, bishop of Chartres, complained of the consecration of Promotus to the see of Châteaudun in his diocese, by Aegidius, bishop of Rheims, who was therefore called upon, in the name of the council, to withdraw his nominee. The council also addressed a letter to king Sigebert, begging of him not to interpose in his favour. (Ib. 865–872.)

(5) A.D. 577, when Praetextatus, bishop of Rouen, was accused by king Chilperic of having encouraged the revolt of his son Meroveus, which the bishop denied. Forty-five bishops, among whom was Gregory of Tours, the historian, heard his defence. But in the end, having been induced to become his own accuser, he was carried off forcibly, thrown into prison, and then exiled. (Ib. 875–880.)

(6) A.D. 615, the most considerable that had yet met there; said to have been attended by seventy-nine bishops, and even called general in a council of Rheims ten years later. Its preface deposes to its having been summoned by king Clotaire, who confirmed its canons afterwards in a special edict. They were fifteen in number, all disciplinary. By the second of them, no bishop may choose or have one chosen to succeed him during his lifetime, unless he should have become, for some reason, incapable of administering his diocese. By the third all manumitted slaves (liberti) are to be defended by priests, and not reduced again to their former state. And by the fifteenth no Jew may hold or apply for any public office giving him power over Christians. Any Jew endeavouring to compass this is to receive baptism at the hands of the bishop of the place, with all his family. The rest are less new, than old canons revived. (Mansi, x. 539–546.) Ten more canons (Mansi makes them fifteen) are preserved of a nameless council (Delaland, Suppl. ad Sirmond, p. 62, has invented a name for it), by the first of which these fifteen are confirmed, as being in no way contrary to the Catholic faith or church law, while by the eighth priests and deacons are forbidden, under pain of deprivation, ever to marry. (Ib. 546–548.)

(7) A.D. 638. When the exemption of the abbey of St. Denis is stated to have been renewed, "in universali nostrâ synodo Parisiis congregata," as king Dagobert, who subscribes first, is made to say. But if so, why should it have formed the subject of a grant afterwards, A.D. 658, by bishop Landeric? (Mansi, x. 659 and xi. 61.)

[E. S. Ff.]

PARISH. I. Names for.—The Greek word παροικία, from which the English parish is derived, through the Latin paroecia, parochia, the Norman-French paroisse (Lois de Guillaume le Conquérant, 1), and the early English paroche, paroshe, paresche (Stratmann, s. v.), appears to have had two meanings. (1) In Greek inscriptions it is not uncommon to find the inhabitants of a town divided into those who have and those who have not full civil rights, and described collectively as οἵ τε πολῖται καὶ οἱ πάροικοι πάντες, e.g. Corpus Inscr. Gr. No. 1631 at Thespiae, No. 2906 at Priene, No. 3049 at Teos, No. 3595 at Ilium Novum; hence, in the first use of the term and its cognate terms in Biblical and ecclesiastical Greek, they are found in this literal sense of a "sojourner" and "sojourning," e.g. in the LXX. Exod. ii. 22; Deut. v. 14; 2 Kings viii. 1, in the N. T. Acts vii. 29; Ephes. ii. 19; Heb. xi. 9; in Philo, e.g. vol. i. pp. 161, 511, ed. Mangey; in Josephus, e.g. Antt. Jud. viii. 2, 9. It is probable that the term came thus to be ordinarily applied to the colonies of Jews in the great cities of the East, who were not absorbed in the ordinary citizens, but kept their nationality distinct; e.g. at Cyrene, where Strabo ap. Joseph. Antt. Jud. xiv. 7, 2, says that there were four divisions of the population—citizens, farmers, μέτοικοι, and Jews. It was probably continued or adopted by the colonies of Christians in the same cities, who stood in a similar relation to the rest of the population: hence, in Clem. Rom. i. c. 1, the church of Rome describes itself as ἡ ἐκκλησία τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡ παροικοῦσα [Ῥώμην], so Polyc. ad Philipp. 1; Martyr. Polyc. 1. With this mingled the metaphorical sense of the word in which this "sojourning" upon earth was contrasted with the "abiding city" in heaven, e.g. 1 Pet. i. 17; Clem. Rom. ii. c. 5; Corpus Inscr. Graec. No. 9474, 9683.

(2) It was used, in a sense which continued its earlier sense of "dwelling near a city," as equivalent to a rural commune or a detached suburb. This meaning is rare, and the editors of the Corpus Inscr. Graec. treat the use of πάροικος in the sense of "colonus," as a proof that the inscription on which it occurs, No. 8656, is not earlier than the 4th century, A.D. In the later civil law παροικία was applied to villeins or peasant-farmers; e.g. in the Practica, tit. 15, c. 2, ap. Von Lingenthal, Jus Graeco-Romanum, pars i. p. 42.

In the ecclesiastical use of the words these two meanings were confounded—the former meaning predominates in the earlier period, the latter in the later; nor does the confusion disappear until far on in the middle ages; i.e. παροικία, paroecia were used (i.) of the whole colony of Christians in a given city or district, i.e. of the "diocese," in its modern sense of the district over which a bishop came to have jurisdiction; (ii.) of the rural or suburban communities which were more or less dependent on another church—i.e. of the "parish" in its modern sense. Between these two uses of the words it is not always easy to distinguish. The following must be taken as being only an approximate classification of some leading instances:—i. = the modern "diocese": S. Iren. Ep. ad Florin. ap. Euseb. H. E. v. 20; Apollon. Ephes. ap. Euseb. H. E. v. 18; Alexand. Alexandrin. Ep. ap. Theodoret. H. E. i. 3; Conc. Ancyr. c. 18; Nicaen. c. 16; Const. Apost. ii. 1; viii. 10; St. Cyrill. Hierosol. Catech. xiv. 21; St. Athanas. Apol. c. Arian, c. 49, vol. i. p. 131, id. Hist. Arian. c. 17, vol. i. p. 279, id. Tom. ad Antioch. vol. i. p. 616; St. Greg. M. Ep. vi. 11; xiv. 7; in Gallican documents from the 6th century onwards—e.g. in the instrument of foundation of the abbey of St. Mesmin ap. D'Achery, Spicileg. vol. iii. p. 307; in England, Conc. Clovesh. c. 3, Conc. Cealcyth. c. 3; in the probably genuine writings of popes—e.g. Epit. Hadrian. Can. Apost. 40, Hormisd. Ep. 117, ad Episc. Hispan. c. 3; in the Carolingian Capitularies—e.g. Karlomanni Capit. A.D. 742, c. 3, Pippini Capit. Suession. c. iv. 1, Capit. Vern. c. 3, Karoli M. Capit. General. A.D. 769, c. 8; in the Liber Pontificalis, Vit. S. Sixti, p. 8; in the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals—e.g. Epist. Clem. i. c. 36, 70, Epist. Calixt. ii. c. 13, Epist. Lucii. c. 5; and even in the 12th century—e.g. Legenda S. Hujon. Lincoln. ap. Giraldus Cambrensis, ed. Dimock, vol. vii. p. 176. So far did this wider sense of paroecia prevail that a distinction sometimes appears between the paroecia of a simple bishop, and the diocesis or provincia of a metropolitan—e.g. S. Bonifac. Mogunt. Epist. 49, ad Zachariam, A.D. 742, Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. lxxxix. 714, "tres ordinavimus episcopos et provinciam in tres parochias discrevimus; so S. Zachar. Epist. 3, ad Burchard, Migne, vol. lxxxix. 822. ii. It = the modern "parish": S. Basil. Epist. 240 (192); Const. Apost. ii. 58; Conc. Chalc. c. 17; 3 Conc. Tolet. c. ix. 20, Emerit. c. 19, 2 Hispal. c. 2, Agath. c. 21, Rem. c. 19, Cabillon. c. 5; Sidon. Apollin. Epist. vii. 6, p. 183; S. Greg. M. Epist. i. 16; Vit. S. Elig. ii. 25, ap. D'Achery, Spicil. vol. ii.; in the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals, Epist. Clem. iii. c. 70 (from Lulli Epist. ad Pontif. Max. in S. Bonifac. Epist. 112, p. 290); Hincmar Rem. Capit. Synod. 4, c. 1, ed. Sirmond. p. 732, Migne, P. L. vol. cxxv. p. 795. Conversely diocesis is frequently used, probably by a survival of one of its classical uses (for which see Marquardt, Römische Staats- verwaltung, Bd. i. p. 5) as equivalent to the modern parish—e.g. Sidon. Apollin. Epist. ix. 16, p. 283; S. Greg. Turon. H. F. iv. 13, p. 152, id. vi. 38, p. 315, uses "parochiae" and "dioceses" synonymously in the same chapter; Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 54, Tarracon. A.D. 516, c. 8, 4 Aurel. A.D. 541, c. 33, 3 Brac. A.D. 572, c. 2, 4 Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 34, 36. This use of diocesis (and the concurrent absence of the use of parocia) is especially found in Italy—e.g. in the long dispute between the bishops of Arezzo and Siena, the documents relating to which are given by Muratori, Antiquit. Ital. vol. vi., where parochia does not appear to occur until the decree of the Roman council respecting the case in A.D. 853.

(The mediaeval spelling parochia, which is a constant variant for paroecia, seems to have arisen from a derivation from the classical parochus, which has been revived in modern times by Baur, über der Ursprung des Episcopats, p. 78, but is altogether untenable.)

ii. Origin of Parishes.—The origin of parishes, in the modern sense of the word, is to be found in the suburban and rural organization of the Roman empire. In the more civilized countries of that empire, each important city had a district surrounding it, within which its magistrates might exercise jurisdiction (=regio, Sicul. Flacc. in Gromat. Vett. ed. Lachmann, p. 135; territorium, Digest, 50, 16, 239, § 8; διοίκησις Cic. ad Fam. 13, 15). This district might contain within it vici, castella, pagi, κῶμαι, φρούρια, which formed dependencies of the city (Isidor. Hispal. Origin. xv. 2, 11; cf. Marquardt, Römische Staatsverwaltung, Bd. i. pp. 7 sq.). In addition to these large cities, with their surrounding territory and their dependent villages and hamlets, there were independent communities in rural districts, which had their own officers, and sometimes also their own territory (Marquardt, ibid.; Kuhn, über die Entstehung der Städte der Alten, Komenverfassung u. Synoikismos, Leipzig, 1878). By the end of the 3rd century, Christianity had penetrated to the majority of these suburban and rural organizations, and provision had to be made for them in the general organization. The provision varied considerably at different times and in different countries; and the modern parish is the survivor of many earlier experiments.

(1.) In Syria it was sometimes the practice to attach a small town for ecclesiastical purposes to a neighbouring larger town; for example, Bethlehem was attached to Jerusalem (Sulp. Sever. Dial. i. 8, ed. Halm, p. 159, writing of St. Jerome, says, "ecclesiam loci illius (Bethlehem) Hieronymus presbyter regit; nam paroecia est episcopi qui Hierosolymam tenet"). But more commonly in Syria, and some parts of Asia Minor, it appears to have become the practice, as early as the 4th century, to appoint presbyters and deacons for small towns and country districts, who were in some respects on a lower footing than the presbyters and deacons of city churches (Conc. Neocaes. c. 13; Antioch, c. 8), and who were superintended by rural bishops, χωρεπίσκοποι, or περιοδευταί, who were themselves in some respects subordinate to the city bishops (Conc. Ancyr. c. 13; Neocaes. c. 13; Antioch, c. 10; S. Basil. Epist. 54 (181). The controversy to which this fact gave rise in the West, in the 8th and 9th centuries, is referred to under ORDERS, HOLY, III. 5. An interesting example of the ecclesiastical organization of a small Syrian town in the 4th century, A.D. 354, is afforded by an inscription at Eitha (El-hît) in Batanea, printed in Le Bas et Waddington, Inscriptions Grecques, &c. No. 2124 (= Corpus Inscr. Graec. No. 8819), where the clergy consisted of two presbyters, one of whom was also archimandrite of the local monastery, and two deacons, one of whom acted as οἰκονόμος, or 'bursar." (2.) In North Africa, the system of rural or itinerant bishops, with jurisdiction over detached towns or villages, does not seem to have existed. It is clear, both from the large number of bishoprics which are known to have existed, and from the taunts which were thrown out on both sides in the course of the Donatist controversy, that bishops of full rank were ordinarily appointed, wherever a Christian community existed; but at the same time there are traces of the system which afterwards came more generally to prevail, e.g. in St. Augustine, Epist. 209, where he speaks of a "castellum" which formed an outlying dependency of the church of Hippo: "antea ibi nunquam episcopus fuit, sed simul cum contigua sibi regione ad paroeciam Hipponensis ecclesiae pertinebat." (3.) In the district round Alexandria, ἡ Μαρεώτης χώρα, the villages were entrusted to presbyters, under the superintendence of the bishop of Alexandria. Athanasius mentions upwards of ten such villages, and also speaks of the bishop visiting them (περιερχομένῳ). The dispute with Ischyras, which occupies a prominent place in his controversy with the Arians, seems to have arisen out of the attempt of Ischyras to have himself appointed bishop of one of these villages, which Athanasius resists on the ground of its being contrary to local practice (S. Athanas. Apol. c. Arian. c. 63, vol. i. p. 143; c. 85, vol. i. p. 158). (4.) In Gaul and Spain, the circumstances under which Christianity spread, and the elaborate civil organization with which it found itself in contact, led to the growth and consolidation of the system which has since become permanent in the Western church. It is probable that in those countries it did not penetrate to the country districts and rural communes until long after its complete organization in the chief towns. Those towns consequently became missionary centres. Presbyters and deacons were sent into the castella and vici, partly to preach and partly to minister to the scattered Christians who were to be found there. That they did not go far from the towns, and that they did not give to the Christians the full advantages of Christian worship, is shewn by their having to return to the city church every Saturday, in order to assist in the services of the Sunday (Conc. Tarrac. A.D. 516, c. 7). By degrees the Christians of these country districts became more numerous; but by that time the tendency had arisen to limit the number of bishops. The episcopate had become more important. Its dignity was not to be impaired by creating a bishop, as in primitive times, for every new community. Presbyters and deacons were detached from the staff of the city church, and deputed to serve country churches. They were sent now merely "ad praedicandum," but "ad regendum," i.e. to exercise ecclesiastical discipline. At first they were still nominally on the roll of the city clergy. They received their allowances, as before, from the common fund. They could be recalled by the bishop, and re-attached to the city church (so late as Conc. Emerit. A.D. 666, c. 12). But gradually they became fixed in their several districts, or "paroeciae." As such they were at first called 'cardinales,"[a] a term which was also applied to the permanent chaplains of endowed oratories (e.g. by S. Greg. M. Epist. xii. 11), and was ultimately superseded in the case of almost all parishes, except the Roman tituli, by the terms diocesani, e.g. Conc. Agath. c. 22; Tarracon. c. 13, parochitani, paroeciani, parochiales, Conc. Emerit. c. 18; 3 Tolet. c. 4; 7 Tolet. c. 4; 9 Tolet. c. 2; locales, 3 Tolet. c. 20; forastici, Can. Martin. Brac. c. 15 (translating the ἐπιχώριοι πρεσβύτεροι of Conc. Neocaes. c. 13).

Such is in outline the history of the origin of the parochial system. When it finally came to prevail, it tended to absorb into itself the other systems upon which Christian communities had been organized, and, although only after struggles which stretch far into the middle ages, and not without the co-operation of the civil power for the purposes of political convenience, to spread the network of its elaborate organization over the whole of Western Christendom. But it will be noted that the history which has been given takes account only of rural or suburban districts, and of towns which were included in such districts. It is necessary to explain briefly the extension of the system—i. to episcopal cities; ii. to privately founded churches.

(i.) In the larger cities, some kind of subdivision soon became necessary, not only because a single building became too small for worship, but also because a single organization became too cumbrous to discharge effectively the various functions of discipline and of charity which the church assumed to itself. But instead of subdividing the church into separate communities, each complete in itself, the theory of the unity of the church was preserved by assigning to each community one or more presbyters, and regarding these presbyters as forming collectively a single συνέδριον, or consilium, under the presidency of a single bishop. This was the case at Alexandria; each district and quarter (λαύρα) of the city had its own church and its own presbyter (S. Epiphan. adv. Haeres. 68, 4; 69, 1; Sozom. H. E. i. 15). This was also the case at Rome. The earliest certain evidence which we possess on the point is the letter of Cornelius in Euseb. H. E. vi. 43, which says that there were at that time forty-six presbyters at Rome. A few years later Optatus (de Schism. Donat. ii. 4) mentions that there were more than forty basilicas; it is inferred that there was one presbyter for each basilica, and probably a larger number for the bishop's basilica. The Liber Pontificalis is of less authority as to the early period, but is more precise in its details. The earliest account which it gives is that St. Evaristus assigned churches and their revenues in Rome to presbyters ("titulos in urbi Roma divisit presbyteris." Vit. S. Evarist. p. 6). The next account is that St. Dionysius assigned churches to presbyters, and instituted cemeteries and parishes (the text is partly uncertain: Bianchini reads "parochias dioceses instituit," but probably the second of these words is a gloss of the first, as parochia was a comparatively rare word in Italy, and also as Hincmar of Rheims Opusc. in caus. Hincm. Laudun. c. 15 ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. cxxvi. 330 and the Pseudo-Isidore, Epist. ii. Dionys. c. 3; Hinschius, p. 196, evidently read "parochias" only). A few years afterwards, pope Marcellus is said by the same authority to have instituted twenty-five "tituli" at Rome, "quasi dioceses propter baptismum et poenitentiam multorum qui convertebantur e paganis" (Vit. S. Marcell. p. 31). It may be inferred from these three accounts that in the first instance the presbyters of the several Roman churches had no special district assigned to them, and that probably they were not even attached to any particular church. After the time of pope Dionysius, each church had its own clergy, its own proper district, and its own revenues. The presbyters, deacon, and sub-deacon of each church were "cardinales," i.e. fixed to the given church; but collectively, as at Alexandria, they formed a single body, which, by corporate continuity, with changes of detail but not of principle, remains to this day as the "collegium sanctae Romanae ecclesiae cardinalium."

But the questions of the relation of these "tituli," "parochiae," or "dioceses," to the "regiones" into which the city was also divided for ecclesiastical purposes, and also of the degree to which they were analogous to the parishes of other parts of Christendom, are questions which do not seem to admit, upon extant evidence, of any certain answer (some help towards the solution of the first of these questions will be found in the treatises of the learned 16th-century antiquary, Onuphrio Panvino, ap. Mai, Spicilegium Romanum, vol. vi., and in Mabillon, Mus. Ital. vol. ii. Comm. praev. in Ord. Rom. c. 3).

(2) Co-ordinate with the normal formation of Christian communities by the aggregation of the Christians of a city or district, and their organization, whether under presbyters or bishops, was the custom of erecting places of worship upon the estates of landed proprietors. In the first instance there appears to have been no restriction upon the erection of such places of worship; the civil law, for fiscal reasons, required the officers of such churches to be taken from the estate (law of Arcadius and Honorius, A.D. 398, Cod. Theodos. 16, 2, 33 = Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 11), but otherwise until the middle of the 6th century left them practically free. It is not clear whether Conc. Chalced. c. 4, which forbids the erection of μοναστήριον ἢ εὐκτήριον οἶκον without the consent of the bishop of the city, refers to these churches; if, as appears most probable from the general tenor of the canon, it does not refer to them, the earliest restriction upon their erection will be Justin, Novell. 67, circ. A.D. 540, which requires both the consent of the bishop, as a safeguard against the multiplication of heretical churches, and a sufficient endowment. In the West there are few traces of them until the 6th century; from that time onwards they became numerous. In some cases they were merely "private chapels," erected for the convenience of the owners of country estates, and the regulation was made that although divine service might for the sake of convenience ("propter fatigationem familiae") be performed in them on ordinary days, yet on the greater festivals resort must be had to the church of the parish or the city (Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 21; 1 Arvern. A.D. 535, c. 1). In other cases they appear to have had districts assigned to them and so to have become country parishes; hence, 4 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 541, c. 26, speaks of "parochiae in potentum domibus;" and c. 33, "Si quis in agro suo aut habet aut postulat habere dioecesim;" and 9 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 655, c. 2, deals with the case of "ecclesiae parochiales" which have been founded by private persons. The two points which were mainly insisted upon in regard to both classes of privately-founded churches were (1) That they should be under the bishop's control; and (2) That they should be sufficiently endowed. The former of these rules probably appears first in 1 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 511, c. 17; the latter was enacted by 4 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 541, c. 33. A good example of the kind of endowment which was required is afforded by S. Greg. M. Epist. 12, 11, which recites that Anio, "comes Aprutianus," had founded an oratory within his "castellum," and that he wished to have it consecrated in honour of St. Peter. St. Gregory, writing to the bishop of Fermo, allows this to be done if the proper endowment is given, namely, a farm with its homestead, a yoke of oxen, two cows, four pounds of silver, a bed, fifteen head of sheep, and the proper implements of a farm. But the freedom with which in early times churches could be founded in country districts, without interfering with the rights of any other church, came to be restricted when the greater part of the Christianized West came to be covered with the network of not only diocesan but also parochial organization. After a country district had been constituted into a parish, and especially after the payment of tithes and fees by the people of such a district to the church of that parish had become a matter not of voluntary offering, but of legal obligation, the foundation of a new church within the limits or on the borders of such a parish tended to be regarded with disfavour. Pope Zachary, writing to Pippin, circ. A.D. 741, will not allow churches or private estates to have, even when endowed, baptisteries or "cardinal presbyters;" the bishop is to consecrate them without the usual solemn masses, and to send a priest to perform service as occasion requires (S. Zachar. Epist. 7, ad Pippin. c. 15; Migne, P. L. vol. lxxxix. 935). The Carolingian capitularies allow the erection of churches by private persons, with the consent of the bishop, but they are careful to provide that the former dues to the original church of the district shall not be interfered with (Karoli M. Capit. ad Salz. A.D. 803, c. 3, Pertz, vol. i. p. 124; id. Excerpt. Canon. c. 19, Pertz, i. 190; Conc. Mogunt. A.D. 813, c. 41; Hludowic. et Hlothar. Capit. c. 6, Pertz, i. 254; Ansegisi, Capit. lib. 2, 45, Pertz, i. 299). The subdivision of the territory and revenues of a parish, which was only allowable in cases of necessity, was entrusted to the discretion of the bishop, by Karoli II. Synod. Tolos. A.D. 844, c. 7; Pertz, i. 379.

[a] That cardinalis in this use, which was transferred from certain civil offices under the empire, means "fixed" is rightly maintained by Gothofred, ad Cod. Theodos. 12, 6, 7, Böcking, Notitia Dign. Orient. c. 5, 2, vol. i. pp. 24, 205; it is shewn, e.g. by a letter of pope Zachary to Pippin (Epist. 8, c. 15, Migne, P. L. vol. lxxxix. 935) who will not allow a "presbyter cardinalis" to be appointed on a private estate, but rules that whenever masses are required in private oratories a presbyter must be specially asked for from the bishop. The other late Latin meaning of "cardinalis" (i.e. praecipuus, according to Serv. ad Virg. Aen. i. 135), is less applicable to either its civil or its ecclesiastical use.

iii. Relation of Parishes to Bishops.—The jurisdiction of bishops over parishes, and over the privately-founded churches which, whether within or without the limits of parishes, were within the district over which a bishop's authority was ultimately assumed to extend, was not established without many struggles. In early times presbyters had claimed the right to detach themselves from the church of which they were presbyters, and to set up altars where they pleased. The attempt was crushed partly by the dominance of the Roman instinct for organization, and partly by the overpowering necessity for preserving the unity of the church. A presbyter who set up an altar without the consent of his bishop was, ipso facto, excommunicated; and if this separation from the rest of the Christian community failed to deter him, resort was had, probably for the first time in ecclesiastical history, to the power of the secular arm (Conc. Antioch, A.D. 341, c. 5; Can. Apost. c. 31; 2 Conc. Carth. c. 5). The theory which, from the first, seems to have governed all interpretations of the relations of the original city church to subsequently-formed communities in the same city, and to suburban or rural communities, was that the officers of those communities were still part of the one original organization. The concilium of the bishop was formed not only of those presbyters who assisted him in the ordinary administration of his own church, but of all presbyters who were in the same jurisdiction. In course of time, no doubt, a distinction between these two classes of presbyters was formed, and in the middle ages the presbyters of the cathedral came to assume not only the functions which had originally belonged to all the presbyters of the diocese, but also in some cases those of the bishop himself. But so late as the 8th and 9th centuries the extra-cathedral presbyters of a diocese were not only allowed but compelled by penalties to assist the bishop, as members of his concilium, at least once or twice a year (Pippini Capit. Vermer. A.D. 753, c. 8, Pertz, M. H. G., vol. i. p. 25; id. Capit. Compend. A.D. 757, c. 24; Benedictus Levita, Capit. i. 11, 60). The organization of the city church originally sufficed for all the clergy of the district or districts which were attached to it. When the population increased without a corresponding increase in the number of dioceses, the extra-cathedral clergy were organized separately; but the original type was preserved. The bishop stood at the head of two organizations, each of which was the counterpart of the other. Parallel with the archipresbyter urbanus was the archipresbyter ruralis or vicanus: the former became known in time as the decanus or dean of the cathedral, the latter as the decanus vicanus or rural dean. Parallel with the archidiaconus urbanus was the archidiaconus ruralis, and the struggle for supremacy between the archdeacon and the archpresbyter in the cathedral was repeated in the diocese with different results, inasmuch as in the one case the archpresbyter and in the other the archdeacon succeeded in establishing his claim.

Conversely, the bishop was theoretically an integral part of the parishes which came to be detached from the church in which he personally presided. The parish presbyter had not at first, as he came practically to have in later times, the full powers of the ministry in his parish. In Rome the presbyters of the several tituli had not even the power of consecrating the eucharist; the consecrated bread was sent round to them every Sunday from the bishop's church (S. Innocent. Epist. ad Decent. c. 5; Liber Pontificalis, Vit. S. Melchiad. p. 33): there is a trace of an attempt having been made to make this the rule for all presbyters (cf. Liber Pontif. Vit. S. Siric. p. 55), but Innocent, l. c., expressly disallows the practice in regard to parishes which were remote from the bishop's church, on the ground that "non longe portanda sunt sacramenta," and that presbyters have the right of consecration. In regard to baptism, the co-operation of the bishop became necessary in two respects, (a) the parish presbyter could only use chrism which the bishop had consecrated, and for which he had to send to the bishop once a year; (b) the baptism was incomplete until, as in baptisms in the bishop's own church, the bishop had imposed his hands (see PRIEST, III. Functions of, (2) ii.). In regard to discipline, the probability is that in the earliest period neither a bishop nor a presbyter could act alone, and that the rule of the Jewish synedria which required an ecclesiastical court to consist of at least three members was ordinarily observed. Some details of the long struggle between bishops and presbyters for the right of the latter to act alone are given elsewhere (PRIEST, III. Functions of, (1) c). This struggle was by no means ended within the period of which the present work takes cognizance, and its later history can only be considered in connexion with the general history of the relations of the Roman see to the Western church in the post-Carolingian period. It may, however, be mentioned here that an interesting survival of the earlier theory is found in the council of Rouen in A.D. 650, c. 16, which clearly implies that the bishop's ordinary visitation of a parish was conceived as the holding of a court in which the local presbyters were his assessors; the purport of the canon is that minor ecclesiastical causes should be determined by the local presbyters before the visitation, and that the graver causes only should be reserved for the more solemn court in which the bishop himself presided.

It is impossible, within the limits of the present work, to enter in detail into the intricate question of the precise periods at which, in the several parts of Christendom, the authority of the bishop of the principal church of a district came to extend over all the towns and villages which were included in that district. That authority was not established without many struggles, and its nature seems to have varied as widely as the extent to which it was recognized. But it came at length to consist in three principal particulars. (1) The appointments of clerks to parochial or other churches were subject to the bishop's approval. (2) Clerks so appointed were subject to the bishop's jurisdiction, which was exercised partly in the course of annual visitations of the several parishes, partly by requiring clerks to repair periodically to the bishop's church for the purpose of being examined. (3) The bishop had the sole right of consecrating churches and altars.

1. The Right of Approval.—In the earliest period, when the clerks of rural churches were only temporarily detached from the city church, the question of the necessity of the bishop's approval could hardly arise, inasmuch as that approval had already been given in the fact of their original ordination. After the first permanent organization of the church, the right of presbyters to detach themselves from the bishop's church, and form communities for themselves, was, as has been pointed out above, speedily crushed. The practical difficulty began with the foundation of places of worship by private persons on their own estates, or in rural districts which were not as yet recognized as forming part of the "territorium" of a city. Those who founded such places of worship claimed the right to appoint anyone whom they pleased to officiate in them without interference on the part of a neighbouring bishop. But the civil law interfered, in this as in other cases, in the interests of orthodoxy. A law of Arcadius and Honorius in A.D. 404, the year of Chrysostom's second banishment, forbids "nova ac tumultuosa conventicula extra ecclesiam" (Cod. Theodos. 16, 2, 37 = Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 15). In the following century Justinian (Novell. 57, c. 2, A.D. 537) forbade founders of churches from appointing anyone whom they pleased to serve them, without the consent of the bishop. Another Novel (123, c. 18) throws a similar enactment into a positive form by providing that founders of churches may nominate clerks for them, subject only to the clerks being found worthy; but the immediate result of these rules appears to have been an attempt, which was also checked, to dispense with clerks altogether in such places (Justin. Novell. 123, c. 32, 131, c. 8). About the same time similar rules were enacted by a Western council. 4 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 541, c. 7, will not allow "peregrini clerici" to be appointed to oratories without the consent of the bishop of the "territorium." Still later in the East Conc. Trull. c. 31, 2 Conc. Nicaen. c. 10, forbade clerks from serving chapels or oratories without the consent of the bishop, under penalty of deposition. But the question was not settled in the West until the Carolingian period, when it is clear that a determined struggle took place between bishops and founders. The Capitularies re-enact the rule that no layman could either appoint or eject a presbyter with a frequency which shews that it was frequently broken, e.g. Karoli M. Capit. de Presbyt. c. 2, Pertz, vol. i. p. 161; id. Excerpt. Can. c. 2, Pertz, i. 189; Hludowici, Capit. Aquisgran. A.D. 817, c. 9, Pertz i. 207; Capit. Wormat. A.D. 829, c. 1, Pertz i. 350 (which places laymen who disregard the rule under the ban of the empire, so also Karoli II. Edictum Pistense, A.D. 861, c. 2, Pertz, i. 489). The bishops in the petition, out of which the Capitularies of Worms resulted, complain that the emperor himself had encouraged the practice in regard to the clergy of his own palace (Conscil. Wormat. Petitio, c. 12, Pertz, i. 340). The reason alleged against absolute freedom of appointment on the part of laymen is that the "acephali," i.e. clerks who owned allegiance to no bishop, were often not reputable persons (Hludowic. 2 Concent. Ticin. I., A.D. 850, c. 18, Pertz, i. 399, id. Concent. Ticin. II. A.D. 855, Pertz, i. 431. The general enactments will be found also in Benedict. Levit. Capit. lib. i. 43, 87, 98, 147, 213; Ansegisi, Capit. lib. i. 84, 141). On the other hand the enactment was made, probably as the result of a compromise, that a bishop was bound to approve a clerk whom a layman presented for approval, except in case of evident scandal (Hludowic. et Hlothar. Constit. Wormat. de persona sacerdotali, c. 15, Pertz, vol. i. p. 337).

2. The Right of Visitation and Discipline.—It is probable that when the churches of great cities founded branch cnurches in their suburbs the bishop of the city church periodically visited such churches for disciplinary and other purposes. This was at any rate the case at Alexandria at the beginning of the 4th century. The bishop made his circuit (περιοδία), and it was in the course of one of these circuits that Ischyras was presented to the bishop by the presbyters of the Mareotic churches as an offender against the ecclesiastical canons (S. Athanas. Apol. c. Arian. c. 63, 85, vol. i. pp. 143, 158). The existence of the same practice in the 4th century in the West is shewn, e.g. by. Conc. Turon. A.D. 397, c. 2, which, in deciding a dispute between the bishops of Arles and Vienne, decides that each of them is to "visit those churches which are shewn to be adjacent to their respective cities." But there is a remarkable absence of conciliar enactments until the 7th century, when 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 36, recites that bishops ought to visit the parishes within their diocese every year, and in enacting that they may do so by deputy, mentions as the purpose of such visitation an enquiry into the revenues of churches, their state of repair, and the manner of life of their ministers. But it is clear from a canon which was enacted at the same place thirteen years later that the bishop not merely enquired into the revenues of parishes, but claimed a portion of them (7 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 646, c. 4). In other words, the bishop appears to have claimed the same rights over the revenues of dependent churches which he possessed over the revenues of the city church. The limitation of the bishop's claims in this respect forms the subject of many canons and capitularies, even after it had become an established rule that he had no claim to the revenues. Enactments were also made for the purpose of limiting his claim to dues and offerings on the score of the expenses of the visitation, e.g. Karoli M. Capit. Lanjobard. c. 5, Pertz, vol. i. p. 110; Karoli II. Synod ap. Tolos. A.D. 844, c. 4, Pertz, i. 379 (which, in addition to fixing the precise amount of produce—wine, fowls, eggs, &c.—which is to be offered, rules that if a bishop visits a parish more than once a year he is not to claim his dues more than once), Hludowic. 2 Concent. Ticin. II. A.D. 855, c. 16; Pertz, i. 432. When the rite of confirmation became finally separated from baptism, its administration was added to the purposes for which the visitation was made, and is sometimes spoken of as a principal purpose, e.g. Karlomanni, Capitul. A.D. 742, c. 3; Pertz, vol. i. p. 17, "quandocunque jure canonico episcopus circumeat parrochiam populos ad confirmandos;" but the burden which this entailed on bishops was probably one of the chief causes of the revival in the Frankish kingdom of the earlier system of rural as distinct from city bishops (Hraban. Maur. de Instit. Cleric. 1, 5), which was crushed by the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals. The right of visitation, for all purposes except this of confirmation, might be exercised by deputy (4 Conc. Tolet. c. 36, allows the bishop to depute any "probabiles presbyteros aut diaconos"), and ultimately came to be mainly exercised through the rural archdeacons.

In addition to the supervision over the clerks of parishes which was thus exercised by means of annual or other visitations, it was sometimes enacted that such clerks should periodically present themselves before the bishop in his own church, and give an account of their mode of celebrating divine service (Karlomanni, Capit. A.D. 742, c. 3; Pippini Capit. Suession. A.D. 744, c. 4; Karoli M. Capit. General, A.D. 769, c. 8). Some bishops went so far as to require their clergy not merely to present themselves, but to bring with them their instrumenta ecclesiae, altar-vessels, and service books (e.g. Theodulph. Aurelian, Capit. ad Presb. 4; Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. cv. 193), and in England the Liber Legum Ecclesiast. c. 4, Wilkins, vol. i. p. 266.

The jurisdiction which a bishop came to exercise over the clergy of parishes was not different in kind from that which he exercised over the clergy of the city church. It was carefully guarded by a long succession of enactments both of canon and civil law. The accused clerk seems never to have been without a right of appeal; and the primitive theory that the bishop's jurisdiction attached to him not as sole judge, but as president of the presbytery, seems never to have wholly faded away.

3. The Right of consecrating Churches and Altars.—It seems to have been an early custom that churches should be solemnly dedicated, and it may be assumed that the bishop, as the chief officer of a church or of a district, ordinarily took part in such a dedication. But it is clear that when the parochial system took root in the West the presbyters who were in charge of parishes did not at first consider the presence of a bishop indispensable to such a dedication. 2 Conc. Brac. A.D. 563, c. 19, deposes a presbyter who for the future ("post hoc interdictum") consecrates a church or an altar. And in the following century the canons of St. Patrick enact for the churches of Ireland that "if any presbyter has built a church let him not offer (sc. the Eucharist) until he brings his bishop to consecrate it, for thus is it seemly" (Can. S. Patric. c. 19). It was a later series of enactments which limited the original rights of a presbyter in regard to offering the eucharist, by requiring him not to offer it, unless under pressure of urgent necessity, except in a consecrated place. The earliest enactment to this effect is of doubtful date, resting only on the authority of the Liber Pontificalis and the Pseudo-Isidore (Lib. Pontif. Vit. S. Syric. c. 2; Gest. Synod. S. Silvester, c. 9, ap. Hinschius, p. 450). The other enactments are Carolingian, e.g. Karoli M. Capit. General, A.D. 769, c. 14, Pertz, vol. i. p. 32; Capit. Aquisgran. A.D. 801, c. 9; Hludowic. 2 Capit. Eccles. A.D. 856, c. 14, Pertz., vol. i. p. 440, and post Carolingian, e.g. Atton. Vercell. Capit. c. 7, ap. D'Achery, Spicilegium, vol. i. p. 403. By a series of enactments which were certainly not earlier than the preceding, it was provided that if a presbyter offered the eucharist, as he might do in cases of urgency, outside a consecrated building, he should only do so upon a portable altar which a bishop had previously consecrated (Karoli M. Capit. General. A.D. 769, c. 14; Conc. Paris, A.D. 829, c. 47; Hincmar Remens. Capit. A.D. 856, c. 3; Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. cxxiv. 794).

iv. Internal Organization of Parishes.—(a) The evidence which exists as to the earliest organization of parishes is not sufficient to enable us to frame many general statements respecting it. If the instance of the Batanean town, which has been mentioned above, is to be regarded as typical, it would seem as though the principle of the Jewish synedria had been preserved in the East, and that in each parish there were at least two presbyters to form with the rural bishop a court for the administration of discipline, and two deacons for the dispensing of the church funds to those who were upon the roll. In the West the statement of Ambrosiaster is clearly to the same effect: "aliquantos presbyteros (oportet esse) ut bini sint per ecclesias et unus in civitate episcopus" (Comm. in Epist. 1 ad Timoth. c. iii. 12, ap. S. Ambros. Op. vol. ii. p. 295). In Rome each titulus had at least one presbyter, and ultimately also one deacon and one sub-deacon; but the precise relations of deacons to the tituli in early times are extremely obscure. In Gaul and Spain a single presbyter or a single deacon was sometimes put in charge of a parish, and sometimes a presbyter and a deacon took charge on alternate weeks (Conc. Tarracon. A.D. 516, c. 7). That a deacon might be "rector" of a parish is clear from many instances—e.g. Conc. Illib. c. 77, "diaconus regens plebem," S. Greg. Turon. de Gloria Confessor, c. 30, p. 918, of a deacon who "rexit ecclesiam vici," at Issiore, near Clermont; but if he alone baptized, the baptism was not complete without the subsequent benediction of the bishop (Conc. Illib. c. 77: the rule was afterwards extended to baptisms by presbyters); and 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 15, disallowed the practice which had grown up of deacons offering the eucharist. But the practice of entrusting parishes to deacons was ultimately forbidden, though apparently not until the 9th century (Hludowic. et Hlothar. Capit. Eccles. A.D. 825, c. 1, Pertz, vol. i. p. 250). There are indications that laymen were sometimes placed in charge of parishes. Conc. Cabillon, A.D. 650, c. 5, enacts that "saeculares qui necdum sunt ad clericatum conversi" are not to be entrusted with the government ("regendum") of either parishes or the property of parishes; Conc. Rem. A.D. 625, c. 19, disallows the appointment of archpresbyters who are not clerks; and among the Culdees of the British Islands lay parsons of parishes, though discouraged by the disallowance of some of the emoluments of the office, are not forbidden (Reeves, Prose Rule of the Céli Dé, p. 94). The question of the appointment of monks to the charge of parishes, which was keenly contested in the middle ages, belongs to a later period. Such appointments are allowed by Conc. Mogunt. A.D. 847, c. 14, with the proviso that the monk is to save his vow of poverty by giving up the revenues of a parish to the bishop or his deputy. But the general rule, which required the ecclesiastical head of a parish to be a presbyter, though broken sufficiently to shew that it was not absolute, was no doubt ordinarily observed. Every parish came to have its priest. If there were several churches within a parish (by which, as will be pointed out below, must not be understood in pre-mediaeval times a district with definite boundaries) each of these churches was required to have its own presbyter. Two or more churches could not be committed to the same presbyter, unless the revenues of the single churches were insufficient for his support (Conc. Emerit. A.D. 666, c. 19; 16 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 693, c. 5; Conc. Paris, A.D. 829, c. 49; Hludowic. Capit. Aquisgran. A.D. 817, c. 9, Pertz, vol. i. p. 207; Ansegisi, Capit. lib. i. 86, Pertz, vol. i. p. 283). But Hlothar. I. Constit. Papiens A.D. 832, c. 1, absolutely disallows the commission of more than one church to one presbyter, and enacts that unless a poor church is shewn to be necessary, it is to be destroyed; if, on the contrary, it is shewn to be necessary, it is to be endowed with lands by the state. It is important to note that in the expressions which are constantly used in reference to the ecclesiastical head of a parish, whether presbyters or others, the sacerdotal idea is almost always in the background. He is not so much the "sacerdos" as the "rector;" he is said "plebi praeesse;" he is sent—not to administer the sacraments, but "ad regendum" (e.g. 9 Conc. Tolet. c. 2; 11 Tolet. c. 3; Pippin. Capit. Eccles. iv. A.D. 789, c. 81; so also when a parish presbyter resigns his office he is said "ab ordine et titulo et regimine plebis se exuere," Conc. Rem. A.D. 874, c. 1; Migne, P. L. vol. cxxv. 796).

(b) It does not appear that any other officers were regarded as necessary to parochial organization. In regard to the earlier period there is no evidence except that which has been given above. But there grew up a feeling against presbyters offering the eucharist without the assistance of other clerks; and it came to be enacted in the West that parish presbyters should both have such clerks, and should take them into their houses in order to train them for the service of the church (2 Conc. Vaison, A.D. 529, c. 1, which speaks of this as being a common custom in Italy; Conc. Emerit. A.D. 666, c. 18). These "clerici parochiani" varied in number under different circumstances, and their duties were the ordinary duties of clerks in divine service. They survive in the modern "parish clerk."

(c) The question of the mode in which the presbyter or other chief officer of a parish was appointed in early times is one upon which only scanty evidence exists. It is probable upon general grounds that such appointments did not form an exception to the general rule, which at first required an election by the people and an approval by the bishop, and which afterwards allowed the clergy or the bishop to nominate, and the people merely to approve. But the endowment of parishes by private persons, and the interweaving of the parochial with the canonical and monastic system, so far overlaid the primitive practice that there was in the middle ages only a small proportion of parishes in which the people had any real share in either the election or the approval of their parish priest. The question of patronage, so far as it falls within the limits of the present work, is discussed elsewhere. [PATRON.]

(d) The limits of parishes were probably in almost all cases fixed by the previously existing organization. Where the Roman organization prevailed, the parish was the pagus, vicus, or castellum, with its surrounding territorium. Where, as in England, the Roman organization had been almost completely swept away, the parish was identical with the township or the manor (Stubbs, Constitutional History of England, vol. i. p. 227; Toulmin Smith, The Parish, 2nd edit. pp. 16–22). But, in a large proportion of cases, it is probable that these limits were not precisely defined until the legal enforcement of tithes rendered such a definition necessary. Nor was it until a much later period that parishes came necessarily to adjoin each other; between parishes, as between townships, were frequently tracts of more or less unsettled or common land, on which chapels might be erected without trenching on any parochial rights. It is probable that, in England, the final parcelling of the whole country into parochial districts was not effected until the era of the poor-laws.

PARSONAGE. The information about the official residences of the clergy in early times is excessively slight. But it appears probable that they had such residences. Under the Jewish ritual it is well known that apartments were provided for the priests and Levites within the precinct of the temple itself (1 Chron. ix. 27). The earliest Christian churches had annexes called Pastophoria. "Let the house (church) be oblong, turned towards the east, the pastophoria on either side towards the east, seeing it resembles a ship." (Apost. Constit. ii. 57, Labbe.) What the purpose of these pastophoria was is a moot question. But some writers have thought that they were official apartments for the clergy attached to the church. (See Hofman, Lex. Univ. s. v.) Some colour of probability is lent to this hypothesis by the fact that the LXX make use of the word to designate the chambers of the Levites in the courts of the temple. This opinion is adopted by Bingham (Eccl. Antiq. viii. 7. 11); but he is said to be mistaken by Herzog (Real-Encyclopädie, vol. i. p. 729).

One of the earliest notices of a house for clergy is that in the Apostolical Canons (can. 5. al. 4), where it is prescribed that only ears of corn, grapes, oil for the lamp, and incense may be offered at the altar, and that all other fruits shall be carried to the house, as a first-fruit for the bishop and priests.

This dwelling together of bishops and priests is reflected in the language of later English history. The Excerpta of archbishop Egbright (A.D. 740, ed. Johnson, no. 26) provide that "Bishops and priests have a house (hospitiolum) for the entertainment of strangers, not far from the church." Johnson gives his opinion that at one period the house for the reception of guests was not identical with the residence-house, for fear of the infection which the strangers might bring. The next of the Excerpts (no. 27) enjoins, that though the bishop be elevated above the bench of priests in church, yet in the house he must remember that he is but a colleague of the priests. That the custom of bishop and priests dwelling together prevailed in England up to a comparatively late period (7th century) may be seen from the pages of Bede (Hist. Angl. lib. iv. c. 27, p. 366, Gidley's translation).

St. Augustine mentions that after he was made bishop of Hippo he "had with him in his bishop's house a monastery of clerics," with whom he lived according to apostolic tradition. (See Ad Fratres in Eremo, Sermo xiv. near the beginning; also ibid. Sermo v. about the middle.)

The term domus ecclesiae as the designation of the house of a bishop is very common in the writers of the early centuries. (See Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. lib. i. cap. 39, et passim.) When a bishop died, his house (domus ecclesiae) was to be assigned to proper custody by the bishop who came to bury the deceased. (Conc. Aurelian, ii. can. 6, A.D. 533). A similar direction was given as the council of Rheims, A.D. 630, can. 16. Hofman (Lex. Univ.) gives Episcopium as one of the terms for a bishop's house.

The construction of a house for a bishop was the subject of a direction from the pope (Gregory III.) in the case of Boniface the English missionary to Thuringia: "Make therefore a house in which your father (Boniface) may in person be bound to dwell" (Antonius Augustinus, Juris Pontificii, part 2, p. 3).

The episcopal residence (domus ecclesiae) is in later times on such a scale as to be the scene of a banquet to a member of the royal family (S. Greg. Turon. lib. vii. cap. 27). In England the penalty for breaking into the house of the bishop is put next in order, and apparently in magnitude, to the penalty for breaking into the king's house (Laws of king Ine, A.D. 693).

PARTICLES. [FRACTION.]

PARURA. [ALB.]

PASCHA MEDIUM, or MEDIUM PASCHAE, was the Wednesday in Easter week. So Alcuin: "Sexagesima inde dici potest quia lx. sunt dies usque ad medium Paschae, quod est feria quarta paschalis hebdomadis" (Epist. ad Car. M. Hittorp. 300). Similarly, Rabanus Maurus, his disciple (Instit. Cler. ii. 34), and Amalarius (de Ord. Antiph. 32). [W. E. S.]

PASCHA PETITUM. This was a name given, but not generally, to Palm Sunday in parts where the creed was delivered to the competentes on that day: "Diversis vocabulis distinguitur; id est, dies palmarum sive florum, atque ramorum, osanna, Pascha Petitum, sine competentium, et capitolavium" (Ordo Rom. in Hittorp. 46; similarly in the edition of this Ordo, differing in many respects, printed by Gerbert in Monum. Vet. Liturg. Alem. iii. 195). [TRADITIO SYMBOLI.] [W. E. S.]

PASCHAE CLAUSUM (PASCHA CLAUSA, PASCHA CLAUSUM, CLAUSULA PASCHAE). Most modern writers (as Mabillon, Liturgia Gallicana, 148; Gerbert, Lit. Alem. Disq. x. iv. 2; Ruinart in Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. ix. 44; Du Cange in v.) identify this with the first Sunday after Easter (Low Sunday, Dies Dominicus post Albas, Dominica in Albis depositis, Quasimodo), but early authorities, whom they do not notice, and certain facts bearing on the question, prove that it was a name given to Saturday in the Easter week. Only the Macri (Hierolexicon in v.) within our reading have stated this correctly, and they give no authority. Others have been probably misled by the fact that Low Sunday is now called Pâque close in France, to which and the neighbouring province of Metz the use of the term Pascha clausum was, so far as appears, confined. It was natural that the name should be transferred when the Saturday ceased to be marked by any special observance, i.e. when the great baptisms of Easter ceased.

Amalarius, A.D. 812, says expressly: "Septuagesima perficitur in Sabbato quod vocatur Clausum Pascha" (De Ord. Antiph. 32). Alcuin, about the same time or earlier: "Videtur Septuagesimus dici posse dies propter decem hebdomadas quae sunt ab ipso die usque clausum Pascha in quo alba tolluntur vestimenta a nuper baptizatis" (Epist. ad Car. Magn. Hittorp. 300). Rabanus Maurus (Instit. Cler. ii. 34) echoes the words of Alcuin. But the newly-baptized laid aside their white dress with ceremony, not on the Sunday, but on the Saturday. Thus Amalarius: "De Sabbato . . . Hodie revertuntur ad fontes, ut exuant se albis" (De Ord. Antiph. 51).

That the Clausum Paschae was a great feast in France might be inferred from the foregoing notices; as also from the facts that Gregory of Tours treats it as a well-known note of time: "Eo anno post Clausum Pascha tam immensa cum grandine pluvia fuit," &c. (Hist. Franc. ix. 44), and from the almost absolute use of the word "clausum" alone, as when the same author says of some persons baptized at Rions: "Nullus ad clausum pertingere potuit vivus" (Glor. Conf. 48). [W. E. S.]

PASCHAL EPISTLES were letters written by patriarchs and archbishops to the bishops within their jurisdiction, and in the case of the pope of Alexandria to the bishop of Rome, if not to other patriarchs, containing a notice of the day on which the next Easter should be kept. They were also called "Festal Epistles" (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vii. 20, 21, ἑορταστικαὶ ἐπιστολαί), or "Festal Writs" (ibid. 22, ἑορτ. γραφαί), from their connexion with the great feast of Easter (Eus. v. s. 20). At Alexandria they were first delivered as homilies, being afterwards put into the form of an epistle, and so sent to the comprovincial bishops. Hence they are sometimes called "Homilies" or "Discourses." They were carried by a special messenger (διακομιστής. Synesius begs a correspondent to treat his messenger kindly coming and going, and to provide him means of proceeding both ways (Ep. 13).

The Office of the Bishop of Alexandria.—It is asserted by Baronius (Annal. Eccles. ad ann. 325), Binius (Labbe, Conc. ii. 69), Dupin (Biblioth. Eccles. under Cyril. Alex.), and many others, that the bishops of Alexandri were expressly requested and authorized by the first council of Nicaea to give annual notice to the whole church, through the incumbents of the principal sees, of the day on which the ensuing Easter was to be celebrated. That the pope of Alexandria did at one time give such notice to the bishop of Rome as well as to those of Egypt is not to be disputed, but it may well be doubted whether he did so in pursuance of any decree of that council, and, again, whether he transmitted a similar notice to the other patriarchs of the East. If we are to be guided by the evidence still extant, we shall rather infer that the custom, whatever its extent, arose from the voluntary deference paid by other churches to that of Alexandria in a question of mathematical science. No formal proof of the alleged conciliar sanction or decree has, to my knowledge, ever been attempted, and the only document that I can meet with which ascribes it to any oecumenical synod appears to me of very doubtful weight. This is the Prologus S. Cyrilli de Festi Pasch. Ratione, which is found in Latin only, and in a single MS., seemingly of the 9th century. It was first printed by the Jesuit Aegid. Bucherius after his Comment. in Can. Pasch. Victorii Aquit. Antv. 1633 (Prolog. u. s. or Epist. 87, § 2; Opp. Cyr. Al. x. 383; Migne, lxxvii.). But more, perhaps, has been built on a statment of Leo the Great, who however (Epist. 94, c. 1) speaks only of "the holy fathers" in general. If the council made that arrangement, we should reasonably look for some mention of the fact in the paschal epistles of the bishops of Alexandria, of which a large number are extant, especially in those of Athanasius, who was himself at Nicaea, and, becoming bishop of Alexandria within a year of the conclusion of the council, must have been the first to act on its decree. Yet neither in his first festal epistle nor in any subsequent one does he make any mention of it. Those of Theophilus are equally silent, and so are the festal homilies of Cyril. Twice also within a century of the council of Nicaea we find bishops of Rome consulting those of Milan and Carthage, as will be seen presently, when in doubt as to the right day. We observe also that Leo, in the epistle above mentioned, begged the emperor to help him by applying to "the Egyptians, or to any others who were reported to have certain knowledge of this kind of calculation" (Epist. 94). Marcian wrote to Proterius of Alexandria, who in a long reply justified the calculation which Leo doubted (inter Opp. Leon. p. 203). The pope submitted, and thanked the emperor for his interposition (Ep. 108); but it is remarkable that in his paschal letter to the bishops of Gaul and Spain he does not mention Proterius, but tells them of his application to the emperor, "quo rescribente viii. kal. Maias definitus est dies" (Ep. 109). At this period, then, it appears certain that the bishops of Alexandria were not held to have authority to settle the day for the whole church. That they were held in great esteem for their skill in such questions is clear from some of the testimonies already alleged. See also Dionysius Exiguus, Epist. Paschal. i. in Apparat. ad Baronii Annales, p. 248; and later yet Adrian I. ad Epilam seu Joan. Presbyt. Ep. 70 inter Epp. Carolinas.

Methods of Publication in various Countries.—The practice of the church, both before and after the Nicene council, will receive further light from the following testimonies. Eusebius tells us that Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, A.D. 247, wrote several paschal letters (Hist. vii. 20–22), in one of which he "set forth a canon for eight years, and proved that it is never right to celebrate the feast of Easter except after the vernal equinox" (u. s. 20). A synod of Arles, 314, thus addresses the bishop of Rome: "Touching the observance of Easter Sunday, we have decreed that it be kept by us on the same day and the same time throughout the whole world, and that thou address letters to all according to the custom" (can. 1). The council of Nicæa, held in 325, settled, with regard to the time, "by the common consent of all, that the most holy feast of Easter should be celebrated on one and the same day" in every church (Ep. Constant. ad Ecclesias; Hard. Conc. i. 449); but we cannot, as before said, find that it imposed on any one bishop the duty of publishing the particular day in each year for the instruction of all others. St. Ambrose says, "even after the calculations of the Egyptians and the decision of the church of Alexandria, most of the bishops of the Roman church are, by their letters, still waiting for my opinion" (Epist. 23, § 8). The question was whether Easter could be kept so late as April 25. In 393 the council of Hippo in Africa decreed "that the venerable day of Easter should be made known to all, "formatarum subscriptione" (can. 6; Sim. Conc. Carth. v. can. 7; Codex Afric. 73); but it does not say by whom the FORMATAE were to be issued. The council of Carthage, 397, determined that, "because of the mistake which is often wont to arise, all the bishops of the province of Africa should be careful to receive the day of paschal observance from the church of Carthage" (cap. 1). To this they afterwards added, "et non sub angusto temporis spatio," and that, as there was to be an annual synod at Carthage, "the holy day of Easter should then be published by the legates" (cap. 41). When this was settled, two bishops present said, "We ask now of this assembly that ye deign to inform our province of the day by letters," on which the president, Aurelius of Carthage, said, "It must needs be so." In 413, Innocent of Rome, writing to Aurelius, expresses his opinion that the next Easter ought to be celebrated on March 22 (xi. kal. Apr.), adding, "It will become your wisdom, my brother and partner, with the like-minded and our fellow-priests [consacerdotibus], to consider this same matter in the most religious synod, that if objection appear to our settlement, you may write back to us fully and openly, that we may beforehand prescribe by letters (as the custom is) the observation of the paschal day, so fixed by deliberation at its proper time" (Epist. 14). Cassian, 424, limits the letters of the bishop of Alexandria to Egypt (Collat. x. 2). A fragment is extant, in Latin, of an epistle, said to have been written in 444 by Cyril of Alexandria to Leo, in which this clause occurs, "Simul Pascha celebremus kal. ix. Maii [April 23] propter rationem embolismi anni" (Ep. Cyr. A. 86; Migne, x. 378; or Opp. Leon. i. 602, ed. Baller). See also the letter of Paschasinus, whom Leo consulted, "Id verum invenimus quod ab Alexandrinæ ecclesiæ antistite beatitudini tuæ rescriptum est" (Opp. Leon. (Quesn.) 111). The council of Orleans, 541, decreed that the day of the feast should be "notified to the people in church by the bishop," and that, if any doubt arose, the metropolitan should consult "the apostolic see," and abide by its decision (can. 1). At Braga, at a council held on Dec. 15, 571, it was resolved that, before the council dispersed, "the coming Easter of the same year [according to us the next, 572]—on what day of the kalends and in what month it should be kept—be declared by the metropolitan bishop, and that the rest of the bishops, and the other clergy noting this down, should announce it to the people each in his own church" (can. 9). The synod of Auxerre, 578, ordered "all presbyters before the Epiphany to send their messengers [to the bishop], that they might inform them of the beginning of Lent" (can. 2). Gregory of Rome, writing in 598 to the bishops of Sardinia, says that it was a custom of the island for the bishops to go themselves or send their messengers to ask for a written notice of the day on which the next Easter would be celebrated; and that whether they knew it already or not. He exhorted them to be faithful to the custom, which some were beginning to neglect (Epist. vii. Ind. ii. 8). The council of Toledo, 633, shows by the language of its fifth canon that the church of Spain did not receive information on the subject, at that period, either from Rome or the East: "In the Spains, a diversity in the announcement of the paschal feast is wont to happen, a difference in the tables of the festival sometimes causing error. It is, therefore, decreed that the metropolitan bishops inquire of each other by letter three months before the Epiphanies, that, being well instructed through their common knowledge, they may inform their comprovincials of the day of Christ's resurrection." It is probable that the publication of tables of the movable feasts had by this time quite put an end to the paschal epistles of the great patriarchs; but created a difficulty when their accuracy could be questioned, or the last year for which they provided had arrived.

Time of the Announcement.—The festal homilies of Alexandria were preached as a rule on the previous Easter, and then dispersed as letters. A trace of the time is found in many of those that are perfect, e.g. Athanasius: "The season calls us to keep the feast" (i. 3); "Again, my brethren, is Easter come and gladness" (ii. 14), &c.; Cyril: "The present is a time of festival" (v. 44); "Our holy feast now shining" (vi. 60); &c.

Cassian tells us that the epistle was issued from Alexandria "after the day of the Epiphany" (Collat. x. 2). I do not think that we can infer a fixed time from the extant examples, and he may have been misled by the customs of the West. In the West the council of Orleans, in 541, orders the notice to be given in church by the bishop "on the day of the Epiphanies" (can. 1). The council of Braga, 572, directs the bishops and the other clergy, "each in his own church, to announce it to the people on the approaching day of the Lord's Nativity, that no one might be ignorant of the beginning of Lent" (can. 9). The Epiphany is also fixed as the time by the council of Auxerre, 578 (can. 2).

PASCHAL TAPER. This was a large taper, which among the other ceremonies of Easter Eve ("sabbatum sanctum") was solemnly blessed before the altar, at Rome by the archdeacon, in Spain by two deacons, then lighted from the newly-struck and blessed fire, and carried in procession before the catechumens to the font. It was afterwards placed before the altar, and was to burn incessantly until after the solemn mass, or the second Vespers, or the Compline service, of Easter Day, according to different rituals: that of Soissons requires it to burn for four consecutive days (Martene de Ant. Eccles. Rit. lib. iv. cap. 24). The symbolism is obvious. In its origin the paschal taper was a special observance of the general custom which, through East and West alike, celebrated that night "much to be observed" by a bright illumination, changing the darkness into light. [See EASTER, CEREMONIES OF, Vol. I. p. 595.] The twofold reference to the new rising of the Sun of Righteousness from the darkness of the tomb, and to the illumination of the newly-baptized, is constantly recalled to mind in the office of the Benedictio Cerei. In the procession of the neophytes, and when the taper precedes the pope, as (according to the old Ordo Romanus) it should do during the whole paschal week, it is taken to represent the pillar of fire which led Israel through the Red Sea.

The institution of the paschal taper has been commonly attributed to pope Zosimus (A.D. 417) on the strength of the notice in the life of him in the Liber Pontificalis, "per parochias concessa licentia cereos benedici," or, according to another version, "per parochias concessit ut cereos benedicerent;" but it was pointed out by Baronius (Annal. in ann. 418) that this really implies the extension to the parish churches of a custom already existing in (probably) the great basilicas. The hymn of Prudentius, "Inventor rutili," commonly sung during the office of the benediction of the taper, cannot be relied on as an argument for the antiquity of the rite, for it is in truth only an excerpt of forty lines from a much longer hymn, which according to the best reading is inscribed ad incensum lucernae, not de cereo paschali, and which, being No. V. of the Cathemerinon hymns, was clearly intended for daily use at the Vesper service when the candles used to be solemnly lighted. It is possibly, however, alluded to by St. Augustine (De Civ. Dei, xv. 22) where he says, "in laude quadam cerei breviter versibus dixi," &c. where "cerei," and not "creatoris," seems to be the true reading. Ennodius, bishop of Ticino (died 521), has left two forms of Benedictio cerei, from an expression in one of which it is inferred that the practice of preserving particles of the wax of the taper as charms had already grown up by that time. Gregory the Great (Epist. xi. 33) and can. 9, C. Tolet. IV. both speak clearly of the paschal taper; various customs grew up round the rite in later times, such as that of making five holes in the taper, or attaching five grains of incense to it, of stamping upon it the date, the indiction of the current year, or the letters A and Ω, or of fastening to it inscriptions of various kinds, of which examples may be seen in Martene (u. s.). (See the various rituals and commentaries on the office in Sabbato Sancto, and Mabillon de Lit. Gall. p. 141.) [C. E. H.]

PASSION SUNDAY. The fifth Sunday in Lent has from ancient times been called Dominica Passionis or de Passione Domini, because from it begins the more special commemoration of the suffering of Christ. An Anglo-Saxon homily (Aelfric's Homilies, ii. 224 f.) for the fifth Sunday in Lent commences by stating that from that day until Easter the time is designated Christ's Passion-tide (Wheatley on the Common Prayer, ed. Corrie, p. 241, n. 6). In token of sadness the Gloria Patri is generally omitted at this season in responsories, invitatories, and introits. The character of the season is strikingly shewn in the Mozarabic Mass for the day. In modern times, in England at least, the name "Passion-Week" is commonly given to HOLY WEEK. [C.]

PASTOPHORIUM. A chamber attached to the outside wall of a church, and approached from within, used as a vestry, sacristy, treasury, as well as a living and sleeping room. Παστός being an inner chamber, especially a bridal chamber with embroidered hangings, came to signify the shrine of a deity, and the priests whose duty it was to carry the shrine were called pastophori (οἱ παστοφόροι). (Diod. i. 29; Clem. Alex. Paedag. iii. c. 2; Stromat. vi. c. 4), and the chambers where they resided in the precincts of the temple pastophoria (παστοφορεῖα or παστοφόρια). The word is of frequent occurrence in the LXX in this or an allied sense, usually as the translation of לִשְׁכָּה, and generally to designate the chambers annexed to the tabernacle or temple, for the habitation of the priests and other ministers, or for the reception of the offerings in money, corn, fruits, or other stores (1 Chr. ix. 26, 33; xxiii. 28; xxviii. 12; 2 Chr. xxxi. 11; Isa. xxii. 15; Jer. xxxv. 4; Ezek. xl. 17, 38; Esdr. viii. 59). The Vulgate rendering is usually exedrae, sometimes gazophylacium (Jer. xxxv. 4; Ezek. xl. 17, 38) or tabernaculum (Isa. xxii. 15); in 2 Chr. xxxi. 11, horrea. Its use in Christian nomenclature was equally extensive, sometimes denoting the apartments of the bishop and clergy and ministers and keepers of the church; sometimes a vestry or treasury. Bona regards it as synonymous with the diaconicon or vestiarium, "quod barbara voce sacristia nuncupatur" (Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. i. c. xxiv. § 2). This is the sense in which the word is used in the Apostolical Constitutions, where after the faithful had communicated in both kinds the deacons were directed to take what was left and carry it into the "pastophorium" (Ap. Const. lib. viii. c. 13; Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. viii. ch. vii. § 11; Binterim, Denkwürdig. ii. 2, 143; Schelstrate, Conc. Antioch, p. 186). [E. V.]

(2) And Basileus, commemorated Dec. 25 in the Sacramentary of Leo (Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 467). [C. H.]

PASTOR (ποιμήν). (1) When St. Paul (Ephes. iv. 11) speaks of ποιμένας, "shepherds," he seems to describe not so much those admitted to a distinct order or office, as those who "took the oversight" of the flock, under whatever designation. Thus ἐπίσκοποι are said (Acts xx. 28) to "be the shepherds" of the church; and, again, πρεσβύτεροι are warned (1 Pet. v. 2) to "be shepherds" to the flock of God, even as Christ is "shepherd and bishop" of our souls (1 Pet. ii. 25). And the Latin word "pastor" retained for the most part this vagueness; it designated a minister of the church considered as guiding and governing a flock. More especially it designated a bishop; hence in later times "pastoralitas" came to mean the dignity of a bishop or abbat, and "pastorare" to exercise the functions of a bishop or abbat (Ducange, s. v.).

(2) The ADVOCATE OF THE CHURCH was sometimes called "pastor laicus" (Ducange). [C.]

PASTORAL STAFF. (Ῥάβδος, βακτηρία, ῥάβδη; baculus, virga, ferula, pedum, cambuta, capsita, crocea, crossia, stampella, crosse.)

The word has assumed a multitude of forms, partly, no doubt, from the vagaries of the copyists: cambutta, cubuta, cambuta, cambuca, cambucca, camputa, capsita, combucca, gabucca, sambuta, &c.

Migne (Dict. Orfèvr. s. v., following the learned monograph of Barrault and Martin) traces the word cambuta to the Irish missionaries in the time of the Merovingians. This he considers more probable than its connexion with κάμπτω and καμπύλη, a curved staff.

The name ferula (ferio) points to the correctional use of the staff.

The etymology of crosse is controverted. We have the forms crochia, croqua, crocula, and also crocea, crossea, croça, crossa. Some of these forms may be traced to croc and crochet, whilst others suggest crux and the Italian croce. Magri observes (Hierolex. s. v.) that the pastoral staff was called crocceo (Anglicè, crutch), from the use that was made of it as a support in walking.

The most ancient crosiers (sic) appear, says a learned writer, to have been much shorter than those of succeeding ages. That of St. Severinus, bishop of Cologne, who died in the year 400, served him as a walking-stick (Archaeologia, xvii. 37).

There are no grounds for saying whether the pastoral staff, when it was first adopted as an emblem, was designed to be the symbol of duty or of jurisdiction; whether it betokened the shepherd's duty of tending the flock of God or (as a form of sceptre) the right and the responsibility of a ruler. Both these ideas seem to be combined in one of the earliest Latin authorities on the subject—the passage of St. Isidore of Seville (A.D. 560–636), who says that the staff was given to a bishop as a token that he "vel regat, vel corrigat, vel infirmitates infirmorum sustineat" (de Officiis Ecclesiasticis, cap. v.).

The term "pastoral staff" seems to point to the shepherd's crook as the prototype of the wand or sceptre which has symbolized the ministerial office from very early times. Indeed, Suicer (Thesaurus Eccles. s. v. βακτηρία) thus unhesitatingly assigns its origin: "Because the ministers of the church are called shepherds, and their duty is to feed the flock of God, namely, the church, therefore to them is given a staff or rod."

There is an undoubted propriety in the symbol so interpreted. But we may not yet have arrived at the bottom of the matter, if we rest here; for there is some reason to think that the pastoral staff of the Christian clergy was but an adoption with a new significance of a religious usage older than Christianity itself. The sculptures and coins of Italian paganism shew us that the augurs of antiquity bore a staff (lituus) very closely resembling the pastoral staff. It was with such a staff, in fact, that the augur divided the expanse of heaven (templum) into regions for the purpose of divination. The annexed figure from an Etruscan sculpture will give an idea of the augur's staff. In connexion with this figure it should be observed that the early form of pastoral staff appears to have been quite short—much shorter than the specimens of mediaeval art that have survived to us (Reusens, Éléments d'Archéologie chrétienne, Louvain, 1871). The form of the lituus might in some degree account for this. On the other side, however, it ought, perhaps, to be noticed that the lituus had to be borne in the right hand, whilst the handling of the pastoral staff does not appear to have been so restricted. In extant representations the pastoral staff is held sometimes in the right and sometimes in the left hand. Such a variation, however, will hardly be thought sufficient to negative the possibility of the hypothesis — which has the authority of Mosheim (Instit. Eccl. Hist. pt. ii. chap. iv.)—that the pastoral staff is one of those many things which with but slight alterations the early Christians felt at liberty to adopt from paganism as being accepted symbols of piety and reverence.

According to another theory of its origin, the pastoral staff is a survival in the case of bishops of what was once to be seen in the hands of all. It is, in fact, the episcopal walking-stick. Thomassin, Grancolas, and other liturgists of modern times, have vindicated an origin of this kind for the staff. According to them it is no other than the crutch or staff (sustentaculum, reclinatorium) which at first was permitted to the aged and infirm, and which afterwards became general as a support while standing in church. When seats were introduced into choirs, the reclinatorium was doomed to disappear, and (according to these writers) survived in the hand of prelates alone as emblems of honour. The flaw in this theory appears to be that the reclinatorium certainly remained in general use long after the date at which we can trace the pastoral staff.

We now reach the question by whom the pastoral staff was used.

(a) Pope.—It is commonly said that the pope never carried a pastoral staff. The reason assigned for this custom cannot be better given than in the words of Innocent III. "The Roman pontiff does not use the pastoral staff, because St. Peter the Apostle sent his staff to Eucharius, the first bishop of Trèves, whom he appointed with Valerius and Maternus to preach the Gospel to the German race. He was succeeded in his bishopric by Maternus, who was raised from the dead by the staff of St. Peter. The staff is down to the present day preserved with great veneration by the church at Trèves." (De Sacro Altaris Mysterio, lib. i. cap. 62.) It is sarcastically observed by Cahier, a Jesuit writer, that St. Peter must have repeated more than once the sacrifice of his pastoral staff, for several places claim to have it. The same writer, however, shews that there is reason to think that popes did bear the pastoral staff up to the 11th century, and he gives a figure of Gregory the Great bearing a staff from a miniature of the 13th century. This figure we reproduce here (Cahier, Caractéristiques des Saints, p. 298).

Gregory the Great. (From Cahier.)

Barrault indeed says (p. 25) that the portrayal of St. Gregory with a staff proves only the ignorance of the illuminator in the 13th century. Perhaps however, this is not quite fair. It may shew that the present question was in debate in the 13th century, and the plate before us may be the record of the view which the illuminator took in the controversy.

Another representation of Gregory the Great with a staff (though it is of a different shape, being surmounted with a cross) is published by the Arundel Society. This singular monument, says Mr. Marriott (Vestiarium Christianum, p. 237), is assigned by antiquaries to the year 700 or thereabouts. The figure is easily accessible in Mr. Marriott's work, and therefore need not be reproduced here.

A third figure of Gregory the Great with a staff is that which was given to the brothers

Gregory the Great. (From Macri Hierolex.)

Magri for the Hierolexicon (p. 65, ed. Romæ, 1677), and which is believed to be contemporary with St. Gregory himself.

Migne (Dict. de l'Orfèvrerie, s. v. Crosse) denies that the popes ever used the pastoral staff properly so called; but he admits that they had a baton, which was straight as a sceptre. This, however, would hardly differentiate it from the pastoral staff proper, which was not restricted to a particular shape. Baronius, it may be mentioned, concludes that the staff is to a bishop what a sceptre is to a king. It should be borne in mind that, when writers contend that the pope bore a pastoral staff, they do not probably intend to say that the staff was always curved. Krazer indeed (De Liturgiis, p. 353) shews that the oft-quoted words of Innocent III., in which he is understood to disclaim the pastoral staff for the pope, are to be understood as disclaiming only the curved staff of ordinary bishops. By some writers (e.g. Martin and Barrault) a distinction is drawn between the cambuta, the crook or T shaped staff, as the symbol of the pastoral office, and the ferula or sceptre-like staff which betokened sovereign authority. Such writers in the Roman Catholic interest are not unwilling to admit that the pope carried the ferula, whilst denying that he had the cambuta. It would obviously be a great gain to their position if it could be shewn that from the earliest days the symbol of the pastoral care had not been associated with the person of the pope, whilst the emblem of sovereignty had always been so—that, whilst the one character had, of course, been understood, the other had been with the emphasis of the very symbolism pointedly affirmed as attaching to him.

In judging, however, of this vexed question, this point is not to be forgotten, that we do not find any trace of the disposition to repudiate the pastoral staff for the pope until about the 12th century, which is at least a suspicious epoch on a question which in no indirect way concerns the glorification of the temporal sovereignty.

(β) Bishops.—On the early use of the staff by bishops, we may quote the authority of Baronius (ad ann. 504, n. 38), who says that bishops employed the staff certainly in the 4th century. The earliest mention of it given by Maskell (Monum. Rit. iii. 273) as forming a part of the rite of consecration of a bishop is the passage quoted above from Isidore of Spain (A.D. 560-636).

In the early part of the 5th century there seems no reason to doubt, says a competent writer, that St. Patrick took with him to Ireland, when he went to preach the Gospel there, the pastoral staff which afterwards became so famous under the name of the Staff of Jesus (Archæologia, xvii. 36).

In the will of St. Remigius (Flodoard. Hist. lib. i. cap. 18) mention is made of a pastoral staff carved and covered with gold plates.

The earliest mention of the "staff" among Latin writers appears to be in the letter which was addressed by pope Coelestine (A.D. 423–432) to the bishops of the provinces of Vienne and Narbonne on the subject of episcopal dress (Labbe, Conc. ii.). "By dressing in a cloak (pallium) and putting a girdle round their loins, they think that they shall fulfil the truth of Scripture not in the spirit, but in the letter. For if the precepts in question were given with a view to being kept in such a fashion, why are not the subsequent precepts equally observed by holding burning lamps in the hand as well as a staff."

Amongst the Greek writers there is a mention of the pastoral staff as early as the time of St. Gregory of Nazianzum (cent. 4). He says (Oratio 42): "I know the staff which can support and the one which belongs to pastors and teachers, and which corrects the sheep which have reason."

In the Life of Caesarius, bishop of Arles (A.D. 469–542), written by Cyprian, his pupil, mention is made of the pastoral staff being "borne by his chaplain (notarius)" (Martene de Rit. lib. i. cap. 8, x. 18.) So early as the time of Romanus, archbishop of Rouen about A.D. 623, we find the investiture taking place at the hands of the king by giving the pastoral staff ("Rex .... baculum illi contulit pastoralem").

In modern times a bishop is represented with a crook, an archbishop with a cross or crosier, a patriarch with a cross having two transverse bars, and the pope with a cross of three bars. But there is no appearance of this classification within the epoch embraced by this Dictionary.

The carrying of the crosier before a metropolitan in any place was a token that he claimed jurisdiction there. Hence in later times arose difficulties, when, for example an archbishop of York was not allowed the use of his cross at a coronation (see Archæologia, xvii. 38).

(γ) Abbats and Abbesses.—The proof that in very early days abbats had the staff is found by Barrault (p. 5) in the fact that mention is never made of the staff in the pontifical bulls (of which one is quoted as having been issued by Theodore I. in A.D. 643), granting to abbats the use of episcopal insignia. The gloves, the mitre, the ring, and others are specified, but never the staff. This, Barrault argues, could only be because abbats already had the staff. But whether this be accounted as proof or not, we have explicit mention of the abbat's staff as early as the 7th century. In the Life of St. Gall, who lived in the early part of that century, we have this mention of the abbatial staff of Columban: "Qui et baculum ipsius, quem vulgo Cambottam vocant, per manum diaconi transmiserunt dicentes, Sanctum Abbatem ante transitum suum jussisse ut per hoc notissimum pignus Gallus absolveretur." It appears not to have been till a later period that the privilege of abbats was conceded to abbesses.

The assumption of the staff seems always to have formed part of the ceremonial of investiture in the case of an abbat. It is so mentioned in the penitential of Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury in the 7th century. There are many surviving forms of the ritual employed on these occasions; but with the exception of the passage just quoted, it is not easy to say with certainty that any one of them falls strictly within the limit of time embraced in this work. Several, however, belong certainly to a period not much later; and the investiture with the staff is so generally mentioned in them as to lead to the inference that the usage was already a general and accepted one. Pugin, indeed, observes (Glossary, s. v.) that abbats did not borrow the use of the pastoral staff from the episcopal order, as they afterwards did that of the mitre, but that they had this distinction from the beginning.

(δ) Others.—It does not appear that any other persons commonly used what could be properly called a pastoral staff. Hofmann, however (Lex. Univ. s. v. Baculus), quotes Philostratus as an authority for the use of it by priests in the East. But in the Eastern church there is always a risk of mistaking for an official baton the ordinary sub-axillary staff which even laymen carried to church.

Shape.—Owing to the entire absence of primitive representations, there is no absolute proof that the earliest form of the staff was that of a crook (we know, indeed, that in some cases they terminated in a globe or a cross); but, as Pugin observes, the crook form is exceedingly ancient, and as we have seen above in the case of the lituus, was not unknown amongst the emblems of religion, even in pre-Christian times.

The Catacombs furnish no evidence on the subject. There is indeed a figure of Amachius bearing a curved staff (Buonarroti, Vet. Ant. pl. xviii. p. 128), which might be taken for an example of it, but which is more probably a picture of the augur's rod. The earliest forms of the staff cited by Barrault are those put in the hands of two figures of St. John the Apostle, from a MS. in the British Museum, which (he says, on the authority of the custodians of MSS. in that institution) is a copy of a Spanish MS. that belongs to the era of the Goths. If that be so, it need hardly be said that the representations (which we engrave here) are of immense interest and importance in showing the development of the staff at so distant an epoch.

The second of these figures gives an example of the foliated cross. It will be observed that this staff could not be intended for use as a reclinatorium, because it is the full height of the man himself. Similar representations are found elsewhere—in a MS. of the abbey of Elnon, which is conjectured to belong to the latter part of the 7th century; in the staff of Montreuil-sur-mer (fig. 1A), which local tradition assigns to the abbess St. Austreberths (temp. Clovis II.), and in the ancient carving in the outer wall of the Church of St. Thomas at Strasburg, which is believed to belong to the first half of the 9th century. The extreme antiquity alleged for these monuments will not, perhaps, be accepted with the same confidence in all the several cases, but the details of the Strasburg carving carry upon the face of it the conviction that the date (830) claimed for it (Barrault, p. 22) is not far from the truth.

Independently of the few monuments that have survived, we find that a writer of the time of Charles the Bald (died A.D. 877) could even then speak of the curved staff as an antiquity (Mabillon, Acta SS. Ben. Saec. iii. pt. ii. p. 244).

In the case of the curved staff we can distinguish three constituent parts—the point, the rod, and the crook or volute. The purpose of these several parts was embodied in the line which appears on the staff of St. Saturninus at Toulouse—

["Curva trahit, quos virga regit, pars ultima pungit."

Latin bishops, says Magri, bear a staff curved at the top; Maronite bishops a staff surmounted by a globe and cross (which, it may be observed, is also the form of the staff in the figure of Gregory the Great that is engraved with this article; the globe alone is found in an Anglo-Saxon MS. of the 9th century engraved by Dr. Rock); and Greek bishops carry a staff in the form of a T cross. This form perhaps points to the use of the staff as a support (fulcinatorium). But in the East, where they do not sit in church, secular persons, as well as ecclesiastics, supported themselves at divine service on a staff of this shape.

Material.—The means of judging what materials were employed in primitive times are excessively scanty. It seems, however, to be generally agreed that wood entered into the fabrication of the pastoral staff. Martigny says that in primitive times it was of wood, and he adds that it was of cypress most commonly (Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v. Évêques). It may however, be doubted whether any evidence of the cypress is forthcoming which is of an earlier date than the staff sent to Stephen, bishop of Tournai (cent. 12), and afterwards presented by him to the bishop of Orleans. Staves of wood are cited by Barrault as existing at Montreuil-sur-mer, Ratisbon, the treasury of Cologne, and elsewhere. The same writer states that whilst the rod was of wood, the upper part, whether in the shape of a tau or of a volute, was of a more precious material. Ivory was especially used for the tau-shaped staff. The staff of St. Remigius is an example of early work in precious metal. The so-called staff of St. Augustine (which Gavantus thinks is at Valentia in Spain, while Baronius (in anno 504) places it in Sardinia) is made of ivory. Besides wood, ivory and the precious metals as the material of the pastoral staff, we find mention of horn, brass, iron, lead, and even crystal, both for the volutes and the knobs of the rod. It is possible, however, that the surviving specimens made in base metal were not actually borne, but were merely copies made for interment with a deceased abbat or bishop.

Carving on the Church of St. Thomas at Strasburg. (Barrault.)

A question arises as to whether the right or the left hand held the pastoral staff, or whether either did it indiscriminately. We have seen above in this article that the pastoral staff was not in this respect regulated by the laws of the litus, which had to be held in the right hand. The most common usage, in later representations at least, is for a bishop to hold his staff in the left hand, while he raises the right in the act of benediction. Nor does there appear any reason to suppose that in that solemn act the staff was ever held otherwise than in the left hand. Yet there are many representations of bishops, when not engaged in the act of benediction, holding the staff sometimes in the right and sometimes in the left hand. The truth of the matter appears to be that whilst a bishop in benediction always bore his staff in the left hand, upon any other occasion he was free to hold it in either hand as best suited his pleasure or convenience. The annexed plate (p. 1570), which is extracted from the work of Barrault, is described by him as an abbat blessing his monks. It is of the Carlovingian period, and shews the act of benediction at an early date.

Dr. Rock (Church of our Fathers, vol. ii.) has verified a large number of ancient representations, and they fail to bear out the alleged rule either in regard to holding the staff always in the left hand, or in regard to the volute having any particular direction.

It remains only to add that as the giving of the staff was a ceremonial of investiture (De Marca de Conc. Eccl. et Imp.), so the surrender of it was the token of abdication, and the breaking of it was that of deposition. By the fourth council of Toledo (cent. 7) it was ordained that in the restoration of a deposed bishop the baculus should be placed in his hand (can. 28). See Thomassin, Discipline, pt. 2, lib. i. c. 23, s. 7.

In the Celtic Church.—The staff of the bishop and also, at a later date, of the abbat, was the Bachal or Bachuil, and Cambata of the Latinised Celtic church, which frequently appears in the legends of her saints. Thus St. Kentigern and St. Columba exchanged their staves at parting on the banks of the Melendinor (Vita S. Kent, c. 40), and St. Columba on another occasion gave his staff (Mor Bachall) to Scanlann, prince of Osnory (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 433). The Bachall mor of St. Moloc is preserved at Inverary Castle, Argyleshire, and the Quigrich of St. Fillan has lately been returned from Canada and placed in the Antiquarian Museum, Edinburgh. The staves or croziers of St. Mun, St. Fergus, and St. Donnan, after having been preserved at Kilmure, Argyleshire, at St. Fergus, and at Auchterless, both in Aberdeenshire, and used (certainly the last) for superstitious purposes, are lost with that of St. Serf, and with the Bachall Isa of St. Patrick. But though the Quigrich of St. Fillan is rich in design and workmanship (Wilson, Prehist. Ann. Scot. 664 sq.; Proc. Soc. Ant. Scot. xii. 122 sq.) and the Bachal mor of St. Moloc bears traces of a metal covering, the original staves of the saints appear to have been of the plainest description, without a volute and having only a slightly curved head; while it is only the veneration of later ages which has ornamented them with the precious metals and jewels, and carvings of elaborate design. Many of these staves have been carefully preserved, or in later days found, in Ireland, and are to be met with in public and private collections of antiquities, some plain but others richly decorated (Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. viii. 330; Proc. Soc. Ant. Scot. ii. 12 sq. xi. 59; Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 2nd ser. 182–3; Reeves, St. Adamnan, 366–7; Killen, *Ch. Hist. PATEN (Latin, patena; Greek, δίσκος). The wide and shallow vessel in which the bread for the Eucharist is placed and consecrated.

Patens must have been in use from the earliest time, when any formal ritual was established, and no doubt, as was the case with the chalice, the primitive paten differed in little or nothing from a vessel of domestic use; and until the primitive practice of employing the cakes of bread brought as oblations by the congregation was superseded by that of using wafers made expressly, patens were often of large size. Such were the patens weighing from twenty to thirty pounds each which are mentioned in the Liber Pontificalis as given by various popes in the 4th, 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries (v. Lives of popes Mark, Hormisdas, Sergius and Gregory III.).

According to Bona (Rerum Liturgicarum I. xxv. 3) these large patens were ministeriales, and were not used by the priest celebrating, but only in distribution to the people.

Patenæ chrismales are also mentioned which, according to Bona, were "ad usum baptismatis et confirmationis," but very little would appear to be known as to their use.

It is obvious from what has been said above that patens in the larger churches were in the earlier ages often of great size. Roman silver was extremely massive, but patens weighing 25 lbs. must have been of very considerable dimensions. A modern circular salver 15 inches in diameter may weigh about 5 lbs., and the size of those weighing 20 and 25 lbs. may thence be roughly inferred to have been not less than 2 feet to 2½ feet in diameter, if circular, and very probably much more. If the material were gold, the size would of course be much smaller. Many, doubtless, were much less. The golden paten (if it be one) found at Gourdon measures about 7½ inches by 5½ inches, and the circular paten found in Siberia measures 7 inches in diameter.

Patens were probably usually circular; two so formed are shewn on an altar in a mosaic in S. Vitale in Ravenna, the building of which church was commenced in A.D. 547. In S. Apollinare ad Classem, near the same city, a building of about the same date, two objects, which it would seem are intended for patens, are of a sexfoil shape (Webb, Continental Ecclesiology, p. 440). One octagonal in form is said in the Liber Pontificalis to have been given by pope Gregory IV. (A.D. 827–844) to the church of S. Maria in Via Lata in Rome; mention is made in the same work of a covered paten of gold weighing 25 lbs. which pope Leo III. gave to the church of St. Peter. That of Gourdon is oblong in form, from which fact it has been doubted whether it was really a paten.

The material was most commonly silver, but not unfrequently gold; e.g. the Byzantine emperor Michael sent to pope Nicholas I. "Patenam ex auro purissimo cum diversis lapidibus pretiosis, albis, prasinis et hyacinthinis" (Lib. Pontif. in vita Nicholai). Pope Zepherinus (A.D. 203–221) is said in the Lib. Pontif. to have ordered that patens of glass should be borne before the priests in the churches when masses were celebrated. They were not unfrequently formed of this material. Gregory of Tours (de Mirac. S. Martini, lib. 4, c. 10) mentions a paten of a sapphire colour, which doubtless was of glass; and the "sacro catino" at Genoa of green glass, which, through the middle ages was supposed to be an emerald, may very possibly have been a paten; it is hexagonal. Cav. de Rossi has given engravings (Boll. di Arch. Crist. 1864, p. 80, fig. 5) of fragments found at Cologne of a glass vessel almost a foot in diameter which he believes to have served as a paten; and another almost entire exists in the Slade collection in the British Museum (Cat. of Slade Coll. p. 50), which was originally about 10 inches in diameter; this was also found at Cologne, and may perhaps be assigned to the 4th or 5th century; the decoration of these vessels is described below. In the treasury of St. Mark at Venice are two or three shallow basins of glass, which have probably been used as patens; they are, however, possibly later in date than the period embraced by this work. Other materials were sometimes used; in the same treasury is a Byzantine paten of alabaster, about 13½ inches in diameter, and several shallow vesels, probably once used as patens, of agate, sardonyx, or other semi-precious stones, handsomely mounted in silver gilt with inserted gems. It is impossible to affix precise dates to most of these, but if they do not belong to the period treated of in these volumes, we can no doubt form from them correct ideas as to the forms, sizes, and decorations of patens during some centuries antecedent to A.D. 1204, about which time they were probably brought from Constantinople to Venice with the other spoil obtained when that city was taken by the Crusaders.

As the vessels used in the earliest times as patens were either actually such as had served domestic uses or, as in the case of chalices, were formed upon the same models, and as the Christians of the earlier ages undoubtedly were in the habit of ornamenting their domestic utensils with crosses and other religious symbols, it is often a matter of much difficulty to distinguish between vessels which were and which were not intended to be used exclusively in the rites of the church. Thus it has been doubted by that eminent authority, Padre Garrucci, whether the golden vessel found at Gourdon, and shewn in the accompanying woodcut, was intended to be used as a paten, although it is decorated with a cross. His chief reason for the doubt is its form, there being, he thinks, no instance known of a paten thus shaped. As, however, the form would be by no means inconvenient, and as we have an instance, as mentioned above, of an octagonal paten, the objection does not seem decisive. We have but few examples of early patens, and it seems quite possible that some may have had this oblong form, one not uncommon in Roman silver vessels, for secular examples, probably of the 5th century, may be seen in the British Museum, and the Corbridge Lanx is an earlier instance. In favour of the supposition that it was actually a paten, it may be remarked that it was found with a chalice (v. CHALICE), and that the centre has a cross which is in slight relief, a circumstance which would seem to make it ill-suited for the ordinary purposes of domestic life. That patens were so decorated, we may learn from the passage in the Liber Pontif., where we are told that pope Sergius (A.D. 687–701) gave to the Vatican Basilica "patenam auream majorem habentem gemmas albas et in medio ex hyacintho et smaragdo crucem"). It was found with coins of the earlier part of the 6th century, but may perhaps be still older. The octagonal paten alluded to above was decorated in the centre with the head of our Lord, having on the one side the head of St. Mark, and on the other that of pope Gregory IV., the donor.

Paten found in Siberia. (De Rossi's Bullettino di Archaeologia Cristiana, 1871, pl. ix. fig. 1)

The paten shewn in the other cut is of silver gilt, and was found in one of the Berozovoy isles in Siberia, in the year 1867; it weighs about a pound and a half, and measures about 6 inches in diameter. Cav. de Rossi (Boll. di Ant. Crist. 1871, p. 153) is of opinion that it is of Byzantine origin, and dates probably from about the 7th century.

The paten of alabaster mentioned above has in the centre a medallion with a half-length figure of our Lord in cloisonné enamel; on another, also in the treasury of St. Mark's (of agate or sardonyx?) is a similar medallion, with the words, λάβετε φάγετε τοῦτό μου ἐστι τὸ σωμα. These may perhaps be assigned to the 10th or 11th century.

The paten of glass found at Cologne, of which only fragments remain, was of clear uncoloured glass ornamented by three concentric circles of medallions of blue transparent glass of varying dimensions. The larger of these are decorated with figures, the smaller with rosettes, all executed by the application of gold leaf, which has been removed except where required to form the figures, which were then completed by a few lines marking out the features, folds of drapery, and other details. The subjects of these medallions are chiefly Biblical—Adam and Eve, the story of Jonah, that of Daniel, the sacrifice of Isaac, &c. In most cases only one figure is to be found in each medallion. The centre was probably occupied by a figure of the Good Shepherd, symbolizing our Lord.

Glass Paten found at Cologne.

The paten of glass mentioned above as being in the Slade collection in the British Museum is decorated with gold leaf by the same method, and with enamelling in blue, green, and red; but the subjects are not in medallions, but arranged, as will be seen in the woodcut, in eight compartments, divided by slender columns. The subjects of these are—Jonah coming out of the whale, and in the background, reclining under the gourd, Jonah thrown overboard; the paralytic man carrying his bed; the Nativity; the sacrifice of Isaac, or perhaps, more probably, the baptism of our Lord; the three Hebrew youths in the furnace; and Daniel in the lions' den. Of the centre, small fragments only remain, but on them may be distinguished a figure of an animal, apparently a sheep, and the letters EO . . . DULCI. The subject was, there can be no doubt, the Good Shepherd.

Another vessel of glass, which may very probably have served as a paten, is in the collection of M. Basilewsky at Paris. It has been figured and described twice in Cav. de Rossi's Bullettino (1874, p. 153; 1877, p. 77), and will be treated of a third time in the same publication. It would appear to be 9 inches in diameter, and is a shallow dish. De Rossi does not call it a paten, but a "piatto"; the central subject, Abraham about to sacrifice Isaac, seems, however, one very appropriate to a paten. Round the central subject are the following subjects: the history of Jonah; the temptation of Adam; the raising of Lazarus; a figure striking a tree, whence issues water; Daniel in the lions' den; the three Hebrew youths in the furnace; and Susanna and the elders. The subjects are accompanied by inscriptions, which contain many irregularities, e.g. Abraham occurs in place of Adam, and that attached to the figure striking the tree reads, "Petrus virga percuit." The lines of the engraving are scratchy and irregular and apparently done with a diamond point. The art is of the lowest order, but Cav. de Rossi thinks that the date may be circa A.D. 400 ("tra il quarto e il quinto secolo"). It was found in Podgorn[illegible] the ancient Doclea, in Dalmatia.

Occasionally patens bore inscriptions commemorating the donor, or containing mention of the church to which they belonged. One of silver, of the 5th or 6th century, which belonged to the Vatican Basilica, has been illustrated by Fontanini (Discus Argenteus votivus veterum Christianorum, Romae, 1726).

As ancient examples of patens are so uncommon, it is desirable in illustration of the subject to mention examples in which they are represented in works of art of early date. Repres-tations in early art of liturgical or ritual acts are of the greatest rarity, and few can be found in which the celebration of the Eucharist is represented. One of these, that in which Melchisedek is represented as if officiating at an altar, in a mosaic in the church of S. Apollinare ad Classem at Ravenna, has been already adverted to. On the paliotto of the high altar of S. Ambrogio at Milan, in the panel in which the saint is represented at the altar, no paten at all is shewn, but four small round cakes, perhaps 3 to 4 inches wide, disposed in a cruciform order, and marked with two lines crossing each other. This monument dates from A.D. 835. In the Public Library at Frankfort on the Main is preserved a piece of carved ivoryformed like the half of a diptych, which probably once formed part of the binding of some service book, from a part of which the annexed cut, representing an archbishop celebrating mass, is taken. The carver may be supposed to have intended to represent a paten about 6 inches in diameter. This carving is probably of the 9th century.

The last example to be noticed is, although of early date, not within the limit of this work; but some mention of it should be made. It is the group which forms part of the embroidery of the dalmatic called that of pope Leo III., but which probably dates from a period not far from A.D. 1200, and is of Byzantine work. In this our Lord is represented as standing behind an altar, and extending to one of His apostles, with His right hand, a loaf or cake of bread, circula. in form, and indented by two lines crossing each other, while he holds another similar cake in his left hand. On the altar stands a paten, a circular vessel with upright sides, and less shallow than patens would seem to have usually been; in proportion to the figures, its diameter would seem to be about 12 inches, and its depth about 4 inches. In it are two small circles, andt wo cakes, each composed of four circles of the size of the lesser ones. The best engravings of this dalmatic are those given in the Kleinodien heil. Röm. Reiches. [A. N.]

PATRIARCH (Πατριάρχης, patriarcha). The title patriarch seems to have been introduced into the Christian church from the later organization of the Jews. In pre-Christian times the πατριὰ was a subdivision of the tribe (e.g. 1 Esdr. i. 4; ii. 7), and one of the titles of the heads of these subdivisions was πατριάρχης (e.g. 2 Chron. xxiii. 20, where some MSS. have ἑκατοντάρχους: conversely in 1 Chron. ix. 9 the usual reading is ἄρχοντες πατριῶν, and that of some MSS. πατριάρχαι); the same title seems also to have been sometimes given to the head of the tribe itself, 1 Chron. xxvii. 22. How far the tribal organization survived the dispersion is not clear; but as the same title is found under the empire to designate the heads of Jewish communities, or confederations of communities, it is probable that the later use was a continuation of the earlier. The first mention of these later πατριάρχαι is probably in a letter of Hadrian, quoted by Vopiscus (Vit. Saturnin. c. 2); they are also mentioned by Origen (Comm. in Psalm. vol. ii. p. 514, ed. Delarue), by Eusebius (Comm. in Isai. c. 3, Migne, P. G. vol. xxiv. 109), by Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. 12, 17), but more particularly by Epiphanius (i. 30, p. 128), who implies that the office was one of considerable dignity. They are also mentioned in the civil law—e.g. Cod. Theodos. 16, 8, 1, 2, 11, 13; but from Cod. Theodos. 16, 8, 29, and Theodoret, Eranistes, op. vol. iv. p. 32, ed. Schulze, Migne, P. G. vol. lxxxiii. 61, it appears that in the first quarter of the 5th century the office came to an end. (On these Jewish patriarchs, see Gothofredus, ad Cod. Theodos. ll. cc.; Wesseling de Judæorum archontibus, c. 10, reprinted in Ugolini's Thesaurus, vol. xxiv.; Walch, Historia Patriarcharum Judæorum quorum in libris juris Romani fit mentio, Jenae, 1752; Zornius, de Patriarcharum Judæorum auro coronario, reprinted in Ugolini's Thesaurus, vol. xxvi.)

The title seems to have been in use in the Christian church before its extinction among the Jews. The earliest references to it are vague; nor is it clear in what sense it was used, or to whom it was restricted. Basil (Epist. 169, vol. iv. p. 258), writing to Gregory Nazianzen about the deacon Glycerius, says that, despising his presbyter and his chorepiscopus, he had invested himself with the name and dress of the patriarchate, by which must probably be meant the episcopate. Gregory of Nyssa (Orat. funebr. in Melet. Antioch., Migne, P. G. vol. xlvi. 853) uses it in a rhetorical passage of all the bishops who were assembled at the council of Constantinople. Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. xlii. p. 764) appears to use it as a term specially applicable to senior bishops, πρεσβυτέρων ἐπισκόπων οἰκειότερον δὲ πατριαρχῶν, a use which is confirmed by its use in Isidore of Pelusium (Epist. 2, 47, Migne, P. G. vol. lxxviii. 489). But whether it was at any time applied, except metaphorically, to all bishops is very doubtful, though it was occasionally applied to bishops who would not have been called patriarchs in either of the technical senses which the word came ultimately to bear.

(1) In its most important use the title has been confined to the bishops of the five sees of Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. This use grew out of the general tendency to frame the higher organization of the church on the lines which were furnished by the empire. The gradations of rank between bishop and bishop, which corresponded to the gradations of rank between city and city of the same province, came to exist between metropolis and metropolis of the greater divisions of the empire. At the time of the council of Nicaea the great divisions of the East were the four dioeceses, Oriens, Pontica, Asiana, Thraciae (this appears from the Veronese MS. which is published by Mommsen, Abhandlung d. Berlin. Academie, 1862, p. 491). Each of these dioeceses was divided into provinces (ἐπαρχίαι), and each province had one or more metropolis (e.g. in the province of Asia, Ephesus, Sardes, Smyrna, and Pergamum were all called μητροπόλεις; the references in proof are given in Marquardt, Römische Staatsverwaltung, Bd. i. p. 186). Egypt was at this time part of the dioecesis Orientis, but the sixth canon of the council anticipates the later civil organization by recognizing it as an independent ecclesiastical division, and subjecting to the bishop of Alexandria not only the bishops of Egypt, but also those of Pentapolis and Libya. There were thus in the East five great confederations of churches, each of which was independent of the other; in the West the see of Rome stood alone in its supremacy. In the following century the council of Chalcedon, c. 28, took away the ecclesiastical independence of the dioeceses of Pontus, Asia, and Thrace, and subjected them to the see of Constantinople, thus reducing the number of sees of the highest rank to Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, with which the see of Jerusalem was reckoned, extra ordinem. This action of the council of Chalcedon was vigorously protested against by the Roman delegates, Leo the Great rejected it, and the 28th canon is not inserted in the authorized Latin versions of the acts of the council (see the Actio Sextadecima of the council in Mansi, vol. iv. p. 379; S. Leon. M. Epist. 94 (35), vol. i. p. 1198 d; Epist. 119 (92), vol. i. p. 1215).

But it is remarkable that although the title "patriarch" was not unfrequently given to the bishops of these sees in contemporary extra-conciliar literature, and became in later times their ordinary official appellation, it does not occur in the canons of any of the councils of the first eight centuries; nor is it confined exclusively to them until the time, probably the 9th century, at which earliest Notitiae were compiled. In extra-conciliar literature, it is given (a) to the bishop of Rome, e.g. by Cyril of Alexandria, Homil. Divers. 11, ap. Migne, Patrol. Graec. vol. lxxvii. 1040, by the emperor Theodosius, Epist. ad Gall. Placid. ap. S. Leon. M. Epist. 63, vol. i. p. 989, and by Justinian Contra Monophysitas, ap. Mai, Script. Vet. vol. vii. p. 304; in later times, Hrabanus Maurus addresses the pope as "primus patriarcha per orbem," Commendatio Papae prefixed to the treatise De Laudibus S. Crucis, ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. cvii. 139. (b) It is given to the bishop of Constantinople in the civil law, e.g. Justin. Novell. 3; but the assumption of the title "Oecumenical Patriarch" (ὁ οἰκουμενικὸς πατριάρχης, perhaps first by Mennas in a synodical letter of the council of Constantinople in 536, Mansi, vol. viii. p. 959, and frequently afterward, e.g. C. I. G. No. 8685), raised a strong protest in the West (S. Greg. M. Epist. 5, 43, p. 773; Pelag. II. Decret. ad Universos Episcopos. ap. Hinschius, p. 721), and even before the final separation of the Eastern and Western churches led to the omission of the name of Constantinople from the list of "primae sedes" (see e.g. the Praefatio Nicaeni Concilii in Quesnel's Codex Canon. Eccles. printed in the Ballerini edition of S. Leo M. vol. iii. p. 22; the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals, Anaclet. Epist. 3, ap. Hinschius, p. 82; hence in Hincmar Remens. Opusc. in Causa Hincmar. Haeres. lib. 2, c. 4, in the Ballerini edition of St. Leo, vol. ii. p. 471, and Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. lv. 1251). (c) It is given to the bishop of Alexandria, e.g. by Justinian contra Monophysitas, ap. Mai, Script. Vet. vol. vii. p. 309, and by Gregory the Great, Epist. 5, 43, p. 770; for the later history of this patriarchate, see Neale, History of the Holy Eastern Church, Patriarchate of Constantinople; Renaudot, Liturg. Orientl, vol. i.; Vansleb, Histoire de l'Église d'Alexandrie; Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium. (d) It is given to the bishop of Antioch, e.g. by Gregory the Great, Epist. i. 26, p. 516, and in an interesting inscription of the 7th century, now at Oxford, Corpus Inscr. Graec. No. 8987, in which Macarius is called πατριάρχης τῆς μεγάλης θεοῦ πόλεως Ἀντιοχείας καὶ πάσης ἀνατολῆς, i.e. of the Dioecesis Orientis. For the Jacobite Patriarchs who claim to continue the succession of the patriarchate of Antioch, see Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium; Gregor. Barhebr. Nomocan. 7, 3, ap. Mai, Script. Vet. vol. x. pars 2; and the posthumous fragment of Neale's History of the Holy Eastern Church, edited by G. Williams. (e) It is given to the bishop of Jerusalem, e.g. in Justin. Epist. ad Episcop. Constantin. degentes, A.D. 536, ap. Mansi, vol. ix. 178.

(2) The title was also given to the bishop of the metropolis of a civil dioecesis; i. e. of a division of the empire consisting of several provinces. In Conc. Chalc. c. 9, such a bishop is called ἔξαρχος; but (a) Justin. (Novell. 123, c. 22), in referring to this canon, speaks of the same officer as a patriarch; (b) an ancient scholium on the same canon ap. Pitra (Jur. Eccl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 645) says, ἔξαρχον διοικήσεως καλεῖ τὸν πατριάρχην ἑκάστης διοικήσεως, and Zonaras ad loc. ap. Migne, Patr. Gr. vol. cxxxvii. p. 420, also mentions this interpretation; (c) Evagrius, H. E. 3, 6, p. 340, probably following the contemporary writer Zacharias Rhetor, speaks of the right of which c. 28 of the same council deprived Ephesus, and which Timotheus Aelurus temporarily restored to it, as τὸ πατριαρχικὸν δίκαιον. It was hence sometimes given to any metropolitan who had other metropolitans under him; e. g. to the bishop of Thessalonica, as head of the vicariate of Macedonia, Theodorus Lector, p. 586, ed. Vales. ap. Migne, Patr. Gr. vol. lxxxviii. 217 (the status, although not the title, is recognised by S. Leo M. Epist. 6 (4) ad Anastas. Thessalon. vol. i. p. 621; Theophanes, Chron. p. 139, quoting this passage, and knowing only the later use of the title, thinks this use of it to be erroneous); to the bishop of Theopolis (Prusa) in the acts of the council of Constantinople in A.D. 536, ap. Mansi, vol. ix. pp. 191, 206; to the bishop of Bourges (as having beneath him not only his own proper province of Aquitania Prima, but also Narbonensis with its metropolis Narbonne, and Aquitania Secunda with its capital Bordeaux), Nicol. I. Epist. 19 ad Rudolph. Bituric. A.D. 864, ap. Mansi, vol. xv. p. 390, = Epist. 64 ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. cxix. 884; Desider. Cadurc. Epist. 12 ad Sulpit. Bituric. ap. Canisii Thesaurus, vol. i. p. 64; to the bishop of Lyons, 2 Conc. Matisc. A.D. 585, præf., S. Greg. Turon. H. . . 5, 21, Petr. Venerab. Epitaph. Rainald. Lugdun. ap. Migne, Pat. Lat. vol. clxxxix. 1022. But its use in this sense was ultimately superseded in the West by the use of the title "primate" [PRIMATE]. The two titles are identified in the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals, e. g. Clement. Epist. i. c. 28; Anaclet. Epist. ii. c. 26, Epist. iii. c. 29; Zepherin. Epist. 2; Annic. Epist. c. 3.

(A passage of Socrates, H. E. 5, i. seems to point to a third use of the title. In his account of the council of Constantinople in A.D. 381 he not only says that it constituted patriarchs, but also gives their names: six of them are metropolitans, but one of them, Gregory of Nyssa, is not even a metropolitan. It may be inferred from this, and from a comparison with the similar account in Cod. Theodos. 16, 1, 2; Sozom. H. E. 7, 9. that the dignity thus conferred was temperary and personal, giving a supremacy to the particular bishops named which did not attach to their sees, and which had reference primarily to the current controversy. But the text of the passage is not certain; some old versions of it, e. g. in Cassiodorus, Hisp. Tripart. 9, 13, Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. lxix. 1129, represent Gregory of Nyssa as having been transferred to Caesarea, in which case the word may perhaps be taken as equivalent to metropolitan.)

Outside the limits of the Catholic church of the Roman organization, it was the title of the head of the Montanist hierarchy, S. Hieron. Epist. 41 (54) ad Marcell. vol. i. p. 189 ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. xxii. 476; it was adopted as the designation of their chief bishop by the Vandals, Vict. Vitens. de Persec. Vandal. 2, 5, p. 15; it appears to have been similarly adopted under the Lombard kings of Italy, and hence the bishops of Aquileia, and afterwards of New Aquileia (Grado), were called patriarchs, Paul. Diacon. de Gestis Langobard. 2, 10, ap. Migne, Patr. PATRON. There are no traces in the early church of any considerable departure from the mode of appointment to ecclesiastical office which has been described elsewhere [ORDINATION]. The people or the clergy presented to the bishop the person whom they had elected: the bishop had the right of examining him in order to ascertain whether he fulfilled the requisite conditions, and of declaring the election to be complete. The person so elected ministered in the midst of the community which had elected him, and as a coadjutor of the bishop who had admitted him to office. Even when outlying districts came to have churches of their own, which had not a complete organisation, but were dependent upon the church of the neighbouring city, the same system continued without substantial change. The first modification of that system arose from the practice, which was at first encouraged more in the East than in the West, of building places of worship on country estates for the benefit of those who resided upon such estates: (see the eloquent appeal of Chrysostom to landowners, Hom. 18 in Act. Apost. c. 5, Op. ed. Migne, vol. ix. 147). So different were these places of worship in both their origin and their purpose from the churches of ordinary Christian communities, that the ordinary internal organization of such churches seemed inapplicable to them. They were neither disciplinary nor eleemosynary, and consequently had no need of either the officers of discipline or the officers of almsgiving. They were not always within the territorium (χώρα) of any city, and in such cases were as much outside the jurisdiction of the bishop of a city as the estates upon which they were built were outside the jurisdiction of the municipal magistrates. The owners of the estates consequently claimed an absolute control over them. Nor does there appear to have been in the first instance any interference with such control. It is not until the 6th century, and even then not in canon but in civil law, that any enactments are found on the subject. Probably in the interests of orthodox belief, Justinian enacted on the one hand that no church or oratory should be erected without the consent of the bishop or without a sufficient endowment (Novell. 67), and on the other hand that the founders of churches should not appoint clerks to minister in a church without first presenting them to the bishop for examination (Novell. 57, c. 2). Almost the only other eastern regulation is that of the Trullan Council, which virtually repeats the second of these regulations, and in doing so shews by implication that it had come to be disregarded (Conc. Trull. c. 31). [ORATORIUM.]

In the West the canons of Spanish and Gallican councils shew that the respective rights of the owners of estates and the bishops of neighbouring cities were subjects of frequent dispute. The earliest regulation is that of the first council of Orange (1 Conc. Arausic. A.D. 441, c. 10) which enacts that if a bishop has built a church upon an estate belonging to him which lies within the territory of another bishop, he shall have the right of nominating clerks for that church, but that the actual appointment of such clerks, and also the dedication of the church, shall rest with the bishop of the territory. This enactment implies that in a similar case a layman had no absolute right of nomination, but that the bishop within whose territory the church was built could either accept or refuse the clerks whom the founder wished to appoint. A century later, within the Frankish domain, and after Teutonic conceptions of the rights of the owners of land had entered with the Franks into Gaul, the fourth Council of Orleans passed a series of enactments, the tenor of which shews that the owners of estates upon which churches were built claimed large powers over such churches: it enacts that those who build them are to endow them with sufficient lands, and appoint a sufficient number of clerks; that they are not to appoint such clerks against the will of the bishop "ad quem territorii ipsius privilegium noscitur pertinere;" and that the clerks, when appointed, are to be amenable to ecclesiastical discipline, and not to be impeded by the owner of the estate or his agents in the discharge of their ecclesiastical duties (4 Conc. Aurelian. A.D. 541, c. 7, 26, 33). But in the 7th century the council of Châlons-sur-Saône makes it clear that the owners of such estates had again asserted a right both to appoint and to govern their clerks, independently of the bishop, and enacts that this usage is to be reformed, so as to give both the ordination of clerks and the disposal of the revenues of oratories to the bishop (Conc. Cabill. A.D. 650, c. 14). None of these or any other Gallican canons deal expressly with the case of ordinary parish churches; and this must probably be taken as negative evidence in favour of the supposition that the primitive usage had not been altered. There is, however, a Spanish canon which gives to the builder, and apparently to the restorer, of a parish church the right of presenting clerks to the bishop for ordination, and disallows any ordination which is made by the bishop to such a church in defiance of the founder's nomination (9 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 655, c. 2); but the absence of any mention of heirs in this canon, coupled with the express mention of them in the preceding canon, establishes a presumption that the right of nomination was personal to the founder, and did not descend to his heirs. With the exception of this canon, there is no evidence of the recognition in the Western church before Carolingian times, of any right on the part either of a founder or of any other person to nominate clerks to a parish church; (the instance quoted in the canon law, Gratian, Decret. pars ii. caus. 16, quaest. 1, 31, and ascribed to pope Pelagius, is clearly of much later date).

The policy of the popes from the time of Gregory the Great was even more decidedly in the same direction. That pope, writing to Felix of Messina, requests him to consecrate a church which has been built upon private property, if he finds that it has been sufficiently endowed, but expressly denies to the founder any rights, except the right of admission to service, "which is due to all Christians in common" (S. Greg. M. Epist. ii. 5, ad Felic. Messan.). This letter, which was afterwards ascribed to Gelasius (Append. ad Epist. Gelasii Papae, ap. Mansi, vol. viii. 133, Migne, P. L. vol. lix. 148), became the basis of the canon law on the subject (Gratian, Decret. pars ii. caus. 16, quaest. 7, 26), and its substance is embodied in the form of petition which is given in the Liber Diurnus for the consecration of an oratory (c. 5, 3, p. 92, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. cv. 88). In order still further to secure churches erected on private estates from interference on the part of the owners of the estates, and to prevent, as it were by anticipation, the abuses to which the later system of patronage gave rise, Gregory, although he required an endowment for such churches, declined to allow presbyters to be permanently appointed to them: they were to be served by presbyters sent by the bishop from time to time (S. Greg. M. Epist. ii. 12 ad Castor. Arimin., ix. 70 et xii. 12 ad Passiv. Firman., ix. 84 ad Benen. Tundarit., cf. Mabillon, Comm. Praev. in Ord. Rom. in Mus. Ital. vol. ii. p. 19; the rule is also found in a fragment printed by Holsten, Coll. Rom. vol. i. p. 234, and Migne, P. L. vol. lxix. 414, and ascribed, without sufficient ground, to pope Pelagius). And a century and a-half afterwards, immediately before the great change which we are about to describe, pope Zachary lays down a similar rule in almost identical terms: (S. Zachar. Epist. 8 ad Pippin. c. 15, ap. Migne, P. L. lxxxix. 935, xcviii. 87, Codex Carolinus ed. Jaffé, p. 26; in contrast to this may be noted the later policy which disallows "presbyteros conductitios" where a church has funds enough to have "proprium sacerdotem:" Conc. Remens. c. 9, sub Innocent. II. A.D. 1131, ap. Mansi, vol. xxi. 460).

But although these earlier relations of founders or owners of churches to the clergy cannot properly be passed over, they are essentially distinct from, although they have often been confused with, the later system of patronage. That system is an outgrowth of feudalism. Both the name and the thing belong to the Frankish domain, and to the period of the Carolingians. At that period the church had become the greatest landowner in Gaul: it has been computed that a third of all the real property in Gaul belonged to it: (for some particulars, see e.g. Roth, Geschichte des Beneficialwesens, p. 248 sqq. Erlangen, 1850). From time to time laymen had been allowed to have the usufruct of some of these lands, on condition of paying an annual rent to the churches to which they severally belonged. In the troubled times of Charles Martel and his sons (Roth. p. 315, and appendix v., combats the common view which is defended by Waitz, that it was under Charles Martel himself: see Hegel in von Sybil's Zeitschrift, Bd. 5, 227), this use of church lands became almost a necessity of state. In a capitulary of A.D.743 (Capit. Liftin. ap. Pertz, M. H. G. Legum, vol. i. p. 18; Gengler, Germänische Rechtsdenkmäler, p. 601), it is enacted that some part of the church lands shall be for a time appropriated to the crown as an assistance to the army ("at sub precario et censu aliquam partem ecclesialis pecuniae in adjutorium exercitus nostra cum indulgentia Dei aliquanto tempore retineamus"). The lands so appropriated were assigned as "beneficia," i.e. as revocable and conditional grants to individual soldiers. The system of appropriation soon became general and the appropriations when general also tended to become permanent. Not long after his conquest of the Lombards, Charles the Great confirmed previous beneficiary grants of church lands, reserving only to the king himself the right of recalling them (Capit. Langobard. A.D. 779, c. 14, ap. Pertz, i. 38). A certain revenue was reserved to the church: in the capitulary of 743, it was fixed at one "solidus" for each "casata" or homestead: afterwards it became a fixed proportion of the produce, usually a ninth or a tenth (whence the later system of "tithes"). The holder of such a benefice was entitled senior, dominus, or patronus. The modern "patron" of a church living thus preserves the name as well as some of the functions of a feudal "lord." (The identity of "patronus" with "dominus" and "senior" in this sense is shewn (1) by the convertibility of "dominus" and "patronus" in the civil law, e.g. in the text and title of a law of Valentinian and Valens in A.D. 365, Cod. Theodos. 5, 11, 1; (2) by express later statements, especially Ratherius Veronens. Praeloquia, lib. i. tit. 10, ed. Ballerini, p. 28, ed. Migne P. L. vol. cxxvi. 165, "patronus, sive ut usitatius a multis dici ambitur, senior es": this use of patronus has descended to modern times in the Italian padrone. See also Waitz, Die deutsche Reichsverfassung, Bd. ii. 40).

It was not long before the ecclesiastical duties for the performance of which the lands had originally been intended to provide were regarded as subordinate to the general privileges of the ownership of land. The lesser lords followed in the wake of the king. Just as the latter claimed a supreme right of nominating to bishoprics and abbeys (see e. g. Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, Bd. 2, 205; Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte, Bd. iii. 196, 354; id. Deutsche Reichsverfassung, Bd. iii. 194; Friedberg in Zeitschrift f. Kirchenrecht, Bd. iii. 70), and also a right to determine who should be presented to churches upon the crown lands (Karol. M. Capit. de Villis, A.D. 812, c. 6; Pertz, vol. i. 181), so also the former asserted the right of both nominating and dismissing the clerks of churches which were within their fiefs. The ancient right of the people to elect tended to disappear before the claim of the beneficiary holder of church lands, in the same kind of way as, in England, one township after another became the manor of a feudal lord. Within little more than half a century after the death of Charles Martel, this tendency had become so strong that not only the people but also the bishop was ignored. Charles the Great strongly interfered to support the rights of the bishops; he wrote in a tone of indignant rebuke to those who were guilty of the "immoderate presumption" of refusing to present presbyters to bishops, and daring to appoint to parishes without their bishop's consent (Karoli M. Edictum pro Episcopis, ap. Pertz, vol. i. 81, and Jaffé, Monumenta Carolina, p. 371). But the frequency of the enactments in the early part of the 9th century, against the practice of omitting to obtain the sanction of the bishop in appointments to parishes, shews that that practice was neither uncommon nor lightly abandoned; e. g. Karoli M. Capit. Genera e Aquense, A.D. 802, c. 13, "Ut nullus ex laicis presbiterum vel diaconem seu clericum secum habere praesumat vel ad ecclesias suas ordinare absque licentiam seu examinatione episcopi sui"; Conc. Moguntt. A.D. 813, c. 29, 30, ap. Mansi, vol. xiv. 72; 6 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 813, c. 4, 5, ap. Mansi, vol. xiv. 59; Excerpt. Canon. 2 ap. Pertz, vol. i. 189; 2 Conc. Cabill. A.D. 813, c. 42; 3 Conc. Turon. A.D. 817, c. 9, ap. Pertz, vol. i. 207. (6 Conc. Paris, A.D. 820, lib. 1, c. 22, ap. Mansi, vol. xiv. 554, and Constit. Wormat. c. 15, ap. Pertz, vol. i. 337, protect a patron against a bishop by requiring "diligens examinatio et evidens ratio" on the part of the bishop before the rejection of a clerk.)

It is important to note, although the subject cannot be pursued at length within the limits of the present work, that the usurpations of the beneficiary holders of church lands, and of the other feudal lords within whose domains churches were situated, were not limited to the usurpation of the right of appointment of clerks. They began to claim a share of those funds which were left to the churches after the alienation of their lands. In doing so they were supported by the state. Charles the Great directed the bishops to determine what tribute presbyters should pay for their churches to their lords (Capit. de Presbyteris, A.D. 809, c. 3, ap. Pertz, vol. i. 161, "Ut episcopi praevideant quem honorem presbyteri pro ecclesiis senioribus tribuant;" and Lewis the Pious, after specifying the amount of land which parish presbyters might hold free, enacted that if they had more, they should pay "debitum servitium senioribus suis" (Hludowic I. Capit. A.D. 817, c. 10, ap. Pertz, vol. i. 209). A later decretal, falsely attributed to pope Damasus, which is incorporated in the corpus of canon law, speaks with reprobation of the growing custom of laymen claiming part of the oblations which were offered in church (Gratian, Decret. pars ii. c. 10, quaest. i. 16). In one point only were patrons checked with any degree of success. Their assertion of the right to nominate clerks was closely followed by the practice of selling nominations, or at least of accepting presents for them. This practice, although it was not altogether suppressed, was at least checked and discouraged. It is disallowed by Conc. Mojunt. A.D. 813, c. 30 (which forms c. 7 of the Statuta erroneously ascribed to Boniface of Mainz, and printed as his in D'Achery, Spicilegium, i. 508).

Later in the 9th century Hincmar of Rheims is especially distinguished for the stand which he made against it: he expresses his determination in every case to make inquiry, and in no case to ordain a clerk on the presentation of a patron, if the clerk has given a single penny for his presentation (Hincmar, Remens. Epist. 43, ad Teutulf. Comit. ap. Migne, Patrol. Lat. vol. cxxvi. 264; id. Capit. in Synod Remens. A.D. 874, c. 5, ap. Migne, Patrol. Lat. vol. cxxv. 800).

The system of patronage which thus grew out of the introduction by the Carolingians of the system of granting church lands as fiefs was supported by two other circumstances, which also resulted from the Frankish rule.

(1) A freeman who built a church upon his own land had an almost absolute right of property in it. In direct opposition to the Roman rule, according to which, as has been shewn above, the founder of a church had no special rights whatever in the church which he had built, but in full accordance with the spirit of Frankish jurisprudence, Charles the Great enacted that such a church might be assigned and sold: "de ecclesiis quae ab ingenuis hominibus construuntur licet eas tradere, vendere, tantum modo ut ecclesia non destruatur sed serviuntur cotidie honores" (Capit. Francofurt. A.D. 794, c. 54, Pertz, vol. i. 75). Accordingly the gift of a church to a monastery or a bishop was accompanied with the same forms as the gift of any other real property (see Rettberg, Kircheng. Deutsch. vol. ii. 617). This right of ownership carried with it the right of appointment of its ministers, subject, however, to the approval of the bishop; the right was not personal, but descended with the estate, and if the estate were divided, and disputes arose as to the right of appointment, the bishop could not interfere otherwise than by suspending the services of the church until the joint owners or co-heirs had agreed to present to him a single presbyter (2 Conc. Cabillon. A.D. 813, c. 26, ap. Mansi, vol. xiv. 98; so in effect Conc. Tribur. A.D. 895, c. 32; for some questions arising from this rule of joint patronage see Hinschius, in the Zeitschrift für Kirchenrecht, vol. vii. pp. 1 sqq.). At first, provision was made that the foundation of such churches should not interfere with the rights of previously existing churches to tithes and other dues (Karoli M. Capit. ad Salz. A.D. 803, c. 3, Pertz, vol. i. 124, and Excerpt. Can. c. 19, Pertz, vol. i. 190; Conc. Moguntt. A.D. 813, c. 41; Hludowici et Hlotharii Capit. c. 6, Pertz, vol. i. 254; Ansegisi Capit. lib. ii. 45, Pertz, vol. i. 299); but in time the distinction between these privately-founded churches and parish churches proper was broken down, and the original rights of owners in the one case became indistinguishable from the usurped rights of feudal lords in the other.

(2) All holding of land under the Frankish rule involved military service. The full rights of a freeman could only be claimed by one who could defend those rights by arms. In some instances it would appear that clerks did not hesitate to take the field (e.g. Annales S. Amandi, A.D. 712, Pertz, M. H. G. Scriptorum, vol. i. 6; Einhardi, Annales, A.D. 753, ibid. vol. i. 139; Ruodolfi Fuldens, Annales, A.D. 844, ibid. vol. i. 364); but there was a strong feeling against their doing so, and enactments were passed to prohibit it, e.g. Karlomanni Capit. A.D. 742, c. 2; Pertz, Legum, vol. i. 16; Pippini, Capit. Vernen. A.D. 755, c. 16, ibid. vol. i. 22; Karoli M. Capit. General, A.D. 769, c. 1, ibid. vol. i. 42, and Capit. Ecclesiast. A.D. 789, c. 69, ibid. vol. i. 64. It was, in other respects, desirable for clerks to avoid some of the personal burdens which attached to freemen, and it not infrequently became necessary to protect their privileges and their lands against usurpation. Consequently those churches and monasteries which were large landowners frequently put themselves under the protection of a neighbouring secular lord. The common name for the tie which thus came to exist was "advocatia," but with this "patrocinium" is interchangeable (on this point see Waitz, Deutsche Verfassung, Bd. ii. 450, iii. 321). The powers of the "advocatus," or "patronus" in this sense, came in time to be considerable [ADVOCATE OF THE CHURCH, Vol. I. p. 33], especially in relation to abbeys, and in the course of the middle ages, though so far from the period embraced in the present work as not to admit of being stated in detail here, included the right of presentation. In our own country this system prevailed to so great an extent that the word "advocatia," under its modern form of "advowson," has come to be synonymous with the right of presentation.

(Of earlier books on the subject the best are F. de Roye, ad Titulum de Jure Patronatus, Anjou, 1667, and a short treatise, by the jurist G. L. Boehmer, de Advocatiae Ecclesiasticae cum Jure Patronatus Nexu, Göttingen, 1757. Of more recent books, the best are Lippert, Versuch einer historisch-dogmatischen Entwickelung der Lehre vom Patronate, Giessen, 1829; Kaim, Das Kirchenpatronatrecht nach seiner Entstehung, Entwickelung, und heutigen Stellung in Staate, Leipzig, 1 Theil, 1845, 2 Theil, 1866. PATRON SAINTS. For the general doctrine of the influence of glorified saints over human affairs, see the DICT. OF CHR. BIOG. &c. What is here given relates simply to the actual practice of Christians in adopting saints as patrons whether of places or persons.

I. Nomenclature. — A martyr supposed to have a special interest in a place and its inhabitants was called their patron first in the latter half of the 4th century. St. Ambrose is probably the earliest extant witness to the usage, when, in 386, he calls Gervasius and Protasius the "patrons" of the orthodox at Milan (Epist. xxii. 11). Somewhat later he says of departed kings and martyrs, "Illi fiunt supplices, hi patroni" (Expos. in Ev. S. Luc. x. 12). Paulinus of Nola frequently gives the title to Felix, to whom his church was dedicated, and under whose peculiar protection he believed himself and his people to live. Thus, writing in 395 (Carm. ii. in S. Fel. 26)—

> "O felix Felice tuo tibi praesule Nola, > Inclita cive sacro, caelesti firma patrono."

Similarly Carm. ix S. F. iii. 105; v. 316, vi. 5;

but especially in the later Natalitia, which reach to the year 408. The usage was probably much extended by Paulinus. It was taken up by Prudentius, whose hymns, De Coronis, were written some time after 405 (see Hymn. ii. 530, vi. 145, xiii. lin. ult.). St. Augustine late in life, about 421, makes an approach to the usage with which others must have made him familiar, viz. when he speaks of commending the dead to the saints near whom they are buried, "tanquam patronis" (De Cura pro Mort. iv. § 6; see also xviii. § 22). We find the word used absolutely in the books De Miraculis S. Stephani, claiming to be drawn up at the request of Evodius, the bishop of Uzalis, probably not long after the year 420. Eg. (in Prologo): "Ea quae per patronum nostrum Stephanum primum martyrem suum operatus est apud nos Christus" (comp. i. 1; ii. 14). By the year 461, when Paulinus Petricordius wrote his metrical Life of St. Martin, the usage must have been thoroughly established (see lib. 1; Migne, 61, col. 1016; ii. 1028–9, &c.) The last-named author gives the title to St. Martin, even when speaking of events that occurred in his lifetime (iv. 1041, 1048), as does Flodoard to St. Remigius (Hist. Eccl. Rem. i. 13). The correlative to patronus is cliens. Early Christian writers, however, did not, if my observation may be trusted, make this use of it. Paulinus of Nola, in one of his latest poems (A.D. 405), calls himself the alumnus of Felix (Carm. xiii. in S. Fel. 355; comp. 95). Similarly the little town of Abella, "tanti memoratur alumna patroni" (ibid. 793). With Prudentius, the Romans are the "alumni urbici" of St. Lawrence (de Cor. ii. 530). This word does not occur in the very long poem of the younger Paulinus above mentioned. As the patron of this church, Paulinus of Nola calls St. Felix dominaedius (Epist. v. 15, xviii. 3, xxviii. 9, xxix. 13, xxxii. 10; Poem. xxiii. 109). This is peculiar to Paulinus, but the patron saint was commonly called dominus (Paul. Carm. in S. Fel. i. 10). In Lucian's account of the discovery of the body of St. Stephen, he is called "dominus Stephanus" (Revelatio, 34, 8, in App. vi. ad Opp. Aug.). The saints who reveal its site in a vision call themselves "the lords of the place" (ibid. 7), and two of them are "dominus Gamaliel" (4, 7), and "dominus Nicodemus" (3, 4). The saint being dominus, the votary was servus, as we learn from Paulinus and Gregory: but the more common phrase was famulus, especially in the later part of our period. Thus Alcuin of Stephen (Carm. 31 ad Aram S. Steph.) Similarly Hincmar and Abbo.

The Roman relation between patron and client being unknown to the Greeks, they did not fall into the conventional use of any single word to denote the tutelary saints of a place or person. They were "champions" or "patrons" (προστάται, Chrys. Hom. de SS. Bernice et Prosdoce, § 7), "advocates" (παράκλητοι, Greg. Nyss. in Mart. App. 214, or συνήγοροι, Chrys. Hom. c. Ludos, 1; Hom. in Mart. ii. 669); "intercessors" (πρεσβευταί, Greg. Nyss. u. s.; Bas. Or. xix. 8; Theodoret, Gr. Aff. Cur. viii.; Opp. iv. 921); "keepers of the city and guards" (κηδεῦχοι καὶ φύλακες, ibid. 902); "chiefs of men, champions, and allies, and averters of evil (πρόμοι ἀνθρώπων καὶ πρόμαχοι καὶ ἐπίκουροι, καὶ τῶν κακῶν ἀποτρόπαιοι, ibid. 912), &c.

II. The Choice of Patrons.—At first the possession of a relic was thought enough to constitute the saint patron of its possessors. To give an instance: when the body of St. Boniface was brought to Fulda, "the venerable abbat Sturmi with his brethren gave thanks to Christ that they had obtained so great a patron" (Vita Sturmii, 16; comp. 15). This was so fully recognised that relics were commonly called patrocinia. It often happened that a miracle alleged in connexion with human remains raised the person to the dignity of a saint and local patron (Paulin. Petr. Vita S. Mart. v. 106). When the bodies of Gervasius and Protasius, discovered at Milan, were found to heal demoniacs, St. Ambrose said, "Brethren, we have escaped no slight burden of reproach. We had patrons, and did not know it" (Epist. xxii. 11). In the course of time, however, persons chose a patron. Thus, e. g. "Theodelinda, about 600, built a church at Monza, near Milan, in honour of St. John the Baptist, that he might be an intercessor for her husband and children." She promised yearly gifts to his oratory, that through his prayers they might have the aid of Christ both in battle and wherever else they might go." "From that day they began to invoke St. John in all their actions" (Paulus Warnfridus de Gestis Langobard. i. 22, ed. Hamb. 1611, p. 371; see Mus. Ital. i. 210). Such freedom of choice as is here shewn has been restricted by late decrees of Rome, when a public patron is to be elected. He must have been the "first bishop of the place," or one whose "body has been found buried there," or who "sprang from the place and was a citizen of it," or one who has "in some wonderful way protected and [illegible] the people in their times of need" (Bibliogr. compta Biblioth. in v. Patr. SS.)

III. Patrons of Places. Several saints are expressly declared by early writers to have been the "patrons" of certain places. The name is not given by Prudentius to the saints enumerated by him (as the glories of Africa and Spain (de Cor. iv.); but the functions which he assigns to them prove that they were so regarded. In another poem (De Cor. v. 145) three of those mentioned—Fructuosus and his deacons—receive the name patronus. Leo taught that St. Peter and St. Paul were the special patrons of Rome (Serm. 80, § 7; compare what he says of St. Laurence, 83, § 4). Genesius was the "nursling of Arles by right of his birth there; its patron, by virtue of his death." (Auct. Inc. Passio S. Gen. Arel. 1, 13, inter Opp. Paulini Nol. ad Calc. Epp.) Alcuin tells us that, while saints should be honoured and imitated throughout the church, "yet in certain places they are honoured more familiarly among their fellow-citizens with a certain special veneration, because of some one of them having commonly dwelt there, or because of the presence of his sacred relics, which have been given to such or such inhabitants for a comfort." He then proceeds to name several such patrons of cities and regions, as St. Peter and St. Paul of Rome; St. Ambrose, the "defensor" of Milan; the Theban Legion, the glory of the Pennine Alps; Hilary of Poitiers; Martin of Tours; St. Denys and St. Germain of Paris; Remigius of Champagne, the people of which whole province "hastened to the city of Rheims, offering their vows there as if to a present patron. Thus hath the divine goodness provided for the whole world by giving to the several provinces or peoples a special patron in whom to rejoice" (Hom. de Nat. Willibrordi, 1). In the age of Alcuin, we observe, certain honours were claimed for a martyr in every church, though special honours were paid to him, and special trust reposed in him in those places of which he was the patron. But at first the honours paid to them and other saints were entirely local. A curious illustration of this occurred when Julian separated Constantia from Gaza, of which it was a suburb. As a consequence, says Sozomen (Hist. Eccl. v. 3), "each has its bishop and clergy by itself, and its celebrations of martyrs and memorials of the bishops who have belonged to it."

The saints protected the church dedicated with their relics:

> "Ita suis meritis jam tecta sacrata tuetur, > Ut procul effugiat hostis ab aede sacra."
> (Alcuin, Carm. 35 ad Orat. S. Andr.)

Similarly Carmina 42, 77–79, 85, 95, 98, 115. They afforded a general protection to the people who worshipped in their churches:

> "Martyris egregii Quintini altare triumphis > Hoc fulget, populo hic qui ferat auxilium."
> (Id. Carm. 64 ad Ar. S. Qu.)

> "Adjuvat hic nos
> "Cujus honore sacro constant haec templa dicata."
> (Id. Carm. 83 ad Eccl. S. Petri.)

Specimens of the Dedication-formulae of churches (e.g. "in honorem S. Joannis Baptistae") may be seen under INSCRIPTIONS, p. 848.

IV. The Angels Patrons.—When St. Michael, St. Gabriel, and St. Raphael were first chosen by authority as patrons of a church or oratory, we are unable to say. A church dedicated to St. Michael was built at Ravenna in 545. (Ciampini, Vet. Monum. ii. tav. xvii. in vol. i. p. 87). The Besançon Sacramentary, a Gallican book modified by Roman influence, of which the MS. belongs to the 7th century, gives a "missa in honore Sancti Michahel," which was evidently used on his day in oratories, &c., named after him, or possibly, as the Gallicans of that age had very few saints' days, on the anniversary of their opening whenever it was ("in honore beati archangeli Michahelis dedicata nomini Tuo loca," Mus. Ital. i. 356). There is no similar mass in any other Gallican missal, but we find examples in all the old Roman sacramentaries, to which we infer from the Besançon that they belonged at an early period. The Gelasian assigns to iii. kal. Oct. "Orationes in Sancti Archangeli Michaelis" (Liturgia Rom. Vet. Murat. i. 669), which contain no reference to the dedication of the church; but the so-called Leonian gives five missae for pridie kal. Oct., under the heading, "Natale Basilicae Angeli in Salaria," of which two (i. iv) allude to his being the patron of the church (Murat. u. s. 407). The early copies of the Gregorian all have such a mass (iii. kal. Oct.), and they all by the title (Dedicatio Basilicae S. Michaelis, Mur. S. Angeli) intimate that St. Michael was the patron of the church in which it was to be used (see Rocca's copy in Opp. Greg. M. V. 151, Antv. 1615; Pamelius, Rituale SS. PP. ii. 345; Murat. u. s. ii. 125; Menard in Opp. Greg. ed. Ben. iii. 135). Among the poems of Alcuin are two on churches dedicated to him (29, 168), three on altars of St. Michael (37, 64, 77), and a sixth (186) "ad aram sanctorum archangelorum," i.e., as the verses shew, of Michael, Gabriel, and Raphael.

V. Patrons of Classes.—In the middle ages every trade and profession had its patron, and every disease a saint especially gifted for its cure. The germ of this distribution of offices appears even from the very introduction of saint-worship. Thus Justina, persecuted by the magician Cyprian, "implores the Virgin Mary to aid a virgin in peril" (Greg. Naz. Hom. 24 in Cypr. § 11). St. Agnes is addressed by Prudentius (De Coron. 14, in fine) as the especial patroness of female chastity. St. Nicetius, the patron of Lyons, was the especial friend of prisoners (Greg. Turon. Vitas Patrum, viii. 7). St. Sigismund cured the ague (Greg. Turon. de Glor. Mart. 75). In the Besançon Missal found at Bobio, belonging to the 7th century, is a mass of St. Sigismund, "pro frigoriticis" (Mabillon, Musae. Ital. i. 344). Phocas was the patron of sailors (Aster. Amas. Encom. in Phoc. 5 in Combefis, Auctar. i. 180, par. 1680). Sailors at their mess would by turns deposit in money the cost of a meal as the share of Phocas, and when they arrived in port distribute it to the needy in his name (ibid.).

VI. Good Offices expected from Patron Saints.—(1) That most frequently assigned to them was one, the fulfilment of which was least open to dispute. They seconded the prayers of their votaries, and thus often led to their accomplishment, where without such aid they would have failed. St. Basil called them θεήσεως συνεργοί (Hom. xix. 8, xxiii. 7). Leo of Rome exhorts his people to keep vigil in St. Peter's, "who will deign by his prayers to assist our supplications and fastings and almsgivings" (Serm. xi. 4). Gregory I. calls patron saints "adjutores orationis" (In. Evang. ii., Hom. 32, § 8; comp. Bas. above). In fact the constant hope and request of their clients might be expressed in the words of Alcuin,

> "Iste preces nostras adjuvet, opto, suis."
> (Carm. 61 ad Aram, S. Joann. Bapt.)

Similarly Carm. 28 ad Sepulcr. Amandi "Adjuvat iste preces populi;" and Carm. 47 ad Arum SS. Greg. et Hieron.

(2) There was no danger or difficulty in which their aid was not invoked with success. "Let us keep vigil," says Leo, "in the church of the blessed apostle Peter, by whose merits aiding us, we may obtain release from all tribulations" Serm. 84, § 2; comp. 81, § 2). Some of the instances in Paulinus are, even by his own confession, calculated to raise a smile rather than to edify. For example, a rustic who had lost two oxen by theft, instead of pursuing the robbers, flies at once to the church of St. Felix, whom he declares responsible for their restoration (De S. Fel. Carm. vi. 290).

(3) The martyrs were the especial protectors of those who were named after them. Thus Theodoret says that Christians "make a point of giving the appellations of the martyrs to their children, by that means procuring safety and guardianship for them" (Graec. Aff. Cur. Disp. viii. s. 923).

(4) The active assistance in battle of some long departed hero was the subject of many a Greek and Roman myth. Among the semi-converts of the 4th century, there could not fail to be many on whom these romantic traditions had made a deep impression, and we cannot be surprised at their speedy reproduction under a Christian guise. The patron martyr was regarded as a faithful ally, both in aggression and defence of those who served him well. It is, in short, in the heathen myth that we discover the germ of the mediaeval romance which culminated in the conversion of the apostles into knight-errants. Theodoret relates that on the night before the battle in which Theodosius overthrew Eugenius, A.D. 394, St. John and St. Philip appeared to him "in white garments and riding on white horses" and told him that they had been "sent as his allies and champions" (Hist. v. 24). St. Ambrose had promised that he would often visit Florence. After his death in 397 "he was frequently seen praying at the altar in the Ambrosian basilica which he had himself built there," and when the city was besieged by Radagaisus in 406, he appeared to a citizen of the place and foretold its safety. The next day Stilicho came to its relief (Vita Ambros. a Paulino conscr. 50). During the war with the Goths, A.D. 410, the Romans refused to repair a weak part of the city wall, "affirming that Peter the apostle had promised them that the guardianship of that place should be his care. For the Romans reverence and worship this apostle above all" (Procopius de Bello Gothico, i. 23; ed. Nieb. ii. 110). St. Augustine, 421, heard and believed that when Nola was besieged, St. Felix, its patron (ed. Nieb. ii. 110), appeared (De Cur. pro Mort. xvi.). Leo of Rome, 440, asks triumphantly, "Quis hanc urbem reformavit saluti? Quis a captivitate eruit? Quis a caede defendit? Ludus Circensium, an cura Sanctorum?" (Serm. 81, § 1). Venantius, A.D. 560, says of St. Peter and St. Paul (Poem. iii. vii. 19),

"A facie hostili duo propugnacula praesunt."

A part of the poem from which we quote, including this claim of protection, is said to have been inscribed by Ina, A.D. 639, on the walls of his church at Glastonbury (Bolland. Feb. tom. i. p. 906). Compare RELICS.

(5) But more alien still from the spirit and faith of the Gospel was the dependence placed on the patron from protection from the consequences of sin, even at the day of judgment. We find even blasphemous expression, as I think it must be deemed, of this dependence at the earliest period of patron worship. Thus Prudentius declares that he desired to be on the left hand of the judge, that Romanus may come to his rescue (De Coron. x. in fine). The patron is a mediator with Christ, as Christ with the Father (ibid. ii. 578). This extravagance may be partially ascribed to the improper licence which the Christian poets allowed themselves; but the fundamental error is common.

VII. I am not acquainted with any book that treats exclusively or especially of patron saints. Works on the general cultus of the saints are, among others, J. Camerarius de Invocatione Sanctorum, Graece, Lips. 1545; R. Montagu (bp.), Treatise of Invocation of Saints, 1624; Will. Forbes (bp.), Considerationes Modestae de Invoc. Sanct. Lond. 1658, Helmst. 1704, Frankfort, 1707; Oxf. A. C. L. 1856; G. Morley (bp.), *Epistolae duae de Inv. PAUL, APOSTLE; FESTIVALS OF, ETC.

(1) FESTIVAL OF ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL. See PETER, APOSTLE, FESTIVALS OF. Commemoration of St. Paul on June 30, ibid.

(2) Festival of Conversion of St. Paul.—The observance of this festival dates from a much later period than the preceding, though it is not at all easy to approximate to the time with any degree of certainty. The reason for such a commemoration is not far to seek: a conversion such as that of St. Paul stands on an altogether different footing from the call of any other apostle, and when it is considered how different, humanly speaking, Christianity would have been, had God not thought fit to employ St. Paul as He did, we may allow that there is a sense in which Renan is justified in calling St. Paul "the second founder of Christianity."

Besides the general importance of the event herein commemorated, there was also probably a desire to bestow a further commemoration on St. Paul, as though he had hardly received sufficient recognition by the festival of June 29, of which the commemoration of St. Paul on June 30 is also evidence; a need which would be the more felt inasmuch as other important festivals soon became associated with the name of St. Peter. It may be noted that the feast of the Conversion of St. Paul is peculiar to the Western church, the special necessity of which we have spoken as tending to its origination being, on the whole, peculiar to the West.

In inquiring as to the date at which we can first find traces of the observance of this festival, we shall do well in the first place to clear the ground of fictitious instances. Baronius (Mart. Rom. Jan. 29) appeals to sermons of St. Augustine for this festival, an appeal which, if substantiated, would give a decidedly early date. The sermons in question are those given by the Benedictine editors as 278, 279 (Patrol. xxxviii. 1268), and also 189 of those rejected by them as spurious (ib. xxxix. 2098). As regards the first of these, while it is true that the conversion of St. Paul is dwelt on, the particular part of the Acts containing that history having, it would seem, been the lection in the service; yet the heading which connects the sermon with the festival [pro solemnitate conversionis S. Pauli] is certainly late, for the sermon is cited in the Indiculus of Possidius (c. 8) as "de vocatione apostoli Pauli et commendatione orationis dominicae," and it seems to have been one of those made for the paschal season, when the Acts was regularly read. It may be added that the Calendarium Carthaginense makes no mention of this festival, a weighty argument against its celebration in Africa in Augustine's time.

Not unnaturally, in the course of time, when the festival was actually established, the subject matter of the sermon led to its receiving its later title. Thus Florus (Expos. in Epp. Pauli; 1 Cor. iii., 1 Thess. iv., 1 Tim. i.; Patrol. cxix. 324, &c.) invariably cites it as Sermo de Conversione Apostoli Pauli. Assuming the authorship of this expositio to be established, the above is the earliest allusion we are acquainted with to the existence of the festival, bringing it to about the middle of the 9th century.

The second sermon is entitled in some MSS., it is true, in Conversione S. Pauli, but Florus always cites it merely de Paulo Apostolo (op. cit.; Rom. i. viii. ix.; Phil. ii.). The third sermon is merely a cento made up from other sermons of St. Augustine.

No homily for the day is found in the works of Leo, Maximus of Turin, Bede, &c. The festival is given, however, in some forms of the Gregorian Sacramentary (col. 22, ed. Ménard), where the service includes a 'solemn' benediction. On the other hand, however, Pamelius obelizes it, and the Cod. Reg. Sueciae (Vat. 1275) of the Benedictine edition omits it altogether. This MS. is, however, of about the date 900 A.D., and Ménard's Cod. Theodericensis i., a century earlier, gives the festival, but puts it after the commemorations on the same day of SS. Emerentianus and Macharius. It may be noted that the festival is altogether wanting in the Gregorian antiphonary. Almost identical with the form in the Gregorian Sacramentary is that in the Ambrosian, the only differences being that the latter has a prayer super sindonem, and that the benediction is shorter. In the Comes Hieronymi it is entirely absent, Jan. 25 being merely recognised as the Natale of Macharius and Emerentianus. Taking then into account the reference of Florus, and assuming the date of the Cod. Theodericensis to be rightly given, it will follow that the festival was existing at the beginning of the 9th century, but its absence from MSS. of the sacramentary of a later date will suggest that it came but slowly into recognition. Thus there is no allusion to it in the capitulare of Ahyto, bishop of Basle early in the 9th century.

On turning to the martyrologies, we find in the Mart. Hieronymi for Jan. 25, after the entry "Nicomediae, Biti," the further notice, "Romae, Translatio Sancti Pauli Apostoli" (Patrol. xxx. 455), a suggestion, it would seem, of a different kind of origin for the festival. The metrical martyrology of Bede gives a notice of the day, "Octavas merito gaudet conversio Pauli" (Patrol. xciv. 603). This, however, is wanting in some MSS., and may be summarily dismissed as an interpolation. Moreover, in the ordinary martyrology of Bede, in its true text as edited by Henschenius, there is no mention of the conversion of St. Paul, though this occurs among the additions of the late texts (Acta Sanctorum, March, vol. ii. p. xi.). The martyrology of Rabanus Maurus mentions, on Jan. 25, both the translation and conversion (Patrol. cx. 1130); see also Notker (Patrol. cxxxi. 1039). Wandalbert, in the 9th century, commemorates the festival, "Octavo ex Saulo[a] conversum gloria Paulum" (Patrol. cxxi. 587). Some 9th-century calendars, however, do not recognise the festival (see, e.g., the Kal. Floriacense, in Martene and Durand, Ampl. Coll. vi. 650). We may perhaps approximate to the date of the introduction of this festival into England by noting that, while there is no mention of it in the pontifical of Egbert, archbishop of York (732–766 A.D.), yet it is given in the sacramentary of Leofric (bishop of Exeter, 1050–1072 A.D.). The MS. of this, however, now in the Bodleian Library, is of the 10th century (Surtees Society's Publications, vol. lxi. p. xi.).

(3) Apocryphal Literature. — Of apocryphal works connected with the name of St. Paul there is a considerable quantity. There are Acts of Peter and Paul, published by Tischendorf (Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, pp. 1. sqq; cf. p. xiv). There are also Acts of Paul and Thecla (ib. p. 40; cf. p. xxi.) referred to as early as Tertullian (de Baptismo, c. 57). A Syriac version of this has been published by Dr. Wright (Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles).

Two spurious letters exist in Armenian, one purporting to be from the Corinthian church to St. Paul, and the other the apostle's answer. A Latin translation of these is given in Fabricius (Codex Pseud. Vet. Test. iii. 667, sqq.). An English translation by Lord Byron is also given in Moore's Life of Byron. We have also a spurious letter to the church of Laodicea, in Latin (for which see Lightfoot's Colossians, ed. 2, pp. 281, sqq.), and a series of letters in Latin, forming a correspondence between St. Paul and Seneca. These are given by Fabricius (op. cit. i. 871; cf. Jerome de Viris illustr. 12; Aug. Ep. 153 ad Macedonium, § 14; reference may also be made to the essay in Lightfoot's Philippians).

Further, we have an Apocalypse of Paul, first edited by Tischendorf (Apocalypses Apocryphae, pp. 34, sqq.) from a Greek MS. in the Ambrosian Library. A Syriac text also exists, of which an English translation has been published (ib. p. xvii.). [R. S.]

PAVEMENT. Although scarcely to be included among Christian antiquities, the platform or pavement on which Roman governors of provinces and other like officials were accustomed to place their chairs when sitting in judgment comes under our notice on one occasion of such pre-eminent interest that some mention of it can hardly be omitted. It must be almost needless to say that the occasion referred to is that in which our Lord was brought before Pilate—"in the place called the Pavement" (εἰς τόπον λεγόμενον λιθόστρωτον, St. John xix. 13). It appears that it was the practice for Roman officials of high rank to cause such a pavement to be constructed as an adjunct to a praetorium wherever one was established. Suetonius (in Vita Jul. Caes.) says that it was related of Julius Caesar that in his expeditions he carried with him pavements sectile and tesselated ("in expeditionibus tessellata et sectilia pavimenta circumtulisse"). Casaubon remarks upon this passage, that what he carried with him were probably the materials with which such official pavements might be constructed.

A representation in art of such a pavement may be found on the top of the reliquary of carved ivory [RELIQUARY] preserved in the Biblioteca Quiriniana at Brescia, in the subject of Christ brought before Pilate, the seat of the latter being placed on a slightly raised platform or dais. This casket is probably of the 4th century.

The pavements of churches were in the earlier ages usually either of mosaic, or tesselated, or of sectile work, the latter being made up of pieces of marbles, porphyries, or granites, cut so as to fit together and form patterns. One of the earliest examples of the former is probably the pavement in the basilica of Reparatus, near Orleansville, in Algeria, probably circa A.D. 325. (See woodcut.) The two kinds of work were occasionally mixed, as in the pavement of the chapel of St. Alexander, on the Via Latina, a few miles from Rome, discovered about twenty years ago. In this instance slabs of marble enclose squares of coarse mosaic of white marble, in which were a sort of quatrefoils, roughly formed by tesserae of dark stone. This pavement probably dated from the 5th or 6th century. One of very similar character, and probably of the same date, was discovered in 1858, when the original level of the north aisle of the choir of S. Lorenzo-fuor-le-Mura, at Rome, was reached by excavation. The pavement of the earlier church of San Clemente, at Rome, was found to consist of slabs of marble arranged in a somewhat simple pattern. The churches of St. Sophia and St. John Studios, at Constantinople, both retain portions of their original pavements: large slabs of marble, circular or quadrangular, are enclosed by bands of interlacing ornament, chiefly executed in strips of marble, but in part in mosaic (v. Salzenberg, Baudenkmale Constantinopels, &c.). A good, though small, example of a sectile pavement will be found in the triforium of the cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle, being no doubt a portion of that brought by Charles the Great from Rome or Ravenna.

Mosaic pavements not unfrequently contained inscriptions recording the names of the donors. The remains of such an inscription were found in the ruins of the basilica of Reparatus mentioned above. In this occurs the names of Paulus, Pomponius, Rusticus, and Adeodatus with the additions "votum solvit," "voti comp." &c. The pavement is one of considerable elegance; it is divided into compartments, in which are figures of stags, goats, sheep, &c. An engraving will be found in Les Carrelages émaillés, by M. Amé, pp. 15–28, borrowed from that given in the report of the Commission Scientifique de l'Algérie (Beaux-Arts, I. i. pl. liii.). Another instance of a pavement provided by the contributions of the members of the church is afforded by a recent discovery at Olympia, mentioned in a letter printed in the Times of April 16, 1877. It is there stated that the ruins of a large Byzantine church, "perhaps as early as the 5th century, had been found." The pavement of this church was formed of large marble slabs, on one of which, in the centre of the nave, was inscribed, "Kyriakes, a most discreet Anagnostes, who for the salvation of his soul ornamented the pavement."

In the crypt of the cathedral of Verona are remains of a tesselated pavement of elegant design, probably not later in date than the 5th century (v. engraving in Museum Veronense by Maffei, p. cevili.). In the compartments of this are inscriptions containing the names of the contributors to the work and stating the quantities paid for by each, as "Eusebia cum suis tessallavit P. CXX."

Another remarkable instance of an early pavement is that of the church of Dedamoukha, in Mingrelia (The Crimea, &c. by Capt. Telfer, p. 123), which is attributed to the 6th century. In this instance forty small circular slabs are let into the floor near the south entrance, and are asserted to be placed over the heads of the "ἅγιοι τεσσαράκοντα," the forty saints martyred in Armenia, in the time of Licinius, by being exposed to the rigour of a winter frost in a marsh.

Nor were pavements made use of for memorials only, for Gregory of Nyssa (in Theod. Orat. 25) says, "Nor do the walls alone of this temple read us lessons of piety, for the very pavement, in its mosaics like a flowery mead, promotes our instruction." That few examples have remained to our time will not appear surprising, when it is remembered that the pavement is the part of the church of all the most exposed to injury.

One example of a tesselated pavement requires mention as being one of the few instances of the occurrence of Christian symbols in Roman remains in England; the pavement discovered at Frampton in Dorsetshire, an engraving of which has been given by Lysons (Reliquiæ Britannae-Romanae). The ruins in which it was discovered were apparently those of a villa; it covered the floor of an apartment of a square form with a semicircular projection or apse from one side. In a compartment occupying the central part of the arc of the apse remained the two handles with portions of the lip of a vase which if complete would probably have borne the form of the vases or chalices often found in early Christian art (v. CHALICE); while in the centre of the chord of the semicircle was the labarum forming the centre of a band of foliage; immediately, however, beyond this band was one which ran round the room, and was decorated with figures of dolphins. In the centre of this band and in contact with the labarum was a large head of Neptune, while a figure of Cupid occupied a like position on another side. It is difficult to form a satisfactory conclusion as to the destination of this apartment in view of this remarkable collection of Pagan deities and Christian symbols.

PEACOCK. See LAMPS, p. 921. The peacock was a favourite ornament from the 1st century; it is found, with other birds, at Pozzuoli (see new frescoes in the South Kensington Museum, nos. 1270–73), at Pompeii and Herculaneum, and repeatedly in the Jewish catacombs of the 1st century (Parker's Photographs, nos. 561, 562). Martigny says it was a symbol of the Resurrection, from the annual moulting and renewal of its beautiful tail-feathers, referring to Bosio (R. Sott. p. 641) and Aringhi (R. S. II. lvi. c. 36, p. 612). Mamachi (Antiq. Christ. I. iii. p. 92) says there is neither authority for, nor objection to, the symbolism, a view in which we concur; and Martigny quotes a sentence from one of St. Anthony of Padua's sermons (5 post Trin.) which compares our body to all the trees of the wood as well, and with equal plausibility.

St. Augustine (de Civit. Dei, l. xxi. c. iv.) speaks of this bird as an emblem of immortality, from the opinion of his time that its flesh was in part or entirely incorruptible. For this or whatever reason it is made in the cemeteries to accompany the Good Shepherd and the symbolic Orpheus, see FRESCO, p. 696, Bottari, iii. tav. lxiii. Like the Vine and the Good Shepherd, it was part of the repertory of heathen decoration. The fact is, as any draughtsman will see, the peacock with outspread tail is specially adapted to ornament circular vaultings and walls beneath them, as in Aringhi, R. S. col. ii. p. 59. Its radiating plumes make it a geometrical centre for circles or curves of decoration, and it is equally well suited to be a centre of colour. It was probably one of the earliest ornaments adopted by Christian painters, but it may have been one of the latest invested with sacred meaning.

The writer cannot find it in Garrucci's Vetri, but it seems to have been particularly in favour as a fresco subject for walls or roof ornament. Martigny gives an example from the cemetery of SS. Marcellinus and Peter (see woodcut) of a peacock with circular train displayed standing on a globe, with the remark that the artist "evidently" means to symbolise the winged soul rising above the earth after the resurrection. There is a similar painting in St. Agne (Bottari, t. iii. pl. 184). He is strengthened by Boldetti (Cimiteri, &c. p. 164) and by Lupi (Dissert.. ii. t. i. p. 204) in the conviction that the casks or dolia painted near this latter [DOLIUM] represent the blood of martyrs interred in the immediate vicinity, and the peacock their resurrection.

A peacock with two chicks is represented in fresco on a vaulted monument in the catacombs of St. Januarius at Naples. The latter seem to be issuing from a kind of nest-shaped basket (D'Agincourt, Peinture, pl. ii. no. 9). The peacock and young are also found in a Christian catacomb discovered at Milan in 1845 near the basilica of St. Nazaire, for which Martigny refers to Polidori sopra alcuni Sepolcri antecristiani in Milano, 1845, p. 57.

One reason for believing the figure of the peacock to be rather ornamental than symbolic is that it is but rarely found in sculpture. Two peacocks are found with a verse on the epitaph of the priest Romanus in the Musée Lapidaire at Lyons, and this ornament was frequently used in after days in the Byzantine sculpture of Venice (Ruskin, Stones of Venice, vol. i. p. 235. M. Leblant (Inscr. chrét. de la Gaule) says he has only found it three times on monuments, and Martigny only knows two examples in Rome—one on the tombstone of Aurelia Proba (Boldetti, p. 361). There is one on an end of the sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (Bottari, t. i. p. 1). The peacock is sparingly used in a merely decorative way in Carlovingian ornament. There are two rather conventionally but beautifully arranged in an evangeliary of Charlemagne's (Bastard, vol. ii. pl. 2). [R. St. J. T.]

PEARL. [MARGARITA, p. 1090.]

PECTORAL CROSS (Greek, ἐγκόλπιον; Lat. Crux Collaria, pectorale, rationale, formalium, logium, firmale, firmaculum; Ital. fermale, fermaglio). The names rationale, logium (λόγιον), were adopted by Christianity from the high-priest's breast-plate. They may be best explained in Magri's words (Hierolexicon, s. v.): "quia miraculose futura demonstrabat, et quasi loquebatur ac ratiocinabatur, ideoque rationale etiam dicebatur." The word is used by Gregory of Tours.

The earliest account of the pectoral cross given by Hofmann (Lex. Univ.) dates from the 9th century. It is that of Anastasius, the librarian, "Crucem cum pretioso ligno vel cum reliquiis sanctorum ante pectus portare suspensam ad collum, hoc est, quod vocant Encolpium."

Pope Innocent III. traces its use by the pope to the vesting of the high priest under the Mosaic law (De Sacro Altaris Mysterio, lib. i. cap. 53).

In the East the custom began of all Christians, and not bishops alone, wearing a cross hung about the neck. [ENCOLPION; RELIQUARY.] Gregory of Tours relates that he once put out a fire by drawing from his breast a cross of gold which inclosed some relics of the Virgin, the Apostles, and St. Martin.

It should be noticed that neither Durandus nor Thomas Aquinas includes the pectoral cross amongst the official vestments of a bishop; yet it appears that, though it was not a part of the exclusively episcopal vesture, bishops were in the habit of wearing a pectoral cross in the time of Durandus. The prayers which are usually recited on putting the cross upon the breast are not anterior to the 14th century, at which date the pectoral cross seems first to have taken rank amongst episcopal ornaments.

Pugin (Glossary) observes that the pectoral cross is now considered an emblem of jurisdiction, hence when a bishop enters the diocese of another he wears the cross concealed.

[H. T. A.]

PECTORALE, PECTORALIS. These words are used in a variety of senses to describe things worn on or covering the breast. We may mention, for example, (1) the band or fillet encircling the breast of women. See e. g. Jer. ii. 32, where the Hebrew חֵשֶׁב (στηθοδεσμίς, LXX) is rendered by Jerome fascia pectoralis; cf. also Isa. iii. 24 (Vg.); (2) its use as equivalent to Rationale (see the article), but no instances occur of this sufficiently early for our purpose; (3) Gregory the Great, in one of his letters, uses pectoralis [al. pectorale] simply for a great-coat, which he sends as a present to Ecclesius, bishop of Clusium, who, having no winter coat, suffers from the cold (Epist. xii. 47; Patrol. lxxvii. 1251). PELICAN. The pelican is sometimes used as a Christian symbol, in consequence of the myth which relates that when a serpent has bitten her young, she tears open her breast and revives her brood with her own blood. PENITENCE. The penitential discipline, in its original conception, required a delinquent to pass through three stages, beginning with a confession of his guilt [EXOMOLOGESIS], and ending with absolution, and a restoration to his forfeited privileges [RECONCILIATION]. The intermediate stage of penance is treated in this article in the following order:—

I. NAMES. ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT. The original meaning of the Latin word poenitentia, with its Greek equivalent μετάνοια, was repentance—implying change of heart, contrition, and amendment. In this sense it was frequently used by early ecclesiastical writers. The transition from this meaning to that of penitential discipline is not difficult to trace. Along with the inward feeling of contrition, there came to be combined, in the theological idea of repentance, an outward act of self-abasement. Gradually the outward act was accepted as a sign of the inward sorrow, and ultimately took the place of it. Isidore (ii. 16, de Poenitentibus), following Augustine (Ep. 54), derives the word from the penal idea underlying penitence: "Poenitentia nomen sumpsit a poena." In Raban. Maur. Instit. ii. 29, the derivation is: "A punitione poenitentia nomen accepit, quasi punitentia, dum ipse homo punit poenitendo, quod male admisit." The author of the de vera et falsa Poenit. c. 19, which bears the name of Augustine, slightly varies the etymology: "Poenitere est poenam tenere, ut semper puniat in se, ulsciscendo quod commisit peccando." This explanation is adopted by Peter Lombard (sentent. iv. diat. 14), and by Gratian (de Poenit. dist. 3), and is the accepted etymology of the Roman canonists (Morinus Poenitent. i. 1).

The Latin word in universal use to express penitential discipline in all its stages and degrees was poenitentia, with its corresponding concrete noun poenitens, a penitent, and the verb poenitere, to do penance In Cyprian and in the Conc. Eliber. the noun is generally used with some adjective, as "agere, facere poenitentiam plenam, veram, legitimam." At a later date, poenitentia was employed as equivalent to the discipline of the Incelers, the third and principal station of penance (1 Conc. Tolet. c. 2; Conc. Agath. c. 60; Felix, iii. Ep. vii.) In the Latin penitentials the verb is used by itself absolutely. 2. Exomologesis. A Greek word adopted by Tertullian (Poenit. c. 9), and used by Cyprian and Pacian, and occasionally later. 3. Abstinere, communione privari, communionem non accipere. The lightest form of censure, consisting in rejection from participation in the sacred elements for a period; a frequent formula in the Latin councils. 4. Segregatio, separatio; the translation of the Greek ἀφορισμός. 5. Flere, andire, substrari, consistere—the terms of the four stations.

The Greek equivalent of poenitentia is μετάνοια. This word retained for the most part its original meaning of change of heart. Basil uses it (c. 34) to signify the penitential course (see Conc. Laodic. c. 19); in another place (c. 22) to express the principal station of the ὑποπίπτοντες. In the latter instance it precisely corresponds with a similar use of the Latin poenitentia. In the later Greek rituals μετάνοια is a prostration. In the penitential ascribed to John the Faster, at the end of the "Ordo," the penitent is instructed to say the trisagion eight times . . . and to make eight μετανοίας. A little before it is directed that women μόνον προσκυνήσεις ποιείτωσαν χωρὶς μετανοιῶν. The word μετάνοια here must signify some laborious and humiliating posture. 2. ἐξομολόγησις. The word employed by all Greek canonical writers to signify the course of discipline. It occurs in this sense in the Ep. ii. ad Corinth. which bears the name of Clem. Rom. 3. ἀφορισμός — the ordinary term of the Can. Apost. and also of the canons of Conc. in Trull. It signifies separation from the faithful (compare St. Luke vi. 22), involving either simple rejection from the eucharist, or in addition to rejection the performance of certain penitential acts and rites, the nature of which was not defined, but depended on the custom of the church. 4. προσκλαίοντες, ἀκροώμενοι, ὑποπίπτοντες or γονυκλίνοντες, συνιστάμενοι. The four stations. (Gregory Thaumat. Ep. c. 11; Basil ad Amphiloc.; Conc. Ancyr. &c.) 5. ἀκοινωνήτος εἶναι. The penitential censure of Conc. Ephes. (c. 6); Conc. Chalced. (cc. 4, 8, 16, 23) 6. ἐπιτίμιον. An ecclesiastical penalty (Basil, Ep. cc. 71, 74; Sozomen, H. E. vii. 16). ὑποκεῖσθαι ἐκ τῶν κανόνων ἐπιτιμίοις (Conc. Chalced. cc. 3, 8, 9; Conc. in Trull. cc. 44, 49, &c.) In the Greek penitentials the prayer over those whose penance was at an end is called εὐχὴ τῶν ἐξ ἐπιτιμίων λυομένων. 7. κανονίζειν, to impose a penalty according to the canons, a later Greek usage (Euchologion, Goar, p. 678).

The theory of penitential discipline was this: that the church was an organised body with an outward and visible form of government; that all who were outside her boundaries were outside the means of divine grace; that she had a command laid upon her, and authority given to her, to gather men into her fellowship by the ceremony of baptism; but as some of those who were admitted proved unworthy of their calling, she also had the right, by the power of the keys, to deprive them, temporarily or absolutely, of the privilege of communion with her, and, on their amendment, to restore them once more to church membership. On this power of exclusion and restoration was founded the system of ecclesiastical discipline. It was a purely spiritual jurisdiction. It obtained its hold over the minds of men from the belief, universal in the catholic church of the early ages, that he who was expelled from her pale was expelled also from the way of salvation, and that the sentence which was pronounced by God's church on earth was ratified by Him in heaven. No body of heretics ever ventured to claim this power. Ambrose was not merely taking high sacerdotal ground, but stating an historical fact, when he said (De Poenit. i. 2), "Hoc jus sibi recte Ecclesia vindicat, quae veros sacerdotes habet; haeresis vindicare non potest, quae sacerdotes Dei non habet. Non vindicando autem ipsa de se pronuntiat, quod cum sacerdotes non habeat, jus sibi vindicare non debeat sacerdotale." Penitence has at once its origin and sanction in the New Testament, and primarily in the promise of Christ Himself (St. Matt. xviii. 18). A system of discipline was undoubtedly in force among the Jews at the Christian era, and was recognised by our Lord (St. John xvi. 2; St. Luke vi. 22). In the development of church organisation which the apostles were appointed to carry out, penitential discipline was assigned its place (1 Cor. v. 3–5; 2 Cor. xiii. 10; 1 Tim. i. 20; Tit. iii. 10). Two of the great "mortalia delicta," moechia and idololatria, in the case of the incestuous man at Corinth (1 Cor. v.), and of the heretics Hymenaeus and Alexander, were visited with apostolic censure. The former example contains the elements of the future discipline. It was a distinctly spiritual sentence. The decision emanated from the chief pastor: "I have judged already." It was announced before the congregation: "When ye are gathered together." Its effect was to expose the delinquent to some bodily mortification: "Delivered unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh." Its object was his amendment: "That the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord." And its result, his ultimate restoration, on his repentance, to the fellowship of the church (2 Cor. ii. 6, 7). Many of the fathers saw in this expression—"delivered unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh," a sanction for the austerities of penance (Origen, in Levit. Hom. xiv. 4; Pacian, Paraen. ad Poenit. c. 18; Basil, c. 7; Ambrose, de Poenit. i. 13; August. de Fid. et Opp. c. 26). The references to ecclesiastical discipline in the earliest writers are naturally rare and fragmentary. The organization of the church was no less incomplete in this than in other matters. Clemens Roman. (Ep. ad Cor. c. 57, ed. Jacobson) has the following passage: ἄμεινον ἐστιν ὑμῖν ἐν τῷ ποιμνίῳ τοῦ Χρίστου μίκρους καὶ ἀλλογίμους εὑρεθῆναι, ἢ καθ' ὑπεροχὴν δοκοῦντας ἐκριφθῆναι ἀπὸ τῆς ἐλπίδος αὐτοῦ. The reference of this to some simple form of discipline is unmistakable. The Shepherd of Hermas, which is probably a generation later than the Clementine Epistles, speaks clearly and fully at the beginning of the 2nd century of the practice of separating an offender: (Herm. Pastor. vis. iii. 5; see Ibid. Similitud. vii.) An evidence for the existence of penitential discipline in these early times, which is, perhaps, stronger than any isolated passage, is the universal tradition of the church. The origin of Montanism is dated by Epiphanius in one place (Haeres. li. 33) as far back as A.D. 126. Other authorities fix it about A.D. 150 (Robertson, Ch. Hist. i. 5). That is to say, Montanus was only one generation removed from the apostle St. John. He separated from the church chiefly on the ground of the claims of the church with regard to discipline. In other words, discipline was so widely prevalent, and so firmly established, as to create a schism within a generation of the last of the apostles. The inference from this is well drawn out by Thorndike (Laws of the Church, iii. x. 2; Works, Lib. of Anglo-Cath. Theol. vol. iv. pt. 1). After Montanus there can no longer be any question on the discipline of penance being part of the regular organisation of the church. In the early ages the necessity for church censures must have been comparatively rare. As the need arose, the bishops with their priests dealt with each case in some simple manner, after the model, no doubt, laid down by St. Paul. The treatment of those who lapsed during the Decian persecution gave the first impulse to a more systematic and uniform organization. Crimes were classified, penalties promulgated, and the duration of penance was defined. The correspondence between the Roman and African churches, which appears in the epistles of Cyprian, gives some insight into the method in which a degree of uniformity was gained. Local needs and circumstances, no doubt, had their influence on the decisions of the early synods. The system in the West does not appear to have been so rigidly defined as in the East. The canonical epistles of Gregory Thaumaturgus, Basil, and his brother Gregory of Nyssa, were at once the expression and the support of this more inflexible rigidity. Under their influence the elaborate system of the penitential stations took its rise. These stations were taken into the canonical code, but they never appear to have entered into the practical administration of the Western discipline. The 3rd, 4th, and the beginning of the 5th centuries may be regarded within general limits as the flourishing period of the penitential system. It was then complete and regular, and at the same time had not ceased to be sustained by the zeal and belief of the church. The extent to which it entered into the routine of Christian legislation, is manifest from the space which penitential directions occupy in the writings of that period. The austerities were genuine and voluntary, endured from a firm conviction that only by such endurance could sin be expiated. "I have known many," says Ambrose (de Poenitent. i. 16), speaking as of facts which had come under his personal knowledge, "who have furrowed their cheeks with continuous tears, who have laid themselves in the dust for all to tread upon, and whose faces, thin and pallid from fasting, have presented the appearance of living ghosts." With the beginning of the 6th century the framework of the system was still unaltered, but the substance of it was rapidly decaying, more rapidly in the East than in the West. Through the 7th century public penitence was all but dead. It revived for a time under the ecclesiastical rule of the Carolingian princes, but the real life of penitence resided in the private system administered through the penitentials. Milman (Lat. Christian. iii. 5), in a passage on the power accruing to the clergy through ecclesiastical discipline, thus sums up the value of the system founded on the penitentials: "However severe, monastic, un-christian, as enjoining self-torture; degrading to human nature, as substituting ceremonial observance for the spirit of religion; and resting in outward forms which might be counted and calculated; yet as enforcing, it might be, a rude and harsh discipline, it was still a moral and religious discipline. It may have been a low, timid, dependent virtue to which it compelled the believer, yet still virtue. It was a perpetual proclamation of the holiness and mercy of the Gospel. It was a constant preaching, it might be, of an unenlightened, superstitious Christianity, yet still of Christianity."

II. Prior to the Spread of the Novatian Heresy.

The chief characteristics of discipline prior to the spread of the Novatian heresy, as compared with those which afterwards prevailed, were the shortness and mildness of the censures, and the simpler forms by which the system was administered. The Stations of Penitents had not yet been elaborated. The earlier censures no doubt corresponded with those imposed afterwards in the stations, but the technical names of the stations, and the systematic division of penitents connected with them, are of later date. In the first three centuries there appear three distinctly marked degrees of censure—(1) exclusion from participation in the elements, (2) exclusion from the sight of the sacrament and from the eucharistic prayers, (3) exclusion from the church altogether, that is to say, excision from the body of the faithful, and excommunication, although this latter term was not yet in use. An examination of the principal sources of information for that period will serve to shew clearly the nature of these penalties. The Apostolic Canons employ four terms to express church censure — 1, ἀφορίζεσθαι, separation, which applies equally to clergy and laity; 2, καθαίρεσθαι, deposition, which was confined to the clergy; 3, ἀφορίζεσθαι καὶ καθαίρεσθαι, which was also peculiar to the clergy; 4, τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἀποβάλλεσθαι, excision from the church, to which all were subject. The severity of this last sentence was still more increased in two canons (cc. 27, 28), which direct that a priest ministering in holy things after deposition παντάπασιν ἀκοινώνητος ἔστω. In the Apostolical Constitutions there is no record of any organised system, but only the mention of lighter and weightier censures. In Apost. Const. ii. 16, after some general directions that the bishop shall encourage and not repel penitents, there is given the mode of treating a delinquent. He was to be ejected from the church, and the deacons meantime were to visit him and remonstrate with him, and if he appeared contrite they were to come to the bishop and intercede for him, the bishop then was to allow him to enter the church, and, when satisfied of his earnestness, to reinstate him after a penance of a few weeks' fasting. In further directions in the same chapter, the bishop was to refuse the penitent the holy communion for a period, the length of which was to be adjusted to his offence, and afterwards receive him as a father would a repentant son. For ordinary purposes of discipline, and for light offences, this was the censure employed. The heavier penalty given in the Constitutions corresponds with the excision from the church of the Canons. Here is evidently the germ of the system of stages of penitence which was afterwards the law of the church. Tertullian refers only to one degree of censure, and that, as might be expected from his character and writings, a severe one. He takes no note of the simple rejection from communion which was the common penalty in the Apostolic Canons. Censures, he states (Apolog. c. 39), exclude men from the communion of prayer, from the solemn assembly, and from all holy fellowship. Penitence with him was laborious outward self-abasement, no mere loss of a holy privilege. It was an exomologesis, a confession of sin by act as well as by word; and in what this confession consisted he shews vividly (Poenit. c. 9): "Exomologesis is a discipline for the abasement and humiliation of man, enjoining such conversation as inviteth mercy; it directed also even in the matter of dress and food—to lie in sackcloth and ashes, to hide his body in filthy garments, to cast down his spirit with mourning, to exchange for severe treatment the sins which he hath committed; for the rest, to use simple things for meat and drink, to wit, not for the belly's, but for the soul's sake; for the most part also to cherish prayer by fasts, to groan, to weep, and to moan day and night unto the Lord his God; to throw himself upon the ground before the presbyters, and to fall on his knees before the beloved of God; to enjoin all the brethren to bear the message of his prayer for mercy." The same method of penitence which the writings of Tertullian disclose appears in the epistles of his disciple Cyprian. The sations had not found their way into Africa in his time. Cyprian's usual terms for expressing penitence were "agere poenitentiam," "facere exomologesim," which signify the performance of definite penitential acts. He rarely or never saw occasion to use the censure, which consisted only in expulsion from the Eucharist, and not often the great sentence of excision from the church.

The decrees of the council of Elvira, circ. A.D. 305, throw great light on the course of discipline at the close of the 3rd century. The canons were of exceptional rigour, but the system on which they were promulgated no doubt followed the general lines of discipline then prevailing in the West. They use three grades of censure. For various minor offences the penalty was simple rejection from participation. In these cases no outward acts of penance were performed. The beginning and end of the penalty was the denial of the sacred elements. The second grade of censure consisted in the infliction of strict penitence, the "poenitentia" and "exomologesis" of Tertullian and Cyprian. The mode of carrying out the penance was not defined. It was enough that it should be full and canonical—"vera, legitima, plena," that is to say, according to the rites and austerities then in practice in that province. This penitence was of two degrees—one leading to reconciliation at the end of so many years, the other only at the end of life. A third censure, employed by the Conc. Eliber., was that of expulsion from the church. It was reserved for such great crimes as retaining images in a house (c. 41), or contumacy (c. 20), or a relapse into infamous modes of life (c. 62). In c. 49 the offender was to be absolutely cut off, "penitus abjiciatur," the force of which may be, either that in addition to the ecclesiastical censure he was to be debarred civil and social intercourse with Christians, or that he was to be cut off without a hope of return. This last interpretation would coincide with the remarkable harshness exhibited by the Spanish fathers. Of their eighty-one canons, no less than fourteen specify offences for which excommunication was to be final, "nec in fine dandam esse communionem."[a] On a review of these early authorities there appear to have been up to the close of the 3rd century three distinct ecclesiastical censures—1, rejection from participation for a fixed period; 2, rejection from communion and the prayers of the faithful, together with certain definite acts of penance: this is penitence strictly so-called; 3, excision from the church, whether final or with the understanding that the offender might be readmitted by means of penitence; this censure is excommunication.

1. Duration of Penance.—The duration of penitence in the earliest ages is uncertain. The Apost. Const. ii. 16, permit a delinquent to be restored after two, or three, or five, or seven weeks of fasting. That the period was short, and did not approach the ten, fifteen, or twenty years which were inflicted for graver offences after the 4th century, is rendered probable from the absence of any mention of long periods of exclusion in the writings of Tertullian. The same inference may be drawn from the silence of the Apostolical Canons. These affix no period whatever to their penalties.[b] The teaching of Montanus and his great convert, Tertullian, who seceded from the church partly on account of her laxity, had the natural effect of rendering the catholic discipline more severe. Still, in Africa under Cyprian, and in Rome under Cornelius, it does not appear that a sentence often exceeded one or two years. The demand of the lapsed to be admitted without penitence, and the curtailment or remission of the period of exclusion by a commendatory letter from a martyr, are clear indications that the sentences were not long. In one instance there are the materials for determining the actual length. In a synod held under Cyprian, in A.D. 251, after Easter certainly, and most probably in the summer, it was resolved among other matters that those of the lapsed who had even sacrificed should be admitted after a term of penance. Cyprian foreseeing signs of the renewal of persecution, directed through another synod on the Ides of May of the following year (Ep. lix. 12) that these lapsi should be at once re-admitted (Ep. lvii.). Their penitence therefore had not exceeded nine months. It is true that they were reconciled under circumstances of particular urgency; but one or two centuries later, an idolater would not have been admitted in less than several years, under any circumstances. In general it may be stated, that up to the time of Montanus the duration of penitence was very short; after Tertullian it became longer; but frequently in urgent cases it was curtailed, both by councils and bishops, and in some instances remitted entirely. The contrast between this leniency in the African and Roman churches and the crushing severity of the Spanish fathers at Elvira, about a generation later, shews that the system of discipline was not yet organised on a uniform basis.

[a] These canons have sometimes another reading, "in fine," in place of "nec in fine," and also in c. 63 of "vix in fine;" but the harsher reading is the more generally received one. Chiefly on account of the similarity of these canons to the Novatian heresy, Morinus (ix. 19) endeavours to prove that the council must have been held prior to the condemnation of Novatus, in fact before the age of Cyprian.

2. Rites and Usages.—Although in the earliest ages the term of penance was short, and part of it was frequently remitted, there was greater strictness than afterwards prevailed in granting it. No one was admitted who did not beg admission from the bishop, with all the outward signs of deep contrition. From the time of Novatus onwards admission was easier, for when penitence was known to involve long years of public humiliation, less scruple was shewn in opening its privileges to all who were content to submit to it. After the 4th century it came to be laid down that penitence was to be denied to none who sought it. Innocent I. A.D. 402–417 (Ep. xxv. init.; Labb. Conc. ii. 1288), declared that he held it to be an act of impiety to refuse imposition of hands; an opinion upheld by Celestine I. A.D. 422–432 (Ep. ii. ad Episc. Gall. c. 2; Labb. Conc. ii. 1620). Similar resolutions were passed by some of the Frankish councils (Conc. Andegav. A.D. 453, c. 12; Conc. Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 36). But in earlier times penitence was regarded more in the light of a privilege and concession than of a right, and more caution was used in granting the privilege, from the fact that it was administered once only; if the penitent afterwards relapsed, there was no door by which he could return.

The earliest records exhibit the delinquent outside the door of the church, clothed in sackcloth, and with ashes upon his head, asking the worshippers as they entered the church to implore God on his behalf, and make intercession for him with the bishops and presbyters and the whole congregation. In the Apost. Const. ii. 16, already cited, it is directed that the offender is to be kept outside the church, and detained there till he has given evidence of genuine repentance. The length of the exclusion rested absolutely with the bishop. He too was the sole judge of the sincerity of the repentance. The locality of the repentant man who was seeking the peace of the church was outside the door (Tert. de Pudicit. 3); there, in his remorse, he threw himself in the dust before the feet of the priests (Tert. de Poenit. c. 9), and before the brethren (ibid. c. 10), with weeping and supplications for mercy. His self-abasement was a request to be admitted to the grace of penitence; it was the first act of the repenting sinner, begging his repentance might be accepted. The behaviour which befits the repenting sinner is drawn out by Cyprian, in language which there is no reason to suppose is not to be accepted literally (de Laps. c. 21): "Men must pray, and entreat with increased continuance; pass the days in mourning, and the nights in vigils and weeping; employ their whole time in tears and lamentations; lie stretched on the ground; prostrate themselves among ashes, sackcloth, and dust; after Christ's raiment lost, wish for no garment beside; after the devil's feast, must voluntarily fast; give themselves to righteous works, whereby sins are cleansed; apply themselves to frequent almsgiving, whereby souls are freed from death." Compare Eusebius, H. E. v. 28. The next stage was, that the bishop, satisfied of the man's repentance, and yielding to the intercessions addressed to him, sent the deacon to bring him into the church (Apost. Const. ii. 16), and solemnly laid his hands upon his head, and admitted him to penitence. Whether his public confession, which had necessarily been uttered during his abasement outside, was repeated now, or at some later stage, or was spoken again and again at different stages, there is no evidence clearly to shew. [EXOMOLOGESIS, p. 644.] What is certain is, that an open acknowledgment of guilt was required at the beginning of penitence. The imposition of hands, as in confirmation and ordination, was invariably accompanied with prayers, the form of which no doubt varied in different churches. One example is given in Apost. Const. viii. 9, of what date is uncertain; and such forms of prayer are found in all the penitential rituals of the 9th and following centuries. At the time of imposition of hands, the bishop assigned to the delinquent his term and degree of penance and thenceforth, and until he was reconciled, he became a penitent, properly so called. After the performance of the various acts of contrition, the fastings and self-mortifications, the penitent was received back into the church. And this reception in the first three centuries took place immediately after the conclusion of the penance, and carried with it all the privileges of full communion. This appears to have been the undoubted use of Cyprian, and of the Roman and African bishops of his age.

[b] There is one exception to this statement: c. 23 inflicts an exclusion of three years on laymen who mutilate themselves. Morinus iv. 9, without giving any definite reasons, regards the words ἔτη τρία as an interpolation.

III. The Penitential Stations.

After the close of the 3rd century, discipline became more systematic and more rigid. The Novatian controversies had had a twofold effect on the Catholic system. On the one hand, penitence was very rarely denied to any offender; on the other, its duration was longer, and its austerities sharper. It came to be regarded less and less in the light of a privilege, and more exclusively as a penalty—a weapon in the hands of the rulers of the church, to punish her criminals. In the earliest ages, and before the zeal of Christians was cooled by the influx of the mixed multitude which the cessation of the persecutions introduced, the fastings and mortifications of a repentant sinner were voluntary for the most part, the natural expression of inward grief. There was no fixed time for their continuance; this was determined solely by the earnestness of the repentance, and the discretion of the bishop. But now penitence became a penal sentence, which was to be worked out by certain appointed stages—so many years to be passed in one stage under certain conditions, so many more in another with a relaxation of the conditions, the later stage not to be begun till the earlier was completed; and so, step by step, the outcast was restored to full communion. The stages were the well-known penitential stations. The East was their birthplace. In the councils of Neocaesarea, A.D. 314, c. 3, and Ancyra, A.D. 314, cc. 20, 21, 25, reference is made to the ὡρισμένοι βαθμοί of penance, proving that there were certain stages which were so well known and well established in the church that it was not necessary to define them. The earliest mention of them by distinct names is in the last chapter (c. 11) of the Canonical Epistle of Gregory Thaumaturgus. This canon is commonly regarded as of a somewhat later date than the rest of the Epistle, but it expresses the view of a period shortly subsequent to that of Gregory of what was then believed to have been the course of discipline in Gregory's age. The definition there given of the stations is this: "Fletus est extra portam Oratorii, ubi peccatorem stantem oportet fideles ingredientes orare ut pro se precentur. Auditio est intra portam in Narthece, ubi oportet eum qui peccavit stare usque ad Catechumenos, et illinc egredi. Audiens enim, inquit, scripturas et doctrinam, ejiciatur, et precatione indignus censeatur. Substratio autem est ut intra portam Templi stans cum Catechumenis egrediatur. Consistentia est ut cum fidelibus consistat; et cum Catechumenis non egrediatur." In the system of discipline carried on by Basil (cc. 22, 56, 57, 58, 64, 66, 75, 77, 80, 81, 83), and his brother, Gregory of Nyssa (Can. Ep. passim), the stations bore a prominent place; and their use seems to be taken for granted in the councils of the early part of the 4th century—Ancyra, Laodicea, Neocaesarea, Nicaea. They had then become a recognised, and, so to speak, a canonical branch of the penitential organization of the church. Their working will best be seen by taking the penitent through the several stages. At the outset it is supposed that the delinquent, either by confession or notoriety, or after an examination, stands convicted of a grievous sin; that he has made an open acknowledgment of it, whether before the bishop or the presbytery, or the whole congregation [Exomologesis]; that he has received imposition of hands from the bishop, and is then to undergo his penance through each step of the series. The strict letter of the law sentenced him to begin at the first and lowest of these, but this strictness must in practice have been frequently relaxed. Even when the system was in its greatest force, that is to say, in the Eastern church through the 4th century, some countenance was given to this laxity by the canons themselves. Thus the Conc. Nicaen. c. 12, decrees that those who shew their repentance by their dress, and by fear, and by tears, and by submission and good works, may, after a time among the "audientes," share in the communion prayer; the principal and laborious station of the "substrati" being thus omitted. Basil (c. 4) in the same way curtails the penance of one who has been thrice married. The Conc. Ancyr. (c. 7) permits certain delinquents, after two years among the "substrati," to leap over the stage of the "consistentes," and be received to full communion. Analogous instances occur in Greg. Thaumat. c. 9; Basil, cc. 13, 61, 73, 80, 81. It was only in rare cases that an offender was sent at all to the mourners or the hearers. The ordinary course, almost universal in the Latin church, and very general in the Greek, was to remit him at once to the great station of the "substrati." This was the course enjoined by the Council of Ancyra, cc. 5, 7, 8, 16, 24. In Basil, however, a strict adherence to the four consecutive stations was decreed for all great crimes. In the Canonical Epistle of Gregory of Nyssa, the station of "consistentia" does not occur. The penitent is allowed by him to pass from the station below to full communion. These variations are found during the full vigour of the system. When once it had been weakened, it must have been impossible to restore it, and to recall delinquents back to submission to this ideal severity.

1. The Mourners, flentes, προσκλαίοντες.—This was the first stage through which the penitent was to pass. It is to be distinguished from the mourning and weeping outside, to which reference has already been made in the discipline of the earlier centuries. The station of the mourners was the position of those whose penitence had already begun. The mention of the name is rare among the early authorities; and it is not likely that the thing itself was frequently imposed. It was part of the scheme and framework of the system, held in reserve rather than commonly inflicted. Reference is made to it directly in the last canon (c. 11), which is attributed to Gregory Thaumaturgus, and indirectly, in c. 8 of the same epistle, where certain robbers are held to be undeserving even of hearing; that is to say, they were not to be allowed inside the building. The only station then remaining for them would be among the mourners. Basil introduces the station by a similar paraphrase. "Polygamists," he says (c. 80), "are not to be received for three years;" and a short time afterwards sentences other culprits to be ejected for three years, and in each case adds, "then they are to be hearers for two, kneelers for three," &c. The terms "to be ejected," and "not to be received," signify some stage below that of hearers, which can only be among the mourners. In many of his canons (cc. 22, 56, 57, 58, 59, 64, 66, 75), the station is mentioned directly, and by name. But this is not the case in the Canonical Epistle of Gregory of Nyssa. He remarks that there is a canon of that sort that habitual fornicators are to be expelled for three years altogether from prayer, and afterwards be hearers for three years, &c. The being expelled from prayer is an indirect way of describing the lowest station.

i. Their Position.—In the appointment of the ancient churches there was an open area or space set apart in front of the door. All who entered the church necessarily came through this area or approach. This was the place assigned to the mourners, and beyond it they were forbidden to pass. The removal of delinquents outside the very doors of the church was a practice as old as Tertullian, who states (de Pudicit. c. 4) that for certain monstrous crimes the criminal was not allowed to cross the threshold of any part of the sacred building. At a later period Chrysostom warns (Hom. xvii. in Matt.) some of his hearers, that if they continue contumacious they shall be prohibited from entering even the porch, as adulterers and murderers are prevented. Morinus is disposed to think that ejection from the building and exposure to the elements is the interpretation of the disputed c. 17 of Conc. Ancyr. which sentences those guilty of unnatural crimes to pray εἰς τοὺς χειμαζομένους, inter hyemantes.

ii. Duration and Mode of Penance.—The mourners being placed outside the very doors of the church, could take no part in what was going on inside. They were cut off from all sacred rites whatever. They could hear neither the reading of the Scripture nor the preaching; still less could they join in the prayers or in the sacred mysteries. So far as public worship was concerned, they were to all intents and purposes aliens from the church. There remained to them only their personal devotions, and their hopes by earnestness of repentance and amendment of life to obtain a mitigation of their sentence. Still there were certain duties attached, not exclusively to this station, but to a state of penance generally, and which would be more rigorously enforced in this station whenever it was occupied, by the performance of which the penitent was led to expect that he might make a favourable impression on the church from which he had been expelled. The foremost of these was an open and frequent acknowledgment of his guilt. And this self-abasement, as Ambrose points out (Poenit. ii. 10), was not inflicted merely for the humiliation of the offender, but as proof and fruit of his contrition. If pardon, he says, has to be obtained from one in secular power, you go about, and canvass and supplicate people, and cast yourself at their feet, and kiss their very footsteps, and bring forward your innocent children to plead for their guilty parent; and need you be ashamed to use the same earnestness in beseeching the church to intercede to God for you? (See Pacian, Paraen. ad Poenit, c. 6.) The dress of the mourner was to correspond with his language and position. There were no special regulations allotting a distinctive garb to him, but whatever dress was held to be suitable to severe penance must be held to apply to the station in which the greatest severity was exercised. For a fuller account of the penitential dress see below, under the section Kneelers, p. 1593. It remains to point out the length of time for which delinquents were remitted to this lowest depth of penitence. Basil, c. 56, assigns twenty years to a murderer, four of which are to be among the mourners. For the same crime the code of Gregory of Nyssa places the murderer for nine years in the lowest station. For manslaughter, (Basil, cc. 58, 59), two of the eleven years of exclusion are to be among the mourners; for adultery, four out of fifteen; for uncleanness, two out of seven. One canon (c. 73) sentences an apostate to spend the remainder of his life a mourner.

2. HEARERS, audientes, ἀκροώμενοι.—The notices of this second station are scanty. There is no express mention of any rites or austerities peculiar to it, nor of any ceremony by which the penitent was promoted to it from the stage below. With many of the Latin Fathers—Tertullian, Cyprian, Augustine—the "audientes" were the catechumens, and these writers do not use the term at all to express a penitential station. In fact, it is doubtful if the station itself ever obtained a general use in the Western church. It was unknown in Africa; it is not mentioned by Ambrose as part of the Italian system; it is altogether omitted in the Collectio Canon. of Martin of Braga, and therefore presumably was not in use in Spain. The only precise and direct reference to the hearers among Latin writers is to be found in one of the letters of pope Felix III. A.D. 483–492 (Ep. vii. ad Episc. Universs. Labbe, Conc. iv. 1075), who decrees that those who submitted to a second baptism should undergo the same penalty which c. 11 of Conc. Nicaen. laid upon the lapsed, that is to say, three years among the hearers, &c. In the East the station was a recognised part of the organization of discipline from the beginning of the 4th century (Gregory Thaumat. c. 11; Basil, cc. 22, 56, 75, &c.; Gregory Nyss. c. 3; Conc. Ancyr. cc. 4, 6, 9; Conc. Nicaen. cc. 11, 12; Apost. Const. viii. 5).

i. Their Position.—The c. 11 of Gregory Thaumat. places the hearer within the door in the narthex of the church. His position, strictly speaking, was in the porch (προπύλαιον, πρόθυρον, πρόναος), but this could not always be enforced in practice. The object of this station was, that he should be a listener to the Scriptures and the sermon. In some buildings he might be able to hear while standing in the vestibule; but as a rule his place must have been assigned within the building at the lowest end of the church. Inside the church was the position as interpreted by the Greek canonists (Balsamon in can. 11, 12, Conc. Nicaen.; Zonaras, in c. 4 Conc. Ancyr.; Harmenopulus. Epitom. Canon. sec. v. tit. 3). He was so far in advance of the mourner that he was spared the abject self-abasement and supplication expected in the lowest stage, and he had moreover the privilege of hearing the Word of God, but he did not as yet receive any imposition of hands, nor share in any intercessory prayer. He was admitted within the walls of the church, but on the same footing with Jews, and heretics, and heathen, and the first order of catechumens; for against none of these classes who wished to enter to listen to the Scriptures were the doors of the church to be closed (4 Conc. Carthag. c. 84).

3. KNEELERS (substrati, ὑποπίπτοντες).—This was the third and principal station in the Eastern system; in the Western, it was not only the principal, but in general practice must have been the only one, with the exception, perhaps, of the consistentes. When the Latin fathers speak of penitence, it is the position and the penance of the kneelers that they have in their mind. It has already been seen that the two earlier stages entered little into the practical administration of the discipline of the West. The Latin versions by Dionysius Exiguus, and by Martin of Braga of the canons of Ancyra, translate ὑποπίπτοντες and ὑπόπτωσις by poenitentes and poenitentia. And so the pontifical letter of Felix III. (Ep. vii.), already cited, renders the ὑποπεσόντας of c. ii. Conc. Nicaen. by "subjaceant inter poenitentes." It therefore appears that, generally, when the word penitence was employed in the West during the period under review, it referred not to the four stations in succession, but to this particular one of the kneelers. In this station also was performed the exomologesis of the earlier fathers, and the "plena, legitima poenitentia" of Cyprian and the Conc. Eliber. In one of Basil's canons (c. 22) this station is called pre-eminently μετάνοια, poenitentia.

i. Their Position.—The position of the penitent, or the kneeler, is stated by Gregory to be within the door of the church, so that he may go out with the catechumens. He stood within the walls of the building in the part below the ambo. And this position agrees with the decrees of Basil (cc. 22, 58, 75), and is the one assigned by the Greek commentators on the canons (see, for instance, Zonaras and Balsamon in can. 11, 12; Conc. Nicaen. can. 4, 5; Conc. Ancyr.) The ambo thus served as a point of demarcation between the penitents and the faithful; if the number of the faithful was so great as to extend below the ambo, the penitents were thrust lower still.

ii. Rites and Prayers.—In the two lower stations the delinquents were outside the care of the church; as mourners they could not enter the building, as hearers they could only listen to the reading and preaching of the word; but in the stage of kneelers they were again recognised as a part, though an erring part, of the Christian fold. In the first place, they underwent frequent, if not constant, imposition of hands. The 3 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 589, c. 11, orders penitence to be administered according to the form of the ancient canons, which appoint, as it proceeds to explain, that the penitent should frequently resort to imposition of hands. And long before this, the 4 Conc. Carthag. A.D. 398, c. 80, had ordered the hands of the priest to be laid on penitents at every time of fasting; and even on days of remission (id. c. 82), when other Christians were accustomed to stand during their prayers, penitents were not to be exempt from kneeling. Together with imposition of hands, special prayers were offered on his behalf; c. 19 of Conc. Laodic. A.D. 320, gives an early account of these prayers. After the catechumens have gone out, the prayers of the penitents shall be offered, and when they have come under the hand of the priest and departed, then the prayers of the faithful. The order of the service is related fully in the Apost. Const. viii. 8, 9. After the dismissal of the candidates for baptism, the deacon cried out, "Orate poenitentes and let us pray earnestly for our brethren who are undergoing penance; that the God of mercy would shew them the way of repentance, and admit their contrition and confession and bruise Satan under their feet," &c. When the prayers was finished, the deacon bade them arise and bow their heads to receive the bishop's benediction. The order of prayer accompanying this rite is then given. At the conclusion of this, the deacon exclaimed, "Depart ye who are penitents." The 3 Conc. Carthag. A.D. 397, c. 32, directs these rites, in the case of notorious delinquents, to take place "ante apsidem." An earlier and simpler account of the dismissal of the penitents from church is given in Apost. Const. ii. 57. There is distinct reference to this service in Chrysostom. "The first prayer," he says (Hom. 71 in Matt. p. 624), "which we pray for the energumens, is full of mercy; the second prayer likewise, when we pray for the penitents, is for mercy." Bingham, Antiq. XIV. v. 13, raises the question whether these prayers, which were an undoubted part of the Eastern offices, were in use also in the West, but concludes that the usage was the same in both branches of the church. Sozomen (H. E. vii. 16) gives a graphic account of what he had himself, perhaps, witnessed in a Roman church. "In the Western church, and especially in Rome, the place in which the penitents stand is visible to all; they take up their position in it distressed and sorrowful. When the liturgy is finished, as they may not share in the sacred mysteries, they throw themselves prostrate on the ground with cries and tears, when the bishop, in his compassion, coming to them, falls likewise by their side, raising his voice with theirs, till at length the whole congregation is dissolved in tears. After this the bishop is the first to rise and to take them by the hand; and when he has offered the prayers suitable for sinners performing penance, he dismisses them from the church." The same ceremony of assigning the penitents a special place, and uniting with them in prayer, and dismissing them with the catechumens, was in use in the Frankish church (Conc. Agath. c. 60; Conc. Epaon. c. 29).

iii. Dress.—The delinquent in this stage of penance was to be arrayed in sackcloth. Whether he was required to wear this at all times while under sentence, or only during his public prostration in the church, does not appear. So Ambrose (ad Virg. Laps. c. 8) exhibits a virgin who had fallen into sin, undergoing penance, clothed in sackcloth, and with ashes sprinkled upon her head. And so Jerome (Ep. 30 ad Ocean.) describes the garb of Fabiola, while doing penance in the Lateran church in presence of the clergy and people of Rome, with a garment of sackcloth, with her hair dishevelled, and her face and hands unwashed. So Gregory of Tours (Hist. viii. 20), depicts the penance of bishop Ursicinus. It was one of the decrees of the council of Agde (A.D. 506, c. 15), that an offender, from the beginning of his penance, should wear "cilicium," as was the custom throughout the church; and that if he had neglected to change his dress, he should not be admitted among the penitents. The "sicut ubique constitutum est" of c. 15. Conc. Agath. is illustrated by Tertullian de Pudicit. c. 5; Cyprian de Laps. c. 19; Caesarius Arelat. Hom. i.; 3 Conc. Tolet. c. 12, and by the subsequent directions of the rituals of the 8th and 9th centuries. The sordid garb of penance was to be worn as long as the exclusion continued (Pacian, Paraen. ad Poenit. c. 19). Another austerity, enjoined by c. 15, Conc. Agath. was cutting off the hair—a direction also found in 1 Conc. Barcinon. A.D. 540, c. 6, and 3 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 589, c. 12. A man was to shave his head; a woman to wear a veil. This veil was the general dress of a female penitent (Optatus ii. in fin.). Ambrose (Virg. laps. c. 8) had ordered his penitent virgin to cut off that hair which before she had used as a blandishment. The shaving the head gave place, at a later date, to the opposite practice of neglecting the hair and the beard, and suffering it to grow long and heavy, as a symbol of the weight of sin resting on the penitent's head (Isidore de Eccles. Off. ii. 16).

iv. Penitential Exercises.—In addition to the public submission to the appointed course of discipline—the prostration in the church, the open confession, the penitential dress, the rejection from the Eucharistic service—certain special acts of self-mortification were required from the penitent. In the earlier ages, and when zeal was warmer, these acts of contrition were left to the conscience of the contrite sinner. All that was absolutely demanded of him by ecclesiastical usage was obedience to the rites of the public censure. Still it was thought becoming, and a suitable token of sincerity, that the private life should be in accordance with the public profession. So Pacian (Paraen. ad Poenit. c. 19), speaks of it as a daily duty of a penitent to weep in sight of the church, to mourn a lost life in sordid garb, to fast, to pray, to fall prostrate, to refuse luxury, to hold the poor man by the hand, to entreat the prayers of the widows, to fall down before the priests, to essay all rather than to perish. But, as will be seen when a later period is reached, these private acts of penance came more and more to be added on to the public discipline, till, ultimately, they usurped its place. A still later stage will shew these acts redeemable by money payments. The chief of these penitential exercises was fasting, borne sometimes as a self-imposed austerity, sometimes as an additional penalty inflicted by authority. At a later date these special fastings were an invariable accompaniment of the censures of private penance. In the 4th and 5th centuries, if not invariable, they were always expected (Ambrose, ad Virg. laps. c. 9; de Poenit. ii. 10; Caesar. Arelat. Hom. i.) Sozomen, continuing his account (H. E. vii. 16) of the practices of the Western church, states that, in addition to the public formalities, the penitent voluntarily exercised himself in fastings, and in abstinence from meat and from the bath, or in other mortifications which had been commanded him. These austerities were usually assigned, as Sozomen relates, by the penitentiary; but as that office was altogether abolished in the time of Nectarius, the more general practice in the church must have been that the bishop, or priest, under whose ministrations the delinquent ordinarily lived, allotted them. By the end of the 5th century, special penitential fastings were the common practice (Felix III. Ep. 7). Towards the middle of the following century, other restrictions were added. The first council of Barcelona, A.D. 540 (cc. 6, 7), not only orders penitents to pass their time in prayer and fasting, with a shaven head and a religious dress, but also forbids them to be present at banquets or to take a part in public affairs, but to lead a frugal life in their own homes. The length to which these deprivations and macerations were carried may be gathered from what is told of a visit to the penitential cells of a monastery by John Climacus in the 6th century (apud Morin. vi. 11). After relating the laborious penance of the prisoners, he adds, "What I saw and heard among them filled me with despair, when I compare my easy ways with the rigour of those saints, and consider what the aspect of the place, and of their whole dwelling was, how dark, and foetid, and sordid, and squalid," &c. In addition to fasting and abstinence from the ordinary enjoyments and luxuries of life, there were two other restrictions laid upon penitents, one of which cut them off from marriage, or, if they were married, from conjugal intercourse; the other, from the profession of arms or any other secular calling. These two restrictions were curiously confined, both as to the date and the part of the church in which they were in force. In the first place, they are not met with in any of the authorities prior to the conversion of the empire. Neither Tertullian, nor Cyprian, nor Pacian, nor the councils of Elvira or Arles, make any reference to penitents being excluded from marriage or marriage-rights, or from bearing arms, or carrying on business, or taking any part in public affairs. So, with regard to the restrictions on public or professional life. Christians were undoubtedly prohibited from undertaking certain public offices (Conc. Eliber. c. 56; 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 7), not because they were penitents, but because of the taint of idolatry attaching to the offices in question. What has been said with regard to the absence of these restrictions in the West in the first three centuries, applies to the Eastern church absolutely. Neither celibacy, nor retirement from secular life, was ever imposed in connexion with public penance in the East. Such prohibitions were frequently laid upon the clergy, but upon the clergy alone (Con. Apost. cc. 81, 82; Conc. Chalced. c. 3). Coming to the Western usage, the Latin fathers no doubt counsel seclusion and continence during the time of penance (for example, Ambrose de Poenitent. ii. 10), but they do not make them obligatory. The earliest decision on the subject is in a letter (Ep. i. 5) of pope Siricius, A.D.

384–398, in reply to Himerius, bishop of Tarragona (Labb. Conc. ii. 1017), which prohibits participation in the elements, although it sanctions communion in prayer, to those who, after their penance, had returned to military life and contracted a second marriage. There was always a tendency in such restrictions to increase in severity. Accordingly, the 2 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 443, c. 21, casts out altogether from the doors of the church a penitent who, during his penance or afterwards, entered upon marriage a second time. And 3 Conc. Aurelian. A.D. 538. c. 25, prohibits a penitent from resuming arms or secular pursuits under penalty of being denied communion to the hour of death. Still severer is a decree of 2 Conc. Barcinon. A.D. 599, c. 4, which places marriage during penance on the same footing as the marriage of a nun, and orders both to be utterly expelled from the church. Some of the Frankish councils (2 Conc. Arelat. c. 22; 3 Conc. Aurelian. c. 24) forbade married people even to be received as penitents. The latest canon appointing these restrictions is the one of Barcelona just quoted. These special penalties may therefore be said to have been in use through the 5th and 6th centuries, and only in the Western church. They will reappear later in connexion with the Western discipline; no longer, however, as an ordinary part of public penance, but rather as special punishments for special great crimes. It is manifest that this discipline strictly enforced would not only lay a heavy burden on those who submitted to it, but would also lead to great practical inconvenience. The number of penitents at this time was very large, and if they were to be excluded, not only during their penance, but for the remainder of their lives, both from carrying arms and from all secular pursuits, their means of livelihood would be cut off. The necessities of the case led to a system of dispensation, upon which much light is thrown in one of the epistles of pope Leo I. A.D. 440–461 (Ep. xcii. Labb. Conc. iii. 1408, where both the questions and replies are given). He is writing in answer to questions put to him by Rusticus, bishop of Narbonne. In reply to interrog. 10, asking how penitents who plead in a law-suit are to be treated? Leo answers, that a man who is seeking pardon for spiritual wrong must be content to forego his civil rights; and in fact, he prohibits the penitent from appearing in court. In reply to the next question, with regard to trade and business, he decrees that although all matters of buying and selling are likely to stain the soul, still that there are some trades which are honourable, and he gives no decision in the matter. In practice this distinction appears to have held good, that a respectable trade or profession was open to a penitent; but that if he resumed any questionable, still more any discreditable business, he again exposed himself to ecclesiastical censure. And this is in accordance with the language of Gregory (Hom. 24 in Evangel.), that there are certain trades which can scarcely be carried on without contamination with sin, and it is obligatory on a repentant sinner not to adopt one of them. The restriction with regard to war did not involve the same practical difficulty as secular business, and to this Leo was not disposed to grant any dispensation declaring (Ep. xcii. interrog. 12) that it was contrary to all ecclesiastical usage for any one at the conclusion of his penance to resume arms. With respect to continence, the councils in the canons cited above insisted upon strict self-control, both during penance and afterwards. This strictness Leo (ibid. interrog. 13) would rather relax, and allow a married man to return to his wife when his penance is over. This decision of Leo is cited with approval by the sixth council of Toledo (A.D. 638, c. 8) where the continence of penitents is the subject of a long disquisition.

4. The BYSTANDERS, consistentes, συνισταμένοι. —The fourth and last penitential station. The ecclesiastical term σύστασις is given in the c. 11. of Gregory Thaumaturgus, and frequently in the canons of Basil. The Conc. Ancyr. uses the word once only, c. 25. The signification of the term is, standing together with the faithful and communicating with them, but in prayer only, and not being dismissed before the Eucharistic service. In the earlier Greek canons the station is more frequently expressed by some paraphrase. The c. 12 of Conc. Nicaen. decreed that after an offender had expiated his allotted sentence among the hearers, he might communicate in prayer. This communion to which the "consistentes" were admitted, extended no further than the right to share in the Eucharistic prayers. All the other rites of the sacrament, and more particularly reception, were forbidden. Among the prohibited rites was that of bringing oblations. The Conc. Ancyr. frequently (cc. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 16, 24) describes this fourth station by the expression "let them be present at the Eucharist without oblation" (χωρὶς προσφορᾶς κοινωνησάτωσαν). The c. 11 of Conc. Nicaen. expresses the last stage by similar language. See also Felix, Ep. iii. 7. Communion in prayer, without the privilege of making an oblation, was therefore tantamount to rejection from actual participation. And this appears to have been the extent of the ἀφορίζεσθαι of the apostolic canons and the abstinere of Cyprian and of the councils of Elvira and Arles. The consistentes comprised several degrees and classes of penitents. 1. Those who had worked their way up through one or more of the lower stages. 2. Those whose censure only excluded them from participation, either because their offence was a light one, as in the case of the inhabitants of cities absenting themselves from church for three Sundays, or of gamblers (Conc. Eliber. cc. 21, 79; 1 Conc. Arelat. cc. 3, 4, 5, 6, 11), or because the offender had at once confessed his crime and obtained a remission from penance. (Gregory Thaumat. c. 9; Basil, c. 61). 3 Penitents, who, after reconciliation, had resumed their secular trades, and who had re-married, and who by a decree of pope Siricius, A.D. 384–398 (Ep. i. 5), were to be denied participation. Of these classes, the second, which contributed probably the greater part of the whole, were in no strict sense penitents; the third was an exceptional case. The first were the consistentes proper. They were admitted once more into communion with the faithful, with the exception of the right of making oblations, and receiving the elements. Whether or not they were exempt from all penitential exercises there is no evidence to shew. Whatever disabilities in the matter of marriage, and arms and public affairs and trade, were imposed upon other penitents, were laid also upon these, although it is most probable they were spared the humiliation of a penitential dress, and of public imposition of hands.

i. Their position.—The position of the consistentes was above the ambo with the rest of the congregation. This may be taken as a matter of course. It is nowhere expressly so stated, but as all those below the ambo, catechumens, penitents, energumens, were dismissed before the beginning of the eucharistic service, and the consistentes were permitted to remain, it is natural to conclude that their position in church would be above those who were dismissed. But whether they mixed indiscriminately with the faithful, or were set apart by themselves, is not so clear. Basil decrees (c. 4) with regard to a woman who had contracted a third marriage, that after so many years among the Hearers and Co-standers, they were to be restored to the place of communion (τῷ τόπῳ τῆς κοινωνίας), which would seem to imply that the actual communicant occupied a distinct place in the church; and bearing in mind the orderly arrangement of an ancient Christian congregation, the men on one side, and the women on the other, the monks, the virgins, and the sacred widows, in the front, it seems more likely that the penitents, even when they had reached the highest station, had a separate locality in the church.

IV. From the Seventh Century to the Ninth.

1. In the East. With the beginning of the 5th century, the Eastern system entered upon a new stage. The abrogation of the office of the Penitentiary priest, which took place some time during the episcopacy of Nectarius at Constantinople, A.D. 381–397, may be taken as the point of departure from the earlier practice. The reason and the circumstances of the removal of this church officer are given in Sozomen, H. E. vii. 16; Socrates, H. E. v. 19. The changes which may be traced to this act of Nectarius are—1. The removal of the presbyter whose office it was to superintend confession and penance. 2. The decline of the custom, which dated from the earliest ages, of acknowledging certain crimes openly before the congregation, the supervision of which had been one of the duties of the penitentiary. 3. The selection by the penitent of his acts of penance, instead of their assignment by the penitentiary. 4. The gradual cessation of public penance for secret crimes. 5. The cessation of the public rites of daily imposition of hands and prayers for the penitents, which were the chief ceremonies in the ritual of the station of the ὑποπίπτοντες. Of these changes, the first four followed as a matter of course from the abolition of the penitentiary's office. The public imposition and prayer did not long survive; they may be said to have ceased with the termination of the observance of the stations, and they formed no part of the Eastern discipline at the close of the 5th century. The solemnities observed toward the kneelers, who comprised the great body of those who were undergoing public penance, consisted of two parts; the first, the laying on of hands and the prayers; the second, the formal dismissal from the church. The latter of these continued in force after the former had fallen into disuse. Morinus (Poenitent. vi. 22) discovers a mention of this solemn dismissal in the Eccl. Mystagog., c. 14, of St. Maximus, who wrote in the 7th century. The disappearance of all the solemnities peculiar to the stations is coincident with the omission of any mention of the stations from the canons of councils. The one exception to this statement is Conc. in Trull. c. 87, which sentenced an adulterer to be a Mourner one year, a Hearer two, &c., &c. Martene (de Rit. Antiq. i. 6) suggests that this canon points to the existence of the stations in the 7th century. Morinus, with more reason, regards it rather in the light of an historical reference by the fathers in Trullo, than of a canon on existing discipline. The absence of any reference to the rites and solemnities of penitents is equally marked in the Greek liturgies, as in the canons already cited. Those of Basil and Chrysostom are altogether silent with regard to them. So are the liturgical writings of Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, about A.D. 720. The Syriac liturgies of Antioch and the Nestorians, in common with all the oriental liturgies, mention the ritual of the catechumens, but not that of the penitents. Equally silent is that of St. Mark, which is said to have been used by the churches of Jerusalem and Alexandria. The liturgy of St. James has one direction which may refer to the dismissal of penitents. After the reading of the Gospel, the deacon is to say, Let none of the catechumens, none who are yet uninitiated, none who are unable to pray with us, be present at the mysteries. It is not improbable that the expression "those who are not able to pray with us," may refer to delinquents undergoing penance, but they are not mentioned by name. The same direction occurs in the Abyssinian liturgy (Morinus, Poenitent. vi. 22). In the age of the compilation of these liturgies, the old penitential rites of public prayer and imposition of hands, and to a great extent of solemn dismissal, had apparently vanished. In the time of the Greek canonist Balsamon, the 12th century, every vestige of them had completely departed, and they are spoken of in c. 19, Conc. Laodic., as customs of the early ages. It is difficult to determine with any fulness the penitential rites which took their place. The chief source of information is the Penitential book which bears the name of John the Faster, who succeeded to the patriarchate of Constantinople, A.D. 585. The Penitential is published in the Appendix (pp. 615–644) of the great work of Morinus, together with the Canonarium of John the Monk, who in the title is called a disciple of Basil, which can mean no more than that the treatise contains some of the traditionary teaching of Basil, or carries on his system. If the date commonly assigned to these books could be depended upon, there would be no difficulty in sketching the outline of the penitential system in the East, in the 6th and following centuries. But the books manifestly contain much later additions, and modern criticism has not yet determined how much is genuine, and how much spurious (Wasserschleben, Die Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche, p. 4, note). There is little doubt that John left behind him a collection of penitential canons, which for some ages had wide authority in the Eastern church. Nicephorus Chartophylax (Ep. ad Theod. Monach.) writing about the year 800, testifies to the general reception of the canons. A council of Constantinople, held under Alexius Commenus about A.D. 1085, replying to certain questions of some monks, condemns (quest. 11), the canonica-system of the Faster for having destroyed many souls by excessive indulgence. The book appears to have passed through the same history as some of the more familiar Penitentials of the West. In its present form it probably contains most of the original instructions of John, but with so much of accretion that it is unsafe to rely upon it in matters of detail. The use and encouragement of minute secret confession are unquestionable, if the Penitential is to be accepted as authentic in any shape. To stimulate confession, the priest was instructed to examine the delinquent in the utmost detail. Then there followed the delivery of the sentence, consisting mainly of fastings, and continuing sometimes for a number of years. Lastly, there came the singular practice, which may be dated from this age, and which continued peculiar to the Eastern discipline, of granting a preliminary absolution immediately after the confession, and after the imposition of penance, but deferring full restoration to communion till the completion of the penance, however long or short it might be. The only vestige of the public penitence remaining was the retirement of the penitent (ἀπὸ τοῦ ναοῦ) from the choir of the church into the narthex while the Mass was being celebrated. He was under instructions to retire at the same time with the catechumens, but he was not, like them, solemnly dismissed, although his retirement was doubtless a remnant of the old rite of formal dismissal. Reference to this practice of the penitent retiring is made in a MS. of Simeon of Thessalonica, In Sacr. Liturg., about A.D. 1000, published by Morinus, Appendix, p. 470. The order of conducting the confession in the Greek Penitential was this: first, the confession, accompanied by a certain ritual of posture and prayer, then a minute interrogation of the delinquent, then a short precatory absolution, and afterwards the assignment of a penance to be performed without any public ceremonial. [See EXOMOLOGESIS, Vol. I. p. 650.] The sentence sometimes extended to ten or fifteen years; the ἐπιτίμια (or penitential exercises) were chiefly confined to restrictions on matters of food and drink. [See FASTING, Vol. I. p. 663.] As, however, the ἐπιτίμια were precise and elaborate and sometimes of long duration, and, on certain festivals, might be omitted entirely, it was customary to assign them in writing. Slaves and servants of all classes were to receive only half the penance imposed upon their masters. The ritual described in the Penitentials was the model for the practice of penitence in the East throughout the middle ages (Leo Allatius Consen. Eccl. Orien. cum Occident. iii. 9).

2. IN THE WEST.

i. Public Penitence.—The changes which came over the Eastern discipline in the 5th century were longer in making their appearance in the West. But when the change came the same general results followed. The ritual of public imposition of hands, and an order of prayer and solemn dismissal before the eucharistic service, fell into disuse. Morinus infers from the absence of a penitential ritual in any of the early Latin liturgies, the Gregorian or Gelasian sacramentaries, the Ordo Romanus, the Ambrosian liturgy, or of any reference to one in the early liturgical commentators, Walafrid Strabo, Raban Maur, Amalarius, that the public rites in the treatment of penitents came to an end about A.D. 700. Another change, dating from about that period, and coincident with the introduction of the Penitentials, was the definition of the distinction between public and private penance. The latter, which was unknown in the early ages, now almost entirely usurped the place of the former; and it grew to be accepted as a custom of the church that public penance should be reserved for notorious offenders, but that for secret sins private penance sufficed. No exact date can be fixed as to the time in which public penitence fell into abeyance. It declined with the gradual decline of primitive church order. In the English church it had disappeared altogether before the close of the 7th century. There is a decree in the penitential of Theodore (A.D. 669–690, I. xiii. 4), which states that reconciliation was not to be publicly granted in his province, because public penance was not in existence. Even as early as the 6th century private penitence had made an inroad on the public discipline; there is a canon of 1 Conc. Matiscon. A.D. 581, c. 18, which deprives certain delinquents of communion till they had made satisfaction by public penance. In the stricter system of former centuries, the deprivation itself would have been a public penance. Morinus (vii. 1) quotes a decree from Conc. Leptin. A.D. 743, which he states to have been confirmed by pope Zacharias, that an offender who privately and spontaneously confessed should be dealt with privately; if he was openly convicted, or made a public confession, then he was to pass through penance publicly, in the presence of the church, according to the canons. This decree, which does not appear among the four extant canons of Lestines, was inserted in the later collections of the Capitularies, v. 52; and taken with other indirect indications of the decay of public discipline, it may be regarded as representing the general practice of the West at the close of the 8th century. Thus the 2 Conc. Remens. A.D. 813, c. 31, called attention to the distinction which ought to be observed between those doing public and private penance: a distinction also made by 6 Conc. Arelat. c. 26 in the same year, and repeated in the Capitulary issued by Conc. Ticin. A.D. 855, (Labb. Conc. viii. 149), and in Conc. Mojunt. A.D. 847, c. 31, under Raban. Maur. When once the custom became general that some might be exempt from public penitence, there naturally arose a difficulty in enforcing it in cases which had no claim to exemption. In different provinces, zealous and energetic bishops insisted upon the observance of the canons. Thus among the Capitula issued by Hincmar, A.D. 852 (Labb. Conc. viii. 585), to the clergy of the diocese of Rheims, was one to the effect that if, in defiance of clerical admonition, a notorious criminal refused to submit to public penance, resort was to be had to the extreme censure of excommunication. Hincmar allows a criminal fifteen days' grace, after which, if he still refuses submission, he is to be excommunicated. In England (Theod. Penitent. I. xiii. 4) public penitence was in abeyance as early as the close of the 7th century. In France, Jonas, bishop of Orleans (de Instit. Laic. i. 10), writing at the beginning of the 9th century, states that a public penitent was scarcely ever seen in the churches, and that the vigour of the ancient discipline was almost dead. It is not, however, to be supposed that the primitive system was quite gone. Public penitents were still to be seen, who were separated from the faithful in dress, and by their position in the congregation. An evidence of their existence is to be found in the laws passed for their protection. It was a criminal offence in a priest or layman to compel a public penitent to eat flesh or drink wine (Capitular. i. 157); to slay him was a crime of special enormity (ibid. iv. 18). The 9th century witnessed some revival of the old discipline. The organisation of the stations became again, in a modified form, the rule of the church (see Martene, de Rit. I. vi. art. 4). The Conc. Vormat., A.D. 868, c. 30, appointed a penitent to pray for a certain time outside the church doors; at the end of that period he was to be solemnly introduced, but still separated from the faithful, and be placed in a conspicuous corner of the church, and there to stand, unless he had special permission to sit (Conc. Mogunt. A.D. 888, c. 10); afterwards he was permitted to mix with the congregation, but reception of the elements came later (Capitular. v. 136). If the third stage of non-participation was prolonged, communion was granted on Christmas Day and Easter. Detailed directions for dealing with particular delinquents will be found in the pastoral letters of pope Nicholas I. A.D. 858–867; Ep. xvii. ad Rivol. Episc.; Labb. Conc. viii. 503; Ep. xxiv. ad Hincmar.; ibid. p. 513; Conc. Nannetens. A.D. 895, c. 17. In the matter of dress it does not appear that any change was made from the penitential garb in use in the earlier centuries. In some provinces it was the custom for the hair and beard to be shaven, in others to be neglected and suffered to grow long. All the penitentials and rituals to which an "ordo" is attached, speak of hair-cloth and ashes as appropriate to the time of penance. A penitent was also to go barefoot, as appears from the Ep. xvii. ad Rivol. Episc. of Nicolas I. just cited, which makes an exceptional concession in favour of an individual offender to wear boots or sandals. Conc. Tribur. c. 55, forbad also the use of linen. In addition to these austerities, a rigid and long-continued system of fasting was imposed. Gregory III. (A.D. 731–741, Ep. i. 7; Labb. Conc. vi. 1469) decided, in reply to a question of Boniface, that a parricide should be denied communion till death, should fast the second, fourth, and sixth days of each week, and abstain from flesh and wine as long as he lived. A man who murdered his own son was enjoined by Nicolas I. (Ep. xvii. ad. Rivol. Episc.) to abstain from flesh all the days of his life, for seven years to drink wine only on Sundays and festivals, and the remaining five years of his penance four days a week. He was allowed intercourse with his wife, but forbidden to bear arms except against the pagans, and if he had occasion to travel he must go on foot. Another criminal was ordered by the same pontiff (Ep. ad Hincmar.) to fast till evening all the years of his penance, except at Easter and on the festivals; an exemption extended in another case to the fifty days from Easter till Pentecost. These disabilities and austerities are enforced with some variety in the councils of that period (Conc. Vormat. cc. 26, 30, 36; Conc. Tribur. cc. 56, 58). Morinus sums up the penalties inflicted after the beginning of the 7th century, as distinguished from those of an earlier date, under four headings. 1. Those which concern dress and habit including the obligation to go with bare feet, and to wear no linen and to travel on foot. 2. The observance of specified days and modes of fasting 3. Corporal punishment. 4. Exile. [See CORPORAL PUNISHMENT, EXILE, FASTING, FLAGELLATION.] To this may be added a fifth of incarceration, or SECLUSION in a monastery, involving, of course, an abandonment of secular life. An ancient MS. from Beauvais (Martene de Rit. i. 6) gives an account of rites of public penance, which can hardly be later than the 9th century. It is interesting to note in it the vestiges of the old ritual, the detention without the door, the imposition of hands, and the solemn dismissal. "At the beginning of Lent, all delinquents undergoing, or about to undergo, public penance, should present themselves to the bishop before the door of the church, clothed in sackcloth, with bare feet and downcast looks. There the penitentiary priest should be present to examine their cases, and impose penance according to the appointed grades. The bishop should then bring them into the church, and prostrating himself on the ground, together with all the clergy, should sing the seven penitential Psalms; afterwards rising from prayer, he should lay his hands upon them in accordance with the canons, and sprinkle them with holy water and place ashes upon them, and cover their heads with sackcloth, and with groans and sighs announce to them that as Adam was cast out from Paradise, so must they be cast out from the church. He was then to order the deacon to conduct them outside the door, the clergy following them, and saying the sentence, 'In the sweat of thy face,' &c., and the bishop shall close the door upon them; and so they remain outside till the Coena Domini." A Novon MS. of the 9th century gives a short "ordo" for public penance, which is repeated by the Pseudo-Alcuin, and many rituals of a later date. "Take the penitent on the fourth day in the morning in Capite Quadragesimae, and cover him with sackcloth, and shut him up till Coena Domini." The same codex contains a form for the benediction of ashes, with the direction that when the ashes are laid on the head of the penitent, the priest is to say, "In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, remember that thou art dust, and that to dust thou shalt return."

ii. Private Penitence.—The whole system disclosed by the penitentials points to the prevalence of private penance. In the Greek penitentials the delinquent makes a private acknowledgment of his sins to the priest, he is questioned in private, and the various rites and ceremonies which precede final reconciliation are also private. The Latin, no less than the Greek, penitentials are entirely silent on the essential elements of public discipline. Their contents bear out the statement of Theodore (Penitent. I. xiii. 4) that public penance did not exist in the province for the discipline of which he published his book. The clergy had sufficient hold upon the consciences of their flock to compel them to submit to many severe acts of self-abasement and self-denial for their sins. But the converts of the independent northern races shrunk from the open humiliation of appearing before the congregation with a shaven head, and with the arms and the attire and the characteristic ornaments of a free man laid aside. The whole transaction, the imposition of the penance on the one side, and its performance on the other, was, as it were, a secret one between the delinquent and his priest or bishop. The church, as such, took no part in the matter. The nature of the sins censured varied from some trivial carelessness up to horrible and unnatural crimes. But each offender was alike subjected to penance whether his offence was labouring on the Lord's Day (Theod. Penitent. I. xi. 1) or murder (ibid. I. iv. 2) or heresy (ibid. I. v. 9). For the first of these offences the censure was seven days' penance; for the two last ten years. But in either case the delinquent became a penitent. The sentence was passed by the bishop or the priest, or even by a deacon, but there was no open or public rite connected with it. Fasting and abstinence were the usual penalties, and these were generally expressed in the disciplinary canons of all the penitentials, Irish, Anglo-Saxon, or Frankish. To these the Irish books especially added EXILE from the native land for a fixed period, alms to the poor, and the emancipation of a certain number of servi or ancillae, and in the case of bodily injuries satisfaction to the parents or friends (Poenitent. Vinniae, Wasserschleben, pp. 108–224). As discipline decayed, the notion of REDEMPTIONS began to be accepted, and other and easier penalties were introduced, such as the singing of so many psalms, the payment of so many solidi to the poor, so many strokes of a rod, or genuflexions (Beda Poenitent. xi. x. Cummean, Poenitent. "de divite vel potente quomodo se redimit pro criminalibus culpis," Wasserschleben, p. 464). Both Beda and Cummean give their sanction to the employment of a substitute by any one who was unable to say his psalms, an evasion which sounds perhaps the lowest depths to which the rigour of the primitive system had sunk. In most of the penitential books the quadragesimal season of the year and the legitimae feriae of the week were periods when more severe abstinence was imposed. See below, Season of Penitence. On certain days the penitent was free from his punishment; these are stated by Cummean at the conclusion of his prologue, to be all Sundays, Christmas, Epiphany, Easter, Pentecost, St. John Baptist, St. Mary Ever-virgin, the twelve Apostles, and St. Martin, because his body was reposing in that province. Several of the Frankish penitentials have attached to them a "ratio" or "ordo ad dandam poenitentiam." These are doubtless of a later age than the body of the canones to which they are appended. They are apparently of a sufficiently early date to throw some light on the system of private penance in the 8th century. The Penitential. Pseudo-Roman., the text of which belongs to the 7th century, has a long prologue, "Quomodo penitentes sunt suscipiendi sive reconciliandi" (Wasserschleben, p. 360). In it the priest is exhorted to fast one or two weeks with the penitent, and even with cries and tears to join in supplication with him. In this latter direction there is a trace of the custom of the earliest ages (Soz. H. E. vii. 16). When the penitent comes to confess his sins the priest is to bid him wait a little till he has entered into his chamber for prayer, and if he has no chamber, the priest should say the prayer that followed in his heart. After the prayers, are given further details on the fasting to be imposed and on almsgiving. the alms to be used either for the redemption of captives or the relief of the poor, or to be placed on the altar. Then follow "orationes ad dandam poenitentiam;" and, finally the prayer, which was to accompany the imposition of hands. This ordo is also published by Martene (de Rit. i. 6), from a pontifical from the Benedictine monastery of Jumièges of the 8th century. Communion was not invariably delayed till after the final reconciliation. In prolonged penitence Theodore permits communion "pro misericordia" after six months or a year. A MS. from the church of St. Gatianus of Tours, attributed by Martene (de Rit. i. 6) to the 9th century, contains an "ordo privatae ceu annualis poenitentiae," which discloses some variety of ritual. It directs all priests to exhort their flocks to come to confession the first day of Lent, and if from being on a journey or from being engaged in any business, they are unable to come for reconciliation on Coena Domini, the priest may reconcile them at once. When each one comes to confess, if a layman, he is to lay aside his staff, and, whether a clergyman or a monk, he is to bow himself to the priest, who will then order him to sit before him. Then follow the profession of faith and confession of sin, after which the penitent is to prostrate himself on the ground with groans and tears (prout Deus dederit). The priest is to suffer him to lie there for a time, and then raise him and assign him his penance; then comes a second prostration, and then supplication for the priest's intercession.

V. Sins and Penalties.

1. Sins subjecting to Penance.

i. Open Sins.—Only mortalia delicta exposed the delinquent to penitence in the early ages. Lesser offences were punished by the rejection of oblations and the refusal of the elements in holy communion. The faults and defects of daily life were considered to be fully satisfied by daily prayer. Penitence, strictly so-called, which involved an open acknowledgment of sin and a performance of certain acts of austerity and a special dress and a separation from the faithful in church, was restricted to certain grievous sins as defined by the canons. The model on which the penitential code was founded was the decision of the apostles with regard to the newly-converted Gentiles (Acts xv. 28, 29). For the first 400 years the three great sins of idolatry, murder, and adultery, or such as were closely allied to them, and clearly fell under the same category, were in general the only crimes punished by public penance. The slight or apparent exceptions to this statement will be investigated presently. In the moral and homiletical writings of the fathers of that period, the classification of sins and the enumeration of those which could only be expiated by penance are made with more fulness than in the canons of councils. Tertullian in his tract De Pudicit. c. 19, which represents the most rigid notions of that age, yet admits that some sins were matters of daily occurrence to which all were subject, and which consequently needed no penance. Among such he reckons anger and quarrelling, and a rash oath and a failure to keep an engagement, and an untruth told from modesty or necessity. But the three capital crimes he arranges on a level above all others (ibid. c. 12), and endeavours to prove, in accordance with the tenets of Montanism, that the church had no power to absolve them, as, he infers, she claimed to do through penance. Nearly all the references to penitence in Cyprian are in connexion with the lapsed, that is to say, idolatry. Although there are two passages which intimate that penance was allotted in the African church to less heinous sins. In Ep. xvi. 2 he condemns the laxity with which the eucharist was granted to the lapsed, whereas in lesser sins (minoribus peccatis), sinners do penance for an appointed time, and, according to the rules of discipline, come to confession, &c. In the following, Ep. xvii., he speaks again of penance being done for an appointed time for lesser offences which are not committed against God, contrasting, that is, such offences with idolatry, which is directly against the majesty of God. But the general rule of the church was that public penance was restricted to mortal sins. So it is stated by Pacian in his treatise on penance, which manifestly reflects the teaching of Cyprian. Other sins he considers (Paraen. ad Poenit. c. 9) may be cured by the compensation of good works, but idolatry, murder, adultery are capital crimes. Augustine clearly lays down that only the gravest sins were visited by public penance. There are some sins, he says (de Fid. et op. c. 26), so great as to deserve to be punished by excommunication; others which need not the infliction of that humiliation of penance which is imposed upon those who are properly called penitents in the church; a third class, again, from which none can escape, for which our Lord has left us a remedy in the daily prayer, "forgive us our trespasses." This distinction of light sins, for the cure of which daily prayer is sufficient, occurs again and again in his writings (Enchiridion, c. 71; Hom. xxvii. t. 10, p. 177; Hom. cxix. de Temp. c. 8; Ep. lxxxix. ad Hilar. quaest. 1; Ep. cviii. ad Seleucian., cited by Bingham). He tells the catechumens (de Symbol. ad Catechumen. i. 7) that those who are seen doing penance have been guilty of adultery or some such grievous act. He distinguishes between peccatum and crimen, the former, sinfulness from which none is free, the latter, an act of grievous sin (Tract. lxi. in Joan. t. 9, p. 126; De Civ. D. xxi. 27; de Symbol. i. 7). Ambrose (de Poenit. ii. 10) confines penance to graviora delicta. The canonical epistle of Gregory of Nyssa is an elaborate treatise on the nature of crime and of the ecclesiastical discipline suitable to it. Like the Latin fathers, he starts with murder, idolatry, and uncleanness as the three mortal sins, but he bases his classification, not on the decision of the apostolic council (Acts xv. 28, 29), but on the threefold division of the faculties of the soul, the rational, the irascible, and the concupiscible; and all sins punishable by penance he ranks under one of these three headings. Under the first are reckoned idolatry and apostasy, either of which, if committed wilfully and through instability of faith, must be expiated by a life-long exclusion; if under fear or compulsion, then a nine years' penance is sufficient. Under the second heading he includes adultery, which involves the disgrace or injury of another, and simple uncleanness, the former crime requiring double the penalty of the latter. To the irascible faculty he assigns murder, with the distinction of voluntary and involuntary homicide. He then discusses covetousness, which, in the language of St. Paul, he calls a species of idolatry, and which he says springs from a combination of all these faculties, but the censure of which, he adds, has been overlooked by the fathers before him. Of the branches of covetousness he considers robbery with violence and the spoiling of graves for the sake of the clothes and ornaments contained in them, to be the only offences requiring public penance. Simple theft and the robbery of tombstones were marked by no ecclesiastical censure. He declines to attach a penalty to usury and extortion, on the ground that the ancient canons have not done so. By usury, however, he must have meant usury by a layman; in the case of a clergyman it had been distinctly condemned by Conc. Nicaen. c. 17. The three capitalia delicta are the principal objects of Basil's canons. He has, in addition, one on perjury (c. 64), another on robbery (c. 61), and another on rape (c. 30); each of which might, without any violence, be brought under the heading of one of the three fundamental sins. The councils of Elvira, Ancyra, Neocaesarea impose penance on these three mortal sins only. In Conc. Eliber. cc. 73, 75, the crime of an informer was held to involve murder, and was punished accordingly. And in the same light, to judge from the extreme penalty attached to it, it was regarded by 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 14. In course of time, and apparently towards the close of the 4th century, the number of sins for which public penance was exacted began to be enlarged. As in the case of covetousness, in the passage just quoted, Gregory of Nyssa states that it had been overlooked by the ancient fathers, and that therefore he adds it to the list of delicta. Basil (c. 30) says the same of rape, and of polygamy (c. 80), that he had no ancient canons to guide him, and that he made them penal by his own judgment. Still these and similar additions did not materially alter the definition of ecclesiastical crimes, and as long as public penance was in force, the description of 1 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 398, c. 2, held good: "that a penitent was one who either on account of murder or various crimes and most heinous sins was doing public penance." Excommunication for small faults was strictly forbidden by Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 3. The 5 Conc. Aurelian. A.D. 549, c. 2, and 2 Conc. Arvern. A.D. 549, c. 2, laid a like prohibition on suspension from communion for light causes; an offender was to be suspended only on those grounds which the ancient fathers had decreed. As the boundaries of the church were enlarged and her relations with the state became closer, the ecclesiastical was framed more in accordance with the civil law. Thus the 2 Conc. Turon. A.D. 567, c. 20, inflicted long penance on the abduction of a sacred virgin, on the ground that the Roman law had made it a capital crime

And the spoiling of graves by clergymen was to be punished by deposition by 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 46, because such an offence was defined to be sacrilege by the public law. Hence it became an axiom of the church that any crime punishable by death by the code of the state was to be expiated by penance. This was the language held by pope Pelagius II. A.D. 578–590, Ep. ii. and by Gregory the Great, x. Ep. 13, ad Episc. Panit. Firman. (Moralia, v. 5). Under the system administered in England by Egbert the list of mortal sins became considerably enlarged. The following enumeration is given in the Archbishop's Penitential, c. 1, "de capitalia crimina." "Nunc igitur capitalia crimina secundum canones explicabo. Prima superbia, invidia, fornicatio, inanis gloria, ira longo tempore, tristitia seculi; avaritia, ventris ingluvies, sacrilegium, id est sacrarum rerum furtum, et hoc maximum est furtum, vel idolaticis servitudem, id est auspiciis et reliqua, adulterium, falsum testimonium, furtum, rapinam, cantus adsidua, idololatria, molles, sodomita, homicidi, perjuri." His second chapter treats "de minoribus peccatis," but the distinction between minora and capitalia in his list is altogether arbitrary and unmeaning. The complete account of the sins which required formal penitence must be sought in the penitential books themselves.

ii. Secret Sins.—No distinction was made so long as public penitence was in force between secret and notorious crimes. The same penalty was required for each. In the earlier ages, when public confession was practised, it followed as a matter of course that the ensuing penance should be public too. There is nothing to shew in the first four centuries that secret sins, after once they had become known to the church, were treated in any other way than sins which were detected. The only distinction was that, if the offence was spontaneously confessed, the penance was lighter (see below PENALTIES, iv. Alleviation of), but it was none the less open penance. Many of the offences censured by the canons could only have been known to the doers of them; for instance, Conc. Neocaesar. c. 9; Conc. Eliber. c. 76; Basil, Ep. cc. 69–71. The very exception which Basil (c. 34) states was allowed in the case of a married woman, implies that open penance was the rule. Her sin, if it was unknown to her husband, must have been expressly a secret one. She was spared open disclosure, not because of its secrecy, but to save her from her husband's vengeance. The Epistle of Leo to the bishops of Campania (Ep. lxxx.; Labb. Conc. iii. 1373), which is generally regarded as marking a departure from the early practice of open confession, is written throughout on the supposition that, whether the sin was open or secret, the penance was the same. Morinus gives some conspicuous instances of the admission of secret sins being followed by severe sentences. One was that of Potamius, bishop of Braga, who wrote to the bishops assembled in the tenth council of Toledo, A.D. 656, confessing that he had been guilty of fornication. The crime was altogether unsuspected and the confession spontaneous, yet he was sentenced by the council to life-long penance. See Morinus, v. 11, where this and other instances are detailed at length.

2. PENALTIES.

i. Whether exclusively spiritual.—The different penalties inflicted by ecclesiastical discipline may be divided into three degrees: i. excision from the church; ii. penance; iii. exclusion from communion. The second of these includes all the austerities and disabilities imposed by the penitential system. The extent and duration of them have been sufficiently discussed in the body of this article. Prior to the conversion of the empire the church had no power to interfere with the civil rights of her members, and her censures must have been exclusively spiritual. "The weapon by which the proud and contumacious are stricken," says Cyprian (Ep. iv. 4), "is a spiritual sword." [Compare LAW.] Yet sometimes the rulers of the church did not hesitate to apply to the heathen emperors to uphold their discipline. In answer to such an application, Aurelian commanded the judgment which deposed Paul of Samosata to be enforced by the civil power (Euseb. H. E. vii. 30), the emperor's authority being confined to compelling Paul to give up the house and church of his see. At a later date the bishops still more readily called in the power of the magistrate, when spiritual censures failed to maintain ecclesiastical order (Conc. Antioch. c. 5; 3 Conc. Carthag. c. 38; Codex African. cc. 68, 93); and no inconsiderable part of the ecclesiastical legislation embodied in the Theodosian Code, and at a later period in the capitularies of the Carolingian kings, had for its object the maintenance of the discipline of the church. What may be termed the natural rights of man were not touched by spiritual censures. A parent under penance did not lose his authority over his children, nor were subjects absolved from their allegiance to a prince, who was censured. One of the Christian emperors was a penitent, others heretics, and another an apostate, but this did not loosen the submission of the church to their imperial authority. With respect to other disabilities affecting penitents, there is no mention of any direct refusal of funeral rites. The 1 Conc. Vasen. A.D. 442, c. 2, decrees that penitents dying suddenly in the field or on a journey before the priest could be brought to them might be buried with a sacred service if they were leading satisfactory lives; by implication denying Christian burial to the contumacious and impenitent. The absence of any commemoration after death would follow from the refusal of the rites of burial.

ii. Persons on whom inflicted.—All baptized Christians were subject to the censure of the church. Over Jews or heathen outside her jurisdiction of course did not extend. Catechumens who were, as it were, in a middle state, never became penitents. If they were guilty of an ecclesiastical crime they were degraded to a lower class of their own order. The clergy were dealt with on a different footing to the rest of the community (see below, Penitence of Clergy). Penance was imposed equally upon women as upon men. Bingham quotes Valesius in Socrat. H. E. v. 19; Bona, Rer. Liturg. I. xvii. 5, in favour of the opinion that although women fasted and mourned in private, they were not exposed to open penance for the first three centuries. But no such exemption appears in Tertullian or Cyprian; and in the Spanish church at any rate, women were sentenced to penance. Conc. Eliber. c. 5 decrees that a mistress beating her slave to death shall be restored at the end of five years "acta legitimâ poenitentiâ;" and c. 14, in the case of a fallen virgin, makes a broad distinction between her exclusion with or without penance (compare Ibid. cc. 8, 10, 12, 13, 63, 65; Conc. Ancyr. c. 21). The statement of Basil (c. 34) that the fathers had decreed that an adulteress should not be compelled to publish her crime, could hardly have been inserted if public penitence of women had not been the rule—as in the 4th century there can be little doubt it was the rule. The penitential exercises of Fabiola were commended by Jerome (Ep. 30, Epitaph. Fabiol.) not because she was a woman, but because they were undertaken spontaneously. A woman submitting to penance was no special object of commendation. (See the instructions given by Ambrose ad Virg. laps.) The 3 Conc. Tolet. c. 12 gives directions for the penitential dress of a woman. A man under penance was to shave his head, a woman to wear a veil. Female penance must have been so common as to require regulating where the rule prevailed that a married woman could not become a penitent without her husband's consent (2 Conc. Arelat. c. 22). (For special female delinquencies, see Theodor. Poenitential. I. xiv. "de poenitentia nubentium;" Egbert, Poenitential. c. 7, "de machina mulierem.")

Neither wealth nor office was allowed to exempt a delinquent from the censure of the church. Under the heathen empire the mere acceptance of certain magistracies, inasmuch as they involved their holders in idolatrous ceremonials, was an ecclesiastical offence (Conc. Eliber. cc. 2, 3; compare the note of Gothofred on Cod. Theod. XV. v. "de spectaculis"). By 1 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 314, c. 7, all Christian governors of provinces were ordered to take with them commendatory letters, and bring themselves into communication with the bishop, so that if they transgressed against discipline there might be no difficulty in expelling them from communion. Although in the 4th and 5th centuries no consideration of rank checked the great bishops from censuring offenders in high places, as, for instance, the condemnation of Andronicus, governor of Ptolemais, by Synesius (Ep. 58), and the governor of Libya by Athanasius (Basil, Ep. 47), and the famous expulsion of Theodosius from communion by Ambrose (Bingham, Antiq. XVI. iii. 4), yet in practice the right was rarely exercised. (For reasons for this forbearance see Barrow, Of the Pope's Supremacy, p. 12.) The age at which a young person came under the discipline of penance is nowhere defined. It is not likely that the church would excommunicate a boy or a girl. A Roman synod under Felix III. (A.D. 487, c. 4) decided that boys who had been baptized by the Arians should remain a short time only under the imposition of hands, and then be restored; for it was not reasonable that their penitence should be prolonged. The Conc. Agath. c. 15 exempted the young from severe penance because of the weakness of youth. In the discipline of a monastery a delinquent under age was flogged (Macar. Reg. c. 15; Benedict, Reg. c. 70; Gregor. Ep. ix. 66, quoted by Bingham). And probably in the church at large the weapon of penance was used only against those who had passed their minority.

iii. Uniformity of.—It is laid down in the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 48), that great care and discretion were to be exercised in treating offenders; some were to be dealt with by threats, some by terrors, some by being urged to almsgiving, some to fasting, and some by ejection from the church. And for a long time no doubt this discretion was vested in the bishop, assisted perhaps by his presbytery. As the church grew, and intercourse increased between her different branches, a more uniform scale of penalties was adopted. The frequent communications which passed between Rome and Africa, traces of which are preserved in Cyprian's epistles, are the first important efforts after uniformity of discipline. The decisions of the councils of the succeeding age were a further advance in the same direction. Nearly all the twenty-five canons of Ancyra and the eighty-one of Elvira treat of the penalties suitable to ecclesiastical crimes. The same may be said of the twenty-two canons of the first council of Arles, and to a certain extent of the canons of the Apostles. These various judgments of the assembled fathers represent, in fact, so many penitential codes, whose decrees would be the model, if not the rule, for the administration of discipline throughout the church. The appointment of the PENITENTIARY officer in the dioceses of the Greek church would also tend to produce a uniform standard of penalties. The treatise which more perhaps even than the decrees of councils helped to establish a system in the East was the epistle of Basil. For many ages this canonical letter of Basil was the standard which governed the discipline of the East. Hardly less authoritative was the epistle of his brother Gregory of Nyssa. The decisions of the popes on questions referred to them were a further contribution to a body of penitential law; for example, Syric. Ep. i. 3, 5, 6; Innocent, Epp. i. 7; ii. 12, 13; iii. 2; Leo, Ep. lxxix. 4, 5, 6; Felix III. Ep. vii.; Nicolas, Ep. ad Rivol. The Penitential books were an additional attempt to codify the law. Originating either from famous monasteries, or embodying the decisions of great prelates, they spread far and wide through France and England, and in a less degree through all the churches of the West in the 7th and 8th centuries. The 3 Conc. Tolet. c. 11 in the 6th century, and the Conc. Moguntt. c. 31 in the 9th, alike complain of the difficulty of maintaining penance at the true canonical standard. The penitentials were no doubt designed to meet the difficulty. The principle laid down by Conc. Mogunt. was, that penalties were to be based on the ancient canons, or the authority of scripture, or the custom of the church. The penitentials in themselves possessed no canonical authority, and their multiplication was in some instances regarded with jealousy. "Their errors," said the bishops in 2 Conc. Cabilon. A.D. 813, c. 38, "are certain, and their authors uncertain." With the growth of the papal power and the centralization of ecclesiastical jurisdiction at Rome, discipline tended to become more and more uniform.

iv. Alleviation of—

a. By repentance.—Although the church aimed at uniformity of discipline, the same penalty was not always imposed on the same crime; or if the penalty was originally the same it was not carried out alike in all cases. There would be practical difficulties in the way of insisting on the completion of a merely spiritual sentence extending over twenty or twenty-five years. But in addition to the necessities of the case a mitigation of the penalty was openly granted in certain instances. The first ground of relaxation was earnestness of repentance over and above the formal submission to censure. Conc. Ancyr. c. 5 orders the bishop to examine the present and past life of a penitent and shew clemency accordingly. By Conc. Laodic. c. 2, perseverance and prayer and confession, and a total abandonment of evil habits, were allowed to move the rulers of the church to pity (see Conc. in Trull. c. 102). Conc. Nicaen. c. 12 decided that a delinquent who proved his amendment by fear and tears, and submission and good works, and labour and dress, should, after his appointed time among the Hearers, join in communion of prayer; that is to say, the laborious station of Kneelers might be omitted; those, on the other hand, who thought it sufficient to shew their repentance by merely coming to the church door, were to complete their full sentence. The 4 Conc. Carthag. c. 75 speaks to the same effect on "negligentiores poenitentes." Basil (c. 74) considers it an act of duty that those who have the power of binding and loosing should remit part of the penalty of the earnest and diligent. The same sentiment which appears several times in the epistle of Gregory of Nyssa, regulated the administration of discipline throughout the church (Innocent I. Ep. i. 7; Leo, Ep. lxxix. 6; Conc. Vermat. c. 75).

b. By confession.—One who spontaneously confessed his crime was generally treated more leniently than after detection. Conc. Eliber. c. 76 made a wide distinction in the case of a deacon who allowed himself to be ordained after the commission of mortal sin. If he made a voluntary confession, he might be reinstated at the end of two years, but if others convicted him, he was to do penance for five years, and then be restored to lay communion only. In Martin Bracar. (Collect. Conc. c. 25), a priest confessing under similar circumstances might retain the name of priest, but not celebrate; if he was convicted, even the name was to be taken from him. Gregory Thaumaturgus (Ep. cc. 18, 19), with reference to robberies which had occurred during the confusion arising from a Gothic invasion, made the station of a delinquent depend upon the manner in which the theft was revealed, whether by conviction or by confession and restitution. Basil (c. 61) diminished the penalty of a thief who confessed by one-half. The same authority, at the beginning of his treatise, gives to spontaneous confession and lapse of time and ignorance an equal power in alleviating penance. (See Ambrose, Virg. laps. c. 8; de Poenitent. ii. 8; Prosper, Vit. Contemplat. ii. 7.) In some flagrant instances, as in the case of an adulterous clerk (3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 7), confession was of no avail.

c. By intercession.—The accounts of public penance during the first three centuries frequently represent the delinquent imploring the congregation and the widows and the virgins and the clergy to intercede with the bishop for him. And when the length of penalties was undetermined by canon, and rested practically with the individual bishop, such intercessions were a recognised channel by which to obtain a mitigation of penance. With the elaboration of the system which began with the 4th century, these intercessions are rarely heard of, although Augustine mentions incidentally (Ep. liv. ad Macedon. p. 93), a custom of magistrates interceding with the church for offenders. In Africa a practice arose, which quickly became abused, of granting alleviation of penance to the intercession of martyrs, that is to say, of Christians in prison expecting death during persecution. [LIBELLI, p. 981.]

3. PENITENCE DENIED.

I. Sometimes to the first Commission of mortalia Delicta.—The grace of penitence appears to have been withheld from certain delinquents in the early centuries, not because the church had any doubt about her authority to grant it, but on the ground that the power of binding was vested with the same sanction as that of loosing, and that to open the door with equal readiness to all great criminals alike would only bring discipline into contempt. This seems the probable explanation of the undoubted effect of some of the early decisions. Cyprian has left it on record (Ep. lv. c. 17) that among his predecessors some entirely closed the place of penance against adulterers, and by implication against the other two mortal sins which were of a still graver character; but he adds that in doing so they did not break the verity of the church. How far this exclusiveness was followed in other provinces is one of the many vexed questions of the primitive discipline. See Albaspin. Observat. II. vii. 20; Bona, Rer. Liturg. I. xvii. 1; Fell not. in Cypr. Ep. vii. p. 17, cited by Bingham. By the clear testimony of Tertullian (de Pudicit. c. 1), pope Zephyrinus, A.D. 202–218, granted penance to the sins of uncleanness and fornication, and Tertullian founds upon this a charge of inconsistency against the bishop because he was not equally indulgent to murder and idolatry. Morinus (ix. 20) holds that the evidence of Tertullian in this treatise on the usage of the Roman church is not worthy of credence. Martene (de Rit. i. 6), on the contrary, cites him as a trustworthy witness. If the ordinary reading of "nec in fine" in many of the canons of Elvira is to be accepted, there can be no doubt that penitence was denied in Spain to idolatry and to murder (see for instances cc. 1, 6, 63, 73, 75). With regard to moechia the decisions were more lenient (cc. 13, 14, 31, 69, 72); except in aggravated cases (cc. 12, 66, 71), when communion was refused absolutely. It may be well to enumerate the exact crimes for which communion was denied by the council of Elvira even at death: idolatry in an idol temple after baptism (c. 1); a baptized flamen sacrificing again (cc. 2, 17); adultery after penance (cc. 3, 47); killing by witchcraft (c. 6); if a woman deserted her husband without cause and re-married (c. 8); parents selling a child for prostitution (c. 12); dedicated virgins becoming prostitutes (c. 13);

betrothal of a daughter to an idol priest (c. 17); adultery by clergy—on account of the scandal (c. 19); murder by a woman of her child born in adultery (c. 63); clergy retaining adulterous wives (c. 65); unnatural crimes (c. 71); aggravated adultery (cc. 64, 72, 79); giving information which leads to a Christian being put to death (c. 73); malicious charges against the clergy (c. 75). These decisions appear to have had at the most only a provincial authority, and not to have governed the general discipline of the church. For the Conc. Ancyr. (cc. 9, 16), which was contemporary with Conc. Eliber. or only a few years later, granted penance to each of the three mortalia delicta even in their most aggravated forms. And, indeed, throughout the Eastern church, with the exception of a decision of Conc. Sardic. c. 2, which rejects certain fraudulent bishops from even lay communion at death, there does not appear any trace of the refusal of the rites of penance for the first commission of any sin sincerely repented of. Nor does any trace of such severity occur later than the Conc. Eliber. in the West.

ii. Generally to a Repetition of Sin once expiated.—The refusal of penance a second time was one of the unwritten canons of the early discipline. No council passed a decree against its repetition, but in practice its refusal was almost universal from the very beginning. Hermas (Pastor, Mandat. ii. 4), considering whether an adulterous wife ought to be received by her husband, determined that she should be taken back, but not often, for to be servants of God there is but one penitence (compare Id. Similit. iii. 9). This decision of Hermas is cited and approved by Clem. Alexand. (Strom. ii. 13, p. 459, ed. Oxon.). The language of Tertullian is very explicit (de Pudicit. c. 7); "God hath placed in the porch a second repentance, which may open to those who knock, but now for once only, because now for the second time, but never again." The "first repentance" which he had in his mind was baptism. A little later (ibid. c. 9), he speaks of the "second and only remaining repentance." A passage in Origen (Hom. xv. in c. 25 Levit.) gives a clear account of the general practice. "In graver sins the peace of repentance is granted but once only, or seldom; but those common sins which men frequently commit, always admit of repentance, and are redeemed at once." The words "or seldom" are generally regarded as a later interpolation; the date of their insertion probably coinciding with the growth of greater laxity in the Eastern church. There appears some reason for believing that Chrysostom did not hesitate to grant penitence more than once. Socrates (H. E. vi. 21) states that he taught that though a synod of bishops had decreed that relapsed penitents should not be readmitted, he was willing to receive them a thousand times. On the accuracy of this statement with reference to Chrysostom see Morinus, v. 37. At the beginning of the 5th century the privilege of frequent penance was taken away from the Massalian heretics by a synod of Constantinople, A.D. 426 or 427, under Sisinnius, one of Chrysostom's successors, because it had been so often abused. From this Bingham concludes (Antiq. XVIII. iv. 7) that a repetition of penance was not unknown in the metropolitan province. The relaxation of the early rigour may be partly attributable to the excessive length of the sentences imposed in the Eastern church after the 3rd century. If a delinquent had done penance for fifteen or twenty years, and was willing to pass through the ordeal a second time, it was impossible to reject him. In the Latin church the discipline of a single penance survived longer. The Conc. Eliber., which was so severe in refusing reconciliation even once was not likely to grant it a second time (cc. 3, 7, 74; Pacian, Ep. iii. contr. Sympron. c. 27). They are rightly reproved, says Ambrose (de Poenitent. ii. 10), who think that penance can be performed often, for they wanton against Christ. Augustine (Ep. cliii. ad Macedon. c. 7) is a witness that even the lowest place in the church was refused to a relapsing penitent. The manner of dealing with such lapsers in the Western church is laid down by pope Siricius (Ep. i. ad Himer. c. 5); they were not to have the benefit of a second penitence, but might be present, without communicating, at the celebration, and be allowed a viaticum at their death. By 2 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 443, c. 21, a penitent repeating his sin was to be cast out of the church. By 1 Conc. Turon. A.D. 460, c. 8, he was ejected, not only from the church, but from the society of the faithful (Conc. Venet. A.D. 465, c. 3). By the 6th century penitence began to be conceded frequently. For the 3 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 589, c. 11, complains that in many of the Spanish churches discipline was no longer administered according to the canons, but as often as men sinned and applied to the priest, so often penance was granted. This abuse the council checked. The disappearance of the early rule dates probably from the decline of public discipline, and the substitution of a private system by which a sinner obtained reconciliation as often as he confessed his sin and submitted to penance.

iii. Till the Hour of Death.—The ordinary course of penance in the 4th and 5th centuries held an offender in its trammels for half a lifetime for certain mortal sins; if the sins were especially heinous, the penalty extended over the whole life, however long its duration. This severity was not confined to one province. In Spain the Conc. Eliber. c. 3, withheld communion till death from a converted flamen who, abstaining from sacrificing, merely exhibited a shew; and all his life he was to be under canonical penance. A consecrated virgin who had fallen was allowed communion at last only if she had passed a life-long penance (ibid. c. 13). At a later date the Conc. Herd. A.D. 523, c. 5, sentenced any of the inferior clergy who, after penance, relapsed into the same sin, to exclusion till death. In France a similar sentence was passed by 1 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 314, c. 14, on false accusers of their brethren; and by Conc. Valentin. A.D. 374 [illegible], on lapsers into idolatry. In the East the Conc. Ancyr. A.D. 314, c. 6, attached this penance to unnatural crime; and the Conc. Neocaesar. c. 2, decreed that a woman marrying two brothers was to be expelled till the approach of death, and then only to be admitted on her assurance that should she recover the marriage should be dissolved. And finally, in Rome Felix III., A.D. 483–492, decided in Conc. Rom. c. 2, with regard to the African clergy, who had suffered themselves to be rebaptized in the Vandal persecution, that they were to consinue under penance all the days of their life, and not be present during the prayers of the faithful or even of the catechumens, and be admitted to lay communion only at death. (See Ambrose, Laps. Virg. viii. 38.)

4. PENITENCE OF THE SICK.—The sick under discipline may be divided into three classes:—i. those who for some grievous crime had been ejected from the church and fell sick while outside her pale; ii. those who were conscious of undetected sin, and asked for penance on their sickbed; iii. those overtaken by illness while undergoing penance. With regard to the first class, there seems little doubt that for about the first 300 years the full grace of penance was denied to them absolutely. Cyprian (Ep. ad Anton. lv. 19) does not shrink from stating this positively. The great council of Arles, A.D. 314, c. 22, at which most of the Western churches were represented, decreed that apostates who had not sought penitence in health were to be debarred from it in illness, unless they recovered, and had an opportunity of proving their sincerity. The denial of penance at the hour of death to those who had scorned it in life was continued in the case of condemned criminals for a long period in France. In Germany this rigour was relaxed in the 9th century by Conc. Vormat. c. 80, Conc. Triburi. c. 31; in France it was not repealed till Feb. 1396, by a decree of Charles VI. It does not appear that the refusal of reconciliation was necessarily a refusal of all the benefits of penitence; for Innocent I. A.D. 402–417 (Ep. iii. ad Exuper.), states that the old custom of the church, in the case of repentant delinquents at death, was to grant penance but deny communion, and that this was done in order to maintain a high standard of discipline during the times of persecution, and that afterwards, when persecutions ceased, both penance and absolution were conceded to the dying, and that henceforth was the law of the Catholic church. There is a saying of Cyprian (ad Demetrianum, c. 15), "Nunquam sera est poenitentia si sit vera." None the less the great African father denied communion to grievous sinners in their last illness, not however because he doubted the efficacy of death-bed repentance but its sincerity. After the close of the persecutions full reconciliation was granted to all dying men seeking it, whatever their previous career; and the question was authoritatively set at rest by a decree of Conc. Nicaen. c. 13. [See RECONCILIATION.] The treatment of the second class of sick, those whose sin had not been detected or confessed till their last illness, was more uniform. Penitence and reconciliation were on no account to be refused them (Conc. Andegav. A.D. 453, c. 13). Pope Celestine I., A.D. 422–432 (Ep. ii. ad Episc. Vienn. et Narbon.), says that he knew of some having denied penitence to the dying, but that he was "horrorstruck at such impiety." Leo I. A.D. 440–461 (Ep. cviii. ad Theod. Episc. c. 4), not only decided that penitence was to be granted to the sick, but adds that "if they have lost their voice and could only express by signs their desire for penance, or even if they were motionless as well as speechless, and any trustworthy witnesses could testify that they had signified the desire before the arrival of the priest, it was in all cases to be conceded." The first council of Orange, A.D. 441, c. 12, passed a similar decree, having in view probably the case of those overtaken by paralysis, or any similar affliction. The 4 Conc. Carthag. A.D. 398, c. 76, had carried the concession even farther, it had granted penance, not only to the helpless, but even to the insensible, if there was evidence that it had been desired by the patient while he was rational (see 12 Conc. Toled. c. 2, 13 Conc. Toled. c. 9). These decrees governed the administration of the penitence of the sick during the middle ages. The third class of sick contained those who were overtaken by illness during their penance. In the 4th and 5th centuries when sentences sometimes extended over twenty years, this class must have been a numerous one. They were on the supposition already penitents. The matter remaining to be considered is the time and manner of their RECONCILIATION. One point in connexion with the penitence of the sick is involved in some obscurity. If a penitent recovered who had been absolved on his sick-bed, was he to complete his original sentence? In the case of light sins, for which an offender had been merely debarred communion, it would follow that when communion was conceded the penalty was at an end. Morinus (x. 14) is disposed to extend the same principle, at any rate up to the time of the spread of the Novatian heresy, to delinquents guilty of greater crimes, and who had been made penitents strictly so-called. He considers their absolution a satisfaction of all ecclesiastical censure. The treatment of the lapsed in the Roman and African churches, and also the silence of the canons of Elvira with regard to the completion of a sentence after reconciliation in extreme sickness, bear out the inference. He makes the same statement, though with some hesitation, with respect to the Greek church in the period prior to the organization of the stations. With the beginning of the 4th century the question becomes clearer. The severity which spread through the treatment of all penitents was extended to convalescents. The sentence left unfinished at the time of a sickbed remission was to be taken up on recovery. This rule was enforced, not only as a matter of principle, but to meet the cases of those, which appear to have been not infrequent, who feigned dangerous illness in order to escape part of their penalty. Originally a penitent once reconciled was sent back on recovery, not to his former position, but only to the station of consistentia. The council of Nice (c. 13), after resolving that no one on the threat of death was to be denied his ἐφόδιον (viaticum), goes on to decree that should the man revive after receiving it, he was henceforth to communicate in prayer only till his original sentence was finished. In some parts of the church this middle course was the one adopted for a long period. It was approved by Felix III. (Ep. vii.), in the treatment of the rebaptized, who in anticipation of death had been permitted to communicate, and is inserted by Martin of Braga in his Collect. Can. c. 82. In other provinces greater severity prevailed. Gregory of Nyssa laid it down, that a patient who had been granted participation in the holy mysteries should, if he recovered, return to the station in which his danger and necessity had found him. Synesius (Ep. 67) attached the same condition to concedir,; communion to a certain Lamponianus.

The 4 Conc. Carthag. A.D. 398, c. 76, with regard to penitence being given even to one insensible, made it the duty of those who had been witnesses of his contrition, to take care that if he recovered he fulfilled his canonical penance, the duration of which was to rest with the discretion of the priest. By ibid. c. 78, no sick man who had received his viaticum was to consider his penitence satisfied without imposition of hands; and as this was one of the rites of the substrati, it would involve his being remitted to that station. The completion of penance after a sick-bed absolution was for a long time the general rule (1 Conc. Arausic. A.D. 441, c. 3; Conc. Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 36). The rule was to some degree modified by a decision of 1 Conc. Barcinon. A.D. 540, c. 8, that the length of a convalescent's penance should depend on the discretion of the priest, but should in no case involve imposition of hands. From the 6th century, and up to the beginning of the 12th, severity towards the sick increased rather than diminished. An indication of this is seen in 3 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 589, c. 12, which required sick penitents, equally with those in health, to shave their heads if they were men, and if women wear a veil, and put on haircloth or some other penitential dress. This injunction, which appears to have been confirmed by 12 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 681, c. 2, and by 13 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 683, c. 9, must manifestly have depended on the nature of the sickness.

3. Season of Penitence.—The godly custom that persons convicted of notorious crimes should be put to open penance, was not confined to the beginning of Lent in the primitive church. Bingham (Antiq. XVIII. ii. 2) says there is a perfect silence in the more ancient writers about it. Morinus (vii. 19) traces the origin of the restriction to the quadragesimal seasons to the 7th century, when public penance had ceased to be exacted for secret sin. For the first half of the 5th century Hilary of Arles is a witness (Vita, c. 13) that penitence was granted every Sunday. The primitive custom appears to have been to receive the penitent whenever he was brought to the bishop. In the Greek church this custom was never restricted; but in the Latin the various pontificals and rituals of the 8th and 9th centuries disclose a practice of reserving the penitential rites to the beginning of Lent, whether the first Sunday or the previous Wednesday. Even at that date penitence was not exclusively confined to the Lenten season. The caput jejunii was held to be the usual and most appropriate time, but there was no law of the church prohibiting the imposition of a state of penance at any season of the year if the case required it.

6. Minister of Penitence.—In the administration the bishop had supreme if not exclusive power. The statement, however, of Martene (de Rit. i. 6), that he alone received confession, and he alone imposed penance, is too unqualified. For it seems undoubted that the presbyters shared the bishop's jurisdiction. Still, the power resided in the bishop alone, if he saw fit to exercise it. Cyprian frequently claimed and used the sole right of discipline (Epp. xvii. xix. xxv. xli. xlii. xlvi. &c.) and his presbyters acknowledged his claim (Ep. Caldonat. ap. Cyprian, xxiv.) The Apostolical Constitutions, which deal so largely with discipline, are addressed to the bishop. He was to preside over all, as entrusted with the power of binding and loosing (Apost. Const. ii. 18); upon him the blame was to be laid if he neglected to exercise his power (ibid. c. 10), for he was set in the church to sit in judgment on offenders. [BISHOP, p. 231.] But although Cyprian and others did not hesitate to vindicate their episcopal authority, they frequently acted in conjunction with their presbyters in the difficulties disturbing the church. From the earliest ages there are indications of this association of presbyters with their bishops. Some such association appears in the sentence issued by St. Paul against the incestuous Corinthian (1 Cor. v.). The excommunication emanated from the apostle, but it was to be decreed by the assembled church, "when ye are gathered together," at Corinth. The apostle was present only in spirit to preside over their assembly.

Ignatius, whose epistles shew the great authority possessed by presbyters in the 2nd century, refers (ad Philadelph. c. 8) to the penitent coming to the bishop's consistory, εἰς συνέδριον τοῦ ἐπισκόπου. The Constitutions, after speaking of the presbyters as the advisers of the bishop, and the council and senate of the church, go on to say that the presbyters, and the deacons shall sit in judgment with the bishop (Apost. Const. ii. 28). Tertullian's definition of exomologesis (Poenitent. c. 9) comprised submission and supplication to the presbyters. Humiliation before the presbyters is related of Natalis the confessor (Euseb. H. E. v. 28). In Conc. Eliber. c. 74, the "conventus clericorum" is made the judge of the gravity of a perjurer's offence. Cyprian has numerous allusions (Epp. xvi. xix. &c.) to the presbyters uniting with the bishops in the administration of discipline. For himself, he said (Ep. xiv.), from the beginning of his episcopacy he had resolved to do nothing of his private judgment without their concurrence. Cornelius similarly (Ep. xlix. ad Cyprian) would not decide the case of the confessors who had sided with Novatian till he had summoned his presbytery. The councils which condemned Origen (Pamphil. Apolog. ap. Phot. Cod. cxviii.), Novatian (Euseb. H. E. vi. 43), and Paul of Samosata (ibid. vii. 28), were composed of bishops and presbyters, the last-mentioned synod containing deacons also. The first step in the prosecution of Noetus (Epiphan. Haeres. lvii. 1), and of Arius (ibid. lxix. 3) was to bring them before the presbytery. Before Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, issued his circular letter to the other bishops against Arius, he had previously summoned the presbyters and deacons, not only to hear the letter, but also to give their assent to the judgment (Coteler, ad Const. Apost. viii. 28). On the condemnation of Jovinian by Siricius (Ep. ii.) a presbytery was summoned, and the presbyters and deacons were associated in the promulgation of the sentence. Similar steps were taken by Synesius (Ep. lvii.) in excommunicating Andronicus. The fourth Conc. Carthag. c. 23, prohibited a bishop from hearing any cause alone without the presence of his clergy; but it is not clear whether the causes in view were clerical or lay. In many instances of ecclesiastical censures the laity appear to have been present, not in any judicial capacity, but as witnesses, and to stamp the sentence as issuing from the whole body of the faithful.

After the conviction of an offender, it rested with some one to see that the sentence was carried out. In such public rites as imposition of hands and a special locality in the church, there could be no need of supervision. The case would be different with the more private disabilities and austerities. Generally speaking, the superintendence rested with the bishop. This is clear from the numerous passages referring to his authority over penitents; and further evidence in the same direction may be gathered from the laws forbidding a bishop to receive a penitent, without recommendation, from another diocese. (Can. Apost. c. 12; Conc. Nicaen. c. 5; Conc. Eliber. c. 53; 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 16.) It would have been impracticable for the bishop to have long maintained this supervision personally. In the earliest ages, when every member of a church was known to the bishop and to each other, he probably did so; the congregation would supply all needful evidence of the performance of an erring member's penalty. But as the dioceses increased in size, he must have found it necessary to delegate his authority. In the East it was transferred to the PENITENTIARY presbyter, appointed by the bishop, and acting for him. In the West the duty of supervision appears to have been committed to a great extent to the deacon. The Apostolic Constitutions (ii. 16) appoint the deacon to attend to an expelled member, and keep him out of the church, and afterwards bring him to the bishop. In the 9th century rituals, this duty is laid, not on the deacons generally, but on the archdeacon. He it was who collected the penitents and admonished them, and introduced them to the bishop, and afterwards bore testimony that their penance had been duly performed. Morinus (vi. 17) conjectures that, for at least 300 years prior to the date of these rituals, these same duties fell to the charge of the archdeacon. In the larger dioceses the rural deans shared the duty; and subsequently, as appears from the visitation articles of Hincmar, it became one of the functions of the parochial clergy.

The power of remitting the length or severity of a sentence was one of the privileges of the bishop. He, said the council of Ancyra (c. 5) was to examine the life and conversation of the penitent, and increase or mitigate his penalty. A similar power was recognised by a succession of councils (Conc. Nicaen. c. 12; Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, c. 16; Conc. Andegav. A.D. 453, c. 12; Conc. Ilerd. A.D. 523, c. 5; 4 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 541, c. 8). As the number of penitents increased, more discretion was vested in the presbyter, but always with a reference, and, if necessary, with an appeal to the bishop. Basil, c. 74, gives the power of alleviating penance to those who have the gift of binding and loosing; language which was also used by Conc. in Trull. c. 102. By 4 Conc. Aurel. c. 28; 1 Conc. Cabilon. c. 8, the "sacerdos" was the judge who determined the extent of penance. In the Eastern church, from the time of the Decian persecution till the episcopacy of Nectarius of Constantinople, the penitentiary must have been the executive minister of discipline.

7. Penitence of Clergy.—The penitential discipline as it affected the laity was medicinal rather than penal. In its treatment of the clergy, the penal element predominated. Not only was a delinquent clerk exposed to the humiliation of a public censure, but he was also deprived, temporarily or absolutely, of his office, and the rank and emolument of office. And the sentence was the more severe, that in the early ages a degraded clerk was never reinstated. Hence a charge against a clergyman was required to be proved with legal formality, as his guilt involved not only a moral stigma, but a loss of privilege and means of livelihood. This twofold effect, the spiritual and the temporal, of an ecclesiastical censure on the clergy, naturally regulated the administration of discipline towards them. One of the Apostolical Canons (c. 24) laid it down, that a bishop, priest, or deacon, for certain crimes, was to be deposed, but not excommunicated, because the Scriptures had said that a man was not to be punished twice for the same offence. The rule was repeated by Basil, cc. 3, 32, 57. Still it does not represent the unvarying discipline for the first three centuries. In general a clergyman was degraded in cases in which a layman was excommunicated. And where this rule held good, a clergyman was not subjected to penitence. But in the primitive ages it frequently occurred that no difference was made between the penance of clergy and laity. The penalty followed the same course as if the delinquent had not been in orders—ejection from the church, and re-admission by penance. (See council of Neocaesarea, c. 1.) The Elviran canons afford a still clearer illustration of clerical penance. A deacon confessing a preordination crime might receive communion at the end of three years, acta legitimâ poenitentiâ (Conc. Eliber. c. 76). For instances of public penance, see the account given of Natalis (Euseb. H. E. v. 28); and of the presbyter Felix (Cyprian. Ep. xxv. ad Caldon.; Ep. Caldon. ap. Cyprian. xxiv.); of Novatus (Id. Ep. iii. 3); of Trophimus (Id. Ep. lv. 8); of bishop Fortunatus (Id. Ep. lxv.); and of bishop Basilides (Id. Ep. lxvii. 6). Nor did open clerical penance, which was part of the stricter system of a time of persecution, altogether cease with the close of the 3rd century. The first council of Orange, A.D. 441, c. 4, followed by the second council of Arles, c. 29, determined that clergy should be admitted to penance if they sought it. The first council of Orleans, A.D. 511, c. 12, mentions a presbyter, "sub professione poenitentis." The third council of Braga, A.D. 675, c. 4, threatened a clergyman with six months' subjection "legibus poenitentiae." (See also 1 Conc. Turon. cc. 3, 5; Conc. Venet. c. 16; Conc. Agath. cc. 8, 42; Conc. Ilerd. cc. 1, 5; 2 Conc. Tolet. c. 3; 3 Conc. Aurelian. cc. 4, 8.) On the other hand, a statement of Pope Leo, 441–461, seems difficult to reconcile with these authorities. He lays it down (in Ep. xcii. c. 2, ad Rustic.; Labb. Conc. iiii, 1408) that it is not in accordance with ecclesiastical custom for a presbyter or deacon to obtain the grace of penance by imposition of hands. One explanation is that the "ecclesiastica consuetudo" alleged by Leo was prevalent only in the Roman church. Another, that the words of Leo were strictly correct, and that no presbyter or deacon as such was ever subjected to penance, because he was first degraded and had ceased to be a clergyman. But this explanation, while reconciling the pope's language with canonical decisions, reduces it to a mere truism. The privilege, or inability, in whichever light it may be regarded, which as a general rule protected the higher clergy from open penance, was not extended to the lower orders. The council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, decreed in two canons (cc. 2, 8), that for purposes of discipline monks were to be regarded as laity; a decision repeated by 1 Conc. Barcinon. A.D. 540, c. 10; Conc. in Trull. c. 81; 2 Conc. Nicaen. cc. 5, 13. For a further account of clerical penalties, see BISHOP, p. 228; DEGRADATION; DISCIPLINE; ORDERS, HOLY, p. 1492. [G. PENITENTIAL BOOKS: LIBER POENITENTIALIS; POENITENTIALE; CONFESSIONALE; POENITENTIALES CODICES, CODICELLI, LIBELLI; LEGES POENITENTIUM; PECCANTIUM JUDICIA. The term is applied to collections of penitential canons issued under the name and with the authority of some eminent ecclesiastic, with a view to establish a uniform rule for the administration of discipline; the best known are the Anglo-Saxon penitentials of the 7th and 8th centuries.

The early history of canons of discipline is involved in some obscurity. It is probable that each bishop, with his presbytery, administered the discipline of his diocese on certain general principles which left the details to local regulation. Afterwards, as individual bishops by weight of character gained a reputation in the church, their decisions on matters of discipline obtained more or less the force of church law. Hence the epistles of Basil and his brother Gregory of Nyssa on penance were received as of something like canonical authority. In this view they may be regarded as the earliest penitential books. Of these two sets of canonical laws, that of Gregory is in the form of a letter to Letoius, bishop of Melitine. It attempts to trace the source of all sin to one of the three faculties of the soul, which he designates the rational, the concupiscible, and the irascible, and for each a separate mode of treatment is to be adopted; but there is no regulated scale of penalties for different degrees of sin. The epistle of Basil contains more direct penal enactments. It deals principally with the three capital crimes of idolatry, murder, and fornication, and allots to each form of sin its appropriate punishment. Although stamped with no canonical authority, Basil's epistle evidently had a wide influence on the administration of the discipline of the Eastern church, and eventually received the synodical sanction of the council in Trullo, A.D. 692. Other rudimentary penitentials are to be found in the numerous decretals of the Roman bishops, although no one of these deals systematically with the subject. After the 3rd century the chief authority for the regulation of discipline was in the penitential canons of the councils. In addition to the general council of Nice, the Oriental councils of Ancyra, A.D. 314, Neocaesarea, A.D. 314, Gangra, A.D. 362, and the various African councils of the 4th and 5th centuries, and the Spanish and Frankish from the 4th to the 7th century, contain a copious legislation for the administration of penance. The decrees of these councils had only a provincial, or at most a national, force, and there was no attempt to establish a universal code of penitential law. The nearest approach to systematizing the laws of discipline is in the Codex Ecclesiae Africanae, emanating from Carthage, A.D. 419. The full development of the penitential system is usually attributed to Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 669–690. But recent investigations have established the genuineness of fragmentary British and Irish penitentials, which indicate that the system was flourishing in the Celtic churches in these islands at a period anterior to Theodore. The nature of the contents of the various penitentials, wherever there is any peculiarity to call for remark, will appear as the list proceeds; but in general it may be said that they had one common characteristic, varying little with the nation for whose guidance they were compiled. They maintain a complete silence on the dogmatical controversies which shook and disunited the Eastern church; in many of them there is little or no reference to the ordinances of the church; their whole purpose and strength are concentrated on the enforcement of practical duties. Among the rude tribes of the north and west, the outward profession of their newly-acquired Christianity was by no means invariably followed by an abandonment of the ferocious and licentious passions of the old heathen life. It was the object of the penitential book to allay, and gradually to extirpate, the vices of heathenism. The pictures which they disclose, especially of the sins of the flesh, is a dark one. But the public denunciation of these crimes and passions in the church, and the determination of her rulers to restrain them, was a step towards the light. The drawing out a catalogue of different vices, and appending a proportionate punishment to each, no doubt fostered the notion that each vice had its price, by the payment of which it might be expiated, and so far tended to blunt the moral sense of the iniquity of sin. On the other hand, the church, by declaring that it was her function to discover and punish vice because it was vice and against God's law, brought home to the people, in the only way these simple races could understand, a belief in God's moral government of the world. An undue multiplication of the books was jealously watched. In the Gallic church, where, to judge from the number of Frankish penitentials which survive, their influence must have been widespread, the council of Châlons, A.D. 813 (c. 38) passes upon them a formal censure; they are said to clash with the authority of the canons; their authors are declared to be uncertain, but their errors certain.* The discipline of the penitentials was that of the cloister, classifying sin, and pursuing it into every detail; the monastic rules being relaxed, and adapted to the conditions of life of a free people. In the list which follows it will be convenient to arrange the books under the headings of the different national churches in which they were published.

* The decrees of the Gallican councils against penitentials are very severe. Thus the council of Châlons, A.D. 813, c. 38: "Modus enim poenitentiae peccata sua confitentibus aut per antiquorum institutionem aut per sanctarum scripturarum auctoritatem aut per ecclesiasticam consuetudinem imponi debet, repudiatis ac penitus eliminatis libellis, quos penitentiales vocant, quorum sunt certi errores, incerti auctores." Compare Conc. Moguntt, A.D. 847, c. 31; Conc. Paris, A.D. 829 c. 52. In the latter the bishops are ordered to burn the penitentials wherever they find them: ["Ne per eos ubivis sacerdotes imperiti homines decipiant."] A

I. British and Irish Penitentials.

1. Excerpta quaedam de Libro Davidis.—The date of these fragmentary extracts from the 'Liber' of David, bishop of Minevia, the present St. David's, lies between A.D. 550 and 600 (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Eccl. Documents, i. 118). They consist of sixteen canons treating of drunkenness, fornication, homicide, perjury, robbery, usury; and may be considered as the earliest penitential book connected with the British islands.

2. Sinodus Aquilonalis Britanniae.

3. Altera Sinodus Luci Victoriae.—Two synods held under David, in the year 569. The first contains seven penitential canons, the second nine.

The locality of the synods was probably Llanddewi Brefi, in the neighbourhood of Cardigan (Haddan and Stubbs, i. 117). The state of morals exhibited by these early canons was degraded. The 'Liber Davidis' opens with the penalty for excessive drinking among priests about to minister in God's temple.

4. Poenitentiale Vinniai.—This book was first printed by Wasserschleben (Bussordnungen, &c. pp. 108–119) from a comparison of the MSS. Cod. Sangall. No. 150, saec. ix; Vindob. Theol. 1st. No. 725, saec. ix; Sangerm. No. 121, saec. viii.; and the Irish canons of the Cod. Paris, No. 3182, saec. xi. xii. It is difficult to identify the Vinniaus, or Finian, whose name it bears. Wasserschleben conjectures the author to be the Finianus mentioned by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Mart. i. p. 391) who, born in Ireland in the year 450, lived for some time in Gaul, then went to Wales, to bishop David, whence, in the end of the 5th century, he returned to Ireland, in order to uphold the faith and discipline which had declined since the death of St. Patrick. If this Finian was a contemporary of David, he lived a century later, but even so he would be earlier than Columban, which corresponds with the conclusion which would be drawn from a comparison of this confessional book with that of Columban, where the greater part of Finian's work is repeated. Wasserschleben divides the book into fifty-three paragraphs. This penitential enumerates the principal crimes of the clergy and laity, with their appropriate punishments. Like the synods under St. Patrick, and the Liber Davidis, it shews the influence which the clergy had obtained in temporal matters among the Celtic nations.

5. Prefatio Gildae de Penitentia.—The date of this fragment must be placed somewhere before the year 570 (Haddan and Stubbs, i. 113). It comprises twenty-seven sections, several of which are repeated in Cummean and Bede, and in the so-called Roman Penitential. The mode of penance to be inflicted is strictly stated at the outset, and is much more in detail than the penance to be found in any other early book.

6. Canones Adamnani (Addamnani vel Addominari).—The canons of Adamnan, abbat of the monastery of Hy, the date of which must lie between the years 679 and 704, were probably passed by some Irish synod under Adamnan's influence (Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 111). They consist of thirty chapters, treating almost entirely of unclean food.

7. Canones Wallici.—These canons are a collection of national rather than ecclesiastical law. They are found in the Cod. Sangerm. No. 121, saec. viii. with the title "Incipit judicium culparum;" in the Cod. Paris, No. 3182, from whence they were taken by Martene (Nov. Thes. t. iv. col. 13), they are called "Excerpta de libris Romanorum et Francorum." For the argument for their Welsh origin, see Haddan and Stubbs, i. 127. Their date is probably the first half of the 7th century.

8. Canones Hibernenses.—These canons are found in the same French MSS. with the preceding collection. They are all of great antiquity; some, as apparently iii. "Synodus Hibernensis decrevit," being decisions of synods over which St. Patrick presided. The canons are interesting as specimens of early penitential rules, and as the sources from which later compilations were derived. Wasserschleben (pp. 136–144) has published six collections:—i. "De disputatione Hibernensis sinodi et Gregori Nasaseni sermo de innumerabilibus peccatis incipit." Many of these canons are afterwards used by the compiler of the Penit. Bigotianum [infra, p. 1612]. Their spelling of Latin terminations is remarkable; there are also traces of the use of the old vernacular, as, for example (c. 4), "Poenitentia magi vel votivi mali, si credulus id dem ergach vel praeconis." ii. "De Arreis." This is the earliest notice of redemptions to be found in penitential books, and was the parent from which many later developments of the system drew their origin. The first canon gives a fair instance of the nature of the commutations: "Arreum superpossitionis C. psalmi et C. flectiones genuum vel iii. quingenta et cantica vii. iii. "Synodus Hibernensis decrevit." iv. "De jectione." A curious scale of payments to be made by one who turns a poor man adrift or refuses to succour him. The "jectio" shall be a certain proportion, from a fifth to a ninth, of the composition for murder. v. "De canibus sinodus sapientium." vi. "Item synodus sapientia sic de decimis disputant."

II. Frankish Penitentials.

The discipline of the Frankish church from the 4th century was regulated by the decrees of provincial councils, which are remarkably full of disciplinary canons. It was not till the 7th century that anything approaching to a systematic compilation of the different acts of councils in the form of a penitential was attempted. How well the ground was prepared for such a compilation appears from the numerous penitential similar feeling is apparent in a letter of bishop Ebbo of Rheims, circa A.D. 850, to Halitgar of Cambray (Canisius, Lect. Antiq. ed. Basnage, tom. ii. pt. ii. p. 87): ["Et hoc est, quod hac in re valde me sollicitat, quod ita confusa sunt judicia poenitentium in presbyterorum nostrorum opusculis atque ita diversa et inter se discrepantia et nullius auctoritate suffulta, ut vix propter dissonantium positu discerni. unde fit, ut concurrentes ad remedium poenitentiae tam pro librorum confusione, quam etiam pro ingenii tarditate, nullatenus eis valeant subvenire."] works, which were at once drawn up on the basis of the first which was published.

1. Poenitentiale Columbani. — This earliest Frankish penitential was the work of the Irish monk Columban, born in the first half of the 6th century, in the province of Leinster. He lived for some time in the great monastery of Bangor, and then crossed to Gaul in the year 590; a few years later he penetrated to Italy, and founded the monastery of Bobbio at the foot of the Apennines, where he died, A.D. 615 [DICT. CHR. BIOG. i. 605]. Among his writings are two penitential books, one 'Regula Coenobialis,' designated in some MSS. 'Poenitentiale,' 'Regula fratrum Hibernensium;' in others, 'Columbani Liber de quotidianis poenitentiis monachorum.' This work, framed on a severe standard, contains a code of monastic rules, and has no concern with the general administration of church discipline. It is remarkable for the frequency with which corporal chastisement occurs among its penalties. Six, ten, or even two hundred strokes might be laid on a careless or offending monk. Columban's other work is entitled 'Liber de Poenitentia,' or 'de Poenitentiarum mensura taxanda.' The work was first published by the Minorite friar Fleming, in the year 1667, from a codex of the monastery of Bobbio. This Cod. Bobbiensis is the only MS. of the penitential known to exist. It consists of two parts, which can never have been intended to form one consecutive set of canons. The first part contains twelve chapters on miscellaneous offences, some of which are also dealt with in part two, and not, in all cases, carrying the same penalty. The second part, which is the true penitential rule, begins with the introduction, "Diversitas culparum diversitatem facit poenitentiarum;" then follows an elaborate comparison between bodily and spiritual disorders. After the introduction come twelve sections on the "capitalia crimina" of the "clerici et monachi;" cc. 13–25, on the "crimina" of "laici;" and the remaining cc. 25–30 on the "minutae monachorum sanctiones." The last chapter of Columban (c. 30) is an injunction laid upon the monks to confess before mass not only actual offences, but thoughts and desires. It is interesting as one of the earliest examples of a practice which was afterwards to be stringently enforced upon the whole church.

In the introduction to the penitential, Columban states that he has composed his work partly from his own discretion, and partly from the "traditiones seniorum." Among these "seniores" must be placed Vinnianus, from whose Irish penitential Columban has borrowed no less than thirteen of his thirty sections. Compare Columb. Poen. cc. 1, 2, 4–9, 11, 16, 20, 21, 23, with Vinnian. Poen. 23, 12, 11, 22, 18, 19, 20, 25, 26, 27, 8, 9 17, 36, 22, 9.

Columban's book which, from the name of its author, has usually been regarded as an Irish work, Wasserschleben pronounces to be Frankish, composed after he had crossed to the continent. The grounds for deciding against its Irish origin are certainly very strong:—(1) Monkish rules and penalties always emanated from the superiors of cloisters, or from some one in high authority; it is highly improbable that Columban would have been allowed to publish a work of this importance while he was occupying a subordinate position in the monastery at Bangor. (2) No trace of Columban's canons is observable in Theodore, while, on the other hand, they form the basis of numerous undoubted Frankish collections. (3) C. 25 forbids communicating with the heretical sect of the Bonosiaci,[b] who were spread over Gaul and Italy, but were unknown in the British Isles. (4) The arrangement of the materials shews an independent undertaking. At the head of the capitalia crimina, Columban places homicide; afterwards follow fornication, perjury, &c., and this order was adopted by most of the Frankish penitentials; whereas those which rest upon Theodore's work begin with drunkenness. This arrangement was probably due to the prominence which these various vices and crimes attained among the respective races. With the inhabitants of the British Isles drunkenness was the prevailing sin—with the German tribes, murder, and crimes of violence.

2. In close connexion with Columban's work, Wasserschleben (Bussordnungen, pp. 360–429) has printed eight anonymous penitentials, all of which show a Frankish origin.

(a) Poenitentiale Pseudo-Romanum.—This was first published by Halitgar, bishop of Cambray, in the 9th century, and may be found in Canisius, Lectiones, ed. Basnage, ii. 2. Halitgar styles it the Roman penitential, and states, in his preface, that it is one "quem de scrinio Romanae ecclesiae adsumpsimus." It is also printed at length by Morinus (de Sacrament. Poenitent. appendix, pp. 565–568). Wasserschleben (Bussordnungen, &c. p. 58) is disposed to doubt this statement of Halitgar with regard to the Roman archives, and adduces several reasons for believing it to be an entirely Frankish work. (1) Use is made of Gildas (Ps.-Rom. ix. 1–5; Gild. 9, 12, 21–24. (2) Undoubted reference is made to the Gallic council of Auxerre, A.D. 578 (Conc. Autis. cc. 1, 3, 4; Ps.-Rom. vi. 3, 4, 5). (3) A considerable part of the book is borrowed immediately from Columban, and it is itself the source of several chapters of the Merseburg Penitential (Mers. 47–51 · Ps.-Rom. iii. 4; vi. 8, 9, 10).

(b) Poenitentiale Hubertense.—First published by Martene and Durand (Ampl. Coll. vol. vii. col. 37) from a MS. from the monastery of St. Hubert at Audain in the Ardennes. The full title is, 'In nomine sanctae Trinitatis incipiunt judicia sacerdotalia de diversis criminibus ex canonica auctoritate sumpta.' It contains a number of decrees, strung together without any connexion or rubrical arrangement.

(c) Poenitentiale Merseburgense. — This penitential is a long treatise, comprising 149 sections, and is chiefly interesting from the numerous references to heathen manners and customs: c. 22 denounces those who seek auguries by birds or any other evil devices; c. 23, divination by soothsayers, because they are the works of evil spirits; c. 26 prohibits "sortes sanctorum," which are contrary to reason; c. 27 denounces as sacrilege the resorting to trees, or fountains, or "cancelli," or any other place except to a church, in order to make a vow, &c [PAGANISM, SURVIVAL OF.]

[b] Bonosus, bishop of Sardica, A.D. 392, denied the perpetual virginity of our Lord's mother; of the tenets of his followers in the 7th century little is known.

(d) Poenitentiale Bobiense.—From a MS. of the monastery of Bobbio, of the 7th or 8th century. It is headed "Judicius poenitentialis." It contains 47 sections on miscellaneous offences, and concludes with two prayers for the penitent.

(e) Poenitentiale Parisiense.—From a Parisian MS. of the 8th century. It contains 61 sections of the ordinary character.

(f) Poenitentiale Vindobonense.—This is from a Vienna MS. of the 10th century. It has a short instruction, headed "Judicium patrum ad penitentes." The greater number of its 102 sections are identical with those of the Merseburg book.

(g) Poenitentiale Floriacense.—From a Fleury codex, which was first printed by Martene (de Rit. Antiq. ii. 61, ed. Rotomag.) "ex pervetusto codice Floriacensi." It opens with a long "Ordo ad dandam poenitentiam," according to which the priest is to receive confessions. The penitential proper is styled "Judicium poenitentiae;" of its 50 original canons only 10 are extant.

(h) Poenitentiale Sangallense.—Taken from a St. Gall MS. of the 9th century. It is introduced by the same "ordo" as the preceding Poen. Floriac. It contains 19 short canons, nearly all of which are to be found either in the Merseburg or the Parisian books.

All these anonymous penitentials, with the exception of those from Vienna and Merseburg, bear the mark of the 7th or, at latest, of the first half of the 8th century. The "ratio" or "ordo" appended to Pseud.-Rom., Merseburg., Floriac., Sangall. are, perhaps, of the 10th or 11th century (Wasserschleben, Bussord. p. 56). They treat throughout of private penance, consisting chiefly of fasts on bread and water; sometimes the penance of exile, almsgiving, or psalm-singing occurs. In the Pseudo-Roman and St. Gall collections, there is a division of the subject into chapters according to the principal crimes; in the remainder, the canons are strung together without any system whatever. Different from the Anglo-Saxon practice is the ratio appended to the Pseudo-Roman and Merseburg collections, in which the deacon is permitted to receive the penitent, at least if the priest is not present, or in a case of necessity.

3. Poenitentiale Cummeani.—The history of this penitential is involved in much obscurity, and the identification of the Cummean (Commean, Cumian, Cumin, Comin) whose name it bears, is no less perplexing. The Acta SS. Hibernens. xii. Januar. mention twenty-one Irish ecclesiastics of that name, but no intimation is given of any of them having written a penitential. In two Swiss MSS. St. Gall, 550 and 150, a penitential is found with the preface, "Cummeani Abbatis in Scotin orti;" and from this it has generally been concluded that both Cummean and his work were of Irish or Scotch origin. Mone (Quellen und Forschungen, p. 494, cited by Wasserschleben), suggests that Columba, abbat of Iona, circ. 597, compiled the work, and that Cumin, one of his biographers, wrote the preface. Theiner (Disquisit. Sacrae, p. 280) attributed it to a Cummean, abbat of Iona, who died at the end of the 6th century. Kunstmann (die Lateinischen Pönitentialbücher der Angelsachsen, p. 22), although not expressing himself decidedly which Cummean he considers to be the author of the treatise, regards it as the principal source of Theodore's Penitential, and remarks that Theodore's use of it is a further proof of the consideration enjoyed by Irish teachers in England. Wasserschleben (p. 62), with more critical acuteness, points out that the designation "Abbas in Scotia ortus" clearly indicates that Cummean was not in his own country when he composed his book. He therefore looks for some ecclesiastic of that name who lived on the continent, and finds him in a Cummean mentioned in Acta SS. Hibernens. 4 Jun. p. 244; in Annal. Benedict. ii. p. 282, and in Ughellus, Ital. Sacr. t. iv. col. 959, 960, who emigrated to Italy, and died in Columban's monastery of Bobbio in the reign of the Lombard king Luitprand, which extended from A.D. 711 to 744. The fact that this Cummean is called "episcopus" in the Chronic. Bobiens. quoted in Ughellus, and the agreement of the date of his death with the date which the internal evidence from the penitential bearing his name indicates, render it highly probable that he is the "Abbas in Scotia ortus." Wasserschleben has published (pp. 460–491) a text taken from the following MSS.—Cod. Sangall. 550, saec. ix.; Cod. Sangall. 675, saec. ix.; Darmst. 91, saec. ix.; Vindob. Theol. 651, saec. x.; Frising. 43; Windbergens. 88. Of these MSS. only the first bears Cummean's name; and it is not clear whether some older MS. has not yet to be discovered of which these are copies. As to the date, it is manifest that, presuming this to be the authentic penitential, Cummean took his work from Theodore, and not the converse; for many passages of the former, in cc. i. ii. iii. iv. v. refer to Theodore by name as the authority for the decisions given. The date, therefore, cannot be earlier than Theodore's death in A.D. 690. On the other hand, Cummean was the source from which Egbert drew some of his canons. Compare Egbert. Pen. iv. 14; vii. 7; xii.; with Cum. Pen. vii. 8; vi. 8; xiii. This would give the middle of the 8th century as the limit of time on the other side. And this date coincides with that of the Cummean who died at Bobbio in the reign of Luitprand. There is a curious association of Cummean's work with the name of Jerome, the origin of which is of old date. In an Avignon MS. saec. xiii. it is distinctly ascribed to Jerome. In the Cod. Vindob. Theol. No. 725, saec. ix. fol. 40, is contained an "Inquisitio S. Hieronimi de penitentia." followed by two chapters from Theodore, almost the whole of Cummean, and some other additions, the whole, however, anonymous. This is also found under the title "Hieronimi fatentur" in Cod. Merseb. fol. 23, and with the superscription "de duodecim triduanis" in Cod. Vindob. jur. can. No. 116, fol. 21; also in the Cod. Cotton. Vespas. D. ii. 1, p. 3, are some "Canones poenitentiales secundum Hieronymum," which are undoubtedly borrowed from Cummean. And it is remarkable that Egbert, in his preface, mentions Jerome in company with Augustine, Theodore, and others, as authorities on the subject of penitence, but does not mention Cummean; he borrows, however, both from Cummean and Theodore, and it is not improbable that the work of the former was known to him under the name of Jerome.

The Penitential is headed by a long introduction comprising (1) "de diversis criminibus." (2) "De modis poenitentiae," which prescribes the scale of scourging, psalm-singing, and almsgiving, &c. by which penance could be redeemed, borrowed apparently from Irish sources, see Canones Hibernenses de Arreis, p. 139. The code of dispensations concludes with the declaration, which is also found in the Appendix to Bede's Penitential (x. 8), that he who does not know his psalms and cannot fast must look out some respectable man to do it for him, whom he must recompense either by labour or money. (3) "De divite vel potente, quomodo se redimit pro criminalibus culpis." The title of the treatise is 'Excarpsus de aliis plures poenitentiales et canones.'

4. Poenitentiale Bigotianum.—This penitential was first printed, but not completely, by Martene (Thes. Nov. tom. iv. col. 22–30), under the title 'Libellus de remediis peccatorum,' which is a variation from that found in the MS. Wasserschleben has printed his edition (pp. 441-460) from Cod. Paris. Reg. 3182 (olim Bigot. 89) fol. saec. xi. pp. 286–299. No name is attached to it, and Wasserschleben gives it the title Bigotianum, that being the only MS. in which it is found. The same MS. contains most of the Irish and British fragments, and the compiler has evidently drawn largely from Irish sources. He quotes "canones sapientium et Gregorii" (see supra, Canones Hibernenses, p. 1609), the Canones patrum, Vinniaus, Theodore, the Frankish penitentials, Cassian, and the Vitae Sanctorum, from which he adduces the examples of the Abbas Pastor, Moyses, Peritus, Antonius, St. Syncletica, and others. This element in the penitential would lead to the conclusion that, like Columban and Cummean, the author was one of the many Irish missionaries who settled in France. The work appears to have been made use of by Cummean, unless, as is not improbable, both were derived from a common source not yet discovered. It is especially rich in material, and the writer has shewn unusual originality in the arrangement of his matter.

5. Poenitentiale Vindobonense.—This is another anonymous penitential published by Wasserschleben pp. (493–497), from Cod. Vindob. Theol. Lat. No. 725 (olim 667), 8vo. saec. ix. fol. 1–82. It contains part of Cummean's introduction, the same part which is also found in Cod. Sangall. 675, and is designated here "Praefatio Cummeani Abbatis in Scotia orti." Then follow the titles of twenty-four chapters, borrowed from Cummean, Theodore, and Vinniaus. Then the "Inquisitio Sancti Hieronymi de penitentia," mentioned above; after that the titles of seventeen more chapters from the same sources as the earlier ones, and concluding with "Interrogatt. Augustini et respons. Gregorii."

6. Poenitentiale Remense.—Another book based on Cummean, found in Cod. Paris, 1603 (olim regius 4483; Remens. 264) saec. viii. 8vo. fol. 104–138. It is an anonymous work of sixteen chapters.

7. Poenitentiale XXXV. Capitulorum.—This is a very systematic compilation of penitential canons published by Wasserschleben (pp. 505–526) from the Cod. Vindob. jur. can. No. 116, 4to, saec. x. fol. 22–41, and Cod. Sangall. 150, fol. 285–318. The work is founded on Theodore, Cummean, and the Frankish Penitentials connected with Columban, and the decisions of the two former authorities, under the designation "Judicium Cummeani," "Judicium Theodori," or "Judicium Canonicum," are frequently cited in succession for the same offence. From the preponderating use made of Cummean's work, and Irish and Anglo-Saxon sources, and from the citation of a "Judicium Scotorum," it is a probable conjecture that the penitential was compiled by some Scotch missionary. The treatise appears to have had a wide circulation, for large excerpts from it appear in a MS. of the Austrian Cistercian Monastery of Holy Cross, saec. x. in the Cod. Valicell. saec. xiii. in the so-called Collectio Saviniana, and in the Collectio Anselmi Lucens (Wasserschleben, Beiträge zur Geschichte der vorgratianischen Kirchenrechtsquellen, pp. 34, 151).

Anglo-Saxon Penitentials.

1. Poenitentiale Theodori.—The treatise which bears the name of Theodore is the most important of the penitential books, but it is only within the last few years that a genuine text of the work has been published. Whether Theodore was himself the author of the book, and what it was, and whether any set of canons existed which could be proved to be drawn up under the authority of the great archbishop—these till quite recently were open questions. This obscurity is the more remarkable as there was a unanimity of tradition for many centuries that Theodore's was the first Anglo-Saxon Penitential, and it long had a widespread influence in England, and was long the source and model of the penitential regulations in France and Germany. This influence was partly due to the nature of the work itself, and partly to the learning and commanding character of Theodore, whose primacy, extending from A.D. 669 to 690, was a memorable one in the English church. The evidence for the belief that a Penitential did emanate from Theodore is as follows: (1) Egbert, who was consecrated bishop not later than A.D. 733, and who must have been born consequently soon after Theodore's death, twice in his undoubted Penitential quotes Theodore by name; in the preface he speaks of him in company with Augustine, Gregory, and other Fathers, as one of the great authorities on penitence; and in the body of his work (v. ii.) he takes a canon almost verbatim from Theodore's treatise, with the introduction "Teodorus dixit." The Liber Pontificalis (ed. Vignol. Rom. 1724, tom. i. p. 270) which was first published in the second half of the 8th century, states, "Theodorus Archiepiscopus peccantium judicia, quantos scilicet annos pro unoquoque peccato quis poenitere debeat, mirabili et discreta consideratione descripsit." Identical testimony is given by Paul Warnefrid (Paulus Diaconus) cited by Wasserschleben, p. 15. (3) The Codex Canonum Hibernicorum, the date of one MS. of which lies between A.D. 763 and 790 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 174), quotes the work by name, as do also many of the French penitentials and collections of canons. (4) It is spoken of by Rabanus Maurus (De judic. poenit. lat orum, c. 6; opp. Colon. 1626, tom. vi. p. 119) as "Poenitentialis quem Theodorus constituit." And Regino of Prüm, in his Visitation Instructions requires the ecclesiastics under his jurisdiction to be provided with a copy of either the Roman Penitential, or Theodore's or Bede's. On the other hand (i) Theodore's contemporaries are silent; Bede, who speaks fully of the archbishop's activity in the English church, has not a single reference to Theodore's Penitential, either in his own treatise or in his History; (2) by the twelfth century the work was unknown, or forgotten, in England.

Before coming to that which can now be confidently accepted as the authentic work ascribed in the 8th century to Theodore, it will clear the ground to give a list of the imperfect or spurious editions of the book that have been published.

(1.) In A.D. 1639 Spelman, in the first volume of the Concilia, published the headings of 78 chapters under the title of "Poenitentiale Theodori Archiepiscopi." He took them from a MS. of the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and expressly states that he was not permitted to make a copy of the whole. This MS. seen by Spelman, C. C. C. C. 190, was published, with six chapters at the beginning and twenty-two at the end omitted, by the Record Commission, Ancient Laws and Institutes of England, p. 277, seqq. edited by Thorpe. The C. C. C. C. 190 MS. was taken as the text, and MSS. Cotton. Vesp. D. 15, C. C. C. C. 320, were collated with it to supply various readings. In favour of this being the original work there is only the title, which is comparatively modern, and the authority of Spelman founded on a glance at the MS. Against this supposition are these fatal objections: c. 20 consists for the most part of canons from the second Roman council under Gregory II. A.D. 721; c. 38 contains a long passage from a capitulary of Charles the Great, A.D. 789; in almost all the chapters use is made of the Collection of Canons by Halitgar of Cambray, circ. 829; there are numerous citations from the French councils of Orleans, Agde, Chalons. The conclusion from this evidence is, that Spelman and Thorpe's Penitential is a French compilation not earlier than the ninth century. This edition was again published by Kunstmann (Die Lateinischen Pönitentialbücher der Angelsachsen, Mayence, 1844), who also published from a Ratisbon MS. a series of 193 canons, under the name 'Canones Gregorianni.' The full title in the MSS. is "Canones Sancti Gregorii Papae urbis Romae," the origin of which heading is doubtless to be found in the replies given to Augustine by Gregory on the ecclesiastical government of England. These "Canones Gregorii" are reprinted by Wasserschleben (pp. 160–180). They consist of a disorderly selection from the genuine work of Theodore.

(2.) D'Achery in the Spicilegium, vol. ix. published (A.D. 1669) 120 chapters from various Parisian MSS. under the title "Capitula Theodori." In A.D. 1671 they were republished by Labbe and Cossart (Concilia, vi. 1875), and again in A.D. 1723, in the new edition of the Spicilegium (i. 486), edited with the notes of Baluze and Martene, when the 120 original canons were increased to 168, of which however the last twenty came from the Irish book of Adamnan (supra, p. 1609). In Wasserschleben's collection these canons are printed (pp. 145–160) as "Capitula Dacheriana." The "capitula" are a mixed collection, arranged without any method, containing few canons on penance, and possess no claim whatever to be regarded as the original treatise.

(3.) Jacques Petit published in Paris, in A.D. 1677, with the title Theodori Poenitentiale, a work in fourteen chapters, taken from two MSS. from the library of De Thou, together with the "capitula" of D'Achery, and sixty other canons communicated to him from various MSS. by one Nicolas Favier. These fourteen chapters constitute what is now recognised as the second book of the original penitential. The capitula of Favier have no connexion with Theodore, but are from sources as late as the 10th century. This selection of Petit was reprinted by Migne in A.D. 1851, in vol. 99 of the Patrologia.

(4.) The obscurity which so long hung over the Penitential of Theodore was at length dispelled by the learning of Dr. F. W. H. Wasserschleben, Professor of Law in the University of Halle. In the introduction to his work, Die Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche, published at Halle in A.D. 1851, he has demonstrated (pp. 13–37) that Theodore himself wrote no penitential, but that the treatise which bears his name contains his original decisions, the name of the writer being unknown. Rejecting all previous editions, he has instituted a fresh search into the chief continental libraries, and as the result of his labours, has brought to light a book which he is satisfied is the original treatise issued under Theodore's name. For his text he has made use of the following MSS.: (a) Cod. Vindob. no. 2195 (Salisb. 324), fol. saec. ix. x. fol. 2–40; (b) Cod. Vindob. jur. can. no. 116, 8vo, saec. viii. ix. fol. 1–16; (c) Cod. Sangerm. no. 940 (ol. 912): this is an "apographum" of the Corpus MS. 320, to be mentioned below; (d) Cod. Herbipol. Theol. no. 32, 4to, saec. viii. ix., containing an index of both books, but only the text of the first. The remaining MSS. contain only the second book: (e) Cod. Paris, no. 1603, 8vo, saec. viii. fol. 92–103; (f) Cod. Paris, no. 3846 (ol. Regius, 3665, Teller. Remens. 262), fol. saec. ix. x.; (g) Cod. Paris, no. 1455, fol. (ol. Colbert, 3368, Reg. 3887), saec. ix.; (h) Cod. Sangerm. no. 366, 4to, saec. ix.; (i.) Cod. Darmst. no. 91, 4to, saec. ix. fol. 84, seqq.; (k) Cod. Sangerm. no. 1365, 4to, saec. x. xi.; and 2 Codd. Thuan., from which Petit's fourteen chapters were taken.

(5.) Soon after the publication of Wasserschleben's edition, and before they had themselves seen his text, Professor Stubbs and the late Rev. A. W. Haddan discovered a copy of the true work in England, which only differs from Wasserschleben's text in various verbal readings. This text was published by them in A.D. 1871, in Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents, iii. 176–203. It is taken from MS. 320 in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, an earlier MS. than any of those which are the source of Wasserschleben's publication, being probably not later than the 8th century; although even in this a reference (I. viii. 5) to "quibusdam codicibus" indicates that the original MS. has not yet been discovered. The Corpus MS. is one of those which Thorpe used without seeing its value; but of which Wasserschleben had only an imperfect transcript in Cod. Sangerman. 940. The fact that the researches of English scholars have brought them to the same conclusion as that reached by the eminent German investigator into Penitential literature may be regarded as decisive on this long-vexed question. We now possess a substantially accurate text of the treatise which was known in the early part of the middle ages by the name of the Penitential of Theodore.

The exact date and name of the writer of the Penitential will probably never be discovered. In some of the Parisian and the two Vienna

MSS., the work is described as "Poenitentiale Theodori," or "Canon Theodori de ratione poenitentiae et diversis quaestionibus." In another Paris MS. (Cod. Sangermanens. 1365) it is called "Libellus quem Theodorus archiepiscopus de diversis interrogationibus ad remedium temperavit poenitentium, de quaestionibus conjugiorum cap. xxvii." The full title of the original is wanting altogether in the early Corpus MS., which has lost its first folio; in the only MS. in which it is entire, Vienna 2195, it stands thus—

PRAEFATIO
INCIPIT PRAEFATIO LIBELLI QUEM PATER THEODORUS DIVERSIS INTERROGANTIBUS AD REMEDIUM TEMPERAVIT PENITENTIAE. DISCIPULUS UMBRENSIUM UNIVERSIS ANGLORUM CATHOLICIS PROPRIAE ANIMARUM MEDICIS SANABILEM SUPPLEX IN DOMINO CHRISTO SALUTEM.

This title is followed by a long preface, written in particularly barbarous and corrupt Latin. Nevertheless it throws considerable light on the authorship of the work. The treatise purports to be a series of decisions on ecclesiastical discipline given by "venerabilis Antistes Theodorus" in answer to the questions of the priest Eoda, surnamed "Christianus." In it use has also been made of a "libellus Scotorum," afterwards referred to (I. vii. 5), the author of which is expressly stated to have been an ecclesiastic. Of this Eoda, who submitted the questions to Theodore, nothing whatever is known; he cannot be satisfactorily identified with bishop Haeddi mentioned at the end of the Penitential, nor with any of the many persons of the age who bore similar names. The identification of the "discipulus Umbrensium," who is represented as the editor of the treatise, is equally remote. The designation signifies either that he was a native of Northumbria who had been a disciple of Theodore, or, more probably, an Englishman of southern birth who had studied under the northern scholars (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 173). The conclusion which is clear, and which can be drawn from the preface, is that Theodore was not the author of the Penitential in the sense of having written it himself, but that it contains his judgments, was drawn up under his personal direction, was published with his authority and during his lifetime, and has always borne his name. The priest Eoda is spoken of as "beate memoriae," and was therefore dead before the publication; but that Theodore himself was yet living seems highly probable, from the verses, first published by Kunstmann, in which, at the conclusion of the Penitential, he commends his soul to the prayers of bishop Haeddi.

For his decisions, next after Holy Scripture, Theodore is indebted to the current ecclesiastical law, and particularly the Codex Canonum of Dionysius Exiguus. Comp. Theod. Poenit. I. i. 1, with Can. Apost. 42; T. Poenit. I. ii. 6, with Conc. Ancyr. c. 9; T. Poenit. I. v. 10, with Conc. Nicaen. cc. 11, 12; T. Poenit. I. xv. 4, with Conc. Ancyr. c. 23. In T. Poenit. I. v. 2, pope Innocent is quoted by name, with a reference to a decision of his in Ep. ad Episc. Macedon. which is contained in the Dionysian codex. There is further evidence that this collection of canons was known in England in the 7th century; at the council of Hertford, A.D. 673, Theodore brought forward certain "Canones patrum" in order to select those which were suitable for the needs of the English church; and these "canones" in all probability were the collection of Dionysius Exiguus. Traces of Theodore's Greek training are seen in his frequent references to Basil's Epistle to Amphilochius. Five times he quotes Basil by name, in addition to many indirect appeals to his decisions. (Conf. Theod. Pen. I. ii. 7, viii. 14, xiv. 3, II. vii. 3, xii. 6; Basil. Ep. cc. 58, 18, 4, 9, 21.) A further evidence of Eastern learning appears from his many allusions to Greek practices; one chapter (II. viii.) contains nothing else but a comparison of the different customs and opinions of the Greeks and Romans. Justinian's Novells are another Eastern source on which he drew. (Conf. Theod. Pen. II. xii. 7, 11, 12, 21, 23, 32; Novell. Justin. cxl., xxxiv. 10, xx. 5, 7, 6.) Theodore must also have been conversant with the British and Scotch sources of ecclesiastical law. Theod. Pen. I. ii. 1 is apparently taken from the Liber Davidis, c. 6; Theod. Pen. I. ii. 7 from the Sinodus Luci Victoriae, c. 8. Theod. Pen. I. ii. 16 imposes fifteen years penance on incest, but adds that according to another standard life-long exile has been allotted; this is in reference to the Sinod. Luc. Vic. c. 6, which inflicts exile on incest. The one canon of Theodore which sanctions commutation of penance (I. vii. 5) is also founded on a Celtic authority; it comes from that same "libellus Scotorum" to which allusion was made in the preface. [REDEMPTIONS.]

2. Judicium Clementis.—This fragment was first printed by Kunstmann (Die Lateinischen Bussbücher der Angelsachsen, pp. 176, 177) from an Augsburg MS. no. 153. With this Wasserschleben has collated a 10th century MS. from the Austrian Cistercian convent of Holy Cross. Kunstmann identifies this Clement with Willibrord, one of the Anglo-Saxon missionaries to Frisia, in A.D. 692. Willibrord is known to have borne the name of Clement from one of the letters of Boniface to pope Stephen (Ep. 107, edit. Jaffé). Haddan and Stubbs have printed (Councils, &c. iii. 226) the canons as a fragment illustrating the Anglo-Saxon system of penitential discipline. Wasserschleben, however, without giving his reasons, appears to doubt whether the identification can be authenticated, and has appended the "Judicium" to the Frankish penitential. It comprises twenty sections of no special interest.

3. Poenitentiale Baedae.—There is no clue to the exact date of this work. Bede died on Ascension Day, A.D. 735, and assuming, as there is no reason to doubt, that the treatise was written by him, the date of it must be fixed in the early part of the 8th century. The penitential was first published in the Amplissima Collectio of Martene and Durand, vol. vii. col. 37, taken from a MS. in the monastery of St. Hubert at Andain in the Ardennes. This edition is incomplete, containing only the latter half of the work. A later and more perfect edition was printed by Wasserschleben (Bussordnungen, &c. pp. 220–230) from a Vienna MS. no. 116, 8vo, saec. viii. ix. fol. 17–22, collated with two other codices, Frising. no. 3, and Ransh. no. 73. In this edition the chapters were first divided into sections. It is reprinted with various readings from the issue of Martene and Durand, by Haddan and Stubbs (Councils, &c. pp. 326–334). In this form it may be accepted with little hesitation as the genuine production of Bede. It bears the title, INCIPIT EXSCARPSUM DOMINI BEDANI PRESBYTERI. It contains twelve chapters. In addition to this authentic treatise of Bede, another has been printed bearing his name. It appears in several editions of his collected works under the heading "Liber de remediis Peccatorum." It is printed in the Concilia of Spelman and Wilkins, the former of whom appears to have had some doubt of its authenticity, and to have omitted considerable portions of earlier editions. The best text is that printed by Kunstmann (Pönitentialbücher, &c. pp. 142–175) from a Munich MS. of the 11th century (Cod. August. 153), and adopted by Wasserschleben, in whose collection it bears the title "Penitentiale Pseudo-Baedae." Haddan and Stubbs regard it as a compilation from two distinct works, the Penitential of Bede and the Penitential of Egbert.

4. Poenitentiale Egberti.—Several treatises have been published bearing the name of Egbert. The discovery of the authentic work involved a no less complicated investigation than was necessary in the case of Theodore's Penitential. Among the documents which, wholly or in part, have been attributed at various periods to the archbishop are—

1. In Wilkins's Concilia (i. pp. 113–143) there is printed a work in five books in parallel columns, Anglo-Saxon and Latin, under the title, "Poenitentiale Ecgberti Archiepiscopi Eboracensis." This is reprinted by Thorpe in the Monumenta Ecclesiastica appended to the Ancient Laws (pp. 343–392), but with a different division. The first is named "Confessionale," the remaining four "Poenitentiale." In addition to which, under the title of Additamenta, Thorpe gives a collection of thirty-five other canons in Anglo-Saxon and Latin. A further edition of part of this work is given in Cooper's Appendix B to the Report on the Foedera, with the title. "Poenitentialis Ecgberti Archiepiscopi Eboracensis, liber iv^tus." The grounds for rejecting the claim of any part of this to be accepted as the original work are:—(1) The first three books of Thorpe's "Poenitentiale" are, with one slight exception, a translation of the third, fourth, and fifth books of the Penitential of Halitgar of Cambray, circ. A.D. 830. (2) The fourth book of the "Poenitentiale" is a compilation from Theodore and Cummeanc. (3) The "Confessionale" is composed of extracts from Theodore, the genuine Penitential of Egbert, and a few additions from the Poen. Bigotianum and Poen. Remense; although it is not possible altogether to exclude the supposition that Egbert may have translated into Anglo-Saxon some of the older passages both in the "Confessionale" and the fourth book of the "Poenitentiale."

2. Thirty-five canons, purporting to be extracted from the second book of the Penitential, were published by Spelman in the first volume of the Concilia; these were adopted both by Labbe and Cossart (Concilia, iv. 1601–1604) and by Mansi (Concilia, xii. 459). They are taken without any critical attempt to distinguish what is genuine, from a Bodleian MS. to be mentioned hereafter.

3. In addition to the Penitential, a collection of Excerptiones has been published by Spelman (pp. 258–278), Labbe and Cossart (vi. 1586–1588), Thorpe (Ancient Laws, p. 326 et seqq.), and in a translation in Johnson (Canons, ed. Baron. i. pp. 184–223) under the name of Egbert. The source from which these excerpts are taken is MS. Cotton. Nero, A. I. The fact that they contain extracts from the capitularies of Charles the Great is alone fatal to their claim to be regarded as Egbert's.

4. The Liber de Remediis Peccatorum is ascribed in some MSS. to Egbert. On its true history see above, Poen. Baedae.

5. The Pontificale which was published in 1853 by the Surtees Society, from a Paris MS., bears the name of Egbert, and there is no reason to doubt its authenticity. It is, however, as the name implies, a ritual and not a penitential book. Another work, the Dialogus, which is equally authentic, has an indirect bearing upon penitence. It is in the form of a series of decisions on ecclesiastical matters in reply to sixteen "interrogationes" submitted to the archbishop (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 403–413).

6. The genuine Penitential was first printed as an anonymous work by Martene and Durand (Amplissima Collectio, vii. coll. 40–48) from the same MS. in the monastery of St. Hubert in which Bede's tract is found. The independent researches of Wasserschleben have led him to the conclusion that this must be the original work. His edition is printed in his Bussordnungen, &c. pp. 231–247, taken mainly from the Cod. Vindob. jur. can. no. 116, fol. 77–87; it is also found in the following MSS.: Cod. Frising. no. 3, Ranshov. no. 73, Sangall. no. 677, Vat. Palat. no. 485. The genuine Penitential is also to be found in the Bodleian MS. 718, which comprises four books; of these books the first, containing twenty-one capitula, which are the first twenty-one capitula of the so-called "Excerptiones Egberti" of Thorpe, then the genuine work, then certain confessional prayers of a later date; the remaining three books belong probably to the 10th century. The first book concludes with the words "Finis libri Poenitentialis Ecgberhti Archiepiscopi." Haddan and Stubbs have reprinted (iii. 416–431) Wasserschleben's text, with various readings, from the Andain MS. of Martene and Durand, the Bodleian MS. 718, and the fragment printed in the Surtees edition of the Pontificale. The identification of this edition as Egbert's rests on the ground that it contains no reference to anything of a later date, that it is cited as his by Rabanus Maurus, a pupil of Alcuin, and that it is declared to be the work of the archbishop by the compiler of the Bodleian MS. 718. The exact date of the Penitential cannot be fixed with any accuracy. It was no doubt published while Egbert was archbishop. He died A.D. 766, in the thirty-fourth year of his pontificate, and he probably received the pall as early as 734, for at this date he is known to have consecrated bishop Frithbert of Hexham. The limits of time within which he issued the Penitential cannot then be drawn closer than A.D. 734–766. The full title of the book, with some variation in the Bodleian MS., is EXSCARPSUM DE CANONIBUS CATHOLICORUM PATRUM

VEL PENITENTIALE AD REMEDIUM ANIMARUM DOMINI EAMBERCTHI ARCHIEPISCOPI EBURACAE CIVITATIS.

Spanish Penitential.

In the Codex Vigilanus, or Alveldensis, in the library of the Escurial (ff. 148, scr. 976) there is a penitential book of Spanish origin, the greater part of which consists of excerpts from Theodore, Cummean, and Frankish penitentials. The substance of the book, therefore, contains nothing noteworthy, but the spelling is remarkable for the interchange of the letters b and v; for instance, prevent for praebent, serbandum, observari, inebriabent, noberca, abunculus, voberit, valneaberit, and decanus for diaconus. There is a trace of national customs in chapter 84: "Qui in saltatione femineum habitum gestiunt et monstruose se fingunt et majas et orcum et pelam et his similia exercent, 1 ann. penit." Majas is probably connected with the majo, maja, a boy or girl affectedly and shamelessly dressed; orcum, the orco of the old Spanish romance, the ogre or wild man of the woods; pelam signifies in Spanish a richly-dressed boy, carried with dancing on a man's shoulders. See Wasserschleben, p. 71.

Greek Penitentials.

A critical investigation into the history and sources of the Greek penitential books has not yet been made. Morinus (de Sacramento Poenitentiae, appendix, pp. 616–864) has published two Greek books, one of which has the name of John the Faster, Gregory's contemporary and opponent at Constantinople. Morinus has taken his edition from a 13th century MS. at the "Bibliotheca Altempsiana" at Rome; he professes himself unable to decide to what extent the MS. contains later interpolations into the original work; but he finds extracts in the works of Harmenopulus and Matthew Blastares of the 14th century, which profess to be taken from John's Penitential, but which do not exist in the Roman MS. The title of the edition of Morinus is Ἀκολουθία καὶ τάξις ἐπὶ ἐξομολογουμένων συνταγεῖσα ὑπὸ τοῦ ὁσίου πατρὸς ἡμῶν Ἰωάννου τοῦ νηστευτοῦ.

The other book, which he has published as a separate penitential, taken from a Vatican MS. which he had not seen himself, is styled: Ἰωάννου Μονάχου καὶ Διακόνου, μαθητοῦ τοῦ μεγάλου Βασιλείου, οὗτινος ἡ ἐπωνυμία, τέκνον ὑπακοῆς, Κανονάριον, διαγορεῦον περὶ πάντων λεπτομερῶς τῶν παθῶν, καὶ τῶν τούτοις προσφόρων ἐπιτιμίων, περί τε τῆς ἁγίας κοινωνίας, βρωμάτων τε καὶ πομάτων καὶ εὐχῶν λίαν συμπαθέστατον.

In addition to these Morinus has published an Ἀκολουθία τῶν ἐξομολογουμένων, taken from a 10th century MS. from the Barberini Library in Rome. He calls it a breviary or enchiridion of a penitential. It comprises three headings: the rite of making and receiving a confession, the form of examining the penitent, and the manner of giving absolution; it contains no list of penalties for sins, but refers to an index, from which Morinus infers that at the time when this breviary was in use there was well known in the Eastern church some penitential book, in which the penalties of sins were classified.

The methods and contents of these Greek books have little in common with the Latin penitentials; they bear a closer resemblance to the later "ordo" or "ratio" appended to some of the Frankish books. Morinus has printed the Penitential of Joannes Jejunator and the Canonarium of Joannes Monachus as distinct works. Whether they have any claim to be considered as original and separate treatises, or whether they are based on authentic books not yet discovered, or whether they are altogether productions of centuries as late as the 10th or even 12th, are questions which cannot be satisfactorily determined, till some scholar shall examine the MSS. which survive in the Eastern church with the same completeness and diligence which have been bestowed upon the penitential records in the monasteries and libraries of the West.

For the chief contents of this article the writer is indebted to the very learned work of Wasserschleben, Die Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche, Halle, 1851, and to the critical notes introducing the Anglo-Saxon Penitentials published by Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents, vol. iii. Oxford, 1871. [G. M.]

PENITENTIARY. For our knowledge of the office of the Penitentiary Priests, Presbyteri Poenitentiari, οἱ ἐπὶ τῆς μετανοίας πρεσβύτεροι, we are indebted to the account which Socrates (H. E. v. 19) and Sozomen (H. E. vii. 16) give of the abolition of the office. The appointment dates from the time of the Novatian schism. The number of penitents, particularly of those who had lapsed during the Decian persecution, who flocked to obtain absolution from the church, gave a handle to the Novatian party to denounce the system of Catholic discipline. Penitents also frequently made confession of sins before the congregation which were unfit to be recited in public, and were a cause of scandal, both to the bishop who published them and to the congregation who listened to them. To obviate these difficulties, a special officer called the Penitentiary was added to the ecclesiastical roll, whose duty it was to determine what crimes were too scandalous for public acknowledgment, and particularly to decide what offences excluded the offender from partaking of the Holy Communion, and generally to superintend, under the authority of the bishop, the administration of discipline. The office was in force only till the time of Nectarius, Chrysostom's predecessor in the see of Constantinople. During his episcopacy it was abolished, at least in that part of the church which acknowledged the jurisdiction of Constantinople. The occasion which gave rise to the abolition does not appear to have implicated the Penitentiary personally. A certain lady of rank, who was doing penance under his direction, afterwards confessed that she was at the same time carrying on an intrigue with a deacon of the church. The scandal caused a great outcry, and Nectarius, to prevent similiar disorder for the future, formally abrogated the office. This was in A.D. 391. There hangs some obscurity over the question whether the office was at any time a universal one. Sozomen (H. E. vii. 16) implies that it existed throughout the West, and was particularly held in esteem in the church of Rome. But the more general opinion seems to be, from the absence of any mention of the Penitentiary among Latin ecclesiastical writers, that the office was confined to the Eastern church. Compare however, Augusti, Christ. Archäol. ix. 122. The chief interest attaching to the abolition of the office is the bearing which it has on the Roman controversy of auricular confession. Both Socrates and Sozomen expressly state that upon the discontinuance of the office, each one was to be allowed to partake of the holy mysteries as his own conscience dictated. From which it seems to follow, that whatever may have been the practice while the Penitentiary Priest was one of the recognised officers of the church, henceforth secret confession was discountenanced, and that there was to be nothing approaching to compulsory confession before coming to the holy sacrament. To weaken the force of this inference it has been suggested that Socrates and Sozomen were Novatians, or at any rate wrote in the interest of the Novatian party; but this suggestion has no foundation. For some account of the controversy, see Hooker, Eccl. Pol. VI. iv. 8; Bingham, Antiq. XVIII. iii. 12.

Ducange quotes Anastasius Bibliothecarius for the authority that pope Simplicius, A.D. 468–483, appointed an officer called Poenitentiarius Ecclesiae Romanae, with the duty of superintending the penitents and hearing their confessions, and that this is the origin of the office in the church of Rome. In modern times the chief of the Penitentiaries, Magnus Poenitentiarius, is a high official in Rome, and one of the cardinals.

The regular cathedral officer in the Roman Catholic church called the Penitentiary, is one of the appointments of the council of Trent.

PENSIONS. Certain allowances appear from very early times to have been granted from ecclesiastical revenues to ecclesiastical personages under certain circumstances, such as to the clergy who were disabled by sickness or old age, and to bishops who had been driven from their sees, or forced to resign them through bodily infirmity. Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. discip. iii. 2, c. 29, § 1) says that these were usually given in two different forms, either simply as an annual stipend, or by granting the usufruct of lands belonging to the church; the latter chiefly in the case of strangers who had sought refuge in the diocese. Examples of both kinds of pension will be found in the instances that follow.

The first recorded case of a pension granted by authority is found in the acts of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (act. 10), where Domnus, who had been ejected from the see of Antioch by the "Robbers' Meeting," was, at the request of his successor Maximus, allowed an annual sum from the revenues of the see sufficient to keep him from want, and that his claims might not be a cause of disturbance in future years. The same council (acts 11, 12) allowed Bassianus and Stephen, who had both been uncanonically elected to the see of Ephesus, pensions of 200 aurei each from the property of the diocese.

Abundant instances of the causes for which pensions were allowed, and the different ways in which they were granted, are found in the writings of Gregory the Great. Thus (Epist. i. 42) in sending certain clergy to monasteries to do penance for incontinence, he orders that they should receive a sufficient allowance for their subsistence, in order that they might not be a burden to the houses into which they were received. In another place (Epist. i. 43) he directs the bishops of Illyria to obey the mandate of the emperor, who had ordered that the bishops who had been expelled from their sees by the war should share homes and revenues of those who had remained undisturbed, but adding a special provision that they only receive sufficient for their sustenance, that they were only to be regarded as guests, and that they should have no authority whatever given them which should even approach to a partition of the see. Again, a pension of forty pieces of gold (Epist. ii. 53) was assigned, on the ground of common humanity, to Agathon, bishop of Lipara, who had been deprived of his see by canonical judgment. When a certain Felix, a deacon, who had ceased communion with the church from mistaking the intention of the fifth oecumenical council, applied for readmission, Gregory (Epist. iii. 14) entreats the bishop of Syracuse either to restore him to the office of a deacon or to allow him a part of the stipend belonging to it, adding that, in order to take himself a share in the good work, he would add a small annual allowance from the funds of the church of Rome. A bishop of Gaul (Epist. xi. 7) who was unable to perform his duties from pains in the head, was to be persuaded to retire, but his maintenance provided from his church.

John the deacon, in his Life of Gregory the Great, says that pensions were allowed to bishops for two reasons. First (Vit. Greg. iii. 16) when they were driven from their sees and allotted to other bishops for maintenance; second (id. iv. 39) when bishops retiring were allowed to receive from their successors a sum sufficient for their maintenance.

An instance of the usufruct of church lands being assigned as a pension is recorded by Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. ii. 36) in the case of Euphrasius, bishop of Clermont in Auvergne, who allotted to Quintianus, bishop of Rodés in Aquitania, who had been driven from his see by the Goths, gifts of houses, fields, and vineyards; and the bishop of Lyons also allotted to him certain possessions of his diocese which were situated in the province of Auvergne. A more curious kind of pension comes to light by the same historian, who records (id. viii. 20) that when Faustinus, bishop of Aix, had been deposed by the council of Mâcon, it was also ordered that the bishops by whom he had been ordained should each allow him an annual pension of 100 aurei.

An instance of another kind of pension is found in a letter of Hincmar of Rheims to pope Nicholas I. (Ep. 17, Opp. ii. p. 249), in which he says that Rothadus, bishop of Soissons, having been obliged to relinquish his see, he had procured for him the gift of a good abbey; and that all his fellow bishops had given him assistance in his calamity, partly from motives of pity, and partly that he might not give any further trouble to the see, "ut molestus et seditiosus ecclesiae cui praefuerat esse non decertaret."

Another class of pensions appears to have existed in connexion with the cathedral clergy. The third council of Orleans, A.D. 538 (c. 18), leaves it entirely to the discretion of the bishop to permit or to refuse a share in the revenues of the cathedral to clergy who had left it for the purpose of entering monasteries or serving other churches. On the other hand, the council of Merida, A.D. 666 (c. 12), provides that the bishop shall have the right of selecting his cathedral clergy from the parish priests and deacons, and that such clergy shall retain the revenues of their parishes on condition of making an adequate allowance to the presbyter who has taken charge of the parish, and to the other clergy connected with the church. The stipend in such cases accruing from the cathedral revenues being described as a gift from the bishop conditional on the good behaviour of the recipient. Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. iii. 2, c. 29, § 22, 23) thinks that the stipend derived in these cases from the cathedral was called an allowance (pensio) in order that such clergy might not be charged with holding a plurality of benefices.

In these cases the allowance of pensions was right and equitable. Abuses, however, appear to have soon crept in, especially from the right assumed by the Frankish sovereigns of granting pensions at their will settled on property belonging to the church. On the representation of Leo III. this evil was checked by a capitulary of Charles the Great (Addit. iii. c. i.) positively forbidding any division or partition of the property of the church, either in his own lifetime or by his successors.

Another class of pensions, attended ultimately with great evils, arose from the practice of appointing bishops, under various circumstances, to at least titular possession of more than one. [W. D.]

PENTECOST. The word πεντηκοστή (in Latin writers sometimes Quinquagesima) was used in a twofold sense by the primitive church, both for the whole period of fifty days between Easter and Whitsun Day, and also more strictly for the single festival of Whitsun Day.

In the early church the whole of the fifty days between Easter and Whitsun Day was regarded as one continuous festival. Thus Tertullian says that all the festival days of the heathen put together will not make up the Pentecost of the Christians, "Excerpe singulas festivitates nationum et in ordinem exsere; Pentecosten implere non poterunt" (de Idololatr. c. 12), and speaks of Pentecost as a very large space of time, "latissimum spatium," appointed by the church for the administration of baptism. (de Bapt. c. 19). In the same sense the canons of the council of Antioch in Encaeniis, A.D. 341, speak of the quarta septimana pentecostes, medio pentecostes (can. 20, Labbe, ii. 579). The Ordo Romanus lays down that "Tempus Pentecostes inchoatur a primo die resurrectionis et currit usque ad diem quinquagesimum post Pascha," and the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. v. c. 20, ad fin.) extend the term to the whole period as one of festal joy (see Beverigg, Pandect. tom. ii. Annotat. 27; Cotelerius, Patr. Apostol. tom. i. p. 466). Basil the Great speaks of the seven weeks, τῆς ἱερᾶς πεντεκοστῆς (de Spirit. Sanct. c. 27). From the continuous festal character of the period, fasting and kneeling in prayer were prohibited, as on Sundays. Tertullian says, "We count it unlawful to fast or to worship kneeling on the Lord's Day, and we rejoice in the same immunity from Easter Day to Pentecost (Tertull. de Coron. Milit. c. 3). The same rule was laid down by the council of Nicaea, A.D. 325 (can. 20. Labbe, ii. 37). Ambrose also describes the fifty days as each like a Sunday, when "jejunium nescit ecclesia," and which the tradition of the ancients appoints to be regarded "ut Pascha" (Ambros. in Luc. lib. vii. tom. ii. p. 1046). In Sermon 61 (falsely attributed to him) the same prohibition of fasting in Pentecost is found; and in the Praefat. ad Ps. 50 it is spoken of as the Christian jubilee, when the debt of sin is remitted, the handwriting against us blotted out, and all Christians rejoice with alleluias. We have also the authority of Epiphanius (Exposit. Fid. c. 22) for the cessation of fasting and kneeling during this period. Augustine speaks of "dies illi quinquaginta post Pascha usque ad Pentecostem quibus non jejunatur" (Epist. 86), though he elsewhere speaks with some doubt as to whether the rule was universally observed (Epist. 119, ad Januar. c. 17). During this period the alleluia, which had been silent during Lent, was heard abundantly in the services of the church (August. ibid.). Isidore has a long passage (De Offic. Eccl. lib. i. c. 32) on the mode of observing the period, and the absence of all marks of mourning. Cassian is also very full on this subject (De Institut. lib. ii. c. 6, 18; Collat. xxi. c. 8, c. 11, c. 20). Honorius Augustodunus, in his Gemma Animae (lib. iii. c. 136), writes: "Tempus inter Pascha et Pentecosten Quinquagesima nominatur quia a Sabbato quo duo alleluia inchoantur usque ad Sanctam Pentecosten quinquaginta dies computantur quibus alleluia in cantu frequentatur" (cf. Vales. ad Euseb. Vit. Constant. lib. iv. c. 64; Balsamon in can. Nic. xx., apud Beveg. Pandect. tom. i. p. 84; Mendoza, in Concil. Illiber. c. xvii. in can. 43, apud Labbe, Concil. i. 1261).

Early in the 5th century an ordinance of the youthful devotee Theodosius II., A.D. 425, doubtless emanating from his sister Pulcheria, prohibited all stage-plays, Circensian games, and public spectacles during the period of "quinquagesima" on account of its great sanctity (Cod. Theod. lib. xv. tit. v. de Spectaculis, leg. 5 tom. v. p. 253). By a custom of the church which was ancient in the time of St. Chrysostom (Homil. lxiii. [lxvi.] cur in Pentecoste Acta legantur), and which is still retained in the Greek church, the Acts of the Apostles were read between Easter and Whitsun Day (August. Tract. in Joann. VI. § 18; Serm. 315; de Praedest. Sanct. c. ii. § 4; Chrysost. Homil. xxxiii. in Gen. 12. In the church of Spain and Gaul the Apocalypse was commanded also to be read at this season under pain of excommunication (Concil. Tolet. iv. can. 16, Labbe, v. 1711). In a more restricted sense Pentecost stood for the festival of Whitsun Day alone. In this sense it closed the cycle of the Festivals of our Lord, semestre Domini, among which it held the third place, after Easter and Christmas. The earliest occurrence of the word in this sense is in the forty-third canon of the council of Elvira, A.D. 305 (Labbe, i. 975), which, referring to the erroneous custom prevailing in some churches of Spain of cele

This canon appears to have been ineffectual in checking the irregularity, and Pentecost continued to be observed prematurely in the Spanish church. The first of the canons of the tenth council of Toledo, A.D. 656, insists on observing the right number of fifty days, without which they could not look for the full gift of the Spirit (Labbe, vi. 400). Pentecost, as the anniversary of the descent of the Holy Spirit, the birthday of the church of Christ, was observed as one of the chief Christian festivals from a very early time. It is mentioned by Origen (Contr. Cels. lib. viii. p. 392), and, if we give any weight to the doubtful authority of the supposititious work ascribed to Justin (Quaest. ad Orthodox. No. 115), still earlier, by Irenaeus. It is clearly defined in the Apostolical Constitutions: "After ten days from the Ascension, which, from the first Lord's Day is the fiftieth day, do ye keep a great festival on that day the Lord Jesus sent on us the gift of the Holy Ghost" (lib. v. c. 20). There is a sermon of Gregory Nazianzen's (de Pentecoste Orat. xliv. tom. i. p. 712, in which he calls it the "day of the Spirit"—τίμησον τὴν ἡμέραν τοῦ πνεύματος. Chrysostom designates it μητρόπολις τῶν ἑορτῶν (Homil. de Pent. ii. p. 469.) Augustine also mentions it as one of the chief Christian anniversaries (Contr. Faust. lib. xxiii. c. 12), and in his letter to Januarius (Ep. 54) speaks of it as one of the unwritten ordinances observed by the whole world, appointed either by the apostles (which was the unfounded opinion of Epiphanius, Haer. lxxv. § 6) or by oecumenical councils. Among the sermons of Leo the Great are three (Serm. 75–77) de Pentecostes, and four (Serm. 78–81) de Jejunio Pentecostes. It was regarded as a day of chief observance, of equal dignity with Easter and Christmas, on which it was the duty of all Christians to communicate, and that not in the smaller country churches, but in the mother churches of the cities (Concil. Agathens. A.D. 506, can. 18, 31; Labbe, iv. 1386; Concil. Aurel. I. A.D. 511, can. 25; Labbe, iv. 1408). Eusebius designates it (de Vit. Constant. lib. iv. c. 64) μεγίστη ἑορτὴ, πάνσεπτος καὶ πανάγια πεντηκοστή. The celebration originally lasted the whole of the following week, to the Octave, to which effect a decree was passed by the synod of Mentz, A.D. 813. The vigil of Pentecost was one of the chief seasons for the administration of the sacrament of baptism, second only to Easter Eve. These two were indeed the only times when baptism was permitted in the Western church, except in the case of the sick (grabatarii). To those in the Eastern church the Epiphany was added (Greg. Naz. Orat. xl. de Bapt.). In the time of Tertullian it is evident that baptism was permitted during the whole of the fifty days which were known as Pentecost in its wider sense (Tertull. de Bapt. c. 19); but subsequently it appears to have been restricted to the actual vigil of the festival (Bingham, Orig. XI. vi. 7). Jerome also speaks of Pentecost being, like Easter, one of the solemn times for baptism (Hieron. Comment. in Zach. xiv. 8; Epist. lxi. ad Pammach. § 16; BAPTISM, 69, Vol. I. p. 165).

Fasting being prohibited by the earliest church ordinances during the whole of the Pentecostal period, including the following week, called Hebdomas Spiritus Sancti, the usual stationary fasts on Wednesdays and Fridays were originally not resumed till the week succeeding the Octave. Afterwards, when the Ember weeks became fixed, the week succeeding Whitsun Day was observed as a time of fasting and prayer (EMBER DAYS). Leo the Great, in his Pentecostal sermons, lays great stress on the observance of the Pentecostal Fast on the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday (Serm. 75–81). The Rogation days date from the time of Mamercus bishop of Vienne, c. A.D. 450, and established by the first council of Orleans, A.D. 511, were unacceptable to the Spanish church as violating the old rules against fasting in Quinquagesima, and they therefore deferred their litanies and processions till after Whitsun Day (Wal. Strabo, de Offic. Eccl. c. 28; Concil. Gerund. can. ii.). [ROGATION DAYS.] [E. V.]

PENTECOSTARION. The Πεντηκοστάριον, says Neale (East. Ch. Intr. p. 877), "is to the weeks between Easter and All Saints' Sunday what the TRIODION is to those between the Sunday of the Publican and Pharisee and Easter;" i.e. it is the ordinary office-book of the Greek church for that period of the year. PEPUZA or PUZA (in Phrygia), NOVATIAN SYNOD OF, A.D. 375. According to Socrates (iv. 28), at which it was agreed to keep Easter on the same day as the Jews. But this, he adds, was not the act of the collective body (Mansi, iii. 451). [E. S. Ff.]

PERA. This word seems to be used by Cassian in an unusual sense for the sheepskin which formed part of the monk's dress: "pellis caprina, quae melotes vel pera appellatur" (de Coenob. Inst. i. 8; Patrol. xlix. 74; cf. Collat. xi. 3, ib. 150). Hence the word has found a place with Isidore: "Melotes, quae etiam pera vocatur," &c. (Etym. xix. 24; Patrol. lxxxii. 691). It can hardly be supposed that Cassian uses the word in its ordinary Latin sense, for it is not at all likely that the monks under such a rule would be allowed to carry a wallet.[a] Gazet (not. in loc.) suggests that pera is a transcriber's error for paenula; others would read diphthera, and Ducange would transfer appellatur to follow melotes. This, however, seems decidedly feeble. It is perhaps just possible that the word may be Egyptian. [R. S.]

PERIODEUTAE (περιοδευταί). Assistants to bishops, with the duty of itinerating in country districts. The council of Laodicea, A.D. 320 (c. 57), enacts that no bishop shall be appointed in villages or country districts, but only "periodeutae;" but that those bishops already appointed shall perform no act without the authority of the bishop of the city (τοῦ ἐπισκόπου τοῦ ἐν τῇ πόλει). It does not appear that the discharge of these functions implied admission to the episcopal office, since at the council of Chalcedon (act. 4) Valentinus and Alexander sign themselves "presbyter and periodeutes." There is no further information about the duties of these officials, or as to the portion of episcopal function they were permitted to discharge. [Compare Chorepiscopus.] [P. O.]

PERISTERIUM. [Dove, the Eucharistic, p. 576.]

PERITRACHELION. [Stole.]

PERJURY. The Christian code, following the old Roman law set a special brand of infamy on perjury (Cod. Theod. II. ix. 8). It was visited with no less severity by the discipline of the church. Chrysostom (Hom. xvii. in Matt. p. 182; Hom. xxii. de Irâ, t. i. p. 294) placed it in the same category with murder and adultery. By Basil (ad Amphiloc. c. 64) a perjured person was allotted eleven year's penance. The first council of Macon, A.D. 581, c. 17, enacted that he who instigated another to perjury should be debarred from communion for the remainder of his life, and that his accomplice should be incapable for the future of giving testimony. The crime occupied a chapter in each of the early English penitentials. In the penitential of Theodore (I. vi.) it is declared (c. 1) that he who commits perjury in a church shall do penance eleven years; but (c. 2) if under compulsion (the compulsion of his lord, Bed. Poenit. v. 1), then only for three quadragesimae. He who breaks a vow taken at the hands of a layman (Theod. Poenit. I. vi. 3; Egbert. vi. 7) is left unpunished by the Greek canons. But if the vow had been taken at the hands of a bishop, priest, or deacon, or on the altar or a consecrated cross, the penance for breaking it was three years, with a remission of two years if the cross was not consecrated (Theod. I. vi. 4; Bed. v. 2; Egbert. vi. 2). The penance for simple perjury was three years. By the penitential of Bede, v. 4, the false witness was to be punished according to the circumstances of the case; and one (ibid. c. 5) who had unwittingly been guilty of perjury and afterwards confessed his offence was to do penance a year. In the Frankish penitential of Cummean, founded on that of Theodore (Wasserschleben, Die Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche, p. 460, seqq.), the punishment is graduated to the offender's rank. A perjured layman (Pen. Cum. v. 1) was to do penance three years; a cleric, five; a subdeacon, six; a deacon, seven; a priest, ten; and a bishop, twelve. By another clause (c. 9), a false witness is punished less severely, but on a corresponding scale. In c. 4, a layman committing perjury through covetousness was to sell all his goods and distribute them to the poor and retire to a monastery; but if covetousness did not lead to the crime, then for three years he was to live in exile, not bear arms, and fast on bread and water, for two more abstain from wine and flesh and give freedom to a slave, for two more years distribute alms, and at the end of seven he might be restored to communion.

The breaking of oaths which ought never to have been made was not a matter likely to come under canonical supervision. There are, nevertheless, a few decisions of councils. The Spanish council of Lerida, A.D. 523, c. 7, declared that any litigant binding himself by an oath to remain at enmity with his adversary should on account of his perjury abstain from communion for a year, and hasten to be reconciled. The lawfulness of breaking such oaths is discussed at length by the eighth council of Toledo, A.D. 653, c. 2. The council supposes one or two extreme cases, such as a man having sworn to slay his father, or compass the pollution of a sacred virgin, and resolves that it is far better he should break his oath than keep it. The opinions of Ambrose, Augustine, Gregory, and Isidore, are cited in support; from the last of whom several decisions are quoted (Isidor. ii. 31; sent. 10, 22) to shew that sometimes it is better to break an oath than observe it. PERSIA, NESTORIAN SYNODS IN. (1) A.D. 499, under Babeus, patriarch of the Nestorians, at which leave was given to all the clergy to become "husbands of one wife" (Mansi, viii. 239).

(2) A.D. 544, under Abas I., Catholicos of the Nestorians, which passed eleven canons and asserted in the last of them that they had all been based on the faith of the 318 fathers, i.e. the Nicene (Mansi, ix. 125).

(3) A.D. 588, under Iesujabius, patriarch of the Nestorians, which passed thirty canons, and declared in the first for receiving the Nicene faith, the canons of the Apostles, and of the other fathers, besides repudiating the heresies of Arius and Macedonius on the Trinity, and of Eutyches and Manes on the Incarnation (Ib. 975). PERSONIFICATION (IN ART). The fashion of representing the virtues and moral feelings by human figures is one of great antiquity both among writers and artists, e.g. Paulinus of Nola (Epist. 16, c. 4) tells us that "et spes et nemesis et amor atque etiam furor in simulacris coluntur"; and Christian poets in like manner have embodied the virtues and vices in their verses. Prudentius, for example, in his "Soul's Conflict" (Psychom. v. 21), gives this warlike representation of Faith:

> "Prima petit campum dubia sub sorte duelli
> Pugnatura Fides, agresti turbida vultu,
> Nuda humeros, intonsa comas, experta lacertos."

The middle ages are the period which is more especially rich in the representation of the virtues by human figures; and, although they are beyond the limits of this book, it is worth while to cite the case of the bronze gates of the baptistery at Florence, executed in 1330 by Andrea Pisano, because they preserve the type of representation which is met with in earlier times. Faith is here personified as a female with clasped hands, and Charity, also as a female, with a lighted torch.

An example of personification may be seen on a rich sarcophagus from the cemetery of the Vatican (Bosio, Rom. Sott. p. 75), which contained the remains of the popes Leo I. II. III. IV. On a frieze which runs along over a graceful arch surmounting a standing figure of our Lord surrounded by His disciples, are seen two half-length figures, supposed to represent Hope and Charity; the former with clasped hands and eyes raised to heaven, the latter with a lighted torch.

Among similar representations of artists are to be seen Penitence as a female figure in a MS. of Genesis in the Imperial Library at Vienna, and in a MS. of Dioscorides written early in the 6th century (pp. 4–5), a woman holding a mandrake in her hand personifies Invention, proved by the title in Greek character EYPECIC over her head. On p. 6 of the same MS. Juliana Anicia, daughter of Anicius Olybrius, is represented with female figures embodying Prudence and Magnanimity (Φρόνησις and Μεγαλοψυχία) on either side of her, while Thanksgiving (Εὐχαριστία) bows to the ground before her and seems to kiss her feet. Licetus (de Lucernis Antiq. lib. iii. c. 10) says that he found an ancient lamp with figures, representing, in his opinion, Faith and Hope depicted on it; and what gives probability to this view is that Hope is standing in the same attitude and using the same gesture as the figure on the sarcophagus cited above. Such allegorical figures became no doubt more common in the middle than they were in the earlier ages; but there appears sufficient grounds for thinking that they were not rare, if not very common, in the first eight centuries; and that the same attitudes, gestures, and other accompaniments were employed to represent the same ideas in the earlier as in the later centuries (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v. Vertus et Vices). PERVIGILIAE. [VIGIL.]

PETER AND PAUL, SS., IN ART. Representations of the two chief apostles—St. Peter as the apostle of the Circumcision, and St. Paul as the apostle of the Gentiles—had a very early place in Christian art. Eusebius speaks of having seen many such, attributed to the grateful feeling of those who had been converted by these apostles to the faith (H. E. vii. 18). Constantine's vision of the two apostles recorded in the acts of St. Sylvester (ap. Fuhrmann de Bapt. Const. tom. ii. p. 68), however apocryphal, is a proof that at that time these personages had acquired a recognised type. The earliest known examples of this traditional type, as shewn in the gilded glasses of the catacombs, the bronze medals, the mosaics and sarcophagi, as well as in the early statues and statuettes of St. Peter, correspond in their main features to the portraiture given by Nicephorus Callistus (H. E. ii. 37). St. Peter is usually represented as tall and upright, his hair and beard short and crisp, his face round and somewhat undignified, with a long flat nose and arched eyebrows. St. Paul is shorter in stature and a little bowed, his forehead bald, his beard long and pointed, his face oval, with low eyebrows, and the nose straight and long, and his physiognomy characterized by greater delicacy and refinement. The portraits given in the Greek Menaea (Buonarroti, Vasi antichi, p. 76) correspond with this type in almost all points, except that they represent St. Peter, as well as St. Paul, as suffering from baldness. Some rare examples, on the other hand, assign to St. Paul a brow well covered with hair.

The earliest representations of the two apostles are those found in the gilded glasses of the catacombs. They are sometimes depicted alone—St. Peter (Garrucci, Vetri ornati, tav. x. n. 5, tav. xiv. n. 3), where by a singular caprice of the artist the apostle appears as a beardless, smooth-faced young man, and St. Paul (ibid. tav. vii. n. 5) where the usual type is maintained. In by far the larger number of examples the two apostles are depicted together, either in bust (ibid. tav. x. xii. xiii. xiv; Buonarr. tav. x. xi.) [GLASS, p. 731] or standing (Garrucci, tav. ix. xi.) or seated (ibid. tav. xiv. xv. &c.). In an example of this last attitude (ibid. tav. xv. n. 1–5), the two apostles appear to be engaged in a lively discussion, such as that recorded at Antioch (Gal. ii. 11). Each holds a codex, and St. Peter presents his roll to his brother apostle with a degree of eagerness in keeping with the ardency of his character. The two apostles are in innumerable instances portrayed standing on either side of our Lord, either in person or symbolized by his monogram (ibid. tav. xvi. n. 5), according to the custom spoken of St. Augustin as prevailing in his day in Africa (de Consens. Evangel. 1–10). [PHOENIX.] In many cases Christ is bestowing on His apostles the crown of life (ibid. tav. xii. nn. 1–7). The central place is not unfrequently occupied by a female orante. We have instances of the Virgin (?) (ibid. tav. ix. 6, 7), St. Agnes (ibid. tav. xxi. 1–3), St. Peregrina (ibid. n. 6). St. Lawrence also fills the same place (ibid. tav. xx. n. 7; Buonarr. tav. xvi. 2). Other saints are sometimes associated with them, e.g. St. Pastor and St. Damas (ibid. tav. xxiii. n. 2), and St. Philip, St. Simon, and St. Thomas (ibid. tav. xxv. n. 6). In the room of the central figure in some instances we see a chaplet of victory (ibid. tav. x. n. 2, 4; Perret, tom. iv. pl. xxi. 3), or a flower (ibid. tav. x. nn. 6, 8), or several codices (ibid. tav. xiii. nn. 2–6). St. Peter is once represented seated, preaching to a standing female (ibid. tav. xvi. n. 2). Instead of the more usual PAVLVS, we sometimes find St. Paul designated by his earlier name SAVLVS (ibid. tav. xi. n. 3; tav. xvii. n. 7).

Next to the gilded glasses the class of objects on which the two apostles most frequently occur are the sarcophagi and sepulchral slabs of the catacombs. The engravings of Bosio, Aringhi, Bottari, Garrucci, Perret, Maffei (Mus. Veron. p. 484), Allegranza (Mon. Christ. di Milano, tav. iv. vi.), Bugati (Mem. di S. Celse, tav. 1), Millin (atlas, pl. xxxviii. lix. lxiv. lxix.), Le Blant (Sarcophages d'Arles), may be referred to for a large and instructive series of examples. The type is almost invariable. Our Lord stands on a hill, from which issue the four rivers of Paradise; on one side St. Peter, with covered hand, receives from Him a half-opened codex; on the other St. Paul bows in reverence (Bottari, tav. xxv.; Marangoni, Act. S. Vict. p. 42). A somewhat different arrangement appears in a sarcophagus at St. Apollinare in Classe, Ravenna. Our Lord is seated, and gives a roll with His right hand to St. Paul, while St. Peter holds the key and cross on the left. Both apostles are approaching Christ with hasty strides, their garments flying behind them in the wind. A sepulchral slab from the cemetery of St. Callistus, commemorating a Christian named Asellus (Boldetti, p. 193; Perret, vol. v. pl. xi.), bears the busts of the two apostles, rudely incised, with the sacred monogram between them. The hair and beard correspond to the usual type.

Another class of examples is found in the mosaics of the basilicas, for which we may refer to Ciampini's Vetera monumenta and our own article on MOSAICS. The frescoes of the catacombs furnish few, if any, instances (Boldetti, p. 64; Bottari, tav. clxvi.). Examples of mosaics will be found in St. Sabina (Ciamp. tom. i. tab. xlviii.), St. Agatha (tab. lxvii.), St. Maria in Cosmedin (tom. ii. tab. xxiii.), St. Lorenzo (tab. xxxviii.), St. Praxedes (tab. xlvii.), St. Cecilia (tab. lii.), the baptistery at Ravenna (ibid. p. 234), and at Capua (ibid. tab. liv.); the former basilica of the Vatican (de Sacr. Aedific. tab. xiii.), and the later mosaics of the side apses at St. Costanza (ibid. tab. xxvii.). A bronze medallion found in the cemetery of St. Callistus, engraved by Boldetti (p. 192), and more faithfully by De' Rossi (Bullettino, 1864, Nov. Dec.), preserved in the Vatican Library, presents the heads of the two apostles embossed in a style of unusual excellence [see woodcut, and MONEY, p. 1307].

Medallion of SS. Peter and Paul. (Martigny.)

It is difficult to point to an example in which the normal type is depicted with so much dignity and beauty. This fine work of art is placed by De' Rossi in the first half of the 3rd century.

There was no invariable rule as to the position of the two apostles when associated together. In the earlier glasses and other works of art St. Peter generally occupies the right-hand place, and St. Paul the left. In later examples the order was frequently reversed, and this disposition became the rule, especially in the papal bulls (Mamachi, Orig. et Antiq. Christian. tom. v. p. 503). It is evident that no dogmatic importance can be assigned to this change of position.

On the identification of St. Peter with Moses, in the scenes of the Striking of the Rock and the Apprehension, the article OLD TESTAMENT IN ART may be consulted, and that on SCULPTURE for a description of the existing statues of St. Peter. An onyx given by Perret (tom. iv. pl. xvi. 85) represents the apostle walking on the water and our Lord seizing his hand to rescue him. The warning of his Denial is a frequent subject on sarcophagi. There is a very remarkable example on one of the ends of the magnificent sarcophagus of the 4th century discovered in the Vatican (Bosio, 85, 87; Aringhi, i. 317, 319), now preserved in the Lateran Museum. In this and in some other examples the cock stands on the summit of a fluted pillar. The washing of St. Peter's feet by Christ is found on a sarcophagus at Arles almost precisely similar to one given by Bottari (tav. xxiv.)

(Millin, Atlas, lxiv. no. 4). Le Blant, Sarcophages, pl. ix. The raising of TABITHA [see that heading] is sculptured on a few sarcophagi. There are examples at Fermo (de Minici's Monum. di Fermo, p. 83); St. Maximin (Rostan, Monum. iconogr. de l'Église de St. Max. fig. xii.), and Arles (Le Blant u. s. pl. ii. fig. 2, p. 4).

The delivery of the keys to St. Peter appears on a sarcophagus from the Vatican (Bottari, tav. xxi. v.), where the subject is well executed. Another example is found on sarcophagi in the crypt of St. Maximin (Monum. de S. M. Mad. tom. i. p. 771), in the museum of Arles (Le Blant, u. s. pl. ii. fig. 1), and De' Rossi speaks of having found it on one in the cemetery of St. Priscilla. It also appears on a vase of uncertain age, to which Bianchini assigns a very early date (Not. in Anastas. Vit. S. Urban. n. 18), given by Bottari (tom. i. p. 185), and on the mosaic of St. Agatha in the Suburra, A.D. 472 (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tab. xxvii.). The apostle usually receives the keys or key (in some instances there is but one) in a fold of his garment with marks of the greatest reverence. [KEYS, p. 900.] The apostle carries the keys as a symbol of authority on a sarcophagus at Verona (Maffei, Mus. Veron. p. 484), in the mosaic of the triumphal arch of the basilica of St. Paul (A.D. 441) (Ciampini, tom. i. tab. lxviii.), and that of St. Maria in Cosmedin at Ravenna (A.D. 553), where he is in the attitude of offering them at the throne of the Lamb (ibid. tom. ii. tab. xxiii.). The sword does not appear as a symbol of St. Paul till a comparatively late period. The earliest example known to Martigny is in a mosaic belonging to the tomb of Otho II. (d. A.D. 983), preserved in the crypt of St. Peter. [E. V.]

PETER, ST., APOSTLE, FESTIVALS OF. Several festivals connected with this apostle have long been observed in the church, the commemoration of the martyrdom, in which he is associated with St. Paul, of his episcopate, commemorated on two separate days, and of his imprisonment.

(i.) THE FESTIVAL OF ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL.

1. Early History of Festival.—A joint festival of St. Peter and St. Paul, primarily and especially connected with the Roman church, can be traced back to the 4th century after Christ. The discussion as to the whole question whether St. Peter ever visited Rome, and if so for how long, and the evidence for Rome having been the scene of his martyrdom, will be found at length under the article POPE. It may suffice here to remark that Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. ii. 25) cites Dionysius of Corinth, who, in a letter to the Roman church, speaks of Peter and Paul having taught in Italy and having borne witness to the truth κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν καιρόν. Eusebius (in loc.) also cites the Roman presbyter Caius, as testifying to Rome as the scene of these apostles' triumphs—ἐὰν γὰρ θελήσῃς ἀπελθεῖν ἐπὶ τὸν Βατικανὸν, ἢ ἐπὶ τὴν ὁδὸν τὴν Ὀστίαν, εὑρήσεις τὰ τρόπαια τῶν ταύτην ἱδρυσαμένων τὴν ἐκκλησίαν. The same testimony is also borne by Tertullian (contra Marc. iv. 5; de Præscript. 36).

We have said that a festival in commemoration of this martyrdom can be traced back to the 4th century, the Natalis Apostolorum Petri et Pauli, observed on June 29. A hymn of Prudentius, on the passion of these two apostles (Peristeph. 12), is evidence of the early celebration of the festival in Rome. We cite the first four lines in evidence:

> "Plus solito coeunt ad gaudia; dic, amice, quid sit;
> Romam per omnem cursitant ovantque,
> Festus apostolici nobis redit hic dies triumphi
> Pauli atque Petri nobilis cruore."

Later on we find among the works of St. Leo three homilies (Hom. 82-84; vol. i. p. 321, sqq. ed. Ballerini), the first of which dwells on the double commemoration, the second refers to St. Peter alone (relegated to the appendix by Quesnell, as partly spurious, partly a mere cento from the works of St. Leo), and the third is for the octave of the two apostles, the heading, however, being perhaps not genuine. At the beginning of the first of these, St. Leo claims that "in the place where the departure of the chief of the apostles was made glorious, there on the day of their martyrdom should the rejoicing take its rise." The Leonine Sacramentary contains masses for the day, to which we shall again recur (vol. ii. 35 sqq.). We also have sermons for the festival by St. Augustine (Sermm. 295–299; Patrol. xxxviii. 1348), by Maximus of Turin (Sermm. 66–69; Patrol. lvii. 663), &c.

It seems also pretty certain that the ancient Kalendarium Carthaginense includes this festival, though the MS. is somewhat defective at this point. After St. John the Baptist's day (June 24) come two entries partly lost, then ". . . Jul. Sanctorum . . . Apostolorum." After another illegible line comes the ides of July. As no other festival of apostle is known to have occurred at this time, it seems safe to refer this line to St. Peter and St. Paul (Patrol. xiii. 1222). The calendar of Bucherius, which Muratori (de Rebus Liturgicis, c. 4; Patrol. lxxiv. 877) refers to A.D. 355, has the entry: "iii. calend. Julii Petri in Catacumbas et Pauli Ostiense, Tusco et Basso Coss."[a] it is hardly necessary to add that all Western martyrologies and calendars agree in their recognition of this festival, as the different forms of the Mart. Hieronymi, Bede, Florus, Usuard. &c.

On the other hand, the Apostolic Constitutions, a work of distinctly Eastern origin, makes no definite mention of the day, perhaps due to the festival having had a Western origin and gradually finding acceptance in the East. The order is merely given (viii. 33) that slaves are to rest on the great festivals of the Saviour, and also on "the days of the apostles," to which is added a special mention of that of the protomartyr Stephen. As regards the Eastern church, we find a direct statement, valeat quantum, made by Theodorus Lector (Hist. Eccles. ii.

[a] Since the consulship of Tuscus and Bassus fell in A.D. 258 (Clinton, Fasti Romani, in loc.), the assigned date is either altogether erroneous, as Baronius thinks, or is to be referred to some other event than the martyrdom. Pearson (Annal. Cypr. in ann. 258) suggests that it may be the date of the translation of the apostles' remains in the time of the Valerian persecution; and it has even been suggested that the translation fell on the same day as the martyrdom, but this is, of course, mere conjecture.

16; Patrol. Gr. lxxxvi. 189), to the effect that a Roman senator named Festus, being sent to Constantinople on political matters, exhorted that "the commemoration of the chief of the apostles,[b] should be held with great honour and reverence." Theodorus adds that the festival had been kept at Constantinople before, but now received a great additional splendour (πολλῷ πλέον ηὐξήνθη τῆς τοιαύτης τὸ φαιδρὸν πανηγύρεως). This is put in the reign of Anastasius I., who died A.D. 518.

What credit we are to assign to the remark of Theodorus, that a festival of St. Peter and St. Paul had been kept at Constantinople before the time of Anastasius I., or indeed to his whole story, it is impossible to say. The absence of any homily for a festival, afterwards so important, in the genuine works of St. Chrysostom, is conclusive against any general celebration of the festival in the East in his day. We may take this opportunity of adding that in the older editions of St. Chrysostom (e.g. Saville, vol. v. p. 991) was contained a homily, εἰς τοὺς κορυφαίους τῶν ἀποστόλων Πέτρον καὶ Παῦλον καὶ τὸ αὐτῶν μαρτύριον ἐνδοξότατον. The spuriousness of this is, however, palpable; and Montfaucon contemptuously rejects it (vol. viii. p. 7, in spuriis).

Binterim (Denkw. v. i. 384) cites as evidence for the early celebration of this festival in the East a discourse of Gregory of Nazianzum and one of Gregory of Nyssa. As regards the latter, first published by Gretser (Ingoldstadt, 1620), it is sufficient to say that it appears to be certainly the work of Maximus Planudes (see Patrol. Gr. xliv. 35). The former, delivered in A.D. 381 before the hundred and fifty bishops in Constantinople, does not appear in the passage cited to have anything to do with the subject before us, but to be a bidding farewell to a certain church in Constantinople—Χαίρετε, ἀπόστολοι, ἡ καλὴ μετοικία, οἱ ἐμοὶ διδασκαλοὶ τῆς ἐμῆς ἀθλήσεως, εἰ καὶ μὴ πόλλακις δμῖν ἐπανηγύρισα (Orat. 42, c. 26; Patrol. xxxvi. 489, where see note).

In the Eastern church at the present day the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul is, save the two chief festivals of St. John the Baptist, the only one not immediately connected either with our Lord or the Blessed Virgin, included in those of the first rank. The entry for the day in the Menaea is τῶν ἁγίων ἐνδόξων πανευφήμων ἀποστόλων καὶ πρωτοκορυφαίων Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου, and in the Greek metrical Ephemerides prefixed by Papebroch to the Acta Sanctorum for May (vol. i. p. xxxii.) is τῇ ἐνάτῃ σταυρὸν Πέτρος εἱκάδι, δορ ὁ Παῦλος. The festival of June 29 occurs also in the Ethiopic and Coptic calendars (Ludolf, ad Hist. Aeth. Comm. p. 420). Besides this, Ludolf also mentions, but in the Ethiopic calendar only, festivals of Cephas and Saul on September 22, and of Peter and Paul on June 19[c] and July 8; but it is possible that these do not all refer to the two apostles.

In the calendar of the Armenian church given by Assemani (Bibl. Or. iii. 1, 645 sqq.), we find commemorations of St. Peter and St. Paul on June 29 and December 27, the former perhaps a Western importation in addition to an already existing celebration. There is also a commemoration of Peter and Paul, who are, however, perhaps not the apostles, on June 1.

In connexion with the twofold nature of the celebration in the Roman church, a difficulty has been needlessly raised on account of a notice in the Micrologus (c. 42; Patrol. cli. 1009), where, in a discussion on the rule to be observed on the concurrence of two festivals in one day, it is said that one may be postponed to the following day, "as the holy pope Gregory decided to observe the feast of St. Paul after the feast of St. Peter." Now in the Gregorian sacramentary, after the heading, iii. kalendas Julii. Natalis Petri et Pauli, comes the heading, pridie kalendas Julii. Natalis Sancti Pauli. A sufficient explanation is given by Ménard, that originally the pope celebrated mass twice on the earlier day, once in the church of St. Peter and then in that of St. Paul, the latter service being afterwards transferred to the following day. The hymn of Prudentius we have already cited speaks of the two masses as said in different churches on the same day (Peristeph. xii. 57, sqq.).

Confirmation is also to be had from the Gelasian sacramentary, where three masses are given, besides that for the vigil, one for St. Peter proprie, one for St. Paul proprie, and one for both apostles; all three, however, being for June 29. The presumption naturally is that a mass was specially provided for the service in the church of each of the apostles, and a third for use elsewhere on that day. On the above grounds, and considering too that in the service for June 29 in the Gregorian sacramentary the names of the two apostles are equally dwelt on, it is but reasonable to conclude that the special commemoration of St. Paul, whether held on June 29, as in the Gelasian, or on June 30, as in the Gregorian sacramentary, was due to the desire to give that apostle an equal share of honour, the other commemoration having been held in the basilica of St. Peter.

2. Liturgical Notices.—At the risk of a certain amount of repetition, it will be desirable now briefly to review the information derived from our chief extant liturgical monuments. Beginning with those of the Roman church, we find in the Leonine sacramentary a series of masses, in which the one apostle enters as prominently as the other. One of the last of these has the heading, Item ad Sanctum Paulum, in which, however, St. Peter is mentioned co-ordinately with St. Paul. To the sacramentary of Gelasius we have already referred; we may repeat here that we have a mass for the vigil of the apostles Peter and Paul. This is followed by three masses, one for each apostle proprie, and one for a conjoint celebration. A number of forms are also given for the vespers, and a mass for the octave of the festival (lib. ii. 29, sqq.; Patrol. lxxiv. 1166). In the Gregorian sacramentary is a mass for the vigil, for the festival (Natalis Petri et Pauli[d]), [b] The reading of the text is here τῶν κορυφαίων ἀποστόλου Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου. For this Valesius suggested τῶν ἀποστόλων κορυφαίου, referring the title to St. Peter only. His second suggestion, to alter ἀποστόλου into ἀποστόλων, seems more reasonable.

[c] In place of the Peter and Paul of the Ethiopic calendar, the Coptic calendar gives the Patriarch Peter.

[d] It may be noted that Ménard's Cod. Rodradi reads Natale Sancti Petri, and his Cod. Rhemensis, Natale Sancti Petri, proprie. The earlier of these MSS., however, is not earlier than the time of Charlemagne.

and on the following day is a mass for the Natalis Sancti Pauli. There is also a mass for the octave (col. 111, ed. Ménard). It may be noted here that in some MSS. of the Gregorian sacramentary there is a twofold vigil given, the second being in the night (ib. col. 404). In the Gregorian antiphonary, the vigil bears the name of St. Peter only, and so too the festival of June 29, followed by the nativity of St. Paul on the next day. Into this point, however, we need not further enter. The octave bears both names conjointly.

In the Ambrosian liturgy, there is a mass for the vigil and for the festival of the two apostles, but no commemoration of St. Paul is indicated for the following day.

We pass next to the Gallican church. In the ancient lectionary (Lectionarium Luxoviense), edited by Mabillon, the lections in festo Sanctorum Petri et Pauli are an extract from the account of their passion (in place of the ordinary prophetical lection), Romans viii. 15–27, St. Matt. v. 1–16 (Mabillon de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. ii. p. 159; Patrol. lxxii. 208). The MS. containing this lectionary is assigned by Mabillon to the seventh century, which alone would shew that our festival was observed in Gaul under the Merovingian kings.

We may, however, apparently go with safety much further back. There is extant a fragment of a homily of Avitus, bishop of Vienne (circa A.D. 490), bearing the heading, "dicta in basilica S. Petri, quam sanctus episcopus Tarantasiae condidit" (no. 6; Patrol. lix. 294; and the first of the following fragments evidently belongs to this homily). Again, Gregory of Tours mentions the Natale of St. Peter and St. Paul among the festivals whose vigils were to be observed in the church of Tours (Hist. Francorum, x. 31; p. 531, ed. Ruinart). After such evidence, it is rather curious that we should find in a letter of Catulfus to Charlemagne the remark, "sancti Petri in publico celebrare regno tuo constitues" (Patrol. xcvi. 1366). How far any neglect may have occurred, or what special reasons there may have been for urging such a point, it is quite impossible to say.

Mabillon's Gothico-Gallic missal, which he refers to the 8th century, gives a Missa Sanctorum Petri et Pauli, which contains a solemn benediction of the people [BENEDICTIONS, Vol. I. p. 196].

The Mozarabic missal gives a mass for the festival of the two apostles (p. 334, ed. Leslie), and in the printed editions this is followed by the Commemoratio S. Pauli, but there is no special form for this latter, and it is obviously a later addition. The prophetical lection, epistle, and gospel are respectively Ecclus. xliv. 2–16, 1 Pet. i. 2–15, John xv. 7–17. We may add here that in the Sacramentarium Bobianum the epistle and gospel are Rom. v. 7–17 and Matt. iv. 18, John ii. 15–19. As regards the church of Milan, Thomasius's Lectionarium Ambrosianum gives 2 Cor. xi. 19, and we may probably gather from a passage in St. Ambrose (Lib. de Virg. c. 19, § 121, sqq.; Patrol. xvi. 139) that the early part of Luke v. was also read, for he cites verse 5 as from the gospel for the day. As regards the church of Africa, the diocese of Hippo at any rate, we find the epistle was drawn from 2 Tim. iv., for Augustine, in his sermons for this festival, twice cites verse 6 as having been just read—"recole verba quae paulo ante . . . audivimus, Ego, inquit, jam immolor" (Serm. 297, § 5; 299; § 3; vol. v. 1772, 1781, ed. Gaume); and that John xxi. 15 formed part of the gospel is seen from one of the same sermons (2962; ib. 1761).

In the Greek church the epistle and gospel are respectively 2 Cor. xi. 21–xii. 9, and Matt. xvi. 13–19; the gospel at Matins is John xxi. 14–25.

(ii.) THE FESTIVALS OF THE CATHEDRA PETRI.

1. Early History of Festivals.—We pass now from this joint celebration of the two apostles to another very ancient festival which regards St. Peter only. The idea dwelt on in this latter is of his episcopate, or perhaps we may more strictly say, of his confession of Christ and our Saviour's declaration in answer (Matt. xvi. 16, sqq.), and whether it were so directly intended or not primarily, it has ultimately been utilised in the interest of the claims of the see of Rome.

Although the main idea of the festival is clear enough, much uncertainty prevails as to its early history. From about the 8th century onwards we constantly find two days bearing the name of the Cathedra Petri, January 18 and February 22, although it is true that the former is not unfrequently absent. These are known as the Cathedra Romana and Cathedra Antiochena respectively,* and are supposed to commemorate St. Peter's two several episcopates. That St. Peter had been bishop of Antioch is maintained, among others, by Leo, who connects the apostle in a like special way with the two churches ("speciali magisterio in Antiochena et Romana urbe fundavit ecclesiam." Epist. cxix. 2; vol. i. 1213, ed. Ballerini). Our earlier notices, however, are but of a single festival. It has then to be considered what is the cause of the twofold commemoration, and where did the festival originally take its rise. As regards the latter point, we may safely say the West, from the absence of any trace of such a festival in the East, and from the early date at which it can be traced as existing in the Roman church. As regards the former point, two answers may be given. It is possible that there being one Roman festival, this one commemoration branched out into two, with the notion of giving a fresh impetus to the idea underlying the commemoration, a special element being assigned to each day. On the other hand, it must be remembered that our earliest Roman notices fix the Cathedra Petri on Feb. 22, and bring in no mention of Rome or Antioch; and further that in Gaul, where the festival had apparently an exceptional importance, there are, at any rate, reasonable grounds for thinking that the festival fell in January. All this would rather point to the conclusion that the Roman and the Gallican churches observed the festival on different days, and afterwards both these commemorations were embodied in the same calendar, and the mentions of Rome and Antioch are but the attempt to account for the twofold occurrence. Lastly, although a weighty objection to the Roman origin of the festival may be urged from the fact of its absence from important Roman records, e.g. the Gelasian sacramentary, still an important point the other way is that the first notice of the festival occurs in a Roman calendar, two centuries before any other notice is found. This fact, combined with the à priori likelihood that a festival which specially brought into prominence the idea of the primacy of Peter should take its rise in the Roman church, may perhaps justify us in thus striking the balance of probabilities. If so, it must however be admitted that the Roman church did not at first bring the matter into such prominence as at a later time.

* It may be noted that this arrangement is not quite universal, for some forms of the Gregorian sacramentary have in Roma added to the heading of Feb. 22.

We must now enter into the evidence seriatim. Our earliest mention of the festival is that in the Bucherian calendar, where the entry is viii. k. l. Mart. Natale Petri de Cathedra (Patrol. lxxiv. 877). This is a rather peculiar use of the word natale, but it is obviously equivalent to festivitas. In the calendar of Polomeus Silvius, which belongs to A.D. 448, we find on Feb. 22 the entry, Depositio S. Petri et Pauli, followed by the words, "cara cognitio, ideo dicta, quia tunc etsi fuerint vivorum parentum odia, tempore obitus deponuntur" (see Acta Sanctorum; January, vol. i. p. xlv). The reference in the latter sentence is doubtless to the heathen rite of the feralia or parentalia, celebrated in the latter part of February, to which we must again refer, and this may be illustrated by the entry for the day in the calendar of Furius Dionysius Philocalus, which carries us back a century earlier, Caristin (Kollar, Analect. Vindobon. i. 963). As to the meaning of the former clause, the Ballerini, in their notes on a sermon of St. Leo for the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul, suggest (vol. i. 498) that there was a confusion in Silvius's mind with the great festival of June 29, aided, it is hinted, by his observing a festival of the Cathedra Petri on Jan. 18. It is evident, however, that we cannot speak here otherwise than very doubtfully. What evidence the Leonine calendar might have afforded us, it is impossible to say, as the early part of the sacramentary is wanting. The festival is passed over, as has been already mentioned, in the Gelasian sacramentary. It is given in the Gregorian sacramentary as edited by Ménard (col. 29), though not in the text given by Muratori. In most MSS. of the Gregorian sacramentary, the heading is merely Cathedra Sancti Petri; the Cod. Ratoldi prefixes in Antiochia. Some editions give in Roma. This irregularity tends to confirm us in our notion, that the special ideas of Rome and Antioch are not of the original essence of the festival, but introduced as an afterthought.

In the Ambrosian liturgy there is no recognition of the festival; but in the Gallican church it must have had a rather exceptional prominence, as in Mabillon's Lectionarium Luxoriense not only are lections provided for the festival itself, but for three Sundays reckoned from it. It does not seem clear whether this Gallican feast is to be placed in January or February. The much greater prominence of the festival of the latter month in the West generally would favour the view that the latter is meant. Moreover, Mabillon's Gothico-Gallic missal gives us a mass for the day, which follows that for the conversion of St. Paul, which fell on Jan. 25. Another argument may be derived from the order of the second council of Tours (A.D. 567) forbidding offerings of food to the dead on this festival. This order we shall cite at length presently. It will be remembered that we have already referred to the heathen practice as prevailing at the end of February. On the other hand, Mabillon reminds us that forms are only given for two Sundays after the Epiphany, and also that after forms for three Sundays following the Cathedra Petri come those for the beginning of Lent. This is clearly in favour of the January date. There is also independent evidence that in Gaul the feast of the Cathedra Petri fell in January. Mabillon cites from a Mart. Gellonense, "xv. kal. Februarii, secundum Gallos cathedra sancti Petri apostoli." It will thus be seen that there are reasonable grounds for thinking that the Gallican festival fell in January, but of course the case is not sufficiently strong to be at all pressed.

Be the matter as it may, the majority of martyrologies and calendars recognise the two festivals. Thus in the Mart. Hieronymi we have, "xv. kal. Febr. Dedicatio cathedrae sancti Petri apostoli, qua primo Romae sedit"; and "viii. kal. Mart. Natalis cathedrae S. Petri apostoli, qua sedit apud Antiochiam." The martyrology of Bede has the festival in February, but only some forms of it recognise that in January. Both are given in such martyrologies as those of Usuard., Rabanus Maurus, Notker, &c. Wandalbert, on the other hand, gives only the festival of Feb 22, his notice for which is (Patrol. cxxi. 590):

> "Octavoque Petri cathedra et doctrina coruscat, > Urbs laeta Antiochi quo primum praesule venit."

Binterim, speaking of ancient German calendars, remarks (Denkw. v. 1–331) that but few recognise the festival of Jan. 18. It was not till the time of pope Paul IV. (ob. A.D. 1559) that it was definitely and authoritatively established.

2. Liturgical Notices.—We have seen that nothing is to be looked for from Roman liturgies before the Gregorian, some forms of which give a mass for the Cathedra Petri on Feb. 22. The notion of the festival is made sufficiently plain by words occurring in the service. Thus in the collect we read: "Petro, collatis clavibus regni caelestis, animas ligandi atque solvendi pontificium tradidisti"; or again in the Preface: "Petrum apostolorum principem ob confessionem Unigeniti Filii Tui . . . caelestium claustrorum praesulem custodemque fecisti, divino ei jure concesso, ut quae statuisset in terris, servarentur in caelis."

Attention has been already called to the fact that in Mabillon's Lectionarium Luxoriense, lections are provided both for the festival of the Cathedra Petri and for three Sundays reckoned from it, Die Dominico post Cathedram sancti Petri, &c. (Mabillon de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. ii. 119; Patrol. lxxii. 181). The epistle and gospel for the festival are respectively Acts xii. 1–17, Matt. xvi. 13–19, John xxi. 15–19; the leaf of the MS. which contained the prophetical lection is wanting. The mass in the Gothico-Gallic missal brings out very strongly St. Peter's confession as its central idea (op. cit. lib. iii. 226; Patrol. lxxii. 181).

In the Mozarabic missal, which has the one commemoration in February, the prophetic lection, the epistle and gospel are respectively Isa. xxxii. 1–19 (with several omissions),

1 Peter v. 1–6, Matthew xvi. 13–20 (Patrol. lxxiv. 718). The same gospel also is found in the Sacramentarium Bobianum and the Comes of Pamelius; the epistles in these last being respectively 1 Peter i. 3, 4, and Heb. v. 1 sqq.

3. Miscellaneous Notices.—We have referred above to the order of the council of Tours in connexion with this festival; we shall now cite part of the rule in question. After protesting against the heathen abuses connected with the calends of January, and still practised in the sixth century, it proceeds: "Sunt etiam, qui in festivitate Cathedrae domini Petri Apostoli cibos mortuis offerunt et post missas redeuntes ad domos proprias, ad gentilium revertuntur errores, et post Corpus Domini sacratas daemoni escas accipiunt" (can. 22; Labbe, v. 863).

We find this practice referred to in the sermons for the Cathedra Petri formerly attributed to Augustine, but palpably spurious (Serm. 190–192 in Append.; vol. v. 2836, ed. Gaume). Reference is made to a deadly error as still prevalent on that day, "ut super tumulos defunctorum cibos et vina conferunt" (Serm. 190, c. 2; cf. 191, c. 3). We may remark here that this festival did not exist at all in Africa in Augustine's time. The custom condemned above, like many other heathen practices, seems to have lasted on in the church for a long time; and, in the 12th century, John Beleth refers to it in such a way as to indicate its long continuance (Rat. d.v. off. c. 83; Patrol. ccii. 87). He goes so far as to describe the institution of the Christian feast as mainly designed to counteract the heathen feast. After saying that annually, on a certain day in February, the heathen were in the habit of placing a feast on the graves of their parents, for the refreshing of the spirits of the dead, but which demons devoured, he proceeds to say that this custom was so deeply rooted that holy men instituted the festival of the Cathedra Petri, fixing it on the same day on which those abominable things were done by the heathen, so that thereby it should be altogether got rid of. Still the old custom left a trace of itself even on the Christian rite, "unde etiam ab illis epulis festum hoc appellatum est beati Petri epularum."

It may perhaps be worth mentioning here that there is still preserved in the Vatican a wooden chair, which is asserted to be the veritable one in which St. Peter sat. On this and on the whole question of the festival of the Cathedra Petri, reference may be made to Phoebeus, Dissertatio de identitate cathedrae in qua S. Petrus Romae primum sedit: et de antiquitate et praestantia solemnitatis cathedrae Romanae. Romae, 1668.

(iii.) The Festival of S. Petri ad Vincula, etc.

Both the Eastern and the Western churches commemorate the imprisonment of St. Peter by Herod Agrippa and his miraculous deliverance. On Jan. 16 is the Festival of St. Peter's Chain in the Greek church, and on Jan. 22 in the Armenian church (Assemani, l. c.): also August 1 is the Western festival Natale S. Petri ad Vincula. Neither of these times, it will be observed, can be meant to represent the actual time of the event, which fell shortly before Easter (Acts xii. 4); but it is probable that in both cases the date has reference to the dedication of a church in memory of it. The Western festival has by some been associated with the chains with which the apostle was bound by Nero; this, however, was certainly not the primary idea, and we shall discuss the point at length presently.

We shall first refer briefly to the Eastern festival. The entry for this in the Menaea is, ἡ προσκύνησις τῆς τιμίας ἁλύσεως τοῦ ἁγίου καὶ πανευφήμου ἀποστόλου Πέτρου; and that in the Greek metrical Ephemerides already cited is, Χειρὶν προσκυνέω Πέτρου δεκάτῃ ἐνὶ ἕκτῃ. The historical lection for the day in the Menaea gives the tradition that the chain from which St. Peter was miraculously freed was found by the Christians and treasured up. Afterwards it was removed to Constantinople and deposited in the shrine of St. Peter, which is in the Great Church, and there his commemoration (σύναξις) is observed.

As to the supposed date of this event, nothing is said, and it is quite uncertain when the festival commemorating it arose. There is, indeed, a sermon for it extant of which the Latin translation is given in Lipomannus and Surius (de probatis Sanctorum Historiis, vol. iv. 447); the Greek text itself also is found in MSS. in the Vatican Library and elsewhere, but, so far as I am aware, it has not been printed. The sermon, however, is obviously of a date long subsequent to Chrysostom, and Baronius (not. in Mart. Aug. 1) assigns it to Proclus or Germanus, patriarchs of Constantinople. Baronius recounts how the empress Eudocia, the wife of Theodosius II., brought from Jerusalem in A.D. 439 the two chains with which the apostle had there been bound, one being sent for a church in Constantinople, and the other given to the empress's daughter Eudoxia, the wife of Valentinian III., who built a church on the Esquiline in its honour.[t] As regards this story, we may remark that there is no trace of it in any Greek writer whatsoever. Nicephorus Callistus even, when speaking of Eudocia's journey to Jerusalem, and of the relics thence brought by her (Hist. Eccles. xiv. 2), makes no mention of St. Peter's chain. It may be added that this story is equally absent from any but quite late Western records, and may be summarily dismissed. All that may be safely assumed is that at some time a church was built in Constantinople in memory of St. Peter's imprisonment; and there, doubtless in accordance with the taste of the age, chains declared to be his were treasured up.

In the Western church, too, the date on which the festival fell probably had reference to the founding of a church. This is spoken of in many martyrologies as one built and consecrated by St. Peter himself, with no mention of any imprisonment. We cannot claim a very early date for it, for it is absent from the Kalendarium Carthaginense, the calendar of Bucherius, and the Leonine and Gelasian sacramentaries. Nor does [t] This is on the whole the story as told in the modern Roman breviary, which adds that the chain brought from Jerusalem to Rome, when placed by the pope with the one with which the apostle had been bound by Nero, became miraculously joined with it so as to form one chain!

it occur in the Gallican or Mozarabic liturgies. The reference to the dedication of a church spoken of above occurs e.g. in the Mart. Hieronymi, "Romae, dedicatio primae ecclesiae a beato Petro constructae et consecratae" (though some forms add, "et absolutio ejus a vinculis"), the Martyrology of Bede, in some of its forms (Patrol. xciv. 993), Rabanus Maurus (ib. cx. 1160), &c. The metrical martyrology of Bede, it may be noted, omits the festival altogether.

That this church, whatever may be its real history, either was originally built in memory of St. Peter's imprisonment, or soon became associated with that idea, may be inferred e.g. from the heading for the day in the Gregorian sacramentary ad Sanctum Petrum ad Vincula. Wandalbert, in his metrical martyrology, tells us, "Carcere Roma Petrum celebrat vinclisque reductum" (Patrol. cxxi. 606). The ancient Mart. Gellonense gives (D'Achery, Spicilegium, xiii. 408), "Roma ad vincula catenas Sancti Petri osculandas." Similarly Usuard. (Acta Sanctorum, July, vol. vi. 399), Notker (Patrol. cxxxi. 1129), &c. The last-named writer, after speaking of the church erected by St. Peter as the first in Europe, adds that in this were deposited the chains from the prison in Jerusalem.

It may be next asked what grounds we have for judging whether it is the Herodian or the Neronian imprisonment that is referred to. On this, besides our citation from Wandalbert and Notker, we may appeal to the Gregorian sacramentary (in loc.; col. 117, ed. Ménard), where the reference in the words "Qui beatum Petrum apostolum a vinculis absolutum illaesum abire fecisti" is unmistakable. The homily assigned to Bede (lib. iii. 96, de Vinculis Sancti Petri; Patrol. xciv. 498) is spurious. This dwells on the chains brought from Jerusalem and the church built in Rome in their honour by pope Alexander I. It seems pretty obvious therefore that the writers who have spoken of the chains as those of Nero have merely wished to strengthen the Roman associations. It may be worth noting that, besides the church of S. Pietro in Vincoli on the Esquiline hill, there is also one of S. Pietro in Carcere on the Capitoline, the latter clearly referring to St. Peter's imprisonment at Rome, and thus more or less disconnecting the former from that event. This church is mentioned in the Gregorian sacramentary, as edited by Pamelius, under the Monday after the first Sunday in Lent, in a note of the station, ad Sanctum Petrum ad Vincula. Durandus (Rat. Div. Off. vii. 19) combines both reasons as causing the festival. On the whole of the above question, reference may be made to Papebroch in the Acta Sanctorum (June, vol. vii. 410); also Monsacrati, Dissertatio de Catenis S. Petri ad Benedictum, xvo. 1750.

The familiar English name for this day is Lammas, probably a corruption of the Anglo-Saxon Hlaf-maesse, i.e. Loaf-mass; seeing that on that day the Saxons offered an oblation of loaves made from new corn (see Bosworth's Anglo-Saxon Dictionary, and Strattmann's Dict. of the Old English Language, s. v. Hlaf; Wedgewood, Dict. of English Etymology, s. v. Lammas). Thus, in the Sarum manual, the day is called Benedictio novorum Fructuum. Some have chosen to consider Lammas as a corruption of Lamb-mass, on the ground that lambs were offered at this time; and it has been mentioned that tenants of the chapter of the cathedral of York formerly paid a live lamb on Aug. 1. There does not however seem to be much authority for this latter view, though it is certainly curious that we find a Welsh name for the day, Dydd degwm wyn, Lamb-tithing day.

Besides the above three festivals, we find in the Ethiopic calendar a commemoration of St. Peter on July 31 (Ludolf, p. 424), with merely the entry, Peter the Apostle. Also, in the Armenian calendar (Assemani, l. c.), is the notice under May 24, "the finger of the holy apostle Peter," of the reference in which I am quite unaware.

A considerable amount of apocryphal literature has been associated with the name of St. Peter. A passing notice of it may be given here; for detailed information concerning it, reference may be made to the several articles in the Dictionary of Christian Biography and Literature. Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii. 3) mentions as works falsely ascribed to St. Peter, his Acts, Gospel, Preaching (κήρυγμα), and Apocalypse. The Gospel of Peter is also referred to by Origen (Comm. in Matt. xiii. 55), Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii. 25; vi. 12), Jerome (de Viris Illustr. c. 1), Theodoret (Haeret. Fabul. Compend. ii. 2). The last-named identifies it with the gospel used by the Nazarenes. The Gospel and Acts of Peter were condemned as apocryphal by a council held at Rome in the episcopate of Gelasius, A.D. 494 (Patrol. lix. 175). Besides Eusebius (l. c.) and Jerome (l. c.), the Acts of Peter are referred to by Isidore of Pelusium (Epist. lib. ii. 99; Patrol. Gr. lxxviii. 544); and, according to Philastrius (Haer. 88; Patrol. xii. 1200), Acts of Peter were in use among the Manichaeans. Acts of Peter and Paul have been published by Tischendorf (Acta Apost. Apoc. pp. 1, sqq.), and also Acts of Peter and Andrew (Apocal. Apoc. pp. 161 sqq.).

The Preaching of Peter is cited by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. 5, 15, &c.), Origen (Comment. in Joan. tom. xiii. c. 17), &c. His Apocalypse is cited by Clement (Ecl. Proph. 41, 48, 49), and in the Muratorian canon it is classed with the Apocalypse of St. John, though it is added that some are opposed to its being read in the church. An apocalypse of Peter, distinct from the above, existed in Arabic, of which there are MSS. in the Bodleian and Vatican Libraries (Tischendorf, Apocal. Apoc. p. xx).

In addition to the above, another work, the Περίοδοι Πέτρου, is mentioned, e.g. by Jerome (adv. Jovin. i. 262), and is obviously the same as the Itinerarium Petri condemned at the Roman council under Gelasius. Jerome also speaks (de Vir. Ill. c. i.) of the Judicium Petri, and Rufinus (Expos. Symb. Ap. 38) mentions, among books not canonical, that "qui appellatur Duae Viae, vel Judicium Petri." The extant fragments of the above works have been collected, with full information concerning them, by Hilgenfeld (Novum Testamentum extra Canonem receptum, Fasc. 5).

Two Syro-Jacobite liturgies, bearing the name of St. Peter, are given by Renaudot (Liturg. Or. Coll. ii. 146, sqq., ed. Frankfort, 1847). [R. S.]

PETER'S PENCE (Denarius Petri, Romfeoh, &c.). It is sufficiently intelligible that the revenues of the see of Rome, derived originally simply from the patrimony of the Roman bishopric, should have proved inadequate to the papal requirements as the supreme pontiff gradually assumed the supervision of the whole church—a function involving a costly expenditure in every country that acknowledged his supremacy. Among other expedients for meeting this difficulty, the tribute known under the name of Peter's Pence was systematically levied in England (though often disputed and withheld) until abolished in 1534 by Henry VIII. This was a tax of one penny on every hearth collected at the Feast of St. Peter and St. Paul (June 29).

According to the statement of Leo III. (Pope, A.D. 795–816), the tax was instituted by Offa,[a] king of the Mercians, in the year 787, out of gratitude to Hadrian I. for that pontiff's authorization of his plan of dividing the province of Canterbury and establishing a new archbishopric at Lichfield (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 455; Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. 220). According to the tradition preserved in the Life of Offa (p. 29) ascribed to Matthew Paris and printed by Wats along with his edition of the Historia Major of that writer (1640)—a tradition retailed with amplifications by Walsingham (Gesta Abbat. Monast. S. Albani, ed. Riley, i. 5)—Offa made the grant as an acknowledgment of extensive immunities granted to the newly-founded monastery of St. Alban's. The above Life of Offa is, however, to so great an extent fabulous, that this statement is hardly entitled to any credit. A more trustworthy account of the origin of this tax is probably that given by William of Malmesbury, who says that it was instituted in the year 855 by king Ethelwulf, on his visit to Rome, partly, it would seem, in return for the honourable reception previously accorded to his son Alfred by Leo IV., who had also anointed the latter king: "Romam, composito regno, abiit; ibique tributum, quod Anglia hodie pensitat, sancto Petro obtulit coram quarto Leone papa, qui etiam antea filium ejus ad se missum honorifice susceperat, et regem inunxerat" (Gest. Regum Angl. bk. ii. ed. Hardy, p. 152). "The grant," says Hardy, "appears to have been made after Aethelwulf's return to England, by what Asser calls a commendatory epistle, in which he ordered three hundred mancuses to be sent annually to Rome, one-third of which the pope himself was to have, the remainder to be equally distributed between the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul to provide lights on Easter Eve" (see also Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 648).

In northern Europe, this tax was not instituted until much later: in Denmark, in the reign of Cnut; in Norway and Sweden, by the cardinal-legate, Nicholas, in the years 1152, 1153 (Walter (F.), Kirchenrecht, sec. 198). About the same time the payment appears to have been granted by Harald, earl of Orkney, from the county of Caithness (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 250). The tribute appears to have been acknowledged as the pope's due by William the Conqueror, though irregularly paid in England during his reign (Selden, Append. to Eadmer p. 164; Lanfr. Epp. ed. Giles, No. x.). [J. B. M.]

[a] Of a yet earlier institution of the tax by king Ine, for the maintenance of the English school at Rome, there is, as Professor Stubbs says, "a want of evidence;" the statement occurs in Layamon's Brut.

In Goar's Euchologium (p. 449) we find a prayer for the water of holy baptism, ἐν τῇ φιάλῃ τοῦ μεσαύλου τῆς ἐκκλησίας. Phiala is used by Anastasius for a golden basin or cup-shaped lamp, rising from a cluster of porphyry columns in the middle of the font, in the Lateran baptistery, lighted up only at Eastertide, and burning balsam with an asbestos wick (Anastas. *Vit. PHILIP, APOSTLE, LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF. Of the life of this apostle, beyond what is told us in the New Testament, but little is known, and in much of this there is a confusion between the apostle and his namesake the deacon. Clement of Alexandria tells us (Strom. iii. 52; cited by Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. iii. 30) that Philip had children, and that he gave his daughters in marriage. We also gather from the same writer (ib. iv. 71) that Philip was not one of those whose life's work was crowned by a martyr's death. All this is possible enough, but the remarks of Polycrates apparently indicate a confusion between the two Philips. He speaks (ap. Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iii. 31; cf. v. 24) of Philip as falling asleep at Hierapolis; as having had two daughters who remained virgins to old age, and a third (presumably a married one, from being thus separated from the other two), who, after ἐν Ἁγίῳ πνεύματι πολιτευσαμένη, lay at rest in Ephesus. Eusebius then proceeds to quote from the Dialogue of Caius, where mention is made of the four daughters of Philip, prophetesses at Hierapolis, at which place was their tomb and that of their father. On comparing these notices with Acts xxi. 8, it can hardly be doubted that we have somewhat varying forms of tradition as to the persons there mentioned, more especially when Eusebius himself proceeds to cite this last passage as relevant to the matter. The legends contained in the Apocryphal Acts of Philip are totally undeserving of credit, and it is quite hopeless to try to determine which of the two Philips is indicated.

As regards the festival of St. Philip, we find that he, like most of the apostles, had no special and individual commemoration till comparatively late. Among the earliest witnesses in the west, where St. Philip is as a rule associated with St. James the Less on May 1, are the Martyrologium Hieronymi, the metrical martyrology of Bede, and the Gelasian, Gregorian and Ambrosian sacramentaries. In the first of these documents St. Philip is commemorated on two days, April 22 and May 1, besides the mention in the list of apostles at the beginning—"Kal. Mail. In civitate Hierapoli provinciae Asiae, depositio Philippi apostoli." On April 22, St. Philip is commemorated alone; on May 1, in connexion with St. James, a mention of Hierapolis being in each case brought in (Patrol. xxx. 467, 469). For the notices in Bede and elsewhere, where the two apostles are conjoined, and for the possible reason for the conjunction, reference may be made to the article on St. James the Less. As to the Roman liturgies, nothing need here be added. We must note, however, that the ancient Gallican forms published by Mabillon make no mention of a festival of St. Philip at all, nor was he recognised in the Mozarabic missal.

On passing to the east, we no longer find the two apostles associated. In the Byzantine Calendar, St. Philip (ὁ ἅγιος καὶ πανεύφημος ἀπόστολος) is commemorated on November 14, Philip the Deacon being commemorated on October 11. The notice for the former in the metrical Greek Ephemerides, prefixed by Papebroch to the Acta Sanctorum for May, is (vol. i. p. lii.) ἥρθης κακκεφαλῆς δεκάτῃ φίλιππε τετάρτῃ. In the calendars of the Ethiopic and Coptic churches also, November 14 is the day reserved for St. Philip (Ludolf, ad Hist. Aeth. Comm. p. 399), and October 11 for Philip the Deacon. It is true that the latter is spoken of as Philip "the Apostle," but then the Coptic calendar adds the words "one of the seven deacons"; and in this it does but agree with the Menaea, which not only applies the name Apostle to Philip the Deacon, but also generally extends the use of the term considerably. In the calendars of the Armenian church, which are given by Assemani (Bibl. Or. iii. 1. 645), St. Philip is commemorated on November 17. The "Philip the Apostle" mentioned by the first of the two calendars on February 9, is defined by the second as "Philip, the Deacon and Apostle."

A certain amount of pseudonymous literature is associated with the name of St. Philip, but it will be generally quite uncertain whether the apostle or the deacon is the person intended. We have a gospel of Philip mentioned by Epiphanius (Haer. xxvi. 13) as in use among the Gnostics. Acts of Philip were condemned by the council held in Rome in 494 A.D., under the episcopate of Silasius (Patrol. lix. 162). It is probably this that is referred to by Anastasius Sinaita as ἡ περίοδος τοῦ ἁγίου Φιλίππου (cited by Fabricius, Cod. Pseud. Vet. Test. i. 806). The Greek text, or rather several large fragments of it, was first edited by Tischendorf (Acta Apost. Apocrypha, pp. xxxi. 75; Apocal. Apoc. p. 141). Syriac Acta have been published by Dr. Wright (Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles). This is a different document from the preceding, and probably refers to Philip the Deacon.

PHILIPPOPOLIS, see SARDICA, COUNCIL OF.

PHILIPPOPOLIS (COUNCIL OF), A.D. 347–8, was held at the town so called on the Maritza, to the north-west of Adrianople. It was composed of seceders from the council of SARDICA; and as all the documents put out by them were dated from that place, and believed generally to have emanated thence, they will be best considered under that head. The documents peculiar to it are given in Mansi, iii. 125 et seq. [E. S. Ff.]

PHILOSARCAE was, according to Jerome (Epist. 61 ad Pammach.), a name given by the Origenists to those who believed in the resurrection of the same identical flesh and bones which were buried. They also called such believers "pelusiotas, luteos, animales, carneos" (Hieron. Epist. 65 ad Pamm. et Ocean.), as not having attained to the things of the Spirit. The word πηλουσιῶται is explained by Jerome himself (Comm. in Jerem. xxix. p. 407) to mean "in luto istius corporis constituti." As the nickname was Alexandrian, there may be some allusion to Pelusium, the force of which is lost (Bingham's Antiq. l. ii. 17). [C.]

PHILOTHEI. [MONASTERY, p. 1219.]

PHILOTHEUS, martyr with Dominus and others under Maximinus; commemorated Nov. 5 (Basil. Menol.; Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

PHILTRE. The early Christians fully admitted the alleged power of magic to excite love or hatred, though believing themselves to be protected from its influence. Thus in the Clementina Appion is made to say that, when hopelessly enamoured in his youth, he "fell in with a certain Egyptian thoroughly versed in the arts of the Magi . . . . who freely taught him the charm (ἀναυδίην), by means of which he was successful" (Hom. v. 3). Gregory Nazianzen tells us that the legendary Cyprian in his endeavours to corrupt Justina, employed the services of a daemon "whose reward was sacrifices and libations and that close relation which is established through the blood and the odour from the victims" (Orat. xxiv. § 10). "Many women," says St. Chrysostom, "that they may become attractive, employ incantations and libations and philtres, and ten thousand other contrivances" (Hom. 24 in Ep. ad Rom. § 4)

Faith in Christ was a sufficient shield against such darts of the wicked one; but Theodoret tells us of an instance in which the miraculous power of a saint was opposed to them. A woman of rank, whose husband was unfaithful to her, complained to Aphrastes that he had been "bewitched by some artifice of magic." The saint "by prayer destroyed the power of the enchantment, and having hallowed a jar of oil brought by her, directed that the husband should be anointed with it" (Histor. Relig. 8).

Constantine, in 321, made a law against those who, "furnished with magic arts," were "convicted of having perverted chaste minds to lust" (Cod. IX. xviii. 4, De Magia). When the crime appeared among professed Christians of a later period, a severe penance was imposed. "Si quis pro amore veneficium fecerit, et neminem perdiderit, tres annos poeniteat; unum in pane et aqua" (Poenitentiale, ad calc. Sacram. Gallic. in Mus. Ital. i. 392). The old Roman poenitentia: "Si quis pro amore maleficus sit, et neminem perdiderit; si laicus est, dimidium poeniteat; si clericus, annum unum poeniteat in pane et aqua; si diaconus, tres annos, unum in pane et aqua; si sacerdos quinque annos, 2 in pane et aqua" (Morinus, de Sacram. Poenit. 586; Cigheri, Vet. PP. Theol. Univ. x. 223). In the 9th century, bishops at their visitations inquired "if there was any woman who professed that she could by certain acts of witchcraft and incantations change the minds of persons; i.e. so as to turn them from hatred to love or from love to hatred . . . Haec talis omnimodis ex parroechia ejiciatur" (Regino, de Discipl. Eccl. ii. v. 45). [W. E. S.]

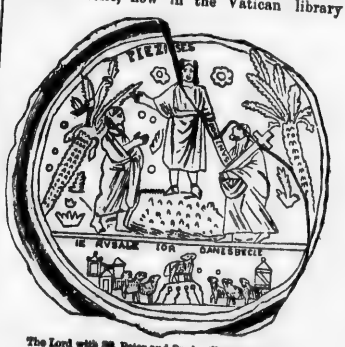
PHOCE, commemorated with Irenaeus Oct. 7 (Cal. Arm.). [C. H.]

PHOENIX. It is not part of our duty to trace the story of the phoenix eastward, or connect it with the Simurgh of Persian poetry. It reached Rome through Greece (see Herodotus's account, ii. 73). It is represented on coins and medals of Hadrian, Caracalla, Antoninus Pius, Constans, and Constantine (Münter, Sinnbilder u. Kunstvorstellungen der alten Christ., 1st Heft, p. 95, and tab. iii. fig. 69 and 68). It would easily be adopted in Christian symbolism as an emblem of the Resurrection, and its name would connect it with the palm-tree. See Tertullian on the Resurrection of the Body (c. 25), where he quotes Ps. xcii. of the palm. The name, the tree, and the bird, with its mythical allegory, all connect the Eastern and Greek imaginations with the central Christian doctrine. Hence there is no doubt that a strange bird sometimes represented on mosaics (as in St. Cecilia's at Rome, see woodcut) is intended for it,

Phoenix. (From Martigny.)

Phoenix. (Martigny, pp. 584-5.)

especially when, as in this instance, it bears the Nimbus, or when [illegible]s placed on the palm (Bottari, tav. xxii.). As a type of death and resurrection it is connected with baptism (Clemens Romanus, 1*st Ep. to the Corinthians*, c. 25). It is found in the mosaics of SS. Cosmas and Damianus at Rome, and in St. Prassede (Ciampini, Vit. Monum. tab. 16, 47, 51); also in the glass given by Dr. Northcote (Roma Sotterranea, p. 316) of St. Peter and St. Paul, being attached to the latter in particular, as the special preacher of the Resurrection. This remarkable relic, now in the Vatican library



The Lord with SS. Peter and Paul. (From Roma Sott.) contains the Lord; the chief apostle and the apostle of the Gentiles, the former bearing his cross, the latter with a crown cast behind him; the palm-trees and phoenix; the Pie Zeses; the Lamb below as in a church mosaic, with Jordan intervening, and the four mystical rivers at His feet again uniting in Jordan; the sheep representing the faithful, and the cities of Jerusalem and Bethlehem. PHOTINA, Samaritan woman who conversed with the Lord (St. John iv.); commemorated March 20 (Basil. Menol.; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. iii. 80). [C. H.]

PHOTIUS, martyr with Anicetus at Nicomedia under Diocletian; commemorated Aug. 12 (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 265; Mart. Rom. PHOTINUS; Wright's Syr. Mart. gives a Photius at Nicomedia with Archelaus and Cyrinus under Mar. 4). [C. H.]

PHYLACTERY. Any thing might be so called to which a protective power, not due to natural causes, was ascribed. Thus Gregory of Rome in 603 sends to king Adulovald "phylacteries, i.e. a cross with wood of the holy cross of the Lord, and a lesson of the holy Gospel inclosed in a Persian case" (Ep. xii. 7 ad Theodel.). Gregory himself wore suspended from his neck "phylacteries of relics" (Joan. Diacon. in Vita Greg. iv. 80). [LIGATURAE.] But the term was chiefly applied to written charms, and of these we propose to speak now.

The use of "phylacteries" is frequently condemned without explanation, as by the council of Laodicea, probably in 365, which forbids the clergy to "make what are called phylacteries," by Epiphanius, 368 (De Fide, 24), by St. Eligius, 640 (De Rect. Cath. Convers. 3, 5, 7), by the council of Rome, 721 (can. 12), by Zachary of Rome, 743 (Ep. 2 ad Bonif. § 6), in a law of Charlemagne, 769 (Capitulare, i. c. 6), in a penitential of Angers (Morinus, de Sacram. Poenit. 586), &c. But they are often described as written documents. Thus Caesarius of Arles, 502: "Phylacteria diabolica per characteras" (Serm. 66, § 3; comp. § 5). Boniface in the council of Leptines, 743: "Phylacteria, i.e. scripturae" (can. 33; Opp. Bonif. 142, ed. Würdtw.). The Capitularies of the French Kings: "Phylacteries or false writings" (vi. 72). The name was not used among the Latins so early as by the Greeks; for St. Augustine, 397, describes them without employing it; "Ligaturae atque remedia . . . sive in praecantationibus, sive in quibusdam notis quos characteras vocant" (De Doctr. Christ. ii. 20, § 30). Neither Isidore, who copies this sentence (Etymol. viii. 9 n. 30), nor Hincmar, who borrows it from Isidore (De Divort. Hloth. et Teth. Resp. 15) introduces the word, from which we may perhaps infer that it was not even in their times very familiar to all the Latins.

Written charms are condemned under the name of phylacteries in the decree ascribed variously to Gelasius and Hormisdas de Apocryphis: "Phylacteria omnia quae non angelorum (ut illi confingunt) sed daemonum magis arte conscripta sunt, apocrypha" (Hard. Conc. ii. 942).

The name was without doubt borrowed immediately from the Jews; and the general restriction of its meaning in practice is due to that circumstance. The Jewish phylacteries (tephillin) were two pieces of parchment, on which were written four texts of Scripture (Exod. xiii. 1–10, 11 16; Deut. v. 4–9; xi. 13–21). One of these was bound on the forehead, the other on the left arm at prayer. They were believed to avert evil from the wearer and to procure blessings for him, owing to the name of God (Shaddai, Almighty) being on them (Beveridge on Can. Laod. 36; Pandect. ii. 196; Schleusner, Lex. N. T. in v.)

The Jewish practice would also naturally suggest the frequent use of the Scriptures as phylacteries. St. Chrysostom, after speaking of the custom of the Jews, adds, that in like manner "many women now suspend the Gospels from their necks" (Hom. 72 in S. Matt. Ev. § 2) and elsewhere "Do you not see how women and little children hang the Gospels from their necks for a great protection" (φυλακῆς, Hom. xix. ad Antioch. § 4). St. Augustine mentions a practice of putting the Gospel on the head when it ached. He says that men were so besotted with ligaturae that he rejoiced when he found this done; not because they did it, but "because the Gospel was preferred to ligaturae" (In S. Joan. Ev. Tract. vii. 12). This use of the Gospels continued for many ages. Thus Nilus the Younger, who died in 1005, having met with an accident, "took out of his bosom the phylactery which he always carried there (this was a folding book, the treasure of the New Testament) and put it to his eyes and lips and breast" (Vita Nili, ix. 63; Bolland. Sept. 26). In the West, however, even this was distinctly pronounced unlawful. St. Jerome commenting on the Jewish practice: "Hoc apud nos superstitiosae mulierculae in parvulis evangeliis, et in crucis ligno, et istiusmodi rebus . . . usque hodie factitant, culicem liquantes, et camelum glutientes" (Comm. in St. Matt. Ev. iv. 23). St. Eligius (u. s.): "Etsi dicatur, quod res sancta sit et lectiones divinas contineat, quia non est in eis remedium Christi, sed venenum diaboli." [Compare LIGATURAE, p. 990.] [W. E. PILATE. Our Lord's appearance before Pilate is almost the only scene of His passion, except the denial by St. Peter, which is to be found in the catacombs, on sarcophagi, or, indeed, anywhere in very early Christian art. See Bottari, tav. xxiv. where Pilate is seated on a curule chair (John xix. 13); see also the Laurentian MS., and Bottari, tavv. xv. xxii. xxxiii. xxxv. Some expression of anxiety and reluctance is generally given to Pilate, and in some instances water is being brought for his hands. His action in washing them is frequently represented, and M. Rohault de Fleury (L'Évangile, vol. ii. pl. lxxxiii. lxxxiv.) gives six examples, two from the Lateran sarcophagi, probably 4th century, one from St. Apollinare nella Citta at Ravenna, the third (11th century) from St. Urbano at Rome. He refers also to a 6th-century ivory in the Vatican. One of the Lateran sarcophagi was brought from the Liberian Basilica, commonly known as the church of St. Maria Maggiore.

The subject of our Lord before Pilate is twice repeated on the lid of the magnificent ivory casket in the Biblioteca Quiriniana at Brescia (Westwood, Early Christian Sculptures and Ivory Carvings, p. 37). He stands before Pilate in a group; and in another before Pilate alone, who is in the act of washing his hands. [R. St. J. T.]

PILGRIMAGE (Peregrinatio). A pilgrim was one who travelled from a motive of religion to any place considered sacred, because peculiarly associated with the memory of Christ or any of the saints. The growth of that feeling towards such places which led to pilgrimages has been traced in the article on HOLY PLACES, Vol. I. p. 774. We now propose to speak of the chief resorts of early pilgrims, their immediate motives, and other matters of interest connected with them.

I. The Holy Land.—Paula and Eustochium, writing in 386, suppose that there had been a constant stream of pilgrims to Jerusalem from the very infancy of the church: "It would be tedious now to run through every age from the ascension of the Lord to the present day, and enumerate the bishops, the martyrs, the men eloquent in ecclesiastical learning, who have come to Jerusalem, because they thought that they had less religion, less knowledge, and had not, as the phrase is, received the finishing stroke of their virtues, unless they had adored Christ in those places whence the Gospel had first shone forth from the Cross" (Ep. 46 inter Epp. Hieronym. ad Marcellam, § 9). The record of earlier visits is scanty; but it is probable that these writers were not mistaken. We must except from the holy places visited by their predecessors the most sacred of all; viz. the sepulchre of Christ and Calvary, which from the time of Adrian to that of Constantine were covered by a vast mound of earth surmounted by a temple of Venus. It is to be observed, however, that Eusebius, who lived in Palestine, and was sixty years old when those sites were uncovered, merely says that the heathen madly thought that by concealing them they should hide the truth (Vita Const. iii. 26); from which we should not infer that he was accustomed to see or hear of crowds of pilgrims eagerly inquiring for the scene of every great Christian event. On the other hand, Sozomen, more than a century later, influenced by the opinions and the custom of his own day, clearly supposes that pilgrims would have frequented those sites in great numbers if they had remained exposed. According to him the heathen hoped that through the means which they employed "the true reason of the reverence paid to that place would in the course of time be forgotten, Christians neither daring to frequent it themselves, nor to point it out to others" (Hist. Eccl. ii. 1). We observe also that the first visitors to the Holy Land of whom we have mention were at least as much inquirers as devotees. Alexander, the first whose name is recorded, is expressly said to have gone there εὐχῆς καὶ τῶν τόπων ἱστορίας ἕνεκεν (Euseb. Hist. vi. 11). Origen, his friend, A.D. 230, describes his own visit to the Holy Land as a "search after the footsteps of Jesus and His disciples and the prophets" (Comm. in Ev. S. Joann. tom. vi. § 24). Firmilian, about 240, is more vaguely said by Jerome to have gone to Palestine "sub occasione sanctorum locorum" (De Vir. Illust. 54).

Helen, the mother of Constantine, is the first pilgrim to the Holy Land of whose visit we have anything like a detailed account. About the year 328, when above seventy years of age, she hastened thither to offer "thank-offerings by means of vows (or "prayers;" χαριστήρια δι' εὐχῶν), and to "seek knowledge of the land worthy of veneration." "When she had bestowed suitable worship on the footsteps of the Saviour, in accordance with the saying of the prophet, Let us worship the place where His feet have stood (Ps. cxxxii. 7), she forthwith bequeathed to posterity a fruit of her personal devotion" (Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. 42) in two churches which she built, "one at the Cave of the Nativity, the other on the Mount of the Ascension" (ib. 43). About five years after the visit of Helen, a traveller whose name is unknown, though the diary of his voyage is extant (Itineraria Romanorum, Wesseling, Amstel. 1735, pp. 549–617), journeyed from Bordeaux to Jerusalem, whence he returned by a different route from that by which he came. He was evidently a religious pilgrim; for until he finds himself on holy ground, his notes are rarely more than a record of stages and distances. He gives us a long list of sacred places, and often with some remark of interest. On his way from home he saw Tarsus, the birthplace of St. Paul, the site of the house (Sarepta, not mentioned) where the widow sustained Elijah, Mount Carmel, where he sacrificed, the bath of Cornelius at Caesarea, a certain spring claiming miraculous power on Mount Sinai, Stradela, where Ahab sat and Elijah prophesied, the scene of David's victory over Goliath, Mount Gerizim, Jacob's well in Sichar, Luz, where he saw the vision and wrestled with the angel, and where the hand of Jeroboam was withered. Arrived at Jerusalem he saw the pools made by Solomon on either side the temple, the two called Bethesda, a crypt in which Jewish tradition taught that Solomon had confined evil spirits, the pinnacle of the Temptation, the place where Solomon was said to have written the book of Wisdom, his reservoirs, the stone stained with the blood of Zacharias, the marks of the spikes on the caligae of the soldiers who killed him, the house of Hezekiah, the pool of Siloam, the house of Caiaphas, and the pillar at which our Lord was scourged, the site of the house of David, the walls of the praetorium of Pilate. Out of the city he visited Mount Golgotha, and, a stone's throw from it ("eighty steps"), Antonini Placentini Itinerarium, 19), the crypt in which the body of Jesus was laid," the church lately built there by Constantine, the Valley of Jehoshaphat, the scene of the betrayal, the monuments of Hezekiah and Isaiah, Mount Olivet and the new church thereon, the Mount of Transfiguration, the grave of Lazarus, the sycamore of Zacchaeus, the fountain made wholesome by Elisha, where was shewn him the vessel that held the salt, the house of Rahab, the site of the pile of twelve stones from the Jordan, the place of our Lord's baptism, the little hill whence Elijah was taken up to heaven, the tomb of Rachel, Bethlehem, and the church built there by Helen, the tombs of Ezekiel, David, Solomon, &c., near it, the spring at which Philip baptized the eunuch, the place where Abraham dwelt under a terebinth tree[a] (Gen. xviii. 4) and dug a well. In returning home he notes all the stages, as before, but only connects one with sacred history, viz. Philippi, where Paul and Silas were imprisoned.

It will be observed that in this careful enumeration of sacred objects and places there is no mention of that which a few years later was the chief attraction of pilgrims to Jerusalem, the supposed cross of Christ. This at once disproves the later tradition of its having been found by Helen [CROSS, FINDING OF, Vol. I. p. 504; HOLY PLACES, iii. Vol. I. p. 776]. Many instances occur of pilgrims going to Jerusalem "to adore the holy cross," see e.g. the accounts of John of Sochus (John Moschus, Pratum Spirit. 180), Thalelaeus (ib. 91), Christopher (ib. 105), Theophilus and his two companions Vita Macarii Rom. 3), the author of the Life of Euthymius (Vita Euth. 136), &c.

Paula, the friend of Jerome, visited every sacred place and object of which she obtained information. "Entering the sepulchre she kissed the stone of the resurrection, which the angel had moved away from the door of the tomb; and licked with faithful mouth the very place of the body in which the Lord had lain; as if being athirst she longed for water." "A pillar was shewn to her, supporting the porch of a church, stained with the Lord's blood, at which He is said to have been bound and scourged. The place was shewn to her where the Holy Ghost came down on above one hundred souls of believers." Having "entered Bethlehem, going into the cave of the Saviour, after seeing the sacred lodging of the Virgin and the stall . . . she solemnly affirmed in my presence that she saw with the eyes of faith the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, the Lord wailing in the manger, the Magi worshipping, the star shining above, the virgin mother, the careful foster-father, the shepherds coming by night . . . the infants slain, Herod raging, Joseph and Mary fleeing into Egypt." "Thence she went down to the tower Ader, i.e. of the flock, near which Jacob fed his flocks, and the shepherds watching by night were privileged to hear, "Glory to God in the highest," &c. She saw "the glittering cross of Mount Olivet, from which the Saviour ascended to the Father . . . entered the sepulchre of Lazarus, saw the house of Martha and Mary, and Bethphage," the spot where Christ mounted the ass, the scene of the parable of the good Samaritan, the sycamore of Zacchaeus, the place where the blind man stood by the wayside. She also travelled to many places in Palestine of note in the history of the Old Testament, both before and after her visit to Jerusalem; and lastly went to Egypt, where she would probably have remained among the ascetics of the desert, "ni majus sanctorum locorum retraxisset desiderium" (Hieron. Ep. 108 ad Eustoch. 9–14). We have omitted much of her tour, but given enough to show that pilgrims were now directed to many holy places which their guides did not profess themselves able to identify when some sixty years before the pilgrim of Bordeaux travelled over the same ground. Paula sketched a similar route for herself and her friend Marcella when the latter should travel to the Holy Land (Paul. et Eustoch. ad Marc. Ep. 46 inter Epp. Hieron. § 12). Gaudentius of Brescia, A.D. 387, mentions a pilgrimage that he made to Jerusalem, but gives no particulars (De Dedic. Basilicae in Vet. Brix. Episc. Opusc. 340, Brix. 1738).

At this period and onward the notices of pilgrimages to Jerusalem are very frequent. For thirty-seven years, Melania the elder, who died in 410, exercised hospitality towards Christians who came to that city "for their vow's sake, both bishops, and monks and virgins, and those joined in marriage, towards persons both in high position and those of private condition, . . . inhabitants of Persia, and Britain, and all the isles" (Pallad. Hist. Laus. 118). The Arabic collection of canons, falsely ascribed to the council of Nicaea, says, "Faithful sons of the Church of God, when ye enter on a pilgrimage to pray and visit the houses of God, the places of His holiness, and the footsteps of His Christ, load not your bodies with meat and drink," &c. (Decr. Alia, 25; Hard. i. 520). Some eminent names are preserved. Philorhomus, a friend of St. Basil, "for a vow went twice on foot to Jerusalem to do honour to the holy places" (ibid. 113). Fabiola, who died in 399, sailed thither from Rome, and for a time was the guest and disciple of St. Jerome (Hier. Ep. 77 ad Ocean. 7). A few years later Marana and Cyra travelled from Beroea in Syria "to Aelia from a desire to behold the sacred places of Christ's sufferings" (Theodoret, Hist. Relig. 29). Peter, who was known to Theodoret when the latter was a child, is another example. In 421, Porphyrius of Gaza, then a young man, was seized with a "divine longing to adore the holy and venerable places of God" at Jerusalem. Not content with one visit, some five years later, though in great sickness, he went there again, and "non cessabat quotidie obire loca sancta, innitens baculo" (Vita Porph. i. 4, auct. Marco Diac.) About this time also, Mark, his biographer, happened to "sail out of Asia to worship the holy places" (ibid. 5). The empress Eudocia went as a pilgrim to Jerusalem in 438 (Socrat. Hist. Eccl. vii. 47). She also spent there the last ten or eleven years of her life, and evinced her religious interest in the holy city by repairing its walls, founding monasteries, and building the church of St. Stephen at the place of his martyrdom (Evagr. Hist. Eccl. i. 21, 22). Licinius, bishop of Tours, A.D. 508, "is said to have been in the East and to have visited the places of the saints, and to have gone to Jerusalem itself, and often seen the places of the Lord's passion and resurrection, of which we read in the Gospels" (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii. 39). Martin, a Pannonian by birth, afterwards bishop of the monastery of Dumium, and in 562 archbishop of Braga, "made a rapid voyage to the East to visit the holy places, and so imbued himself with learning as to be considered inferior to no one of his day" (ibid. v. 38; Isid. Hispal. De Vir. Illus. 45). Many other names might be given; but the details in each case are so scanty and devoid of interest, and so few of them come to us from authors of full credit, that it would be useless to attempt an account of all. There is one traveller, however, who visited Jerusalem in 690, the narrative of whose voyage is of great importance both from its fulness and authenticity. This was Arculphus, a French bishop, of see unknown, who, under the guidance of Peter, a Burgundian by birth, but living as a hermit in the Holy Land, saw the places of chief religious interest therein, and spent nine months at Jerusalem. On his return home, "driven by stress of weather to the western parts of Britain" (Bede, Hist. Eccl. v. 15), he became a guest of Adamnanus, the ninth abbat of Hy, who took down from his mouth an account of his pilgrimage, and a few years later presented it to king Alfred. The treatise of Bede de Sanctis Locis is founded on it, and some extracts are found in his History (v. 15–17); but the work itself is extant, and has been printed by Gretser (Ingolst. 1619) and Mabillon (Acta SS. Ben. saec. 3). From this we may learn that many new discoveries and identifications were alleged to have been made since the days of Paula, by which the faith of the pilgrim was confirmed and rewarded. The cross was not then at Jerusalem, but its place was well supplied by the stone that had been at the door of the sepulchre, the cup used at the last supper ("which the whole people of the city treat with immense veneration"), the sponge, the spear, the handkerchief by which the head of our Lord was covered, a linen cloth woven by the blessed Virgin on which were wrought figures of our Lord and the twelve apostles, a pillar set up where the dead man was brought to life by the touch of the true cross (De Loc. Sanct. i. 4, 7–12). The spear, the sponge, the reed, and crown of thorns are mentioned by Gregory of Tours (Mirac. i. 7) in the 6th century, but the two latter were not seen by Arculphus. Outside Jerusalem he was taken to the Field of Blood, and the tree on which Judas hanged himself (17, 19). He saw (and is the first to mention) the footprints of Christ on the Mount of Ascension, miraculously permanent in the loose sand (22). At Bethlehem he was shewn a natural basin in the rock full of pure water, which had miraculously appeared on the spot where the water in which the infant Jesus was first washed had been thrown (ii. 3). There too he was conducted to the tombs of St. Jerome, the three shepherds, and Rachel (5–7), while in the valley of Mamre he found those of Adam and the three patriarchs (10). The remains of the oak of Mamre, splinters of which were in great request all over the world, were enclosed and covered by a church (11). In a chapel built near the place of our Lord's baptism, he saw preserved the garments in which He was baptized (16). A comparison of the present list with those given before shews that the taste and spirit of each age ruled the nature of the object proposed to its veneration. As superstition became more gross and childish, new food, such as it craved for, was still supplied.

About the year 725, Willibald, the nephew of St. Boniface, visited the Holy Land. Besides objects already mentioned, he saw the places in which the infants were slain, Dorcas restored to life, and where the Jews strove to take the body of the blessed Virgin from the apostles. He also found in the Church of the Sepulchre two columns marking the places on which the two angels (Acts i. 10) stood, and was told that "whoever could creep between the wall and those pillars was free from his sins" (Willib. Hodoeporicon in Basnag. Thesaur. Monum. Eccles. ii. p. i. 112, 113, Amstel. 1725). In the Itinerarium of later but uncertain age, falsely ascribed to Antoninus of Placentia, we observe the further progress of what we must, however reluctantly, deem imposture. For, to omit new identifications of place, we there read of the lamp "which had been placed at the head of our Lord when He was buried" (§ 18), of blood seen where He was crucified (ib.), of the altar on which Abraham was about to offer Isaac (19), the title which Pilate affixed to the cross, which the writer "held in his hand and kissed." A cross was also shewn as that on which Christ died, though the Itinerary seems to have been written long after that exhibited in Cyril's time had been carried away. He also saw the reed and the sponge ("cum qua spongia aquam bibimus") and "the cup of onyx-stone which the Lord blessed at the supper," a likeness of the blessed Virgin, and her girdle and head-band, &c. (20). In the church which had been the house of James, he found the horn with which David and other kings of Judah had been anointed, the crown of thorns, the spear, and many of the stones with which Stephen was stoned (22). The tract is, as the Bollandists describe it, "refertum fabellis plane anilibus" (Prolog. in Maii, tom. ii. Migne, n. lxxii. 897). We do not hear of the heavenly fire in the holy sepulchre on Easter Eve, an imposture practised to this day, until the ninth century. It is then mentioned by Bernard, a French pilgrim, who visited Jerusalem in 870 (De Locis Sanctis, § 10, in Acta Bened. iii. p. 2, p. 524). According to him, an angel came down and lighted the lamps hanging over the sepulchre; "of which light the patriarch gives to the bishops and the rest of the people, that they may make a light for themselves in their habitations." To this pilgrim also were pointed out some objects of reverence of which former travellers make no mention; as the iron gates through which the angel led St. Peter (§ 11), the place of the betrayal (§ 12), four round tables used at the Last Supper, the place where the adulteress was brought to Christ, and the words then written by Him, engraved on marble (§ 13).

II. Rome. — St. Chrysostom, throughout a long panegyric on St. Paul, dwells on his wish to visit Rome where his remains were treasured (Hom. xxxii. in Ep. ad Rom. 2, 3; Hom. viii. in Ep. ad Eph. 2). At this period Rome could already offer many attractions to pilgrims in the shrines and other memorials of St. Peter and St.

Paul, St. Lawrence, St. Cassian, St. Hippolytus, St. Agnes, &c. (see Prudentius de Coronis, hymn. 2, 9, 11, 12, 14).

> "Innumeros cineres sanctorum Romula in urbe > Vidimus." (Prud. u. s. 11, l. 1).

Hence, and from the greater facility of reaching it, Rome became ere long a more common resort of European pilgrims than the Holy Land itself; e. g. Paulinus of Nola made an "annual journey" thither (Ep. 43 ad Desid. 1; Ep. 95, Aug. ad Paul. 6) "pro apostolorum et martyrum veneratione" (Ep. 45 ad Aug. 1). He describes himself as spending the forenoon on one of these visits in the memoriae of the apostles and martyrs (Ep 17 ad Sever. 2). Letters are extant, written at Rome in 449 to Theodosius the younger by Galla Placidia, Valentinian, and his wife Eudoxia, the emperor's daughter, expressions in which show that the writers had gone to Rome from a motive of religion, "to pay worship to the most blessed apostle Peter" (Concil. Chalced. p. i. cc. 20–22, Hard. Conc. ii. 35–37). Galla, in a letter written to Pulcheria at the same time, says, "Ut Romam frequentibus concursionibus adaeque desideremus inspicere, causa nobis est amplectendae religionis, ut terminus sanctorum nostris exhiberemus praesentiam" (ibid.; in Greek, ap. Cotel. Monum. Gr. i. 62). Venantius, in his Life of St. Remigius, who died in 533, tells the story of a young girl whose wealthy friends conducted her in sickness from Toulouse "to the tomb of St. Peter in the city of Rome with a very great number of attendants and great devotion" (Vita, § 6).

From the foregoing testimonies, we may perhaps infer that during the first five centuries pilgrims went to Rome chiefly, if not entirely, for the feast of St. Peter and St. Paul. Compare even the later Gregory the Great, Epist. vi. 19; Hom. in Evang. ii. 37, § 9. It is evident, however, that visitors from a great distance could not even at that period, and much less could they in the more troubled times that followed, arrive at Rome by a given day with anything like certainty. Hence, after the 7th century at least, we find pilgrims flocking thither at every part of the year. The first visit of St. Boniface was timed by the season and the affairs of his people (Vita auct. Willibaldo, v. 14). In his time great numbers went to Rome from England (Langyth ad Bonif. Ep. 30, ed. Würdtus.). The stream had begun to flow about 653, when Benedict Biscop paid his first visit to Rome (Bede, Hist. Abbat. Wiremuth. § 2), to be soon followed by Wilfrid, who had been his companion for part of the way. In reference to the journey of the latter, Eddi Stephani, his friend, says expressly that "as yet that road was untrodden by our nation" (Vita Wilfr. § 3).

The "limina apostolorum" were the first objects visited by pilgrims and probably by all religious travellers to Rome. Thus Sidonius of himself, "Priusquam vel pomoeria contingerem triumphalibus apostolorum liminibus affusus" (Epp. i. 5), where he seems to refer to the shrine on the Ostian Way.

III. Other Shrines.—St. Chrysostom says that the burial-places of St. Peter and St. Paul, St. John and St. Thomas, alone among the apostles, were known in his day (Hom. xxvi. in Ep. ad Heb. 2). Of St. Thomas, Gregory of Tours tells us that "in that part of India in which he first reposed" there was a church in which "by the virtue of the apostle" a lamp burnt perpetually without any renewal either of oil or wick. Thither, he says, "when his festival came, a great assemblage of the peoples gathered, and those from diverse regions coming with vows and merchandise" (Mirac. i. 32). A story told by Socrates (Hist. Eccl. iv. 18) seems to imply that Edessa, to which city his body, or a part of it, was translated, was equally frequented on that account. We read little of the tomb of St. John at Ephesus, but it is incidentally mentioned by John Moschus as visited with other shrines by an ascetic of the same name, who was wont to leave home "for the distant deserts, or for Jerusalem to worship the holy cross and the holy places, or for Mount Sinai to pray there, or for the martyrs at long distances from Jerusalem; for the old man was a great lover of martyrs, and would go away at one time to St. John at Ephesus, at another to St. Theodore at Euchaïta, and again into Isauria to St. Thecla at Seleucia, and again to St. Sergius at Saphae, and journey one while to one saint, and another to another" (Prat. Spirit. 180). In the East, the tomb of Thecla had many visitors. In the West, St. Felix of Nola was one especially famous. If we may believe the poetical account of Paulinus, multitudes flocked to it at his festival from every part of Italy, even from Rome itself (Poem. xiv. Nat. iii. 54–85). Perhaps, however, no shrine was so popular with pilgrims in search of health as that of St. Martin at Tours, where he was reported to have performed numberless cures of which very many are recorded by Gregory, 573, one of his successors in the see (De Mirac. S. Martini, libr. iv.).

IV. Mural Inscriptions by Pilgrims.—The catacombs of Rome have preserved a great number of these graffiti traced with a stilus or with charcoal on the walls by the tombs of the most illustrious martyrs. Many of the earliest, ascribed to the 2nd or 3rd century, "merely express the names of the visitors; but others offer pious thoughts and touching prayers" (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. v. "Pélerinage").

V. Motives to Pilgrimage.—(1) Research.—The first resort of pilgrims was to the Holy Land; and their purpose, research, which they conducted in a devout and reverential spirit. [See before, § I.]

(2) Vows.—If Eusebius is not merely speaking after the notions of his day, Alexander, the earliest pilgrim on record, combined research with the fulfilment of a vow. Vows are ascribed to Helena (Canonum Nicaen. Arab. Praef. Hard. Conc. i. 525). Palladius, as cited § I., evidently supposes that all who received the hospitality of Melania went to Jerusalem "for their vow's sake." Philorhomus and Eudocia, mentioned before (ibid.), had both vowed a pilgrimage; the latter, if she should see her daughter married (Socr. Hist. Eccl. vii. 47). Paulinus, describing his own visit to Rome, speaks thus: "Ipsum temporis ante meridiam in votis nostris quorum cura veneramus per apostolorum et martyrum sacras memorias consumentes" (Ep. 17, § 2). Wilfrid, 653, has made vows to visit Rome (Eddi Steph. in Vita 4), and long after him Canute, after such a pilgrimage, says of himself, "Hanc quidem profectionem jam olim devoveram" (Gul. Malmesb. de Reb. Gest. Reg.
1596). So a nun

(3) Baptism.—It is probable that many catechumens sought the Holy Land from an early period that they might be baptized in the Jordan. Constantine, in 337, when asking for baptism of the bishops at Nicomedia, says, "I intended formerly to do this at the stream of the Jordan; at which our Saviour is recorded to have received the washing for an example to us" (Euseb. Vita Const. iv. 62). Eusebius (De Locis Hebraicis) says of "Bethabara beyond Jordan where John was baptizing" (St. John i. 28), "where also many of the brethren to this day are anxious to receive the washing"; or as St. Jerome paraphrases his words, "desiring to be reborn there, are baptized in the life-giving flood" (De Sit. et Nom. Loc. Hebr. Opp. tom. iii. col. 182, ed. Vallars.). If Pseudo-Amphilochius may be trusted, St. Basil and Eubulus intreated the bishop of Jerusalem that they might "receive divine regeneration in the river Jordan," which was permitted (Vita Basil. 4). See another example, Prat. Spirit. 138. The eve of the Epiphany was the usual time for such baptisms, at which the people carried away of the consecrated water to sprinkle their ships with it before they went to sea, and dipped themselves "pro benedictione," and linen clothes which they kept for their burial (Itinerarium Antonini Plac. 11). In the account of the pilgrimage of St. Willibald, written in 765, we read, "On the Jordan, where the Lord was baptized, there is now a church raised on stone piers, and beneath the church is now dry land, where the Lord was baptized" (Hodoeporicon S. Will. in Basnage, Thesaur. Monum. ii. p. i. p. 111).

A similar sentiment seems to have led some catechumens to Rome. Thus Ceadwal, king of Wessex, A.D. 688, resigning his crown, "went to Rome, desiring to obtain for himself this special glory, viz. to be washed in the fount of baptism at the thresholds of the blessed apostles" (Bede, Hist. Eccl. Angl. v. 7).

(4) Devotion.—The object of most pilgrims, however, is best described as prayer in some holy place or before some holy thing. Faith was confirmed and devotion inflamed by sight; and the more fervent the prayer the more acceptable was it deemed, from whatever cause its greater fervour might arise. Peter the Galatian visited Palestine, that "gazing on the places that had witnessed the saving sufferings he might in them worship God the Saviour; not as if He were circumscribed by place, . . . but that he might feast his eyes with the contemplation of the things he desired" (Theodoret, Hist. Relig. 9). This is the spirit which we observe in Paula (Epist. ad Marcell. § 5; Ep. 46, inter Hieron. Epp.). We have already (§ 1) seen such emotions ascribed to Paula by St. Jerome in terms which shew how highly he valued and respected them; though reason and experience led him to warn the ordinary Christian against the same pilgrimage. [See HOLY PLACES, § II. Vol. i. p. 775.]

The motive of such pilgrims was therefore a loving desire to trace the footsteps of Christ and the saints; while they knew and confessed that an equal devotion elsewhere would have met with an equal reward. This is implied by Theodoret (above); and so St. Jerome: "I dare not confine the omnipotence of God to one narrow corner of the world. . . . From Jerusalem and from Britain the court of heaven is equally open." (Epist. 58 ad Paulin. 2, 3; comp. Paula, u. s. § 10.) St. Chrysostom: "It is not necessary to make a pilgrimage, or travel to distant lands, or to undergo dangers and toils; but only to have the will" (Hom. i. in Ep. ad Philem. § 2). "There is no occasion to cross the sea, and to make a long pilgrimage. Let us, every man and woman, both when gathered at church and remaining at home, call on God with great earnestness and He will certainly grant our prayers." (Hom. iii. ad Antioch. 2.) Gregory of Nyssa, dissuading from the pilgrimage to Jerusalem, says, "Change of place does not make God nearer;" but wherever thou art, God will be with thee there, if the tabernacle of the soul be found such that the Lord may dwell in thee and walk in thee" (de Eunt. Hieros. ii. 1087).

(5) Prayer for a Specific Benefit.—There was, nevertheless, some inconsistency on this point in the teaching of the fathers of that period. They sometimes spoke as if God were more easily propitiated at the shrines of the martyrs than elsewhere. [See PATRON SAINTS].

Where once this opinion of the prerogative of prayer at a martyr's shrine became general, it necessarily gave a great impetus to pilgrimages. Men were ready to travel any distance to obtain certainly a benefit, which prayer could not procure for them at home. The restoration of health was the boon most commonly sought; but nothing was supposed to be beyond the power or the goodwill of the martyr. Some, therefore, asked for children (Basil. Hom. in xl. Mart. 8), some for success in business (id. Hom. in Mam. 1) or war (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. ii. 37), or for the continuance of peace (ibid. iii. 28), or for the detection of guilt and vindication of innocence (Aug. Epist. lxxviii. 3). Others prayed for the souls of the departed. To a son who is represented asking, in reference to a pious father, "Why should I pray for him, why give alms, why fast, why visit the bodies of the saints?" the assurance is given, "It is a holy and wholesome thought to pray for the dead (2 Macc. xii. 46), . . . and to make pilgrimages that they may be released from their sins" (Pseudo-Aug. Serm. ad Fratr. in Eremo, 44; Opp. S. Aug. app. v). With equal confidence men undertook pilgrimages as a means of obtaining spiritual benefits for themselves. Thus Caesarius, A.D. 502, thought that grace to overcome sinful habits would be granted to the pilgrim: "Frequenting the threshold of the saints, they would implore their help against the sins themselves" (Serm. 60, § 3). Victory over sin would insure its forgiveness; and this, also, the penitent pilgrim asked for in direct terms. E. g. Lothair, A.D. 560, "in the 51st year of his reign, sought the threshold of St. Martin with many gifts, and arriving at Tours, at the tomb of the said prelate, unfolded all the actions which he had done amiss, and prayed with great groans that the blessed confessor would beg the mercy of God for his faults" (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. iv. 21). Similarly, Pepin, in 768, went to Tours to implore St. Martin "that he would deign to beseech the mercy of God for his crimes" (Fredegar. Hist. Greg. Cu- tis. iv. 135). In England also, during the same century, we find persons planning a visit to Rome, "that there they might obtain the pardon of their sins" (Cangyth ad Bonif. Ep. 30 inter Epp. Bonif. ed. Würdtw.). Wilfrid went to Rome, "ab ea [sc. sede Apostolica] omnem modum maculae solvendum sibi credens" (Vita, § 3).

Such voluntary penitents were known by their habit from the 6th century downwards, but I cannot discover what its peculiarities were. Venantius Fortunatus, 560, relating an old tradition, represents one whom he calls "righteous and holy" as "going the round of very many villages and cities in the winter season, wearing the habit of a penitent, in search of the medicine of his soul" (Vita S. Martilii, 24). I do not take this as evidence of a practice much earlier than the age of the writer.

(6) Penance.—Pilgrimages voluntarily undertaken in the hope of obtaining the pardon of sin, naturally suggested the imposition of pilgrimage as a public penance. Morinus (de Sacram. Poenit. viii. 17, § 1) supposes that this custom did not begin before the 7th century; but even if Caesarius (u. s.) refers to voluntary pilgrimages only, a passage in Gregory of Tours is sufficient to prove it earlier. He relates that, about the year 539, "a certain fratricide, bound with iron rings for the enormity of his crime, was ordered to make the circuit of the places of the saints for seven years" (de Glor. Confess. 87). The penance here described was afterwards common in the cases of aggravated murder, the rings being made from the weapon with which the crime had been committed: "Ipso decernente pontifice, ex ipso gladio ferrei nexus componantur, et collum peccatoris, venter atque brachia, strictim innectantur ex ipsis ferreis vinculis" (Mirac. SS. Floriani et Florentii, Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. vi. iv. 2; see also Baluze, Not. in Capit. Reg. Franc. ii. 1198).

The earliest canons which prescribe pilgrimage as a penance do not, as we shall see, mention the holy places; but that they were visited by the professed penitents may be shewn from other documents. The Poenitentiale of Theodore of Canterbury, A.D. 688, condemns a bishop, for certain sins, to be deposed, to be twenty-five years in penance, to fast five on bread and water, and to "end the days of his life in pilgrimage" (Morinus, u. s. vii. 15, § 1). Egbert, archbishop of York, 732, of a homicide: "For we will that he perform penance in a foreign land ten years" (Poenitentiale, i. p. i. 24). [EXILE.] The murderer of an ordained person was to "leave his country and possessions and go to Rome to the pope, and then do as the pope should order him" (Poenit. iv. 6). The council of Châlons-sur-Saône, 813, while condemning pilgrimages from wrong motives, yet declares that the devotion of those who, having confessed sin to their parish priest and received his counsel to that effect, "desire to visit the thresholds of the apostles or any of the saints, persevering in prayer, giving alms, amending their life, and correcting their manners, is altogether worthy of commendation" (can. 45). From this century downwards, many great criminals resorted to Rome to obtain mitigation of the penance imposed by their own bishop. Nicholas I., 867, writing to a bishop with reference to such a case, says: "Undique etenim venientes admodum plurimi, suorum facinorum proditores, quantum dolorem inferant pectori nostro, plus singultu reminiscimur quam calamo scribi queat. Inter quos videlicet istum Wimarum ad apostolorum limina festinasse cognoscite." This man had murdered his three sons; yet the pope lightened his penance (Epist. Nic. 136 ad Rivoladrum). We see here one of the many ways in which the action of the popes, ever anxious to keep up by exercise the authority which they had acquired, tended to the destruction of all discipline. In such pilgrimages also we trace the origin of reserved cases, i.e. of the practice of referring some great sins to Rome for absolution.

VI. Letters of Commendation. — Pilgrims received letters from their bishops, abbats, or other superiors, to attest their bond fide character, addressed to the secular as well as ecclesiastical authorities. Forms of such letters are extant. One runs thus: "Quatenus praesens portitor ille, non (ut plerisque mos est) vacandi causa, sed propter nomen Domini, itinera ardua et laboriosa parvipendens, ob lucrandam orationem limina sanctorum Apostolorum Domini Petri et Pauli adire cupiens," &c. (Marculfi Formulae, ii. 49; Indiculum Generale ad Omnes Homines). Another says of the pilgrim: "Petiit nobis ut ad basilicam S. Petri patris vestri pro suis culpis, vel pro nostra stabilitate, valeat ambulare ad orationem. Propterea has literas cum salutatione per ipsum ad vos direximus ut in amore Dei et S. Petri ipsum ad hospitium recipiatis," &c. (Formulae, Bignon. xv. Capit. Reg. Fr. ii. 503, Charta Tractoria). Such letters were given to public penitents on whom a pilgrimage was imposed. Thus in a third form the bishop or abbat, after reciting the crime, adds: "Nos pro hac causa, secundum consuetudinem vel canonicam institutionem, dijudicavimus ut in lege peregrinorum ipse praefatus vir annis tot in peregrinatione ambulare deberet." He therefore begs them, as the penitent is only wandering "pro peccatis suis redimendis," to give him shelter, fire, bread and water, "et postea sine detentione liceat ei ad loca sanctorum festinare" (Marculf. App. 10, Tracturia pro Itinere peragendo). This shews conclusively how the period of exile was expected to be spent. Among the extant letters of Alcuin is one in favour of a pilgrim friend addressed "amicis per diversas nominum dignitates." He calls it "litterae precatoriae" (Ep. 210, Commend. ad Amic.). The bishops of Rome furnished pilgrim penitents with similar letters for their return home. The form in the Liber Diurnus Rom. Pont. begins thus: "Praesentium latores pro sua devotione liminibus beatorum principum apostolorum praesentati, petierunt ut, a nobis relaxati, valeant ad propria remeare" (cap. vi. tit. x. Item Tractoria).

VII. Other Encouragements and Helps.—Hospitality to pilgrims, both on the road and on their arrival at the shrine, was inculcated as a sacred duty. Men were reminded that what they did unto them was done unto Christ (Car. M. 802, Capit. i. 27), and that they might hope to find that they had entertained angels unawares (Conc. Aquisgr. 789, can. 75). The council now quoted addressed a decree to all laymen and clerks: "Hoc nobis competens et venerabile videtur ut hospites, peregrini et pauperes sus-ceptiones regulares et canonicas per loca diversa habeant" (ibid.). In 802 Charlemagne proclaimed a law that "none within his dominions, rich or poor, should venture to deny hospitality to pilgrims; that is," he explains, "let no one for the love of God and his soul's health refuse shelter, fire, and water, either to pilgrims walking through the land for God's sake or to any traveller" (Capit. i. 27). Of Charlemagne himself, Eginhard says: "He loved travellers [peregrinos] and bestowed great pains on their entertainment; so that their number seemed (without unreasonable complaint) burdensome not to the palace only but to the kingdom" (Vita, § 21). This was in accordance with the teaching of Alcuin: "Regum merces in miserorum juvamine, et maxime peregrinorum sacra sancti Petri principis apostolorum limina petentium, magna apud divinam constat esse clementiam" (Ep. 26 ad Anjilbertum). Herard of Tours, 858, charges his presbyters to "love hospitality above all things" and to "undertake the care of widows, pilgrims," &c. (cap. 18).

In many places permanent hostels were erected for the reception of strangers, especially religious pilgrims. Such a house was called xenodochium ("xen.; id est locus venerabilis in quo peregrini suscipiuntur"; Capit. Reg. Franc. ii. 29) or hospitale peregrinorum (because in it were entertained "peregrini et pauperes, in quibus specialiter Christus suscipitur"; Capit. Carol. Calv. tit. xxviii. 10). "On the mount of Nitria," says Palladius, "was a xenodochium in which the monks entertained any guest who presented himself throughout the time of his stay, even if he wished to remain there two or three years" (Hist. Laus. 7). Claudia, the mother of St. Eugenia, "built a xenodochium at Alexandria, and settled lands to serve for the reception of travellers" (Vita Eugen. 19; Rosweyd, 346). John the Almoner, who became patriarch in 609, is said to have built several in the same city (Leontius, Vita Joan. 49). There appears to have been such an institution at Rome in the 7th century; for pope Martin, in his exile, A.D. 654, speaking of the hospitality accorded at Rome to Pyrrhus the heretic, when he went "ad vestigia beati Petri," says: "Quisquis venit illuc miserabilis homo hospitari, omnia ad usum praebentur ei, et nullum immunem suis donis S. Petrus repellit venientium illuc; sed panis mundissimus et vina diversa dantur, non solum ei, sed et hominibus ei pertinentibus" (Commemoratio, Hard. Conc. iii. 684). Zachary of Rome, 742, ordered frequent gifts of food to be taken "peregrinis qui ad beatum Petrum morantur" (Anast. Bibl. Vit. Pont. 93), where the last word seems to imply a residence provided for them. Leo III., 795, gave lands "pro alimoniis Christi pauperum, seu advenis, vel peregrinis, qui ex longinquis regionibus veniunt" (ibid. 98), and he is supposed to have built for their use the hospital of St. Peregrinus, which was afterwards largely endowed by Paschal, A.D. 817 (ib. 100). Louis the Godly, A.D. 814, assigned a property near Vienne to this use: "Reddimus etiam ibi quandam villam quae vocatur Fasiana, quam volumus ad susceptionem peregrinorum et alimonia pauperum ibidem futuris proficere temporibus" (Praecept. Lud. Pii, Baluze, Capit. Reg. Fr. ii. 1404). The council of Aachen, 816, ordered canons to provide a "house of reception in which the poor could be gathered," over which a brother should be set "to entertain strangers and pilgrims who came there" (Capit. i. 141).

VIII. The Washing of Pilgrims' Feet.—This was an observance on which great stress was laid. Thus Caesarius of Arles, A.D. 502, enumerates among the acts of Christian virtue "sanctorum peregrinantium pedes humiliter abluere" (Serm. 62, § 3; similarly, 57, § 4; d7, § 2). Another Western homilist enforces the duty at some length from our Lord's example and words, St. John xiii. 4 (Serm. 149, § 1, in App. iv. ad Opp. S. Aug. ed. Ben.) The monks of Fulda, in a petition to Charlemagne, say: "Quod peregrinorum susceptio et lavatio in eis pedum non negligatur, sed secundum regulam et secundum priorum nostrorum consuetudinem, quandocunque venerint, misericorditer suscipiantur, et ab omnibus patribus lavatio pedum eis exhibeatur" (Libellus, c. 13, in Baluze, Not. ad Capit Reg. Fr. ii. 1086). In the same age some monks sent by their abbat to gather hints from the monastery at Reichenau report to him that there "they wash the feet of pilgrims every week-day, with psalmsinging on their way to it and back" (Capit. Monach. 3, Baluze, u. s. App. Actor. Vet. ii. 1380). Monks were especially tied to this observance on Maundy Thursday, the day on which the precept (mandatum) was given. Thus the council of Aachen, 817: "That the Maundy (if it be the time of the Supper) both of the fathers and of travellers [peregrinorum] take place" (can. 24, Cap. Reg. Fr. i. 583). These latter testimonies probably refer to all travellers, religious and secular; for the original rule of Benedict (c. 53) included all. Compare S. Fructuosi Regula, c. 10. St. Columba, 560, expecting visitors, says: "Draw water to wash our guests' feet" (Vita auct. Adamn. i. 4).

IX. Protection on the Road.—From an early period pilgrims were put under the especial protection of the law. A decree of Dagobert, A.D. 630, says: "Let no one dare to molest or hurt a traveller abroad; for some go about for God's sake, others for necessary business. Nevertheless, the same peace is necessary for all" (Tit. iii. 4; comp. Cap. Reg. Fr. v. 364). Pepin of Italy, 793: "Touching strangers and pilgrims, who, in the service of God, are hastening to Rome or to other places to the bodies of the saints, that they go and return in safety under our protection" (Leg. Longob. i. ix. 28). Charlemagne, writing in 796 to Offa, king of the Mercians, promises safe-conduct to English pilgrims passing through his dominions: "Touching pilgrims who desire to go to the threshold of the blessed apostles for the love of God, and the health of their own souls, let them go in peace, without any molestation" (Baluze, Capit. Reg. Fr. i. 274).

X. Exemption from Toll.—The words "without any molestation," used by Charlemagne above, intimated freedom from every impost paid by travellers to the crown. For he proceeds: "But if any, not in the service of religion, but in pursuit of gain are found among them, let them pay the appointed [illegible] at the proper places." This, however, was [illegible]dy an old privilege, having been granted by Pepin in 755: "Touching pilgrims who travel for the sake of God, that they take from them no tolls" (in Synod. Vernensi, 22). Two years later, at Metz, he expressed this more fully: "That ye on no account detain those who are on their way to Rome or elsewhere for the sake of God at the bridges and dams or on the ferry-boat, nor make any accusation against any pilgrim on account of his baggage, nor take any toll of them" (Syn. Met. c. 6).

XI. Evils of Pilgrimage.—The moral danger to the pilgrim is obvious, and bad results were early noticed. Gregory of Nyssa, A.D. 370, urged against pilgrimage to the Holy Land that not only was there no command for it, but pilgrims suffered a spiritual loss through it. He dwells on the wickedness of those cities in the East, through which they had to pass, and asserts that it penetrated into the lodgings and hostels which they were obliged to frequent, and asks in a proverb, "How can one pass through the smoke without smarting eyes?" (De Eunt. Hieros. ii. 1085.) Nor does he deem Jerusalem itself less wicked, or less full of danger. [See HOLY PLACES, II. vol. i. p. 775.] St. Jerome (ibid.), A.D. 393, gives similar testimony. Our countryman, Boniface, bears witness to the existence of the same evils in Europe. For, writing to Cuthbert of Canterbury, about 743, he alleges that the pilgrimage to Rome was almost certainly fatal to female chastity: "They are ruined in great part, few remaining chaste." "There are very few cities in Lombardy, or France, or Gaul, in which there is not an adulteress or prostitute of the English nation; which is a scandal, and the disgrace of the whole church." (Epist. ad Cudb. 8.) He suggested that women should be restrained by authority from making the pilgrimage. In France the council of Châlons-sur-Saône, 813, denounced other evils of which pilgrimages were the occasion: "A very great error is committed by certain persons, who ill-advisedly travel to Rome or Tours and certain other places under the pretence of prayer. There are presbyters and deacons and other clerks, who living carelessly think themselves thereby cleansed from their sins, and entitled to return to the exercise of their ministry, if they reach the aforesaid places. There are also laymen, who think that they are sinning, or have sinned, with impunity, because they frequent those places for prayer. There are also some of the powerful who, to gain revenue, under pretence of the journey to Rome or Tours, make a great gathering, oppress many of the poor, and affect to do for the sake of their devotions, or of a visit to the holy places, that which they do in truth from covetousness alone. There are also poor persons who undertake it either merely to have a better plea for begging (of whose number are they who, wandering to all parts, falsely assert that they are going there), or because they are so senseless as to think themselves cleansed from their sins by the mere sight of holy places" (can. 45).

XII. Nomenclature.—At a later period a pilgrim to Rome was called "Romipeta" or "Romeus"; in Auvergne, "Romoneou"; in Provence, "Romieu"; &c. (Ducange); in France generally "Romier"—names given at length to all vagrants; whence probably the English verb "to roam." Similarly, it is said, a pilgrim to the Holy Land (Sancta Terra) was a "saunterer." Those who had been there, brought home branches of the palm, and were thence called "palmers," "palmarii," "palmati," French, "paumiers"; and sometimes in France, "ramiers" (Gretser de Sacr. Peregr. ii. 11).

On this subject, Zaccaria (Bibliographia Selecta, iii. ix. 2, in Fleury's Discipl. Pop. Dei, Ven. 1761) refers us to P. F. X. Mannhart de Antiquitatibus Christianorum, § 5, n. 84 seqq., Aug. Vindel. 1767; to his own Annus Sanctus, ii. iv. 4 (Dell' Anno Santo, Rom. 1775); to Petrus Lazerus de Sacra Vet. Christ. Romana Peregrinatione, Rom. 1774; and Jo. PILLAR SAINTS. [MORTIFICATION.]

PINNAS, Scythian martyr with Innas and Rimas; commemorated Jan. 20. (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.). [C. H.]

PINYTUS, bishop of Gnossus in Crete; commemorated Oct. 10 (Usuard. Mart.; Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. v. 9). [C. H.]

PIONIUS, martyr at Smyrna; commemorated Feb. 1 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. i. 40). [C. H.]

PIONUS, presbyter and martyr with Metrodorus at Nicomedia; commemorated March 12 (Florus, Mart. ap. Bed.); Pion and Metrodus, two martyrs at Smyrna, occur on this day in Hieron. Mart. [C. H.]

PISALIS, PISELIS, PISELUM (Gallice, Poêle), or PYRALE, the same as the CALEFACTORIUM, a chamber in a monastery heated in winter, either by an open fireplace as at St. Gall, or with hot-water pipes, which served as the common room of the brethren, for social intercourse. Its usual place was under the dormitory on the east side of the cloisters ("Reginboldus . . . aedificavit primum dormitorium subtus autem pisalem;" Act. Murensis Monast. p. 9, ap. Du Cange.) At St. Gall it had an outlet communicating with the necessarium. Fires were lighted in it from November 1. "A calendis Novembris concedetur fratribus accessus ignis, locus aptus fratribus designetur cujus refrigio hybernalis algoris et intemperies levigatur" (Concord. Regular. S. Dunst. Cant. Mon. Angl. i. xxxiv.). Adelard (Statuta Corbeiens. c. 6), speaks of the Piselum as only in temporary use, "piselo . . . tempore quando illo uti necesse est" (ap. Du Cange, sub voc.) Du Cange is in error in identifying it with the wardrobe. At St. Gall, the house of the novices and the infirmary had each their separate Pisalis for the use of the inmates. [See CHURCH, Vol. I. p. 383, MONASTERY.] [E. V.]

PISCICULI. [FISH: IXΘYC.]

PISCINA, a designation of the font, for which Optatus gives a mystical reason in connexion with the acrostichal name of Christ (Ἰχθύς, piscis), "Hic est piscis qui in baptismate per invocationem fontinalibus undis inseritur, ut quae aqua fuerat a pisce etiam piscina vocitetur" (Optat. lib. iii. p. 62, Paris, 1631). Piscina was also the designation for the infundibulum, or basin to the right (south) of the altar, in which the ministering priest washed his hands before he commenced the Eucharistic service (Cyril. Hieros. Catech. Mystagog. v. 2; August. Quaest. Vet. et Nov. Test. c. i. 101; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, IV. i. 112). [E. V.]

PISTIS, martyr with Elpis, Agape, and their mother Sophia; commemorated Sept. 16 (Basil. Menol.), Sept. 17 (Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 269). [C. H.]

PISTUS, martyr with his brothers Theognis and Agapius sons of Valerius and Bassa; commemorated Aug. 21 (Basil. Menol.); a martyr of the same name, with no mention of the family, occurs on this day in Hieron. Mart. [C. H.]

PLACIDUS, martyr with Euticius and others in Sicily; commemorated Oct. 5 (Usuard. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. iii. 114; Hieron. PLACITUS). [C. H.]

PLAGAL. The name given to four scales or modes added by St. Gregory to those fixed for the church chants as settled by St. Ambrose. The former were called Authentic (v. AUTHENTIC), and bore the names Dorian, Phrygian, Lydian, and Mixolydian, ranging respectively through the octaves D—d, E—e, F—f, G—g. The Plagal modes were called Hypodorian, Hypophrygian, Hypolydian, and Hypomixolydian, and were placed a fourth below these respectively, ranging from A—a, B—b, C—c, and D—d; but their "final" or "tonic" was the same as before, viz.: D, E, F, G. Thus the Hypomixolydian mode differed from the Dorian, although it was contained in the same octave D—d, in that the division of the octave in the respective cases were thus:—

Dorian.

Hypomixolydian.

The prevailing note, or "dominant," was lower than the corresponding authentic dominant, being respectively F, a, a, c (see also MUSIC). These modes were called the 2nd, 4th, 6th, and 8th; and at an earlier period Plagis prothi, Plagis deuteri, Plagis triti, Plagis tetrardi. Each was considered as "related" to the corresponding authentic mode. This may be illustrated, but not represented, by the modern use, in which A minor is said to be the "relative minor" of C, or in which, by some authorities, C minor is claimed to be, in another sense, a "relative minor" of C. An illustration of the fact that two modes may consist of the same notes, may be given by the different treatment of the versicles and responses now in use in cathedrals: assuming the priest's reciting note to be G, on week-days they are often, and perhaps usually, heard sung harmonised with the plain song in the Treble, and, for the most part, in the tonality of G; but on Sundays and festivals, when Tallis's harmonies are used, the same plain song is put into the Tenor, and the prevailing tonality is C.

In consequence of the relationship between the authentic modes and their corresponding Plagals, more extended compositions are to be found in both combined, a practice the modern musicians have largely imitated. [Compare Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte, i. 5; ii. 2, &c.; Handel's chorus, "He saw the lovely youth" (Theodora); Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; Mozart's Pianoforte Quartett in G minor; Weber's Overture, Der Freischütz, and many others.] This changing of modes or scales was known in the time of Euclid, by whom it is called μεταβόλη (Introd. Harm.); but although apparently unrestricted by him, it would seem to have been restricted by the church composers to the pair of authentic and plagal modes corresponding to each other. A very good example of this, but of a later period, is the plain song tune to the Dies Irae (Hymnal Noted No. 46); the first two stanzas are set in the Hypodorian mode, the third and fourth in the Dorian itself. [J. R. L.]

PLANETA. In a previous article [PAENULA] we have endeavoured to trace out the history of the word under which the eucharistic supervestment in the Greek church is designated. In the western church, since the end of the 8th century, this vestment has been almost universally known as casula, but so far as notices are found of such a vestment as in use before that date, the word used is planeta.* Like casula, however, and φαινόλης, the word is not restricted to its eucharistic meaning, and we shall presently cite instances in which it is found for a dress worn by laymen.

In all probability, we may assume that the paenula, planeta, and casula were to all intents and purposes the same dress, differing, that is, merely in points of detail: and as regards the two latter words, while it is true that later liturgiologists absolutely identify them (e.g. Rabanus Maurus, infra), shewing that in process of time all distinction had been lost, yet it is clear that at an earlier period a slightly different idea was conveyed by the two terms; the planeta being a more costly, and the casula a commoner dress, the latter term also being perhaps a provincial or popular name for the more general expression paenula.

Thus we find the casula as a dress of monks and peasants and working men (see the article), but references are met with to the planeta, as something too costly for monks to wear, and as actually in use by senators and nobles. Our earliest instance of the use of the name occurs early in the 5th century. Cassian, writing not later than 417 or 418 A.D., when describing the dress of the Egyptian monks, mentions the mafors, or the short cloak which they were covering the neck and shoulders. "Thus," he says, "they avoid at once the cost and the ostentatiousness of planetae and birri" (de Coenobiorum Institutis, 1–7; Patrol. xlix. 72). The exact term used by Cassian is, it may be remarked, planetes, which we may assume to be a diminutive of planeta. In like manner, Isidore of Seville, two hundred years later, in his Rule forbids to his monks the use of the planeta:—"orarium, birrus, planetas, non est fas uti, neque indumenta vel calceamenta, quae generaliter caetera monasteria abutuntur (i.e. do not use)" (Regula Monachorum, c. 12, § 2; Patrol. lxxxiii. 882).

* We may note that in the Anglo-Saxon Glossary of Aelfric, planeta is defined by caeppe; though conversely caeppe is defined pallium, vestis sacerdotalis. This may indicate a certain latitude in the use of the word.

The planeta would thus appear to be a dress whose costliness rendered it unsuitable for the use of simple monks, whose duty it was to avoid luxury. It was apparently a full flowing robe, for Cassian (supra) contrasts it with the angustum pallidum which the monks were to wear. With this agrees the notice given us by Isidore of the derivation of the word. As there are some difficulties connected with the passage, we give it at length. "The casula," he says, "is a robe with a hood, derived as a diminutive from casa [a house], because it covers the whole person—a sort of miniature casa. Similar is the origin of cuculla—a sort of miniature cella. I may add that the Greeks hold that one of their names for these robes, planetae, is derived from their free and flowing borders[b] [sic et Graeci planetas dictos volunt, quia oris errantibus evagantur]. Hence the term planetary stars; that is, roving stars; stars which roll here and there with a roving maze and motion of their own" (Etym. lib. xix. 24; Patrol. lxxxii. 691). On this passage one or two remarks may be briefly made. After the derivation of casula has been given as a "little house," follows the mention of the planeta, introduced by the words sic et. Of course, however, the derivation in the latter case is on a totally different groove; therefore the sic points to a similarity not of the derivation, but of the thing itself. That is to say, Isidore practically identifies the planeta with the casula. Again the derivation of planeta is of course from the Greek, and as will be seen. Isidore distinctly implies that the name planeta was actually given to the dress by the Greeks. Excepting, however, a remark of Rabanus Maurus, which we shall presently quote, there does not appear to be any further evidence forthcoming to shew that the word planeta is ever used in Greek in that sense. This might tend to prove that the word passed from Greek into Latin in its astronomical sense, and that the then Latin word developed this new metaphorical meaning. Whether, however, the difficulty is to be explained by supposing that evidence of usage existed to Isidore, that is not forthcoming to us, or whether Isidore was misled into the statement by the Greek derivation, does not appear.

It has been already remarked that the planeta seems to have been a dress of a somewhat costly description, suitable for men of rank. This can be shewn not only by the prohibitions to monks we have already cited, but by direct instances. In a life of Fulgentius (ob. A.D. 533), by one of his disciples, a description is given of his triumphal return to Carthage after his exile. A heavy storm of rain coming on, the nobles used their planetae to form a shelter for Fulgentius—"tantum fides nobilium crevit, ut planetis suis super beatum Fulgentium gratanter expansis, repellerent imbres et novum tabernaculi genus artificiosa caritate componerent" (c. 29; Patrol. lxv. 146). Again, in the well-known representation of Gregory the Great, with his father and mother, which is described by his biographer, John the deacon, in the 10th century, not only Gregory himself, as ecclesiastic, wears the planeta, but also his father Gordianus, a senator. The former wore a "planeta super dalmaticam castanea" (lib. iv. c. 84; Patrol. lxxv. 231); and as to the latter, "Gordiani habitus castanei coloris planeta est, sub planeta dalmatica" (c. 83). It may fairly be inferred from hence that, as late as the end of the 6th century at any rate, the planeta, whatever its use by ecclesiastics, whether for official use or otherwise, was also a dress which any gentleman might fairly use. In another passage of the same biography (lib. ii. c. 24; op. cit. 104), the reference is not quite clear. A certain person having been excluded by Gregory from communion for adultery, sought the aid of sorcerers, who undertook that the bishop's horse should throw him as he rode in procession. The plan, however, was readily foiled by the bishop. In the narrative the expression occurs: "When the sorcerers recognized the prelate, ex planetatorum mappulatorumque processionibus." The mappula, whatever its nature may have been, was, as we have shewn in a previous article [MANIPLE], a special privilege of the chief ecclesiastics of the Roman church in Gregory's time. The planeta we have seen to be worn by laymen as well as clerics. It seems to us, therefore, impossible to define the matter very exactly here; we can only say that the two sets of people specified were the officials of high rank in attendance on the bishops of Rome; but whether these are to be viewed as exclusively clerical, or formed of clerics and laics both, is doubtful. Ducange (s. v. Planeta) explains the two classes as deacons and subdeacons respectively; and Marriott (p. 202, n.) considers the planetati to be presbyters and high officials, and the mappulati to be deacons and subdeacons. We doubt, however, whether the evidence is sufficient to justify us in coming to a definite conclusion.

Thus far, we have seen that in the 6th century the planeta was not an exclusively clerical dress, either at Rome or in North Africa. Further, there appears to be no allusion whatever in the records of the first six centuries which points to the planeta as part of the ministerial garb of the Christian clerics. So far as it was worn by clerics, it was in virtue of their official rank, not their clerical profession, the privilege being one shared with laymen.

The earliest instance in which the planeta is referred to as something specially pertaining to the Christian ministry is in a canon of the fourth council of Toledo (633 A.D.). Here it is ordered that if a bishop, priest, or deacon shall have been unjustly deposed, and shall afterwards be found innocent, he is still not to regain his lost rank till he shall have received before the altar, from the hands of a bishop, the external badge of that rank. This is in the case of a bishop, stole, ring, and pastoral staff; in the case of a priest, stole and planeta; in the case of a deacon, stole and alb, and so forth (can. 28, Labbe, v. 1714). A later notice, but of a less definite character, is found in the Regula Canonicorum (c. 8; Patrol. lxxxix. 1102) of Chrodegang, bishop of Metz, A.D. 743–766, which orders that canons living "foris claustra" and in the city must attend the chapter every Sunday, "cum planetis vel vestimentis ecclesiasticis."

From about the year A.D. 800, the term planeta was in great measure superseded by casula, the two words being thenceforward viewed as absolutely synonymous (see e. g. Rabanus Maurus de Inst. Cler. lib. i. c. 21; Patrol. cvii. 309). [Casulam . . . hanc Graeci planetam nominant], Honorius Augustodunensis [supra]; Innocent III. de Sacro Altaris Mysterio, i. 42; Patrol. ccxvii. 789 [casula vel planeta]. For further illustrations on this point, see Ducange (s. v.).

We may call attention here to a similar extension of the use of the term planeta to that which we have already referred to as existing in the case of the phenolion in the Greek church. In an Ordo Romanus (viii. 1; Patrol. lxxviii. 1000), we find the planeta, as a garment, worn at ordination by acolytes, sub-deacons, and deacons. Whether these differed in shape from the priestly planeta is doubtful; but as the matter falls outside our period we shall not pursue the subject further (cf. Is. xiv. 54; Patrol. lxxviii. 1170).

PLANETICUS, PLANETARIUS, an astrologer. The former word seems to have originated in a false reading of St. Augustine, Confess. iv. iii. 4: "Illos planeticos quos mathematicos vocant," where we should read planos. Thence it found its way into Gratian, Decr. p. ii. c. 26, qu. 2, cap. 8. PLANETARIUS occurs in John of Salisbury: "Mathematici, vel planetarii, dum professionis suae potentiam dilatare nituntur, in erroris et impietatis mendacia pernicioseque corruunt" (Policraticus de Nugis Curial. ii. 19). PLATONIA, a broad thin slab of marble (πλάτυς), used for inlaying or veneering walls or floors. Rubeus (Hist. Ravennat. lib. v. p. 238, apud Ducange, sub voc.) speaks of "tabulam marmoream quam appellabant Graeca voce platonism," and in Simon Dunelm., ad ann. A.D. 794, we read of "platonia, id est, marmor parieti infixum." In this sense it occurs frequently in the Liber Pontificalis of Anastasius. Liberius is stated to have ornamented the tomb of St. Agnes "de platoniis (platonis, Muratori) marmoreis petris" (§ 52); Sixtus III. erected at St. Laurence's outside the walls an altar and silver cancelli "supra platonias porphyreticas" (ibid. § 85); and Leo III. at St. Peter's "ex metallis marmoreis platonias posuit diversisque picturis mirae magnitudinis opus decoravit" (ibid. § 316). When the catacombs became objects of pious devotion, it was customary for the rude walls of their more sacred shrines to be faced with these platoniae. Of this we still see remains in the so-called papal crypt in the cemetery of Callistus, the work of Sixtus III. in the earlier half of the 5th century, thus described by Anastasius:—"Fecit platoniam in coemiterio Callisti in Via Appia ubi nomina episcoporum et martyrum scripsit commemorans" (ibid. § 65). The custom is mentioned by Prudentius:

> "Nec Parilis contenta aditus obducere saxis > Addidit ornando clara talenta operi."
> Peristeph. xi. 183.

From being the most celebrated of the sepulchral crypts treated in this manner, the subterranean vault ad catacumbas contiguous to the apse of the basilica of St. Sebastian, from which the designation catacomb has passed to all similar cemeteries, in which tradition asserts the bodies of St. Peter and St. Paul originally reposed, after having been lined with marble by pope Damasus, A.D. 380—"aedificavit platoniam ubi corpora apostolorum jacuerunt, id est, beati Petri et Pauli" (ibid. § 54; cf. Beda de Sex Aetat. Mundi, ad ann. 4328—became known as the Platonia, and was generally designated by that name. It is a rudely triangular chamber, with curved sides and a rectilinear base, its walls excavated with thirteen plainly-arched arcosolia with stucco ornaments. Under the altar is a well-shaped cavity in two compartments, where it is said the bodies of the apostles were placed (Marchi, Monumenti, tav. xxxix. xl. p. 216; Perret, tom. i. pl. 5; Bosio, pp. 178–187). PLAYS. [ACTORS: THEATRE.]

PLEBS. (1) Sometimes used merely for the laity belonging to the church. Thus Augustine addresses his epistle to the church at Hippo, to the clergy, the elders, and the whole laity, "universae plebi." And, again (Collat. Donat. die 1, § 5), says that the people (plebes) refused to acknowledge two bishops in one church. The sixth council of Paris, A.D. 829 (c. 25), rebukes certain archdeacons for extortions practised, not only on the parochial clergy, but even on the faithful laity, "in plebibus parochiae suae."

(2) But it is more generally used in the sense of an ecclesiastical division, either a diocese, or a parish. Thus the first council of Carthage, A.D. 348 (c. 5), provides against the ordination of a layman from another diocese, "de plebe aliena," without the knowledge of the bishop of the diocese to which he belongs; and (c. 12) listens with approbation to the complaint of one of their number, that another bishop was in the habit of holding visitations in certain parishes of his diocese, "circuit plebes mihi attributas." The second council of Carthage, A.D. 390 (c. 20), Cod. Eccl. Afric. (cc. 98, 99), makes regulations for the allotment of parishes (plebes) to their proper dioceses. The third council of Carthage, A.D. 397 (c. 20), provides that no bishop shall interfere with parishes out of his own diocese, "plebes alienae." A council held at Rome, A.D. 826 (Synod. Rom. c. 16), speaks of the parishes under the jurisdiction of the bishop, "subjectis plebibus." The council of Meaux, A.D. 845 (c. 29), orders that bishops should visit the "plebes" under their jurisdiction. A Capitulary of Charles the Great (tit. v. c. 4) speaks of the presbyters in charge of their respective plebes.

(3) Thomassin (de Eccl. Discip. Vet. et Nov. i. 2, c. 5, § 8) thinks that the word was especially applied to the great parish churches which were in charge of archpresbyters, in which alone baptism was administered, and which possessed some jurisdiction over the inferior parishes. Thus in the council held at Rome, A.D. 826 (Synod. Rom. c. 8), mention is made of the "plebes baptismales." The first council of Pavia, A.D. 850 (c. 6) speaks of the appointment of penitentiaries by the bishops and archpresbyters of "plebes;" and (c. 13) speaks of archpresbyters of "plebes" who were to exercise a certain authority, not only over the laity, "vulgus," but over the presbyters of the inferior parishes, "qui per minores titulos habitant," and to have authority in their own parishes as the bishop in the cathedral church, "sicut ipse matrici praeest, ita archipresbyter praesit plebibus," yet in due submission to episcopal authority. PLOTINUS, martyr, with forty-nine others, at Melitene; commemorated Nov. 21 (Wright, Syr. Mart.). [C. H.]

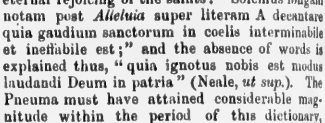
PLURALITIES (Pluralitas beneficiorum).—The office of a clergyman is of such a nature as to be for the most part incompatible with other employment; nor is it possible for one person adequately to discharge duties in two churches. Hence it has from ancient times been forbidden that one man should hold office in different places. The council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451) ordered (c. 10) that no person should be borne on the roll of two churches in respect of the same office. Gregory the Great (Joannes Diac. Vita Greg. ii. 54; Decretum, p. i. dist. lxxxix. c. 1) desired that one office in the church and no more should be committed to one person; the members of Christ must subserve each its own use. The sixteenth council of Toledo (A.D. 693) ordered (c. 5) in the most emphatic manner that more than one church should on no account be committed to the charge of a single presbyter; and the second council of Nicaea (A.D. 787) enjoined (c. 15) that no clerk should hold preferment in two churches, for a man cannot serve two masters. A main object of this canon, as that of the council of Chalcedon previously quoted, was to compel clerks to remain in the church were they were first ordained (Walter, Kirchenrecht, § 221, 9th ed.; Van Espen, Jus Ecclesiasticum, p. ii. sec. iii. tit. 3). PNEUMA. This word is quite as frequently as not met with in the form NEUMA; sometimes also in the form NEUPMA, which seems to point to the orthography of Pneuma; and in the form Neuma the origin seems to have been lost sight of and the word considered to be of the first declension, as we find Neumae and Neumis. It is applied to a musical passage, consisting of a number of notes, which were either sung to one syllable, or to no words at all, in that case probably on the vowel a (ah). This appears to have been used in the Jewish worship as a substitute for the instrumental performance of "Selah" (see DIAPSALMA), or may have been considered a meaning of that obscure word. It is also thought to be a technical meaning of the term "jubilare" used in the translation of the Psalms, so Belethus (quoted by J. M. Neale de Sequentiis ad H. A. Daniel Epist. Crit.), "In hujus fine neumatizamus, id est jubilamus, dum finem protrahimus et ei velut caudam accingimus," and this was mystically referred to the eternal rejoicing of the saints: "Solemus longam notam post Alleluia super literam A decantare quia gaudium sanctorum in coelis interminabile et ineffabile est;" and the absence of words is explained thus, "quia ignotus nobis est modus laudandi Deum in patria" (Neale, ut sup.). The Pneuma must have attained considerable magnitude within the period of this dictionary, because immediately afterwards Notker developed out of it the practice of singing sequences (Neale); it would seem very probable that it had been found inconvenient from its length. A very similar proceeding has taken place in the present century in oratorio music; one seldom now meets with long florid passages[a] such as are to be found in songs, and even in choruses, in the works of Handel and Haydn.

The first tone is generally quoted as a specimen of a short Pneuma of three notes:—

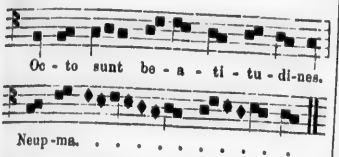
The following is given in Guido Aretinus (de Modorum Formulis apud Coussemaker, vol. ii. pp. 78, &c.), in a "Communion" of the second mode:—



In Walter de Odyngton (Coussemaker, i

[a] These pneumata or passages were at a later period called "divisions;" thus Shakspere "Some say the lark makes sweet division" (Romeo and Juliet, iii. 5).

pp. 218, &c.) occurs the following as an independent Pneuma, apparently; under the eighth mode:—



Some of considerable length appear in the Tonarius Regionis Prumensis, in the notation spoken of above under the article MUSIC, that presents the appearance of short-hand writing, anterior to the invention of the stave; they are put with the NONANNEANE, or NOEACIS; one notably may be mentioned, standing at the head of the Differentie iv^{ti} toni; also in this MS., additions made by a later hand at the beginning of each section, e.g. "Quarta vigilia venit ad eos," are supplied with a notation, and apparently, a Pneuma.

Amongst other uses for Pneumata one was to enable the chant to end satisfactorily, so that there could be no doubt as to the mode in which it was composed. [J. R. L.]

POLYANDRON. This word is used by modern antiquaries for a common sepulchre containing any number of bodies above four. Cells (loculi) were arranged in three or four, or even in as many as twelve tiers one above another, in the sides of a vault or catacomb, and in order to make the most of the space, they were adapted to the different ages and sizes of the bodies to be placed in them. Three such parallel rows of niches are to be seen in the cemetery of Cyriaca, intended respectively for tall, middle-sized and short bodies (Marchi, I Monumenti, &c. tav. xv.). Curiously enough, such cells are sometimes found excavated in a crooked line, so that it would seem that the body must have been bent to fit into them (id. tav. xviii.). Tracings for blocks of niches that have never been executed are occasionally found (id. p. 124 and tav. xxviii.).

These receptacles for the dead are not always made in the walls of catacombs, but are sometimes under the floor, as in the ancient Christian cemeteries at Chiusi (Cavedoni, Cimit. Chiusi, p. 20) and in other places (Marchi, I Monumenti, &c. tav. xxi. xxvi. &c.).

The bricks which were used to close the mouth of these cells at Rome were obtained from the brickyards in the neighbourhood. They are generally marked with the name of the factory and of the maker, and sometimes with those of the consuls. The last-mentioned mark would of course be strong evidence of the period of burial. A considerable number of drawings of these inscribed bricks may be seen in Boldetti (Osservazioni, &c. p. 528 et seq.) and in Fabretti (Inscript. Antiq. t. viii.) (Martigny, Dict. des. Antiq. chrét. s. v.). [E. C. H.]

(2) Confessor with Timotheus; commemorated May 20 (Wright, Syr. Mart.).

(3) Martyr at Caesarea in Cappadocia, with Victurus, Donatus, Quintus; commemorated May 21 (Hieron. Mart.). Under Jan. 7, *Hieron. Florus under Jan. 11 commemorates Polioctus, Candidianus, Filotimus; and on the same day the Bollandists have Polyeuctus, Candidianus, Philoromus (Acta SS. Jan. i. 666). [C. H.]

POLYGAMY. [MARRIAGE, ix. p. 1101.]

POLYMITUS (POLYMITUM, POLYMITA VESTIS). This, as the name implies, is a garment woven with various coloured threads. Thus Isidore defines it (Etym. xix. 22; Patrol. lxxxii. 686), "Polymita multi coloris. Polymitus enim textus multorum colorum est." Caesarius of Arles forbids to nuns the use of "plumaria et acupictura et omne polymitum" (Reg. ad Virg. 42; Patrol. lxvii. 1116). Jerome (Epist. 64 ad Fabiolam, c. 12; Patrol. xxii. 614) uses the word in describing the Jewish priestly girdle. The word also occurs in the Capitulare de Imaginibus of Charlemagne (i. 12; Patrol. xcviii. 1033), where the "vestis polymita sive varia" is the "coat" of Joseph, symbolising the church gathered out of many nations. For further references, see Ducange's Glossarium, s. v. [R. S.]

POLYXENA, virgin, sister of Xantippe, the wife of Probus praefect of Spain in the reign of Claudius, disciples of St. Paul; commemorated Sept. 23 (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

POMPA. [MARRIAGE, p. 1109.]

POMPEIUS (1) Martyr with Terentius under Decius; commemorated Ap. 10 (Mart. Rom.); Daniel (Cod. Liturg. iv. 257) gives the two names as one, POMPEIUS TERENTIUS, which may be by a typical error omitting a comma between them.

(2) Of Italy, martyr in Macedonia with Peregrinus and others under Trajan; commemorated July 7 (Basil. Menol.; Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

PONTIANUS (1) Martyr at Spoletum under one of the Antonines; commemorated Jan. 19 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.; Mart. Rom.); Jan. 14 (Notker, Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 932, and some other Martyrologies).

(2) Deacon, martyr at Carthage with St. Cyprian; commemorated Mar. 8 (Vet. Rom. Mart.; Usuard. Mart., PONTIUS).

(3) Martyr at Rome with Eusebius and others under Commodius; commemorated Aug. 25 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.).

(4) Pope and martyr under Maximinus; natalis commemorated at Rome Nov. 20 (Usuard., Wand., Vet. Rom. Mart.); Oct. 29 (Florus ap. Bed. Mart.); Aug. 13 (Hieron. Mart.).

(5) Martyr at Rome with Praetextatus, under Maximinus; commemorated Dec. 11 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

PONTIFEX. The derivation of this word by Varro, from pons and facere, "inasmuch as," he says, "the Roman pontiffs built the Pons Sublicius and afterwards frequently restored it" (de Ling. Lat, v. 83), may be compared with a capitulary of Charles the Great which commences thus: "De pontibus vero vel reliquis similibus operibus que ecclesiastici per justam et antiquum consuetudinem cum reliquo populo facere debent" (Pertz, Legg. i. 111). Richter, however, considers the theory that its Christian use was derived from the Roman emperors highly improbable, and inclines to regard it as a reminiscence from the Levitical service in the temple, carrying with it the notion of a mediatorial office (Lehrbuch d. Kirchenrechts, p. 204). In Christian literature the title first comes prominently before us, as sarcastically applied by Tertullian to the bishop of Rome: "Audio etiam edictum esse propositum, et quidem peremptorium, Pontifex scilicet maximus, quod est episcopus episcoporum, edicit," &c." (de Pudicitia, c. i.). Cyprian employs language which sufficiently proves that such pre-eminence was unrecognized in the African church of his day: "neque enim quisquam nostrum episcopum se esse episcoporum . . . quando habeat omnis episcopus pro licentia libertatis et potestatis suae arbitrium proprium" (Alloc. in Conc. Carth. ann. 256; Gieseler, I. i. 361). The author of the Life of Fulgentius, speaking of the return of the orthodox bishops to Africa, says that Hilderic, the Vandal monarch, "Carthaginiensi plebi proprium donavit antistitem" (i.e. a metropolitan) "cunctisque in locis ordinationes pontificum" (i.e. bishops) "fieri clementissima auctoritate ordinavit" (Baronius, ann. 522, c. x.). This alone suggests some doubt as to the genuineness of the 39th canon of the African code, which enjoins that "no primate shall be called a prince of priests, or pontiff" [AFRICAN COUNCILS, p. 38]. Similarly the monks of Carthage in the year 525, in a petition to Boniface, bishop of that city, address him not only as "apostolica dignitate praeditus," but also as "Christi venerandus Pontifex" (Thomassin, ed. Bourassé, ii. 366). Hilary of Arles is styled "summus Pontifex" by Eucherius, bishop of Lyons (Migne, l. 773). Anastasius first applies the term to Pelagius I., of whose ordination in the year 555 he says, "et ordinaverunt eum pontificem" (Migne, Patrol. cxxviii. 109). Pelagius himself uses the title when speaking of his predecessor, Leo the Great (Sirmond, i. 310).

There is, however, abundant evidence that long after the 6th century, especially in the language of the civil legislator, the title continued to be applied to all bishops indiscriminately. It is of frequent occurrence in the Gothic and Lombardic codes, and in the capitularies of Charles the Great, e.g. "Ut unusquisque sacerdos cotidianis adsistat orationibus pro pontifice cujus gubernatur regimine" (Pertz, Legg. i. 87). In a capitulary of the council of Aachen (A.D. 803) metropolitans are designated as "summi pontifices." Segebodus is styled "totius Gothiae provinciae archipontifex" (Gallia Christiana, vi. 168). In the 10th century, Bruno, primate of Cologne, is designated simply as "pontifex" (Pertz, Mon. Germ. Hist. v. 430), while in a charter of the year 962, given by Bertha, queen of Hungary, the pope of Rome is styled "Pontifex pontificum apostolicae sedis." But in the year 1000 we find the archbishop of Arles designated as "Pontifex summus" (Ducange, s.v.), and Lanfranc, in the 11th century, is referred to by his biographer, Milo Crispinus, as "Primas et pontifex summus" (Migne, Patrol. cl. 10). D'Achery indeed, in a note on the latter passage, states that these titles were commonly given to bishops of distinguished sees. [J. B. M.]

PONTIFICAL (Liber Pontificalis Pontificale, Ἀρχιερατικόν), a book of offices peculiar to a bishop, as those of ordination, confirmation, &c. The later pontificals admitted offices common to priests and bishops, as e.g. that of baptism, but with special directions for their performance by the latter.

The early SACRAMENTARY was also a pontifical. Thus the Gelasian gives the prayers said by the bishop over public penitents on Ash-Wednesday and Maundy Thursday (Liturg. Rom. Vet. Murat. i. 505, 549); the forms of ordination of bishops, priests, and all the inferior clergy (512, 513, 515, 619–629); the benediction of nuns (629); of the holy oils and chrism (554); of baptism, as performed by the bishop on Easter-eve and the eve of Whitsunday (568, 591); the orders of confirmation (570, 597); and of the dedication of a church (609).

The "Ordo Romanus, qualiter Missa pontificalis celebretur," probably compiled about 730 [ORDO], may be regarded as a partial pontifical in its earliest form. The first part (Mus. Ital. ii. 3–16) describes a pontifical mass, but it gives also directions for the especial services of Lent and Holy Week as celebrated by a bishop, including the making of holy oil, and chrism, and the baptisms of Easter-eve (17–29), and for those of Easter-day, Whitsunday, St. Peter's day, and Christmas (29). An appendix contains, with many further instructions, the method of making the AGNUS DEI. Such a directory was necessary at a time when the sacramentaries, as e.g. the Leonian, or Veronese Gelasian (Mur. u. s. i. 294–483), were almost without rubrics. The necessary parts of this Ordo were afterwards transferred, sometimes, it seems, without any alteration, as in the Codex Elizianus, printed by Ménard (Opp. Greg. M. iii.; i. coll. 1–240) to the sacramentaries as rubrics.

The Gregorian sacramentary, as edited by Grimoald, who became abbat of St. Gall in 841, omits the ordinal, and the offices of confirmation and the dedication of a church (Ménard, Praef. in Sacram. Greg. xii.; Pamelii Liturgicon, index Sacr. Grim. ii. 390–394). This shews that some offices assigned to bishops were already to be sought for in another book, i.e. in a "pontifical." It may be doubted also whether the Benedictiones Episcopales ("sub finem Colonien. praecipui cod. alia manu script.") originally belonged to this sacramentary (Pamel. ii. 478).

It is probable that pontificals were in use at least in England a full century before the time of Grimoald,[b] though the name does not appear to have been finally fixed at that period. (1) The earliest extant is probably that of Egbert, archbishop of York, from 732 to 766, now in the National Library at Paris, no. 138. In order to exhibit the full contents of an early pontifical we will give the headings of the several offices in this book, only premising that the extant copy appears to have been written in the lifetime of Egbert. "Literis Saxonicis ab annis circiter 950 eleganter scriptum," said Martene in 1699 (De Ant. Eccl. Rit. ed. 1764, i. p. xx.). It contains the ordinatio episcopi (with proper missa and benediction); confirmatio hominum ab episcopo dicenda (with benedictions); ordo de sacris ordinibus, qualiter in Romana aecclesia presbiteri, diaconi, subdiaconi, vel ceteri ordines clericorum benedicendi sunt (with missae); ratio qualiter domus Dei consecrandus est (with missae), which is preceded by a form to be used by the priest when he gives notice of the intended consecration (Pont. of Egbert, p. 26; Surtees Soc. vol. xxvii.), and followed by a "missa in dedicatione oratorii," a proper benediction for the dedication of a church, a missa "in dedicatione fontis," and the office to be used "in consecratione cimiterii" (with missa); reconciliatio altaris vel loci sacri, with missa in reconciliatione ecclesie, and a proper benediction. The second part (pp. 58–136) consists chiefly of episcopal benedictions, but other rites occur. We have (1) benedictions for Sundays and other holidays (58–93); (2) for occasional use as at ordinations, super regem, pro iter agentibus, super synodum, &c. (pp. 94–100); (3) Missa pro regibus in die benedictionis, followed by the unction and prayers; (4) consecratio abbatis vel abbatissae, benedictio virginis monialis, consecratio viduae, consecratio crucis, ordo ad sanctimonialem benedicendam; (5) benedictions of fruits, bread, houses, bells, &c.; (6) the Roman rites for Maundy Thursday, the blessing of the Paschal Lamb and other feasts, the blessing of incense on Easter eve; (7) Benedictio armorum,—panis ad infirmum,—casei et butyri, et omnis pulmenti, ad sponsas benedictio, orationes ad libros benedicendos, benedictio vini, pro oculorum infirmitate, orationes dicende cum adoratur sancta crux, ad palmas benedicendas vel ramos. Several of the offices are given by Martene (i. 92, 275; ii. 31, 188, 199, 214, 246, 285, 294; iii. 101, 108). Morinus (de Sacram Ord. ii. 230) refers to the same century the pontifical known as the Benedictional of archbishop Robert now in the public library at Rouen, no. 27. It is so called from the episcopal benedictions preceding the offices in the MS. A full account of it is given by Mr. Gage in Archaeologia, vol. xxiv. pp. 118–136. The extant copy seems to have been written at the instance of Aethelgar of Canterbury, 989. The Ordinationum Ritus are printed by Morinus, u. s. 230–235; and in his work De Sacram. Poenit. he gives the absolutio dicenda ab episcopo super conversum et poenitentem (p. 478); see also p. 374). This pontifical seems to have been only slightly known to Martene, as he merely refers to it twice (ii. 163; iii. 88). The latter writer assigns to the same age ("annorum 900") the pontifical formerly in the Abbey library at

[b] Zaccaria (Bibliath. Rit. i. vi. 2) says: "Inter Latinorum Pontificalia celebriora sunt S. Protadii, ii. 626." &c I can obtain no information about the Pontifical of Protadius, and suspect that the statement is a mistake arising from the fact that certain lauds or acclamations at the enthronement of a bishop are ascribed to Protadius, bishop of Besançon, who died in 625 (Migne, Patrol. Lat. lxxx. 409).

Jumièges, now no. 362 in the public library at Rouen; which is also described by Mr. Gage in Archaeologia, vol. xxv. 244–250. He also gives in extenso the order of the consecration of a church, with proper missa and benedictions (251–274). Martene has transcribed from it, ordo ad catechumenum ex pagano faciendum (i. 15); qualiter suscipere debeant poenitentes episcopi vel presbyteri (275); ordo ad unguendum infirmum (301); ordinationum ritus (ii. 37); benedictio monachorum (162), the same as in Bened. Roberti (163); virginum (189); regum (214); ecclesiarum (250); reconciliatio loci sacri (285); benedictio scrinii (shrine) vel arcae (300); formula excommunicationis (322); ordo ad energumenos adjuvandos (347); ordo ad benedicendum oleum infirmorum, oleum catechumenorum et sanctum chrisma (iii. 88; the same as in Ben. Rob.). Martene also describes (in 1699) "Remensis archimonasterii S. Remigii antiquum pontificale ante annos 900 literis Longobardicis exaratum, Tirpini archiepiscopi Remensis nomine vulgo appellatum" (i. xxii). See offices cited by Martene in i. 68; iii. 10.

The foregoing are, if I mistake not, the only pontificals extant which are assigned to the period ending with the death of Charlemagne. It may be well, however, to mention some others of note to which a less antiquity is ascribed. (1) There is one which was given to a monastery by Prudentius, bishop of Troye, who died in 861 (Zaccar. u. s. 169; Martene, i. 192, 303, ii. 384, iii. 133, 153). (2) A MS. described by Jos. Hartzheim in his Catalogue of the Cathedral library at Cologne, 1752, as "Pontificale Remense," but probably English, as the following petition which he cites from it appears to indicate:—"Ut regale solium, videlicet Saxonum, Merciorum, Nordanhumbrorumque sceptra, non deserat" (Egbert, Pont. pref. x.). (3) That of Rheims "circa tempus Hincmari (845) exaratum" (Zacc. 167). (5), (6), (7), (8) Those of Noyons (by Radbodus) (Mart. ii. 47, 260), Sens (iii. 88), Poitiers (i. 68, 93; iii. 74, 101, 133, 153), and Cahors (i. 93; ii. 45, 262, 333), the copies of which are of the 10th century. (9) The pontifical of Dunstan of Canterbury, who died in 988, is in the National Library at Paris, no. 943. Martene gives from it the rites of ordination, which agree with those in the MS. formerly at Jumièges (ii. 37), the benedictio monachorum (163), and the ordo qualiter domus Dei consecranda est (255).

The Greeks and Orientals do not appear to have put their episcopal offices into a separate volume until long after the 9th century.

In the church of Rome Clement VIII., in 1596, supplanted all the other pontificals of his obedience by a new edition of the Roman (Catalani, Proleg. in Pontif. Rom. ii. 5). [W. E. S.]

POOL OF BETHESDA. [Bethesda.]

POOR, CARE OF. The care of the poor was from the date of the Apostolic Canons formally entrusted to the bishop. This indeed was but a detail of the very wide rule that the bishop was to have the care of everything that concerned the church. (πάντων τῶν ἐκκλησιαστικῶν πραγμάτων ὁ ἐπίσκοπος ἐχέτω τὴν φροντίδα. Can. Apost. xxxvii. Labbe, i. 34 B.) The argument of the fortieth canon is, that since he was entrusted with the souls of men he ought certainly to be entrusted with money.

The comment of Zonaras on the forty-first of the Apostolical Canons is, that the care of the poor was committed to the bishop, who had the control of ecclesiastical property with this view; but that the bishop was to make the distribution to the poor through the agency of the priests and deacons, in order to avert from himself the suspicion of applying the funds to his own uses (Beveregi. Pandect, tom. i. p. 29). A similar provision is made by the council of Gangra (A.D. 325) which provides (can. 8) that no one shall either give or receive offerings apart from the bishop or him whom the bishop appoints to make distribution to the poor (ὁ ἐπιτεταγμένος εἰς οἰκονομίαν εὐποιΐας. Labbe, ii. 418 D).

Bishops are enjoined by the tenth canon of the third council of Tours (A.D. 813) to have "maximam curam et solicitudinem circa pauperes;" yet they are to dispense what is collected by the churches, not indiscriminately, but "cauta circumspectione." In fulfilment of this duty they are authorised by the following canon to pay what is necessary out of the treasury of the church in the presence of the presbyters and deacons (Labbe, tom. 7, p. 1262 d, e). The same presence of witnesses (cum testibus) when the bishop makes these payments is insisted on in the Capitula (cap. 12) of Charlemagne of the year 813. The right of the poor to the property of a bishopric was admitted by John the Almoner, patriarch of Alexandria, when he founded a monastery and endowed it with the revenues of the see. To justify such an alienation, he pleaded that the "patrimony of the poor" could not be better administered than by being given to those who were devoted to evangelic poverty. [Property of the Church, C. (4).]

Pope Gregory's answer to the first question of Augustine of Canterbury is most explicit on the subject of the poor. "It is the custom of the apostolical see to deliver to ordained bishops precepts that of every oblation which is made there ought to be four portions, one, to wit, for the bishop and his household, on account of hospitality and entertainment; another for the clergy; a third for the poor; a fourth for the repairing of churches." (See Bede's Eccl. Hist. of the English Nation, Gidley's transl. p. 65.)

By a later council (Conc. Aquisgran. c. 142, A.D. 816) the obligation to care for the poor is specially extended to canons. Canons might have their own private dwellings, yet they were to maintain "intra claustra" an abode for the poor and aged.

In the last of the eighty Arabic canons of the council of Nicaea (A.D. 325) it is directed that in every town there should be appointed an officer (to this day at Rome called Procurator pauperum), whose duty it was to care for the poor. He might be either cleric or layman; he was to live near the church, and, having the control of funds, he was to provide not only for the sick, but also for those who were in prison. For those who were improperly imprisoned, he was to obtain liberation; the others were to be helped so that they wanted neither for food nor clothing. In France a similar order was made by the fifth council of Orleans (can. 20). Every Sunday the archdeacon or the dean (praepositus) was to visit the prisons, and to supply the wants of poor prisoners out of the funds of the church. Justinian ordered the same to be done on Wednesday or Friday. Other poor captives, too, the bishops might help. Some of the "slaves of the church" they might liberate, make them a grant of money not exceeding twenty shillings (solidi), besides house, vineyard or plot of ground (Conc. Agd. 7). Other slaves there were to protect when enfranchised (ib.). Gregory of Tours makes it a special feature in his eulogy of Maurilion, bishop of Cahors, that he stood between the poor and those who might oppress them "defendens pauperes ecclesiae de manu malorum judicum." It was at the request of Merovens, bishop of Poictiers, that King Childebert readjusted the public imposts according to their ancient distribution, greatly to the relief of the poor of his diocese (Greg. Tur. Hist. ix. 30). When the same officers that had been at Poictiers passed on to Tours, they were resisted by Gregory himself, who at length obtained from the king a confirmation of the immunities that had been conferred upon the city of St. Martin. In England, Cuthbert of Lindisfarne thought that the distressed would betake themselves to his body even after death. The concourse, he urged, would be troublesome to the monastery, and therefore it was for the advantage of the brethren that he should be buried beyond its precinct (Bede, Life). Nor was it only what it is the fashion to call "the deserving poor" that were to be helped; but if any one of the faithful had wasted his property in drinking, and feasting, and wickedness, still he was not to be deserted. Whatever may have been the practical effect of the church's care of the poor, in theory at least she always discouraged idleness in the able-bodied. The bishop was to give food and raiment so far as he could to those who needed them; but it was only to those "qui debilitate faciente non possunt suis manibus laborare" (Conc. Aurel. i. can. 16, qu. Thomassin. part ii. liv. iv. ch. 5).

So paramount did the claims of the poor appear in the eyes of Christians, that St. Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, did not hesitate in a time of distress to sell even the treasures of the church in order to provide relief. The story is told at length by Sozomen how a man recognised upon an actress a piece of work which he had presented at the altar; how a merchant had sold it to the actress; how the bishop sold it to the merchant; and how the bishop was deposed in consequence (Sozom. Hist. Eccl. iv. 25).

Certain forms of distress are the subject of special enactment. The leprous, as being in the worst case of all, were especially commended to the care of the bishop (Con. Aurel. v.).

It appears that the clergy became in some cases so poor as to need alms. A bishop or priest was bound to supply such an ecclesiastic with what was necessary, on pain of excommunication, or even of deposition in case he would not amend (Can. Apost. lix. Bevereg, Pandect. tom. i. p. 38).

Gregory of Tours relates that Crodin took pleasure in building magnificent houses and furnishing them sumptuously, then, asking bishops who were poor to dine with him, he presented them the whole property, in order that "the poor being maintained by it might obtain for him pardon with God." The same writer applies the term matriculari to the poor who were on the roll of the church (De Mirac. B. Mart. iii. 22).

The fund for the relief of the poor was spoken of by St. Gregory the Great under the phrase Res pauperum (S. Greg. Mag. Epp. lvi. lviii.). In the former of these two letters he gives his authority for the payment of a distressed man's debt out of that fund. The care of the poor was not confined to the giving of money or its equivalents. In one of the letters of St. Gregory the Great, the defence of the poor (defensio pauperum) is enjoined upon a bishop as his duty (Ep. xxxvi.). The ordinary rules of courtesy were even to be strained in their favour; "the poor and aged persons of the church are more to be honoured than the rest" (Conc. Carth. iv. 83, A.D. 398); and those who ridiculed the invitation of the poor to the houses of others were anathematized (Conc. Gangr. can. 11).

It ought to be observed that by the 11th canon of the council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451), it is enacted that poor persons, and those requiring help, should be provided with PACIFICAE.

Sometimes a house for the reception of the poor was maintained by private munificence. Such a house probably was the "xenodochium in portu Romano situm," of which it would seem from the letter of St. Jerome that Fabiola was the foundress (St. Hieron. Epp. xxx. ad Oceanum). The council of Aix (A.D. 816) required that canons should provide in their precinct a "receptaculum ubi pauperes colligantur." This receptacle was lower down called "hospitale" (Labbe, vii. p. 1403, A, B). Further particulars of such establishments are given under HOSPITAL, HOSPITALITY.

(A) POPE[a] (abbas, papa, father), a word derived from the Greek πάππας, or πάπας, but often erroneously derived from the Latin, "pater patrum," e.g. Adam Scotus, in the 12th century, says: "Ipsos enim papas, id est, patres patrum, mos solet ecclesiasticus appellare, et ut sic vocarentur instituit" (de Tripart. Tab. Migne, Patrol. cxcviii. 394), a false etymology, that may be explained by the fact that Greek was originally the official language of the church both in the East and in the West; but that the knowledge of it subsequently became almost extinct among "the Latins" in mediaeval times. Walafrid Strabo, who possessed some knowledge of Greek, writing in the 9th century, compares the word to that of "church" as one borrowed by Teutonic races from the Greek in order to express a previously unfamiliar idea: "Kyrch a Kurios, et papst a papa, quod cujusdam paternitatis nomen est et clericorum congruit dignitati" (Migne, cxiv. 927).

The earliest ecclesiastical use of the word appears to have been to denote the spiritual relationship existing between a teacher of Christianity and the convert brought by his agency into communion with a recognised Christian body; in many cases the convert assumed the name of his spiritual father. At a later period the term began to be restricted to bishops and abbats. Severus, a deacon at Rome of the time of Marcellinus (A.D. 296–304), having received permission from Marcellinus to open a double tomb in the catacombs, speaks of having done so—"jussu papae sui Marcellini" (De' Rossi, Inscr. i. p. cxv.). Subsequently, as will be shewn in the course of this article, the title was limited to the bishop of Rome in the West and to the patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Constantinople in the East, and finally was claimed by the pope of Rome exclusively, although still the customary mode of addressing priests in the Greek church.[b]

The theory of the Papacy, as defined at the council of Florence, involves the assumptions: (1) That Peter had been invested by Christ Himself with a certain pre-eminency among the other apostles. (2) That he was the founder of the church at Rome, and that the inspiration and authority especially vouchsafed to him had been given in equal measure to his successors, the bishops of that church. (3) That the bishop of Rome might thus rightfully claim supremacy over the whole Christian church and over all Christian fathers and teachers. We have to inquire into the historical evidence for these assumptions.

(1.) (i.) On the question of the supremacy of St. Peter among the Apostles, and of his presence in Rome, so far as it depends on Scriptural authority, see PETER in DICT. OF THE BIBLE.

When we turn to the evidence afforded by uncanonical writers, we find that either Paul and Peter are designated as joint founders of the church in Rome, or Peter assumes the foremost place, while Paul receives but slight notice, or is altogether unmentioned.

The earliest testimony is probably that of Dionysius, bishop of Corinth. In a fragment of the Catholic epistles of this writer, preserved by Eusebius (E. H. ii. 25), he expressly refers to Paul and Peter as teachers and founders of the churches at Corinth and Rome, and also as having suffered martyrdom at the same time. Replying to Soter (bishop of Rome, A.D. 168–177) and the Roman clergy, who had addressed to the community at Corinth a hortatory letter, he says: ταῦτα καὶ ὑμεῖς διὰ τῆς τοσαύτης νουθεσίας, τὴν ἀπὸ Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου φυτείαν γενηθεῖσαν Ῥωμαίων τε καὶ Κορινθίων συνεκεράσατε. Καὶ γὰρ ἅμφω καὶ εἰς τὴν ἡμετέραν Κόρινθον φυτεύσαντες· ἡμᾶς ὁμοίως δὲ καὶ εἰς τὴν Ἰταλίαν ὁμόσε διδάξαντες, ἐμαρτύρησαν κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν καιρόν (Eusebius, E. H. ed. Heinichen, i. 180).

The main statements of Dionysius are supported by the independent testimony of two yet earlier writers—that of Peter's martyrdom by Clemens Romanus, and that of his teaching at Rome by Ignatius. The language of the former writer is explicit. "Let us," he says, "set before us the holy apostles. Peter, through unjust envy, endured not only one or two, but many persecutions, and thus, having suffered martyrdom, passed into his place of reward in glory:" καὶ οὕτω μαρτυρήσας ἐπορεύθη εἰς τὸν ὀφειλόμενον τόπον τῆς δόξης (Epist. ad Corinth. i. v.; Hilgenfeld, Nov. Test. ext. Can. Rec. i. 8; Migne, S. G. i. 217).

The meaning of Ignatius is perhaps less free from ambiguity, but the passage occurs in his Epistle to the Romans, the genuineness of which is generally admitted, and is supported by the Syriac version. Addressing "The church which presides in the place of the region of the Romans" (ἥτις προκάθηται ἐν τόπῳ χωρίου Ῥωμαίων), he says, "I teach you not as did Peter and Paul; they were apostles, I am one condemned; they were free, but I am, as yet, in bonds:" Οὐχ ὡς Πέτρος καὶ Παῦλος διατάσσομαι ὑμῖν· ἐκεῖνοι ἀπόστολοι, ἐγὼ δὲ κατάκριτος· ἐκεῖνοι ἐλεύθεροι, ἐγὼ δὲ μέχρι νῦν δοῦλος (Cureton, Corp. Ign. p. 47).

The event foreshadowed in John xxi. 18, 19, may fairly be recognised in the above passage from Clemens, a passage strikingly confirmed by that in the Muratorian canon: "Lucas optime Theophilo comprendit, quia sub praesentia ejus singula gerebantur, sicuti et semote passionem Petri evidenter declarat" (see Westcott, Canon of the New Test. p. 499, ed. 1870). Here, though the text is obviously corrupt, the meaning is sufficiently clear; viz. that Luke related only those events of which he was an eye-witness, and that consequently the martyrdom of St. Peter is not recorded by him. It is also worthy of note that, as no tradition ever assigned any other place than Rome as the scene of Peter's martyrdom, every allusion to that event is also an indirect confirmation of his visit to the capital.

[a] Throughout this article the dates placed after the name of a bishop or pope of Rome denote the assigned duration of his office. For reasons which will be apparent in the course of the article, I have preferred to use the term "bishop of Rome" up to the middle of the 5th century, and after that date to employ the term "pope."

[b] Martigny (Dict. des Ant. chrét.) says that the Greeks employ the word to denote both bishops and priests, but with a different accent and inflexion, placing the accent, when employing it with respect to a bishop, on the first syllable; when speaking of a priest, on the second; but this is doubtful.

Irenaeus is the next writer after Dionysius, whose testimony is of a like tenor; and, as the disciple of Polycarp and subsequently a bishop of the Western church, he can hardly be supposed to have given expression to a tradition at variance with the prevalent Christian belief of his age. He speaks of Peter and Paul as "preaching the gospel and founding the church in Rome" (ἐν Ῥώμῃ, εὐαγγελιζομένων καὶ θεμελιούντων τὴν ἐκκλησίαν), and represents this as occurring at about the same time that St. Matthew composed his gospel (Adv. Haer. iii. 1). A passage in the Latin version of the same treatise refers to the church at Rome as that "greatest and most ancient church of universal fame which the two most glorious apostles, Peter and Paul, founded and organized"—"maximae et antiquissimae et omnibus cognitae a gloriosissimis duobus apostolis Petro et Paulo Romae fundatae et constitutae ecclesiae" (ib. iii. 3; ed. Harvey, ii. 9).

The language of Tertullian, in his enumeration of the apostolic churches, is equally definite. "How happy that church," he exclaims, "for which apostles poured forth their whole teaching with their blood; where Peter shares the passion of his Lord, where Paul is crowned with the fate of John!" (De Praescript. adv. Haer. c. 36).

In the 4th century the passages are numerous, even in the most authoritative writers, which corroborate the belief expressed in the foregoing statements, and wherein the bishopric of Rome is habitually referred to as "Petri sedes." See Leo Magnus, ad Sicilienses Episc. (Mansi, v. 1305); ad Theodosium Aug. (ib. vi. 14); Concil. Chalced. Allocutio ad Marc. (ib. vii. 455); Anastasius II. P. (Thiel, Epist. Rom. Pont. i. 824). "Petrus, cujus sedem tenemus, locum gerimus," Vigilius P. (Mansi, ix. 358), &c. Augustine refers to the tradition that both apostles were buried at Rome, as one of universal acceptance: "jacet Petri corpus Romae, dicunt homines; jacet Pauli corpus Romae," &c. (Serm. 296; Migne, xxxviii. 1355). The seventh book of the Apostolical Constitutions, which belongs probably to about the year A.D. 300, represents both Paul and Peter as ordinary bishops of Rome—Paul ordaining the first bishop, Linus; Peter the second, Clemens (Cotelerius, Pat. Apost. i. 385).

The passage from Dionysius is not the only one which Eusebius adduces, in support of what was certainly his own belief and that of his age, viz. that Peter lived, taught, and suffered at Rome. "Also," he says, "a certain ecclesiastical writer, Caius by name, who lived about the time of Zephyrinus, bishop of Rome, disputing with Proclus, the leader of the Cataphrygians, gives the following statement respecting the places where the earthly tabernacles of the aforesaid disciples were laid: 'And I can shew you the trophies (τὰ τρόπαια) of the apostles; for if you will go to the Vatican, or to the Ostian road, you will find the trophies of those who have laid the foundations of the church, and also suffered martyrdom'" (H. E. ii. 25). In addition to these extracts, however, Eusebius also hands down another tradition, of which his acceptance is alone sufficient to occasion grave inquiry as to his judgment and authority as a writer. In the fourteenth chapter of the same book he not only states that Peter visited Rome, but assigns the object of his journey thither. The apostle, whom he designates as τὸν καρτερὸν καὶ μέγαν τῶν ἀποστόλων, τὸν ἀρετῆς ἕνεκα τῶν λοιπῶν ἁπάντων προήγορον, was "sent on," he says, "by divine foreknowledge to Rome, to vanquish Simon Magus, and to be a light and saving doctrine to souls in the West" (Migne, Series Graeca, xx. 170–2). This statement is repeated by a somewhat later writer, Cyril (bishop of Jerusalem, 351–86), who, in his Catachesis (bk. vi. c. 15), refers to Peter and Paul as "ecclesiae praesules," and describes their victory over Simon Magus at Rome (Migne, S. G. xxxiii. 362).

The relevancy of these traditions to our inquiry becomes apparent when we add, that they are regarded by certain critics as not only in themselves devoid of any historical basis, but as indicating the source from whence sprung the whole story of Peter's presence and martyrdom in Rome. According to Lipsius, the origin of this story is to be found in certain doubtful or spurious writings which he respectively classifies (α) as Ebionite or Jewish-Christian sources, (β) the Catholic or anti-Judaistic sources, (γ) certain Gnostic Acta, extant only in fragments.[d] Of these the first are now represented by the Clementine Homilies (ed. Lagarde, 1865), which are considered to belong to the second half of the 2nd century, and by the Clementine Recognitions (ed. Gersdorf, 1838), which are referred to the period A.D. 212–230. With respect to the relative antiquity of these two treatises some difference of opinion exists, but there appears to be little doubt that one of them is derived from the other, and that the latter in turn is founded upon yet earlier treatises known as the Κηρύγματα Πέτρου and Περίοδοι Πέτρου (Hilgenfeld, Nov. Test. &c. iv. 32; Lipsius, Die Quellen d. röm. Petrussage, p. 14).

The Catholic or anti-Judaistic sources are mainly represented by the Πράξεις Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου (ed. Thilo, Acta Petri et Pauli, i. and ii. 1837–8; Tischendorf, Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, 1851), a collection extant in three different recensions, and not supposed to belong to a period anterior to the 5th century (Lipsius, u. s. pp. 52–4). It stands, however, in close connexion with two earlier productions, a certain Πράξεις Παύλου and a Κήρυγμα Πέτρου, which, in the opinion of Lipsius, "breathe the religious atmosphere of the 2nd century." Of these the former is referred to by Origen (de Princip. i. 2, 3), and appears (Hilgenfeld, u. s. iv. 68–73) to have been held in high esteem in the church, and to have been regarded by many as of canonical authority. By Eusebius, however (E. H. iii. 25), it is included among the spurious writings (νόθοι) along with the Shepherd of Hermas, the Epistle of Barnabas, and the Apocalypse of St. John [APOST. CONST. p. 120]. The relation of the latter treatise, the Κήρυγμα, which exists only in fragments (Hilgenfeld, u. s. iv. 52–67), to the former is not clearly ascertainable, but both expressly contravene a still earlier tradition, said to have taken its origin in Galat. ii. 11–17, of a permanent hostility between the two apostles. The Πράξεις Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου, which must be regarded as essentially a compilation from these two earlier treatises, is explicit in its language on this point: "We have believed, and do believe, that even as God separates not the two great lights which he has made" (the sun and the moon), "even so He permits not you to separate Peter from Paul or Paul from Peter" (Tischendorf, u. s. c. 5).

The theory which Lipsius has endeavoured to establish—that all the extant sources of the Petrine legend may be traced back to a yet older Ebionite version of the Acta S. Petri as to their common and sole origin, and that this Judaistic treatise forms accordingly the sole basis for the tradition of St. Peter's presence in Rome—has been disputed by many eminent scholars, among whom Hilgenfeld (see Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie, 1872–1878) has given a full discussion of the question. Any attempt to summarize these arguments is beyond the scope of the present article; and equally so is any examination of the startling theory of Lipsius, that the passage above referred to in the Epistle to the Galatians became the origin of "eine immer weiter ausgesponnene Sagenbildung," which found a natural conclusion in the tradition of a final and decisive contest between the true and the false apostle at Rome.

Against the theory of the two apostles' joint residence and labours, the fact that none of the epistles written by Paul from Rome (Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians, and Philemon), though conveying many salutations, contain any allusion to Peter, presents an argument of no great weight, especially if we assume, as certain evidence suggests, that their labours were bestowed on two distinct churches. If, therefore, it be proposed to assign Peter's arrival in Rome to a date subsequent to that of Paul, and also to the composition of the epistles written by the latter during his first imprisonment (at the same time accepting the various statements with respect to Paul's second imprisonment, and a renewal of his labours in the West during an interval of some years), the evidence in favour of such a theory is strong, if not conclusive. The allusion to Silvanus, the friend of St. Paul, in the first epistle of Peter (v. 12), and that to Paul himself in the second (iii. 15), admit of a far more natural interpretation when understood as written from Rome, at a time when the two apostles were labouring there contemporaneously, if not conjointly, in connexion, however, with two distinct communities; the labours of Peter being bestowed on a Judaizing church, those of Paul on a church composed exclusively of Gentiles. Even the tradition respecting Simon Magus, amid much that is pure invention, probably points to a real attempt at the introduction of heretical doctrine. He is said to have been a supporter of the heresy of the Patripassians, and the church of Rome, from the earliest times of which we have authentic record, is distinguished by its uncompromising opposition to heterodoxy in every shape.

(II.) The evidence for the succession from the time of St. Peter.—The difficulty which attaches to a belief in the tradition concerning Peter extends also to that respecting his earliest successors. According to the lists accepted as authoritative by the Romish church, the succession was preserved unbroken, the duration of each bishop's tenure of office being accurately known to us, not only in years, but even in months and days. On the other hand, a critical investigation of these lists, and a comparison of them with other and earlier sources of information, disclose considerable discrepancies with respect not only to the periods of office, but also to the simple order of succession.

The original sources for the chronology of the bishops of Rome during the first three centuries may be divided into two classes:

(A.) The Greek or Eastern lists.

(B.) The Latin or Western lists.

This classification is not indeed altogether free from objection, for the lists in the first class were undoubtedly derived from Roman sources, while those in the second class were, in all probability, originally drawn up in Greek, which, up to the middle of the 3rd century, was the official language of the Roman church. It is, however, to be observed that the Greek lists are distinguished by certain points of difference, which appear to indicate that they were transcribed from those of the west prior to the time when the official lists of the Roman church were adopted in their final form.

In the following summary of the main facts concerning these different sources, and the conclusions that have been drawn from them, the Roman episcopal succession will be more easily considered if divided into two portions: (α) that extending from Peter to Urban (ending A.D. 230); (β) that from Pontianus to Liberius (A.D. 230–352). After the time of Liberius no difficulties present themselves that here call for discussion, and for the purpose of the present article it will be sufficient to limit our consideration almost entirely to the earlier of the foregoing divisions.

(A.) The first list of which we have any knowledge is that which was known to Hegesippus, who in his visits to the apostolic churches collected information concerning the succession of the bishops from the time of the Apostles, with the design of thereby establishing the evidence of an unimpeachable tradition of Christian doctrine. His statement with respect to Rome is, that during his residence in that city he made out a list of the episcopal succession down to the time of Anicetus,—γενόμενος δὲ ἐν Ῥώμῃ, διαδοχὴν ἐποιησάμην μέχρις Ἀνικήτου (Eusebius, H. E. iv. 22; the conjectural reading of Savile, of διατριβὴν for διαδοχὴν, is rejected by the best authorities; see Heinichen's note ad loc.). This list is no longer extant, but we learn from Eusebius that, according to Hegesippus, Anicetus was the immediate predecessor of Soter,—a statement, as we shall hereafter see, of considerable importance, inasmuch as the early Latin lists uniformly place Anicetus before Pius, and Pius before Soter.

The list contained in Irenaeus (adv. Haer. bk. iii. c. 3) represents Peter and Paul as the joint founders of the church at Rome, and they, it is added, "Lino episcopatum administrandae eccle-dise tradiderunt" (ed. Harvey, ii. 10). The names, as preserved in the original Greek, are as follows:—

οἱ ἁγίοι ἀπόστολοι Πέτρος καὶ Παῦλος ἀφ' ἑαυτῶν ἀπεστάλκασιν.

1. Λῖνος.
2. Ἀνένκλητος.
3. Κλήμης.
4. Εὐάρεστος.
5. Ἀλέξανδρος.
6. Ξύστος.
7. Τελέσφορος, ὃς καὶ ἐνδόξως ἐμαρτύρησεν.
8. Ὑγῖνος.
9. Πίος.
10. Ἀνίκητος.
11. Σώτηρ.
12. Ἐλεύθερος.

It may fairly be assumed that this list represents the official record of the succession accepted at Rome in the time of Eleutherus, the contemporary of Irenaeus.

Eusebius has transmitted to us a double list,—that in the Chronicon (bk. ii.), and that in his Ecclesiastical History; of these the former is contained not in the version by Jerome, but in the Armenian translation. It extends from Peter to Gaius, the last bishop before the Diocletian persecution, and includes the periods of office:—

Here, among the more important inaccuracies, will be noted the insertion of the name of Agrippinus of Alexandria, apparently by pure oversight, as twelfth in succession; the repetition of the name of Linus in the second place instead of that of Anencletus; the omission of the name of Eutychianus in the twenty-sixth place. The duration of Peter's episcopate, it will be noticed, is given as twenty instead of five-and-twenty years.

The following table, taken from Lipsius (p. 14) exhibits the chief points of difference between the foregoing list and that in the Ecclesiastical History down to the time of Urban. Here a certain affinity is undeniable, as in the enumeration from Clemens to Soter the only point of divergence is that in the Chronicon a year more is assigned to the episcopate of Xystus than is allowed in the E. H. On the other hand, the differences in the first four places and those that occur after Eleutherus appear to place it almost beyond doubt that the two lists were derived from entirely distinct sources. The assigned imperial years of the two lists are altogether at variance.

The version of the Chronicon by Jerome, which is now generally admitted to be much more than a mere translation, exhibits even in the list of the Roman bishops considerable deviations. The only two dates which exactly agree, i. e. are the same in the patriarchal and the Christian eras, and also in the imperial year, are those given under Anencletus and under Anteros and Fabian; the imperial years are, in fact, derived from the Ecclesiastical History.

(B.) Among the Latin lists is the Catalogus Liberianus, contained in the compilation of the chronicler of the year 354, and extending to the bishopric of Liberius. It has been edited by Mommsen (Abhandlungen der philolog.-histor. Classe der königl. sächs. Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften, vol. i. (1850), pp. 582–5, and 634–7), to whom we are indebted for the first correct text, and also for original research with respect to its sources and compilation. The Catalogus Liberianus is the most ancient source of the Liber Pontificalis, and, according to Mommsen, is in turn derived from a yet older list, that originally contained in the Chronicon of Hippolytus, bishop of Portus, a work to which the chronicler of the year 354 is to be found having recourse in other portions of his treatise. In the Chronicon of Hippolytus the list itself is no longer extant, but the heading, "Nomina Episcoporum Romae et quis quotannis praefuit," is alone preserved. A comparison of the Catalogus Liberianus with that given by Augustine (Epist. 53; Migne, xxxiii. 195) and that in Optatus (de Schism. Donat. ii. 3) seems conclusively to prove that all three lists preserve essentially the same tradition, the main discrepancies being (1) that neither Augustine nor Optatus makes mention of "Cletus;" (2) that the Catalogus Liberianus (as known to us from existing MSS.) omits the names of Anicetus, Eleutherus, and Zephyrinus; while (3) in Optatus the name of Alexander is (by a palpable blunder) left out before that of Sixtus and put in the place of that of Eleutherus.

The omissions in the Catalogus Liberianus are, however, clearly shewn to be owing to carelessness on the part of transcribers or some such cause, by corresponding gaps in the consular dates between Telesphorus and Hyginus, Pius and Soter, and Soter and Victor: and this evidence, taken in conjunction with the fact that the Catalogus Felicianus (the oldest existing version of the Liber Pontificalis) which was undoubtedly derived from the Catalogus Liberianus, contains missing names, sufficiently justifies the conclusion of Mommsen that they originally existed in the latter list.

On comparing the following lists with those before given, we see that the lists from Augustine and Optatus support the Eastern omission of Cletus. In the opinion of Lipsius, these two writers have preserved to us a more ancient form of the Western tradition, and it would consequently appear to be a legitimate conclusion that the insertion of Cletus in the Catalogus Liberianus is an interpolation; Cletus and Anacletus, in all probability, representing one and the same person. Of this, the statement of the author of the treatise against the Theodotians, who wrote in Rome during the episcopate of Zephyrinus, that Victor was the thirteenth bishop ἀπὸ Πέτρου (Eusebius, H. E. v. 28) affords a strong corroboration. Similarly, Jerome, while referring to a difference of tradition with respect to the order of succession, knows nothing whatever of "Cletus:"—"Clemens, de quo apostolus Paulus ad Philippenses scribens, ait, 'Cum Clemente et caeteris cooperatoribus meis quorum nomina scripta sunt in libro vitae' (Phil. iv. 3), quartus post Petrum Romae episcopus: siquidem secundus Linus fuit, tertius Anacletus, tametsi plerique Latinorum secundum post Petrum apostolum putent fuisse Clementem" (de Viris Illust. c. xv.; Migne, xxiii. 854). On the other hand, Augustine and Optatus differ from the Eastern lists in placing Anicetus before Pius, while the chronicler of the year 354 altogether omits Anicetus.

The following table (p. 1657) affords a comparative view of four lists which appear, beyond all reasonable doubt, to have been in existence in the 4th century, with such emendations as, in the opinion of Lipsius and other critics, are called for and justified by the conclusions derived from a critical study of the texts. These lists are as follows: (1) The Catalogus Liberianus; (2) The list in the Chronicon of Eusebius; (3) That derived from his Ecclesiastical History; (4) That used by Jerome. Of these, (1) and (2) appear to be derived from independent sources, while (3) and (4) shew unmistakable signs of a common origin.*

* A fifth and a sixth list, the former of no independent value, and the latter (the Leonine) of the time of Leo the Great, compiled from lists (1) and (2), may also be consulted in Lipsius (Chronologie, &c., pp. 28–76).

Into the various difficulties arising from the discrepancies between the different lists in the enumeration from Sixtus down to Liberius, it is impossible here to enter. The chief difficulty is that which relates to the succession and the duration of the episcopates of Pius and Anicetus. On referring to the three lists above given (the Cat. Lib., that from Augustine, and that from Optatus), it will be seen that while the name of Anicetus is wanting in the first list, in the other two it is placed before that of Pius. Mommsen, in his restoration of the text of the Catalogus Liberianus, also assigns to Anicetus the place immediately preceding Pius, and gives ann. iiii. m. iiii. d. iii. as his period of office—i.e., from the consulship of Gallicanus and Vetus (A.D. 150) to that of Praesens and Rufinus (A.D. 153). Lipsius, however, relying mainly on the Eastern lists and the authority of Hegesippus, does not hesitate in his attempted harmony (as above given) to place Anicetus after Pius, and to assign to him twelve years of office—the original Latin list, in his opinion, having become corrupted by a succession of errors of transcription, as follows:

Original Latin List.

Higinus, ann. iiii.
Pius, ann. xvi. (Euseb. xv.).
Anicetus, ann. xii. (Euseb. xi.).

(a.) Higinus, ann. iiii.
Anicetus, ann. xii.
Pius, ann. xvi.

(b.) Higinus . . . . [ann. iiii.].
. . . . ann. xii. Anicetus (noted in margin).
Pius, ann. xvi.

(c.)	(d.)
Higinus, ann. xii.	Higinus, ann. xii.
Anicetus, ann. iiii.	[Anicetus].
Pius, ann. xvi.	Pius, ann. xx.

Additional evidence of considerable importance as regards the relative duration of these two episcopates is presented in the fact that Polycarp visited Rome during the episcopate of Anicetus —according to one tradition, in the second year of that bishop's tenure of office (see Giesseler, I. i. 242; Robertson, Church Hist. i. 29; Neander, i. 407; Eusebius, Eccl. Hist. iv. 14; v. 24; Migne, Series Graeca, xx. 193). This, if we accept the Eusebian chronology, in the Eccles. Hist., would be about A.D. 158–159; while according to the Catalogus Liberianus (as restored by Mommsen) it would fall in the year 151—a much earlier date than is conjectured for that of Polycarp's visit by any writer of authority. The most recent investigation of the date of Polycarp's martyrdom, that of Mr. Waddington, may be regarded, however, as affording conclusive proof that it must be assigned to the year 155 or 156 (Mémoire sur la Chronologie du Rhéteur Aelius Aristides, in Mémoires de l'Acad. des Inscrip. xxvi. (1867); see also his Fastes Asiatiques in Lebas and Waddington's Asie Mineure). Such a conclusion, moreover, is in perfect harmony with the Eusebian chronology as corrected by Lipsius; for if we assign to Anicetus twelve years of office, terminating with the year 167, and deduct from this date eleven years, it gives the year 156 as that of his second year of office —the traditional year of Polycarp's martyrdom. It only remains to be added that Waddington's conclusions have been substantially accepted by Renan, Hilgenfeld, and Lipsius, and, although assailed by Wieseler (Christenverfolgungen der Caesaren, 1878), have been triumphantly vindicated by Lipsius (Jahrb. für protest. Theol. 1878, 4, p. 751 sq.).

Into the minor difficulties attaching to the different lists in the enumeration from Sixtus (or Xystus) to Liberius (after which time no doubt of much importance attaches to the accuracy of the official records) it is unnecessary that we should here enter. With respect to the earlier period, in which both the main interest and the chief difficulty centre, we may perhaps conclude that authentic tradition is wanting until we reach the name of Xystus, or at the earliest that of Alexander. Of certain special reasons for caution in accepting the prevalent tradition, we shall have occasion to speak at the close of this article; but while admitting to their fullest extent the arguments which suggest the necessity for such caution, it may be said that they cannot be regarded as sufficient to invalidate the historical existence of the characters whose names are recorded as those of Peter's immediate successors. "These names," says Lipsius, [1] The duration of Pius's tenure of office is given in the text of the Cat. Lib. as ann. xx. m. iiii. d. xxi.; this however is contradicted by the dates there given of the consular years of his accession and decease, and is also at variance with II., III., and IV. On these grounds Lipsius considers himself justified in altering the period to sixteen years.

"are those of men who occupied a conspicuous position in the church at Rome in the first and second generations after the apostles. Linus, referred to in 2 Tim. iv. 21 as among the circle of Paul's friends during his imprisonment, belongs to the former, and Anencletus, or Cletus, Aristus or Evaristus, to the latter generation."

(II.) DEVELOPMENT OF THE CONCEPTION OF THE OFFICE: (1) in relation to other churches; (2) in relation to the civil power.

(i) In relation to other churches.

It will now be of service to notice some of the principal facts which illustrate the gradual acceptance by the church at large of the theory of the Roman supremacy; and here it cannot but be looked upon as of peculiar significance, that in the earliest times the history of the church at Rome appears involved in the greatest obscurity. From the date of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans (A.D. 58) up to the episcopate of Victor (A.D. 193–202), its annals are a blank, save when some incidental allusion in the controversies of the time reveals an occasional fact.

The growing importance of the bishopric is however clearly shown by the saying of the emperor Decius, preserved by Cyprian, to the effect that he would sooner hear of the appearance of a rival to his throne, than of the appointment of a new bishop to the Roman see (Epist. ad Antonian.; Migne, iii. 774). The theory set forth by Cyprian himself of the essential unity of the church, may perhaps justly be regarded as tending to support that of the primacy of the bishop of Rome. He speaks, for example (Epist. 55, ad Cornelium), of the "chair of Peter," and "the principal church of Rome, from whence the priestly unity derived its origin"—"ad Petri cathedram atque ad ecclesiam principalem, unde unitas sacerdotalis exorta est, ... litteras ferre." This language, however, when compared with other passages (Epp. 7, 52, 57, 72: Epist. ad Q. de Haereticis Baptizandis; de Unitate Eccles. c. 4) seems, at most, only to prove that he regarded the bishop of Rome as "primus inter pares;" he speaks for example (Epist. 52) of pope Cornelius as "collega noster," and distinctly affirms that the other apostles were invested with an equal share of honour and power with Peter,—"pari consortio praediti et honoris et potestatis" (de Unitate,[g] c. 4). The phraseology of the bishops of Rome themselves, when addressing other bishops, is confirmatory of this view. In the 4th, and earlier part of the 5th, century we find "Julius . . . fratribus" (Mansi, ii. 1211); "Liberius fratri Eusebio" (iii. 204, 207, 209); "Liberius episc. dil. fratri Eusebio" (ib. 205); "dil. fratribus et coepiscopis nostris Liberius urbis Romae episcopus" (ib. iii. 208); "Zosimus episcopus urbis Romae Hesychio episcopo Salonitano," "Leo episcopus urbis Romae," "Felix episc. s. ecclesiae cath. urbis Romae Acacio," "Gelasius Romanae ecclesiae episcopus," &c. In these latter quotations the limitation implied in the addition "urbis Romae" is of no small significance.

With the fourth century, the evidence that favours the Roman theory becomes more abundant and more decisive. Much of it, however, relates to the technical question of jurisdiction and will be found under APPEAL; much, again, to those relations of the bishop of Rome to the general episcopate, which it has been found more convenient to treat in the fourth division of the present article; our enquiry here will consequently be limited to ascertaining the extent to which the authority of the bishop of Rome was admitted by the church at large in connexion with the definition of doctrine and the maintenance of discipline.

At the council of Nicaea the first signatures are those of Hosius, Vito, and Vincentius, the latter two being further described as "presbyteri Romani," subscribing "pro venerabili viro papa et episcopo nostro sancto Silvestro;" and, if it were possible to accept the statement of Gelasius, Hosius himself (the eminent bishop of Corduba and president of the council) was really the legate of Sylvester on this occasion: ἐπέχων τὸν τόπον τοῦ τῆς μεγίστης Ῥώμης ἐπισκόπου (Mansi, ii. 692; Gelasius, Hist. Conc. Nicaeni, ib. ii. 805). This theory indeed is still accepted by Catholic writers (Hefele, Conciliengesch. i. 24–38; von Schulte, Concilien, p. 65), but is rejected by Milman, Greenwood, Robertson, and others, on the ground of apparent interpolation and confusion; for at the council of Sardica, eighteen years later (A.D. 343) we find the subscriptions of Hosius and Vicentius appearing in the same places, but without any addition to indicate that they attended in a legatine capacity from Rome.[h]

The alleged canons of the council of Sardica undoubtedly conferred on Julius, bishop of Rome, the power of hearing appeals; but the fact that the canons appear to have been unknown to the church for many years after (Greenwood, i. 155), and that when adduced by Zosimus (A.D. 417–8), their authority was denied by the African bishops (Milman, Lat. Christianity, bk. ii. c. 4), is strongly against their genuineness (Gieseler I. ii. 199). And even if their genuineness were admitted, it is still most probable (though we find Sozomen and Socrates in the following century representing their scope as general) that they implied a departure from the rule of the church, and were designed to have effect during the episcopate of Julius only (Baur, Christliche Kirche, ii. 245).

With respect both to Sylvester and to Julius we have, moreover, other evidence which distinctly contravenes a contrary assumption. A letter addressed to the former by the council of Nicaea, asks for a confirmation of the council's decision by a synod of all the bishops of Rome: "episcopos totius vestrae apostolicae urbis in unum convenire, vestrumque habere concilium . . . . ut firmetur nostra sanctimonia" (Mansi, ii. 719); and similarly Julius, when he summoned the accusers of Athanasius to Rome, and was met by the demand why he assumed to write alone, replied that the views he upheld were not his alone, [g] The passages in this chapter which assign to Peter a supremacy among the other apostles do not occur in the earlier MSS., and are attributed by Gieseler (Kirchengesch. i. 364) to Romish transcribers; it is certain that they involve the writer in a contradiction of himself.

[h] An additional proof of a certain tampering with the text is furnished by the statement of the Libellus Synodicus, which gives a third version of the function filled by Vito and Vincentius, as that of the presidents of the Council: ἦσαν ἐξάρχων προκαθεζόμενοι, Βίτων καὶ Βικέντιος πρεσβύτεροι, τὸν τόπον ἐπέχοντες Σιλβέστρου τοῦ πάππα Ῥώμης καὶ τοῦ διαδόχου αὐτοῦ Ἰουλίου" (Mansi, ii. 747).

but those of all Italy and all her bishops: "nam tametsi solus sim, qui scripsi, non meam tamen solius sententiam, sed omnium Italorum, et omnium in his regionibus episcoporum scripsi" (ib. ii. 1230).

Even so late as the time of Innocent I., Chrysostom, when entreating the interposition of the Roman pontiff against his rival Theophilus, appeals not only to Rome but to the collective episcopate of Italy,—κύριοι μου τιμιώτατοι καὶ ὁμοθύμαδον (Migne, S.G. iii. 534).

It is however undeniable that, as already observed, a great accession of influence, if not of directly admitted authority, was gained by the see of Rome as the result of the policy of Julius and his successors in connexion with the Athanasian controversy. The bishop of Rome was from that time regarded as the foremost defender of orthodox doctrine; and the discharge of such a function at a time when, according to the assertion of Pacianus, heresies were so rife that their bare enumeration would fill an "immense volume" (Migne, xiii. 1053), was in itself an inestimable service to the church. Yet, notwithstanding, the fourth century passed away leaving the Roman supremacy still unrecognised. Of this the implicit testimony of Jerome affords almost conclusive proof. In one of his most notable letters (ad Rusticum; Migne, Patrol. xxii. 932), he takes occasion to enforce, by various analogies, the expediency of admitting a central and single authority. He adduces examples from the animal kingdom, from the imperial power, from the judicial power, from the military power, and from domestic rule, and finally goes on to say,—"singuli ecclesiarum episcopi, singuli archipresbyteri, singuli archidiaconi; et omnis ordo ecclesiasticus suis rectoribus nititur" (ib. 942), but, remarkably enough, makes no reference to the bishop of Rome.

Under Innocent I. the claim to supremacy was urged with fresh vigour and increased boldness of assertion. In a letter to Decentius, bishop of Eugubium, he says that the authority handed down from St. Peter is entitled to the obedience of all ("ab omnibus debere servari"), especially, he goes on to say, "when it is clear that throughout all Italy, Gaul, the Spains, Africa, and Sicily, together with the intermediate islands, no one founded churches save those whom the venerable apostle Peter and his successors ordained to the priestly office" (Coustant, i. 855; Mansi, iii. 1028), thus entirely ignoring the labours of St. Paul in the West. Writing (about A.D. 415) to Alexander, bishop of Antioch, he claims precedence for Rome over that see, as the city to which "the honour temporarily conferred on Antioch (the presidency of St. Peter) was transferred, and in which it was consummated," "quod illa in transitu meruit ista susceptum apud se consummatumque gauderet" (Mansi, iii. 1054).

We may perhaps infer with Milman (Lat. Christianity, bk. ii. c. 4) that the Roman supremacy was, by this time, generally admitted in Italy, for we find Leo I. writing to the bishop of Aquileia (which see was not included in the Roman diocese) as one subject to his immediate jurisdiction (Migne, Patrol. liv. 590). In Africa, however, in the time of Zosimus (A.D. 417–8), the independence of the episcopate is amply attested by its condemnation of "transmarina judicia" as a lawful court of appeal for presbyters in that province (APPEAL, p. 129). That the ability of Leo, aided by the decree of Valentinian, would have overcome this spirit there can be little doubt; but in the year before Leo's accession Carthage was taken by Genseric, and the province became subject to Arian domination.

It was during the pontificate of Leo (A.D. 440–61) that, by general admission, the Petrine prerogative first received full and distinct enunciation. As already stated, the decree of Valentinian III. must be looked upon as virtually the act of Leo, who claimed that he and his successors derived from St. Peter a supreme if not immediate jurisdiction over the whole church: "per omnes ecclesias cura nostra distenditur, exigente hoc a nobis Domino, qui apostolicae dignitatis beatissimo apostolo Petro primatum fidei suae remunerationе commisit" (Epist. ad Episc. Illyr. Mansi, v. 1234; cf. Epist. ad Dioscurum, ib. v. 1240). Of the exclusive character of this claim, his language in his sermon on the fourth anniversary of his pontificate leaves no doubt: "et tamen de toto mundo unus Petrus eligitur, qui et universarum gentium vocationi et omnibus apostolis cunctisque ecclesiae patribus praeponatur, ut quamvis in populo Dei multi sacerdotes sint multique pastores, omnes tamen proprie regat Petrus quos principaliter regit et Christus" (Migne, Patrol. liv. 16).

Though, after the invasion of Genseric, the political power had lapsed almost completely into Leo's hands, the prestige resulting therefrom is trented by him as altogether subordinate: "Roma, quae tamen per apostolici sacerdotii principatum amplior facta est arce religionis quam solio potestatis" (De Vocatione Gent. bk. ii. c. 6); "Civitas sacerdotalis et regia per sacram beati Petri sedem caput orbis effecta, latius praesidens religione divina quam dominatione terrena" (quoted by Neander, tr. Torrey, iii. 226).

Yet notwithstanding the unlimited jurisdiction claimed by Leo, it seems probable that even he regarded his powers as visitatorial in their character, to be exercised beyond the Roman diocese only when occasion called for interference; and we may perhaps assent to the view that "he would himself have been shocked at that unmitigated religious despotism for which his name and his authority were vouched by his successors" (Greenwood, Cath. Petri, i. 437).

Under Hilary (A.D. 461–7), Leo's successor, the claims ratified by the decree of Valentinian were pressed still more unreservedly in the provinces; and his celebrated letter to the Gallic bishops embodies little less than a claim not only to universal, but also to immediate legislative authority in the church (see Thiel, Rom. Pont. Epist. i. 141–6).

How successfully these claims were urged, may be seen when we compare the language of Avitus of Vienne, at the commencement of the 6th century, with that of Hilary of Arles. In his letter to the Palmary synod (A.D. 502) he ascribes to pope Symmachus superiority to all earthly tribunals, and says that he can be judged only by God; he also distinctly implies the universal character of the Roman episcopacy: "At si Papa Urbis vocatur in dubium, episcopatus jam videbitur non episcopus vacillare" (Migne, lix. 248–9).

In the pontificate of Hormisdas (A.D. 514–23) a further advance is discernible in the successful effort made to include the East (which had never accepted the decree of Valentinian III.) in the enunciation of the foregoing theory; and the form of confession subscribed by John, the patriarch of Constantinople, on the return of the Eastern church to orthodoxy, although evasive in expression, was regarded as recording a signal victory for Rome: "Sanctissimas Dei ecclesias, id est, superioris vestrae et novellae illius Romae, unam esse accipio; illam sedem apostoli Petri et istius augustae civitatis unam esse definio" (ib. lxiv. 444). We find accordingly John I. (A.D. 523–6) refusing to hold intercourse with Epiphanius, the patriarch of Constantinople, until his right to take precedence had been recognized: προτραπεὶς ὑπὸ Ἐπιφανίου τοῦ πατριάρχου οὐ κατεδέξατο ἕως προεκάθισεν τοῦ Ἐπιφανίου ὁ Ῥώμης (Theophanes, Chronographia, Corp. Hist. Byzant. XXVI. i. 261). In the same spirit Pelagius II. (A.D. 578–90), while denouncing the assumption by John of Constantinople of the title of "oecumenical patriarch," asserted in the most unequivocal language the universal primacy of the see of Rome: "cum generalium synodorum convocandi auctoritas apostolicae sedi beati Petri singulari privilegio sit tradita" (Migne, lxxii. 739).

John, however, so far from discontinuing the title, again subscribed himself thus in the letters in which he acknowledged the formal notification of the accession of Gregory the Great. This drew from Gregory (A.D. 590–604) a still more emphatic condemnation of what he designated as "a haughty and damnable distinction;" "moreover," he adds, "it is known to all that the apostle Peter is the chief of the universal church. Paul, Andrew, John—what were they other than chiefs of particular churches?" (Migne, lxxvii. 743).

The remarkable extension given by Gregory the Great to the power of the pontificate will be noticed under the two divisions with which it is most closely associated; (1), the relations of Rome to the episcopal order; (2), the extension of the church's patrimonium. In the West we have evidence that important exceptions continued to exist to the recognition of the pope as universal metropolitan. In Spain, it is observed by Baxmann (Politik der Päpste, i. 116), that the only instance of Gregory's assertion of such jurisdiction (see infra, p. 1673) was at Malaga, where the imperial government still held its ground. In support of the conclusion to which this fact plainly points, it may be noted that the language of Gregory's illustrious contemporary, Isidore of Seville, is singularly wanting in any such recognition of the Roman prerogatives as the papal assumptions of the preceding century might appear to demand. Isidore admits indeed (ad Eugen. Episc. Tolet.; Migne, lxxxiii. 574), that the "potestas" and "dignitas" conferred on Peter, and transmitted from him to all bishops, were given "specialius Romano antistiti;" but in a more formal treatise (de Officiis Eccl. ii. v. 5) he expressly affirms that all bishops are to be regarded as equal, just as the other apostles were equal to St. Peter, "siquidem et caeteri apostolorum cum Petro par consortium honoris et potestatis effecti sunt . . . quibus decedentibus successerunt episcopi, qui sunt constituti per totum mundum in sedibus apostolorum." Similarly in his Origines (VII. xi.) he assigns "sedes apostolicae" to patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops alike: "Patriarcha Graeca lingua summus pater, quia primum, id est apostolicum, tenet locum" . . . Archiepiscopus Graece summus episcoporum, tenet enim vicem apostolicum," &c.

Among those Western nations which were indebted for their conversion to the direct agency of Rome, we perceive, however, an increased and not unnatural disposition to acknowledge a filial rather than a fraternal relation to the parent see; while after Gregory's death, the course of events—the subjugation of Syria and Egypt by the Saracens, with the involved loss of Jerusalem to Christendom, and the extinction of the churches of Antioch and Alexandria—powerfully contributed to the establishment of the papal autocracy. In England, from the time of the council of Whitby (A.D. 664), the Gregorian traditions, as enforced by Augustine, Theodorus, Wilfrid, and others, were readily accepted, though a strong spirit of resistance to the Roman claims to immediate jurisdiction is from time to time discernible. The British church appears to have almost refused to regard the English churches as Christian (Bede, E. H. ii. 20). The representatives of the English church taxed their antagonists, in return, with spurning "in tyrannous pertinacity the tradition of the Roman church" (see letter of Aldhelm to to Geraint; Bright, Early English Church Hist. pp. 419–423). From England this teaching was in turn diffused over Frankland. In this latter country, however, more than one important change in the relations to the papacy is to be noted. From the time of Caesarius of Arles (A.D. 500) the churches in Aquitania and Burgundy, converted from Arianism to Catholicism, appear to have assumed towards the Roman see an attitude of unquestioning deference. Of this the frequent acceptance of the pallium (infra, p. 1673), as well as other evidence, is sufficient proof. But in Neustria and Austrasia, among the purely Frankish population, this was not equally the case. The Merovingian kings usurped the popular rights in appointing bishops to vacant sees (Guizot, Essais, pp. 192–3); and the relations which the genius of Gregory the Great succeeded in establishing (Mansi, x. 34, 293; Sirmond, i. 420, 454, 456) were not sustained. After the death of queen Brunehaut the intercourse with Rome appears to have come to an end. The council of Paris (A.D. 615), which restored the canonical form of episcopal elections, makes no reference to the papal authority. Guizot observes that from the death of Gregory the Great to the time of Gregory II. (A.D. 604–715), not a single document exists which can be cited as proof of intercommunication between the rulers of Frankish Gaul and the papacy (Civil. en France, ii. 235). It was the great result of the mission of St. Boniface that it restored the spirit of allegiance to Rome in yet more than its original force; and the principle which he distinctly enunciated of the duty of referring all difficulties of an important character to the see of Rome for solution, marks an all-important era in European church history: "eodem modo quo nos Romana ecclesia ordinatos cum sacramento constrinxit, ut si sacerdotes vel plebes a lege Dei deviasse viderim et corrigere non potuerim, fideliter semper Sedi Apostolicae et Vicario sancti Petri ad emendandum indicaverim; sic enim, ni fallor, omnes episcopi debent metr politano, et ipse Romano Pontifici, si quid de corrigendis populis apud eos impossibile est notum facere" (Migne, lxxxix. 764).

At this point we enter upon the commencement of a remarkable fusion between the political and ecclesiastical aspects of our subject, which may be reserved for further comment until towards the close of the outline relating to the development of the conception of the papacy.

(ii) In relation to the Civil Power.—The relations of the State to the Christian community under Constantine the Great and his successors were largely determined by motives of policy. We find Constantius, whose conception of Christianity was extremely defective, avowing his belief that the whole State was more effectually aided by "religion" than by all the services and endeavours of his subjects, and declaring it to be his anxious desire "to rejoice in and to be exalted by the faith." (Cod. Theod. bk. xvi. tit. ii.; ed. Hänel. p. 1490.) Similarly, Valentinian III., in the edict already quoted, speaks of the favour of heaven as chiefly to be gained by the Christian "faith and religion." According to Godefroy (Novellae, p. 49) the terms "religion" and "faith," as here and elsewhere employed by the Roman lawyers, are to be understood in a sense very different from that in which these terms were used by the church itself, and denoted simply the body of privileges ("privilegia ecclesiae" or πολιτεία ἐκκλησιαστική, as they were respectively termed, in the West and the East), conferred upon Christianity as a recognised organization by the State.

In such a compact with the new religion, the emperors, with whatever admixture of higher motives, undoubtedly saw their own political gain; and in like manner the bishops of Rome, in their efforts to assert their jurisdiction over the whole church, discerned a similar advantage in a coalition with the imperial power. This advantage was not, however, to be gained without a corresponding loss of independence and ecclesiastical freedom. "The laws of the Christian emperors," says an able writer, "from Constantine to Leo the philosopher, manifest the absolute subordination of the spiritual to the temporal authority. The minutiae of church government, the relations of the clergy among themselves and to the state, their duties, their morals, and their actions, monastic regulations, the suppression of heresies—all the details, in fact, of ecclesiastical life, internal and external, are prescribed with the assurance of unquestioned power, and with a care which shews how large a portion of the imperial attention was devoted to the management of the church." (H. C. Lea, Studies in Church History, p. 16.) At Rome, however, as regards the chief pontiffs, this language must be accepted with considerable qualification. Exactly in proportion as the imperial power declined in vigour, they are to be seen assuming a bolder policy towards both the church and the state. The removal of the imperial court to Ravenna, under Honorius, was followed by the new assumptions that mark the pontificate of Innocent I. The feebleness of Valentinian III. was in some measure compensated by the vigour of Leo.

So long as the Western empire continued to exist, the traditions of papal Rome were those of at least professed deference to the temporal power; but when, in 476, the Western succession came to an end, the language and demeanour of the popes towards the emperors of the East were characterised by a different tone. A comparison of the letters of Gelasius (A.D. 492–6) with those of Leo I. illustrates this difference. The latter pontiff invariably addresses the emperor with great deference, and admits in the most explicit manner the imperial prerogative in relation to the church. To Theodosius II. he writes, with reference to the assembling of a general council at Rome, "clementia vestra concedat" (Mansi, vi. 53); to Marcian, "differri ad opportunius tempus sacerdotalem synodum juberetis" (ib. vi. 83). Gelasius, on the other hand, while admitting the Roman sovereignty of Anastasius, unflinchingly asserts the supremacy of the church itself in all matters of doctrine. The tone of Symmachus (A.D. 498–514) is equally bold, "An quia imperator es, contra Petri niteris potestatem?" (Thiel, Epist. Rom. Pont. p. 703.)

During the ascendancy of the Gothic power in Italy (A.D. 476–553), the claims of its monarchs were restricted to the right of interference at the papal elections (see III. ii. "Election"). Theodoric the Great, indeed, proclaimed complete liberty of religious profession, "Religionem imperare non possumus, quia nemo cogitur ut credat invitus" (Cassiod. Variar. ii. 27; v. 37). The relations of the Greek emperors and the Gothic sovereigns are, however, justly characterised by Greenwood (Cath. Petri, ii. 125) as "of some moment to the progress of papal history," the imperial policy being directed towards an alliance with the pope, in order to gain assistance in its scheme for the re-annexation of Italy. John I. was received at Constantinople (A.D. 525) with distinguished honours; and to the suspicions thereby excited in the breast of Theodoric we may attribute his death in prison on his return to Italy. In the year 530, a decree of Justinian declared Constantinople to be supreme over all the churches, "Constantinopolitana ecclesia omnium aliarum est caput" (Just. Codex, i. tit. ii. 24, ed. Kriegel, p. 22); but in 534, on the eve of the expedition of Belisarius, an endeavour was made by the emperor to enlist the sympathies of John II. on his side, by a remarkable letter, wherein, after addressing the pontiff as "Sanctissimus Archiepiscopus almae urbis Romae et Patriarcha," he assures him that he has resolved to subject and unite all the clergy of the regions of the East to the Romish see, "Ideoque omnes sacerdotes universi orientalis tractus et subjicere et unire sedi vestrae sanctitatis properavimus" (ib. i. tit. i. ad. fin. ed. Kriegel, p. 13).

The selection of John I. as ambassador from Theodoric to the emperor, and that of Agapetus for a like commission by Theodotus, the Gothic monarch, in 535, are evidence of the growing importance of the papal office in relation to the civil power. After the imperial supremacy had been restored in Italy by the arms of Belisarius and Narses, the exarchs of Ravenna succeeded to the authority before wielded by the kings of the Ostrogoths, and the papal elections regularly awaited their confirmation (III. ii. "Election"). Rome herself descended to the second rank in Italy, and the treatment of Silverius (A.D. 536–8) and of Vigilius (A.D. 538–55) proves how completely the popes were now at the mercy of the emperor. Yet, notwithstanding, the Roman see still represented the highest and most influential authority among the Italians themselves, and the Pragmatic Sanction of Justinian (A.D. 554), which fixed the civil organization of Italy, was issued at the request of Vigilius (Gibbon, c. xliii.).

With the establishment of the Lombard supremacy, that of the Byzantine court was again reduced to little more than a shadow; and it may be regarded as the key to much of the state policy of Gregory the Great, that his chief aim was to extricate the papacy from the dangers by which it was menaced by these two powers. His aversion from the conquerors did not prevent him from gaining over Agilulph, the king of the Lombards, to the Catholic as opposed to the Arian interest (Paulus Diac. bk. vi. cc. 9 and 10). And though he continued to profess allegiance to the emperor, there can be no question that his sympathies with the empire were to a great extent estranged by the assumption by his rival at Constantinople of the title of "oecumenical patriarch." The relations which this pope sought to establish both with Frankland and with England stand in very close connexion with those existing between the papacy and the Lombard and Byzantine courts (Baur, Gesch. d. Kirche, ii. 251; Baxmann, Politik d. Päpste, i. 26).

The decrees of the Quinisext council (A.D. 691), of which the thirty-sixth canon was an endeavour to revive that theory of episcopal pre-eminence which regarded it as resting solely on a political foundation, and the efforts of Justinian II. to thrust them on the acceptance of the West, mark the last stage of interference on the part of the Eastern emperors with the papal power. In the pontificate of Gregory II. (A.D. 715–731) the dispute concerning image worship completed the rupture between East and West; the estates of the Roman see in Sicily and Calabria were confiscated by the emperor Leo; and although Gregory continued to profess a nominal allegiance to the emperor, it would appear that it was mainly from motives dictated by yet stronger feelings of animosity to the Lombards that he and his successors, to use the somewhat exaggerated expression of Gibbon (c. xlix.) "spared the relics of the Byzantine dominion" (Greenwood, ii. 481). Nothing, however, could exceed in plainness the terms in which Gregory repudiated the right of the emperor to interfere in questions of dogma, and maintained that the spheres of the imperial and papal authority were entirely distinct: "Scis imperator, sanctae ecclesiae dogmata non imperatorum esse, sed pontificum, quae tuto dogmatizari debent. Idcirco ecclesiis praepositi sunt pontifices a rei publicae negotiis abstinentes, et imperatores ergo similiter ab ecclesiasticis abstineant, et quae sibi commissa sunt, capessant" (Mansi, xii. 960). The significance of this passage is enhanced when we consider that it is from the pen of one whom Gibbon styles "the founder of the papal monarchy."

It is, however, to the relations of the see of Rome to the Lombard power that we must refer that alliance with the Frankish monarch which paved the way for the assertion of that very political power which Gregory II. professed to disclaim. "Placed between a heretic and a robber" (to use the expression of Bryce), the Roman pontiff fled for assistance to the Frank, and the appeal of Gregory III. to Charles Martel for aid against the Lombards marks the commencement of that new conjunction which resulted in the claims of mediaeval popedom. The title of "papa universalis" which Gregory I. had denounced as blasphemous, was claimed by his successors in the 8th century, and the aspiration to political influence which Gregory II. disavowed, grew, in the middle ages, into an assertion of political supremacy.

Other circumstances favoured these results. The Orbis Christianus no longer coincided with the Orbis Romanus, and the want of a bond of union between the nations of the West was painfully felt. This want the papacy could in a great measure supply; and the celibacy of the popes, and the elective character still preserved by their office, served to diminish the jealousy with which a line of hereditary rulers might have been regarded.

Under these circumstances, the appearance of Boniface in Frankland as the papal legate was attended with signal success, and was productive of results which can hardly be over-estimated in their importance. The "familiar" relations which this prelate had already entered into with Rome, the oath whereby he bound himself to perpetual fidelity to the supreme pontiff (Sirmond, i. 512), and the strenuous manner in which he upheld the theory of the Catholic unity, the duty of subjection on the part of the whole clergy to the successor of St. Peter, and the superiority of the pope to all earthly tribunals ("quia cunctos ipse judicaturus a nemine est judicandus") constitute a crisis in European history. (See Hefele, Conciliengesch. iii. 553–4; Labbe and Cossart, iii. 1925; Greenwood, Cath. Petri, ii. 361–71).

The main facts in relation to the compact with Pippin and Charles are stated elsewhere (see IV. iv. "Political Sovereignty"). It will be sufficient here to observe, that although the elective character of the papal office was preserved, the validity of each election, at least throughout the reign of Charles the Great, was entirely dependent on the sanction of the Frankish monarch, to whom the pope acknowledged a kind of feudal relation. We find, for instance, that when Leo III. announced his election to Charles, the latter, in reply, expressed his pleasure at receiving the assurance of humble obedience and the pledge of fidelity to the throne offered by the pontiff, "gavisi sumus seu in electionis unanimitate, seu in humilitatis vestrae obedientia et in promissionis ad nos fidelitate" (Carolina, ed. Jaffé, p. 354).

It is, however, at least questionable, whether the coronation of Charles at Rome (an event but imperfectly understood and very variously interpreted) was not, to a great extent, a skilful readjustment of the mutual relations of the empire and the papacy. As the pope required the consent of the emperor, before his election could be regarded as valid, so the emperor henceforth received the formal award of his crown from the pope.

Though the power of the Frankish episcopate largely increased with the decline of the Carolingian dynasty, the papal and the royal supremacy were still held to be inextricably linked together. Thomassin quotes, in proof of this, the language of the fourth council of Tours (A.D. 849), addressed to Nomenoë, duke of Armorica, who, at the same time that he revolted from his allegiance to Charles the Bald, sought to render the metropolitan of his province independent of Rome: "omnem laesisti Christianitatem dum Vicarium B. Petri apostolicum, cui dedit Deus primatum in omni orbe terrarum sprevisti" (Sirmond, iii. 70). Similarly, Lewis the German, when he sought to bring over the council of Chiersy to his side in his contest with his brother Charles, received for reply that they could never desert one who had been inaugurated so solemnly by the Frankish bishops, "quemque sancta Sedes Apostolica, mater nostra, litteris apostolicis ut regem honorare studuit et confirmare" (Sirmond, iii. 129).

In the memorable struggle between Nicholas I. and Hincmar (arising out of the divorce of queen Theutberga by her husband, Lothair II.) these theories were asserted by pope Nicholas with unanswerable force against the French bishops. He maintained that even the imperial dignity and power were the gift of the holy see; and in the sequel Hincmar was compelled to restore Rothrad to the see of Soissons, and Lothair to receive back his consort. In support of this simultaneous exercise of the papal prerogative in the civil and in the ecclesiastical domain, we find Nicholas appealing to the False Decretals, a collection of spurious pontifical decrees which, it was alleged, had been compiled by Isidore of Seville, but of which the Roman archives presented no trace, their first appearance belonging to the years 829–840, when they were brought to light at Mentz. In these the sole legislative power of the pope was formally and systematically laid down. "The papacy," says Milman, "became a legislative as well as an administrative authority. Infallibility was the next inevitible step, if infallibility was not already in the power asserted to have been bestowed by the Lord on St. Peter, by St. Peter handed down in unbroken descent, and in a plenitude which could not be restricted or limited, to the latest of his successors" (Lat. Christianity, bk. v. c. 4).

III. Distinctive Features of the Office.

(i) Titles.

Papa.—This title, as already stated, was of wide and various use before its final limitation to the Roman pontiff. In the East its ecclesiastical use has always been comparatively vague, including not only bishops and priests but even readers. We find, for example, the emperor Isaac Comnenus, in the 11th century, speaking of a "lector" as "papa." "Quando episcopus facit simplicem papam sive lectorem" (Lupus, Opera, v. 214). In the 5th century, Avitus, bishop of Vienne, writing to the patriarch of Jerusalem, addresses him as "Papa, Apostle, and Prince of the Universal Church:" "Papae Hierosolymitano. Exercet apostolatus vester concessos a Divinitate primatus, et quod principem locum in universali ecclesia teneat, non privilegiis solum studet monstrare, sed meritis" (Epist. 23; Migne, Patrol. lix. 239). In Alexandria the title appears to have been first borne by Heraclius, who was elected patriarch in the year 222: "ejus tempore appellatus est patriarcha Alexandrinus Baba, id est avus" (Eutychii Alexand. Patriarchae Annales, Migne, S. G. cxi. 981–3). It has been asserted that the title was also borne by the archbishop of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, but this is denied by Assemann, (Biblioth. Orien. i. 14), who says that the archbishop was styled "Primas, Catholicus, et Patriarcha," but never "Papa."

In the West it would appear from the testimony of Walafrid Strabo (supra, p. 1652), that throughout our period the title was not necessarily restricted to its modern use. In its actual employment, however, it appears to have been confined at an early period to bishops. Its limitation to the pope of Rome was gradual, commencing, probably, in the 6th century; and, as we should naturally expect, among the communities more directly under the influence of the Roman see. Liberatus of Carthage speaks both of the "bishop of Rome" and of the "pope of Rome," but, according to Thomassin, after the time of Agapetus (A.D. 535–6), restricts the title of "papa" to the pope: "Agapetus papa ordinatur;" "Papae et senatui Romano scribens rex," &c. (Breviar. cc. 18, 21, 22). In other parts of the West, the title continued for some time longer to be applied without restriction to all bishops. Of this a passage in Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. iv. 26) affords a good illustration. In the year 563 Clothaire I. presented one Emerius to the see of Saintes without the consent of the metropolitan Leontius. Leontius accordingly sought to annul the appointment, and at a council, convened at Saintes, Emerius was deposed, and one Heraclius elected in his place. Heraclius was thereupon advised to despatch a messenger to the court of Charibert, king of Paris, to gain his support. On entering the royal presence, the messenger exclaimed, "Salve rex gloriose, sedes enim apostolica eminentiae tuae salutem mittit uberrimam!" To which the king replied, "Numquid Turonicam[1] adiisti urbem, ut papae illius nobis salutem deferas?" It is difficult to avoid concluding from this passage that both Saintes and Tours were styled "sedes apostolicae" in the 6th century, and their bishops "papae." So also Clovis, when addressing the Gaulish bishops in the year 508, styles them "apostolica sede dignissimi papae" (Mansi, viii. 346); and they appear themselves to have claimed the title "apostolici" at the first council of Orleans, A.D. 511 (Mansi, viii. 367). Thomassin, however, observes, that at the third (A.D. 538), fourth (A.D. 541), and fifth (A.D. 549) councils of Orleans, and that of Clermont (A.D. 549), only Rome is styled "apostolica sedes." He also cites a letter of Avitus (Epist. 31), written circa 525, as referring to the pope simply as "papa;" but in the same letter (Migne, Patrol. lix. 248–9) the expression "papa Urbis" also occurs, while in another (Epist. 7) Avitus appears to attribute equal dignity to the "papa Constantinopolitanus," referring to this pontiff and the Roman pontiff as a double constellation in the ecclesiastical firmament, "velut geminos apostolorum principes . . . . velut in coelo positum religionis signum pro gemino sidere." Fortunatus of Poitiers, writing in the latter half of the 6th century, inscribes a letter to [1] Ruinart, who is followed by Migne (lxxi. 166), reads "Romanam" for "Turonicam," but see note to Hefele, Conciliengesch. iii. 20.

Felix, bishop of Nantes: "Domino sancto et apostolica sede dignissimo patri, Felici papae" (Misc. iii. 4; Migne, lxxxviii. 119); and writing to Euphronius, bishop of Tours, inscribes the letter "Domino sancto .... papae" (ib. iii. 1; Migne, lxxxviii. 115).

It is supposed by Thomassin and by Phillips (Kirchenrecht, v. 603) that, with the end of the 6th century the title began to be entirely restricted to the pope of Rome, who was now generally recognised as "pater patrum." We find, however, that at the sixth general council, that of Constantinople in the year 680, Honorius is referred to as "papa antiquae Romae," and Cyrus as "papa Alexandriae" (Mansi, xi. 214). The following titles assumed by, or given to, pope Agatho, in the Acts of the same council, appear to indicate that such titles were largely enhanced, at discretion, by the use of adjectives, or a more amplified description: "episcopus servus servorum Dei;" "episcopus sanctae Dei catholicae atque apostolicae ecclesiae urbis Romae;" "sanctus nuper ordinatus papa in apostolica sede antiquae Romae;" "sanctissimus et beatissimus archiepiscopus antiquae Romae;" "sanctissimus et beatissimus papa;" "sanctissimus papa;" "orthodoxus papa" (ib. xi. 202, 209, 285, 298, 322, 330, 346).

In the 9th century the dissociation of the title from ordinary episcopal dignity is attested by the fact that we find Gregory IV. (A.D. 827-44) reproving the Frankish bishops for addressing him by the incongruous titles of "frater" and "papa;" when it would, he says, have been more fitting to have shewn simply the reverence due to a father: "Romano pontifici scribentes, contrariis eum in praefatione nominibus appellastis, fratrem videlicet et papam; dum congruentius esset solam ei paternam reverentiam exhibere" (Migne, civ. 207).

The use of this title in addressing any other ecclesiastical dignitary than the pope of Rome was formally forbidden by Gregory VII. in the council of Rome of the year 1073: "ut papae nomen unicum sit in toto orbe Christiano, nec liceat alicui se ipsum vel alium eo nomine appellare" (Gieseler, Kirchengesch. ii. ii. 405, with note).

Pontifex maximus and pontifex summus. [See PONTIFEX.]

Episcopus universalis or oecumenicus.—This title first assumes significance in the time of Pelagius II. (A.D. 578-590), who, as we have already seen, strenuously denounced its assumption by John the patriarch, and at the same time disclaimed it for himself (Baronius, ad ann. 587). His remonstrance appears to have produced no effect on John, for we find his successor, Gregory the Great, repeating both the remonstrance and the disclaimer. According to Gregory, the council of Chalcedon had already distinctly affirmed the exclusive right of the Roman pontiff to this title, but no pope had hitherto assumed to himself this "audacious name," lest such an assumption should seem to involve the denial of the title to his episcopal brethren: "Numquid non, sicut vestra fraternitas novit, per venerandum Chalcedonense concilium hujus apostolicae sedis antistites .... universales oblato honore vocati sunt. Sed tamen nullus unquam tali vocabulo appellari voluit, nullus sibi hoc temerarium nomen arripuit, ne si sibi in pontificatus gradu gloriam singularitatis arriperet, hanc omnibus fratribus denegasse videretur" (Epist. v. 18; Migne, lxxvii. 743). Authorities, however, concur in holding Gregory mistaken in his supposition that the title had been sanctioned by the council of Chalcedon (Gieseler I. ii. 228; Hefele, Conciliengesch. ii. 325; Schaff, p. 662); Leo was only styled οἰκουμενικὸς ἀρχιεπίσκοπος in an accusation preferred against Dioscurus by two deacons of Alexandria (Mansi, vi. 1006, 1012); and that he himself assumed the title in his correspondence is a statement that probably rests upon a forgery (see Gieseler, u. s.). Boniface II. (A.D. 530-2) appears to have been thus styled by Stephen, metropolitan of Thessaly; and Boniface III. (A.D. 606), who according to Anastasius (Muratori, Script. III. i. 135) obtained from the emperor Phocas a decree entitling the see of St. Peter to rank as "caput omnium ecclesiarum," is said to have openly assumed the title. Gieseler (I. ii. 488) refers its earliest appearance as self-assumed to the Liber Diurnus, which appeared A.D. 682-5; and Leo II. (A.D. 682) was saluted as "papa oecumenicus" by the emperor (Mansi, xi. 713). After the 7th century its occurrence is not unfrequent. It is given by the Roman senate to Stephen IV. in the 8th century (Mansi, xii. 625); to the same pontiff by the Lateran council of the year 769 (ib. xii. 713); and to Leo III. by a synod held in Rome in 799 (ib. xiii. 1071). It was used by Charles the Bald in addressing John VIII. in the year 876, on the occasion of that monarch's receiving the imperial dignity from the latter. In the proposals of the commissioners presented to Lewis the Pious (A.D. 825) the pope is referred to as he "who, by apostolical authority and the reverential deference of the world, is exalted to the universality" (Baronius, ad ann. 825). Hallam, however (Middle Ages, c. vii. pt. 1), quotes Gratian (Decretum, ed. 1591, p. 303): "Nec etiam Romanus pontifex universalis appellatur," and says that a distinction is made by the canonists between "universalis ecclesiae episcopus" and "episcopus universalis;" "that is, the pope has no immediate jurisdiction in the diocese of other bishops, though he can correct them for the undue exercise of their own."

Apostolicus [see APOSTOLICUS].—The latest of the episcopal titles claimed exclusively by the pope. Charles Martel, in the 8th century, when recommending Boniface to the Frankish bishops, addresses them as "domini et apostolici in Christo patres episcopi" (Migne, lxxxix. 699). To the evidence of Rupertus Tuitiensis (quoted in APOSTOLICUS) may be added that of Adam Scotus, who, speaking of the pope, says, "Ipsi quippe sunt principales, et maximi sedis apostolicae in ecclesia Romana successores; unde et ipsos specialiter apostolicos sancta ecclesia vocare consuevit" (de Tripart. Tab.; Migne, cxviii. 394).

Servus servorum Dei.—This title was not originally restricted to the bishop of Rome. Augustine (Epist. 217, ad Vitalem) superscribes a letter "August. episc. servus Christi et per ipsum servus servorum ipsius." Fulgentius (Epist. 5) styles himself "servorum Christi famulus" (Gieseler, I. ii. 214). Its earliest use as assumed by the Roman pontiffs appears to have been by Leo the Great, who so styles himself in a letter addressed to the emperor Theodosius II. (Migne, Patrol. cv. 23). It is adopted again by Gregory the Great, with the design, probably, of contrasting his own humility with the arrogant assumption of the title of "universalis" by John of Constantinople (Vita a Joh. Diac. ii. 1). His contemporary, Didier of Cahors, refused to permit himself to be addressed by any other title. In the 9th century it began to be limited to the pope. Leo III. habitually styles himself "episcopus, servus servorum Dei" (Jaffé, Carolina, p. 336, et passim).

Clavigер.—The use of this title appears to date from the middle of the 8th century. Pope Hadrian was styled "clavicularius regni coelorum" (Mansi, xii. 828; xvii. 130–1); in a dedicatory poem addressed in the thirty-seventh year of the reign of Charles the Great to that monarch, the same pontiff writes, "Pollicite sacra dona clavigeri aulae Petri" (Maassen, Gesch. d. Canonisch. Rechts, i. 965–7).

(ii.) Election. This, as is generally allowed by ecclesiastical writers, was, in the earliest times, by the clergy and laity of the church of Rome conjointly with the bishops of the neighbouring dioceses, and in no way differed from that observed in election to other bishoprics. [BISHOP; ORDINATION.]

With respect to the election of pope Cornelius (A.D. 251) St. Cyprian tells us that he was raised to the dignity "by the divine decree, the testimony of nearly all the clergy, the assent of the people, and by the college [ELECTORAL COLLEGES] of venerable priests, and by good men" (Epist. 55; Migne, iii. 771). The emperor Valentinian II. in a letter respecting the election of Siricius (A.D. 385), says: "We hold it to be the right of the Roman people that they should enjoy concord and elect the best man for bishop" (Constant, Epist. Roman. Pont. i. 639). In the disputed election of Boniface I. (A.D. 418) it was alleged as decisive in his favour that he had been elected by the Roman clergy, "amid the acclamations of the people and the chief men of the city, and that 70 priests had subscribed the act of election in the presence of nine provincial bishops" (ib. i. 1007).

The method observed was consequently the same as that observed in other episcopal elections; but almost as soon as the see of Rome rises into historical importance—from the time, that is to say, of Constantine the Great, we find that the act of consecration was always deferred until the ratification of the popular choice by the emperor (or by the exarch of Ravenna) had been received. In the manner in which this imperial prerogative was exercised,—according as it was invoked by the bishop, restricted to a mere formality by the emperor, or enforced in a spirit which virtually destroyed the freedom of the election—we are presented with valuable evidence with respect to the position of the papacy throughout our period.

The earliest instance of encroachment by the civil power on the popular rights was the act of the emperor Constantius, who deposed Liberius (A.D. 356) and installed Felix II. in his place. The new pope was elected by three eunuchs; but the letters which represent Athanasius as stigmatising these proceedings as "incredibile facinus," and asserting that the voice of the church was silenced by the imperial will: "Qui in locum ecclesiae palatium suum succedere voluerit" (Baronius, ann. 370 and 372) are spurious. The clergy and people, on hearing of the banishment of Liberius, pledged themselves by solemn oath in assembly never to accept another bishop during his lifetime.

At this period the growing importance of the office is attested by the fierceness of the contests for its possession. Ammianus Marcellinus, referring to the state of Rome, says that he "should naturally expect that those who were desirous of this high office would shrink from no expedient of faction to gain it" (xxvii. 3); and the scenes that marked the contests between Ursicinus and Damasus (A.D. 366–384), and Ursicinus and Siricius (A.D. 385–399) afforded the emperors Valentinian I. and II. more reasonable grounds for intervention (Socrates, H. E. ii. 27; iv. 29). Under Honorius a law was enacted that whenever two candidates for the vacant chair conducted the contest in an uncanonical manner neither should succeed to the vacancy, but that the Roman clergy should proceed to make another choice (Baronius, ann. 419). The law, however, as emanating from a secular source, has never been held by the canonists to be binding on the church (Dict. Grat. v. Illud autem, D. 96).

Bribery and other scandals continued, notwithstanding, to mark each fresh election; and in the pontificate of Siricius (A.D. 468–483) a time when jealousy of the rival see of Constantinople almost absorbed that of the civil power as represented by Odoacer,—we find this pope actually invoking the interference of that monarch. In view of the election that would follow his own decease, Simplicius requested Basilius, the prefect of Odoacer, not to sanction such election, unless it should be conducted under his auspices, and the proceedings throughout be subject to his supervision (Hardouin, Conc. ii. 977). To this request Basilius assented; and, on the death of Simplicius, Odoacer asserted his right of confirming the election of the new pope —the Roman clergy being thus compelled to acknowledge the authority of an Arian monarch. On the same occasion a royal ordinance was promulgated prohibiting the application of church funds to electioneering or other party purposes.

The elections of Gelasius and Anastasius II. were conducted in due form (save that the former pontiff refused, in the first instance, to notify his election to the patriarch of Constantinople according to custom); but the election of Symmachus another disgraceful contest ensued between his party and that of Laurentius, and the arbitration of the civil power, in the person of Theodoric the Great, was again invoked. Theodoric appears to have contented himself with convening an assembly of the clergy (A.D. 499) which he left free to frame whatever laws might be deemed necessary; and under the presidency of Symmachus the following canons were enacted: (1) A direct adaptation of the ancient Roman law de Ambitu, whereby any presbyter, priest, or deacon, canvassing or soliciting votes, was rendered liable to degradation and excommunication; (2) The penalty of the anathema on any person guilty of the same offence; (3) That a majority of votes should decide an otherwise valid election; (4) Immunity and reward to any person (even an accomplice) who should divulge any attempts at electoral intrigues and malpractices (Baronius, ad ann. 499).

In the difficulties which involve the history of the Synodus Palmaris (A.D. 502) two points in relation to our subject may be regarded as sufficiently ascertained: (1) That the synod repealed the enactment of Odoacer; (2) That it did this solely in order to repudiate the precedent thereby established for civil interposition, for the law concerning the alienation of church property was forthwith re-enacted in all its details by the same synod (Hardouin, ii. 975).

The elections of Hormisdas and John I. present no particular feature; but after the latter had died in confinement, a victim to the displeasure of Theodoric, that monarch assumed to himself the right of both nominating and appointing Felix IV. (or III.). This invasion of their privilege called forth energetic remonstrance alike from clergy and people; and Theodoric was ultimately prevailed upon to decree, that in all future elections the choice should rest with them, though he still reserved to himself the royal right of pronouncing upon such choice before the act of consecration (Cassiodorus, Variar. viii. 15).

The elections of Boniface II., John II. and Agapetus, conducted under Gothic auspices, mark another period of open and shameless bribery; and almost the last act of the expiring Roman senate was to issue a decree (ann. 532) declaring that any person convicted of giving or promising a reward for the purpose of bringing about the election of a candidate, should forfeit the right of suffrage, while the bribe was made recoverable by action against the receiver (ibid. ix. 15). This decree was subsequently ratified by a rescript from Ravenna, which extended its operation to all the metropolitan sees of Italy; and Athalaric, the successor of Theodoric, gave order that "the laudable decree of the most noble senate" should be engraved on marble, and placed in the vestibule of St. Peter's (ib. ix. 16).[k]

The right of a pope to influence in any degree the election of his successor appears to have formed a subject of deliberation at the synod of 499 (see Greenwood, Cath. Petri, ii. 69). In principle, however, such interference had been virtually condemned by Hilary, who had forbidden the bishops of Tarraconensis to nominate their successors (Thiel, i. 167). The theory was now revived by Boniface II., who obtained from a synod in the year 530 a decree empowering him to appoint a successor, and actually nominated a deacon, Vigilius, who was afterwards pope. But a second synod reversed the decree ("quia contra canones fuerat hoc factum"), and Boniface himself publicly committed the writing to the flames,—in the language of Anastasius, "reum se confessus majestatis" (Murat. Script. I. ii. p. 127.)

The restoration of the imperial authority in Italy was followed by renewed interference with the papal elections. A law of Justinian (Novellae, cxxiii. c. 25) shews that bishops were required to maintain a resident agent or secretary at the residence of their metropolitan; the metropolitan, again, at the residence of his patriarch. The growing dependence of the Roman see on the emperor is probably indicated by the fact, that Agapetus (A.D. 535–6) was the first pope who maintained an apocrisiarius permanently at the Eastern court (Thomassin, ed. Bourassé, i. 141). From this time the influence exerted by that court over the papal elections may be inferred from the number of apocrisiarii (e.g. Pelagius I., Gregory I., Sabinian, Boniface III. Martin I.) who succeeded to the papal throne.

The illegal deposition and murder of Sylverius (A.D. 536–7) was followed by the uncanonical election of Vigilius, at the dictation of Belisarius, who, however, according to Liberatus, condescended to observe the usual formalities: "Convocatis presbyteris et diaconibus et clericis, mandavit eis ut alium sibi Papam eligerent" (Migne, lxviii. 1040). But the election, to quote the language of Greenwood (ii. 146), "by every known rule of canon law was void from the beginning." Pelagius I. (A.D. 555–60) the successor to Vigilius, was installed without even these formalities, and his unpopularity was such that only two bishops and a single presbyter could be found to officiate at his consecration (Greenwood, ii. 162). It is not until the year 578, when the Lombard invasion had paralysed the power of the Byzantine court for interference, that we again meet with a really independent election,—that of Pelagius II.

The successor of Pelagius, Gregory the Great, was summoned to the papal chair by the unanimous and spontaneous voice of the electors; "Clerus, senatus, populusque Romanus sibi concorditer pontificem delegerunt" (Vita a Joh. Diac. bk. i. c. 39). For nearly three quarters of a century from his time, no election calls for particular comment, if we except, perhaps, that of Eugenius I. (A.D. 654) whose installation at the dictation of the imperial power during the lifetime of his predecessor, was in open disregard of the canonical requirements. The changes that mark the relations of the papacy and the empire during this period, are, however, important. In the first instance, the emperor is to be seen endeavouring to retain his control over the Roman see by delegating his authority to the exarchs of Ravenna,—the course adopted by Heraclius in 639. The exarchs appear to have sympathised with the see of Ravenna in its endeavours to establish "autocephaly," and rendered themselves obnoxious to the Roman pontiffs by an arbitrary exercise of their powers. At the earnest entreaty of pope Agatho, Constantine Pogonatus, in the year 682, reassumed these powers to himself, and finally, on the succession of Benedict II. in the year 684, in consideration of the great expense and delay (sometimes extending to a twelvemonth) involved in referring each election to Constantinople, consented altogether to forego his right of sanction; from this time nothing more was required than a formal notification from Rome, while the act of consecration no longer awaited the imperial sanction. Baronius speaks enthusiastically of this concession: "Restituta Romana ecclesia in pristinam libertatem;" and the election of John V. in the year 685, is regarded by many [k] This decree may be regarded as retaining its validity until the time when the papal elections became vested in the College of Cardinals. Baronius, and most of the Catholic writers since his time, have sought, somewhat disingenuously, to give a different aspect to this undeniable intervention of the secular power (see Annal. 533; Phillips, Kirchenrecht, v. 748).

canonists as the first really free election. (See Phillips, Kirchenrecht, v. 758.)

The number of Greeks or Syrians who appear as Benedict's successors clearly prove, however, that the influence of the exarchs was still potent. Constantine's concession had been made, moreover, on the condition that the election was unanimous; and the contests that preceded the elections of Conon (A.D. 686), and Sergius (A.D. 687), placed the newly-acquired freedom again in jeopardy. In the former case the "militia" and the clergy of Rome supported different candidates; in the latter the interference of the exarch of Ravenna was solicited, and his support gained by a bribe of one hundred pounds of gold.

It was not, consequently, until the outbreak of the iconoclastic controversy, and the loss of the exarchate, that the prerogatives of the Eastern emperor in relation to the papacy came definitively to an end. The last pope who solicited the imperial confirmation of his election was Gregory III. (A.D. 731–41); and the acts of the Lateran synod of 769 exhibit for the first time the discontinuance of the imperial year in the official records of the proceedings of the Western church (Hefele, Conciliengesch. iii. 435; Mansi, xii. 703–21).

The Lombard kings appear to have attempted no interference with the papal elections; but in Rome itself the growing importance of the influence wielded by the pontiff invested his office with a corresponding value in the eyes of political parties. The forcible installation of Constantine II. (A.D. 767), a layman, by the intervention of the armed nobility, marks another innovation on the canonical method of procedure. Strictly speaking, Constantine was not a layman, for the party who raised him to the see compelled the bishop of Praeneste previously to admit him to priest's orders,—"ut orationem clericatus eidem Constantino tribuerit" (Anastasius, xcvi. 8), and the same bishop consecrated him deacon and subdeacon,—"subdiaconus atque diaconus ab eodem episcopo, in oratorio sancti Laurentii, intra eundem patriarchium, contra sanctorum canonum instituta consecratus est" (ib. xcvi. 10). As, however, these offices had not been filled for the period required by the canons, the clergy of Rome refused to recognize the validity of Constantine's orders, in addition to which he could only claim to be "diaconus forensis," instead of "diaconus cardinalis" (Phillips, Kirchenrecht, v. 761). After he had been deposed and blinded, he was brought before the Lateran synod of 769, and asked how he had dared, being only a layman, to occupy the papal chair, "cur praesumpsisset apostolicam sedem laicus existens invadere" (Anast. xcvi. 42). He appears not to have dared to refer to his own uncanonical admission to orders, but pleaded in defence the precedents of the archbishop of Ravenna and the bishop of Naples, both of whom had been consecrated to their respective offices while still only laymen. It was accordingly enacted by the synod that "no one should be eligible to the papal dignity who had not previously risen, step by step, and been duly made a cardinal deacon or presbyter" (ib. xcvi. 45; Muratori, Script. III. i. 177).

It has been inferred from a subsequent clause of this decree, that the laity were at the same time excluded from all real influence in papal elections, and permitted only to express assent and approval after the selection had been made by the clergy (Hefele, Conciliengesch. iii. 438; Greenwood, Cathedra Petri, ii. 403, note). But it is evident that if such were the design of the synod, it either failed to be carried into effect or was soon set aside, for we are told by Anastasius of the election of Leo III. (A.D. 795), "cuncto populo Romano electus est" (Muratori, Script. III. i. 195); of that of Stephen V. (A.D. 816) "a populo Romano est electus" (ib. III. i. 212); and of that of Paschal I. (A.D. 817) "una voluntate a cunctis sacerdotibus seu proceribus, atque omni clero, nec non et optimatibus, vel cuncto populo Romano in sedem apostolicam Pontifex elevatus est" (ib. III. i. 213). It would therefore appear that the view of Fleury (ix. 464) is more likely to be correct, viz., that the popular or lay ratification of the clerical choice continued to be essential to the validity of the election (see Thomassin, II. ii. 13, § 7).

The statement that pope Hadrian, at a Lateran synod, A.D. 774, made over to Charles the Great the right of appointing to the see of Rome, together with that of investiture to all ecclesiastical dignities in the empire, may safely be dismissed as a mere fiction.[1] The utmost that the Frankish monarch claimed, was the ancient imperial prerogative of confirming each papal election. Phillips (Kirchenrecht, v. 763) and Thomassin (II. ii. 25) concur in their belief that throughout the rule of the Carolingian dynasty these elections took place in due canonical form.

On the other hand, it is not to be denied that the stratagem whereby Leo III. exhibited himself to Christendom as the bestower of the imperial dignity on Charles (A.D. 800) introduced novel elements in the papal relations to the political power, and that these in turn served to render the respective rights of the clergy, the people, and the emperor, in elections to the Roman see doubtful and conflicting. In this manner these elections became one of the chief causes of the strife between emperor and pope in the middle ages (see Phillips, Kirchenrecht, iii. 150; v. 763; Milman, Lat. Christianity, bk. iv. c. 12; Bryce, Holy Roman Empire, c. 5; Staudenmaier, Gesch. der Bischofswahlen, pp. 55–70). In the year 867, on the election of Hadrian II., we are told by Anastasius that the "missi" of the emperor (Lewis II.) were in Rome, and were indignant that they were not invited to be present at the ceremony and take part therein. Whereupon they were assured that the omission was not designed as a slight on the emperor ("Augusti causa contemptus"), but in order that no precedent might be afforded, to be pleaded on future occasions, for the presence of the imperial envoys at the papal elections (Migne, cxxviii. 1382).

(a) Qualifications.—These, throughout our period, appear to have been identical with those for the episcopal office generally, viz., (1) that the elected should be fifty years of age; (2) that he should be one of the clergy of the church over which he was called to preside; (3) that he should have been duly and regularly admitted to the subordinate offices of deacon and presbyter (see BISHOP, p. 129). No instance of translation from another see occurs within our period, the earliest having been that of Formosus, who was translated, in the year 891, from the bishopric of Portus (Bower, History of the Popes, v. 66). The absence of information respecting the exact age of each pontiff at the time of his election, a fact attributable to the obscure origin of the majority, does not enable us to determine how far the limitation with respect to age was adhered to. Gregory the Great was probably about forty-six at the time of his accession; Leo the Great was just fifty; Damasus, Pelagius I., Pelagius II., and Sergius I. were considerably above the latter age. That prior admission to the priestly office was looked upon as indispensable may be inferred from the fact referred to above, that even in the case of the forced and irregular promotion of Constantine, in 767, it was deemed necessary that he should first go through the forms of admission to the diaconate and to the priestly office. The precedents pleaded by Constantine sufficiently prove that no exception existed in favour of the Roman see. Nationality was not regarded, and seven of the bishops of Rome in the first three centuries were of Greek extraction; while the fact that from A.D. 687–767 three were Greeks, four Syrians, and only one a Roman, indicates the influence exerted at this period over the elections by the exarchs of Ravenna.

[1] "Hadrianus autem Papa cum universo synodo tradiderunt Carolo jus et potestatem eligendi Pontificem, et ordinandi apostolicam sedem," &c. (Gratian, Decretum, I. lxiii. 23; Migne, Patrol. clxxxvii. 338). This passage, taken from the Chronica of Sigebertus Gemblacensis, who wrote in the 12th century, is not found in the original MS. of that author, but is supposed to have been added by his continuator, Anselmus; in either case, it resolves itself into a baseless 12th century tradition. See Migne, clx. 147, 270–1, n.; also Hirsch (S.), De vita et scriptis Sigeberti monachi Gemblacensis, Berol. 1841.

(β) The Electors.—These were originally the neighbouring bishops, in conjunction with the clergy and laity of the church of Rome. Such at least is the tenor of the evidence afforded by a letter of St. Cyprian (Epist. 52) concerning the election of Cornelius (A.D. 251), and his statement is appealed to by the canonists as satisfactory proof of the due observance of the canonical forms as soon as we have any information respecting these elections: "Factus est Cornelius episcopus de Dei et Christi ejus judicio, de clericorum paene omnium testimonio, de plebis, quae tunc affuit, suffragio, et de sacerdotum antiquorum et bonorum virorum collegio" (Gratian, Decret. II. causa vii. qu. 1, c. 5). From the 5th to the 8th century it would appear that (1) the whole body of the clergy, (2) the magistrates ("judices") as representatives of the "optimates," (3) the militia ("schola" or "generalitas militiae," who really represented the civic class, while the "civium universitas" remained in the background) made up the component elements of the electoral body (Lib. Diur. II. i.–vii.). In the year 769, we find Stephen III. (IV.) presiding at a synod, which refers in one of its decrees to the papal elections as being made by the "proceres et primates ecclesiae" (Gratian, Decret. I. lxxix. 5). In this body Thomassin considers we may recognise the college of cardinals,[m] but the formal decree for the election of the pope by this body was not promulgated until A.D. 1059, when the second Lateran council decided that from that time the choice, "judicium," should rest with the cardinal bishops, while the cardinal priests and deacons, the laity and the emperor, should be consulted only for their assent (Phillips, Kirchenrecht, v. 792–796; Gratian, I. dist. xxiii. 1).

(γ) Method of Procedure.—The order of the proceedings as prescribed in the Liber Diurnus (Migne, Patrol. cv.) is supposed by the editors to be derived from that observed at four papal elections, viz., that of Boniface V. (A.D. 618), of Leo II. (A.D. 682), of Conon (A.D. 686), and of Gregory II. (A.D. 715).

(1) Immediately on the pope's decease, a letter ("nuntius") was despatched to the exarch at Ravenna, conveying a formal announcement of the event. Originally this letter purported to be written in the name of the whole body of the clergy; but from the time of Pelagius II. (Lib. Diur. II. i.) it appears to have been written in the names of the archpresbyter, the archdeacon, and the "primicerius" or chief notary. (2) After the funeral rites, and a solemn three days' fast, during which time the electors were enjoined to supplicate the divine direction in their new choice, the clergy, "optimates," and "populus" assembled and gave their votes, and the decree was drawn up and received their signatures. (3) The election was then announced by a deputation to Constantinople, and awaited the imperial sanction.[n] (4) It was similarly announced to the exarch at Ravenna, and his confirmation besought; if, as at certain periods was the case, this authority was not vested in his office, he was desired to use his influence in obtaining the sanction of the emperor. From the time of Honorius (A.D. 626–38), however, Gregorovius (Gesch. der Stadt Rom, ii. 124) considers that the Liber Diurnus shews that although the election was also notified to the imperial court, the greater importance was attached to the consent of the exarch. (5) Letters were also sent to the judges, the archbishop, and the apocrisiarius at Ravenna, and to the "patricius," the patriarch, and the apocrisiarius at Constantinople; and the decree ("decretales paginae") was deposited in the archives of the Vatican. (6) When the confirmation of the election had been received, the new pope was conducted to St. Peter's,—"ad confessionem sancti Petri." (7) On arriving there he made a public confession of faith before the relics ("corpus") of the apostle. (8) After receiving consecration and ordination,[o] he repeated this confession. (9) Finally, he delivered a sermon in the city, copies of which were sent to all the churches.

Somewhat as the day of martyrdom was spoken of as the birthday of the martyr, in the community to which he belonged, so the day of their election to the papal office was described by the popes as "dies natalitius." Thus Leo

[m] According to Milman (Lat. Christianity, bk. i. c. 1), the bishops of the adjacent towns, Ostia, Tibur, Portus, &c., were "the initiatory college of cardinals"; but this term, when it first comes under our notice, seems to have included only the presbyters and deacons of the Roman Church (see CARDINAL, 292).

[n] It appears to have been also the custom for the emperors to notify their accession to the papal court at Rome (see Thiel, Epist. Rom. Pont. i. 703).

[o] Ménard, in his notes on the Liber Sacramentorum of Gregory the Great (Migne, lxxviii. 517), quotes from an ancient MS. at Corbey, to which however he assigns no date, an order of ordination in which parts are severally assigned to the bishops of Alba, Portus, and Ostia.

Magnus, preaching on the anniversary of his accession, says,—"Illi ergo hunc servitutis nostræ natalitium diem, illi ascribamus hoc festum, cujus patrocinio sedis ipsius meruimus esse consortes" (Serm. iv. c. 41; Migne, Patrol. liv. 19).

The ceremony of foot-kissing, of which the earliest mention is on the installation of Valentine, A.D. 827, took place on the formal induction of the new pontiff into the Lateran as its possessor.

iii. Insignia of the office.—The distinguishing insignia probably belonged to a period later than A.D. 800; although a tradition is preserved by Almoin (Hist. Franc. i. 24; Migne, cxxxix. 660) that the emperor Anastasius sent a gold crown, adorned with gems, to Clovis, king of the Franks, and that he, at the suggestion of St. Remy, sent it to the pope. Rocca (de Tiarae Pontificiae Origine, Thes. pp. 7, 8) considers that the allusion in the spurious donation of Constantine to the "diadema, videlicet coronam capitis nostri," proves that the pope had already assumed a crown, as distinguished from the ordinary episcopal mitre. The crown was designed to symbolize the temporal power. Innocent III. says "In signum spiritualium contulit mihi mitram, in signum temporalium dedit mihi coronam; mitram pro sacerdotio, coronam pro regno" (Serm. iii.; Migne, ccxvii. 665). The earliest reference to the double crown occurs, according to Richter (Kirchenrecht, p. 201) in the year 1297, in the pontificate of Boniface VIII.; according to Phillips, (Kirchenrecht, v. 612) as early as that of Nicholas II. (A.D. 1059–61). Von Heffner (Trachten des christl. Mittelalters, p. 38) assigns the earliest mention of the triple crown to the time of Clement V. (A.D. 1305–14); Phillips not earlier than that of Urban V. (A.D. 1362–70). The upright pastoral staff ("pedum rectum") surmounted by the cross, is probably referred to as the "ferula pastoralis" in the account of the deposition of Benedict V. in the 11th century (Pertz, Mon. Germ. i. 626), and cannot be traced farther back than this. The cross was borne by the pope in common with all the other bishops; the pallium [PALLIUM] in common with other metropolitans, but the pope claimed the exclusive right to wear it on all occasions (Richter, Kirchenrecht, p. 218).

IV. PREROGATIVES SPECIALLY CLAIMED FOR THE OFFICE.

i. Claim to universal authority in the church, as specifically asserted (1) in the granting of dispensations, (2) in the conferring of privileges.

(1) Theories of a universal jurisdiction and of special powers, as prerogatives of the Roman pontiff, almost necessarily involved his right to exempt, under circumstances of an exceptional and peculiar character, particular communities or dioceses from customary canonical observance. The precedents afforded in our period for the exercise of such a power are few, but among the best ascertained are—

(a) Dispensations from penalties attaching to non-observance of the canons.—The power to grant these is justly described by Thomassin as in its very nature peculiar and singular, for, he observes (Vet. et Nova Discip. II. iii. 27, § 14), all canonical discipline must soon have come to an end, if each bishop had possessed the power of remitting at pleasure the obligations imposed by a canon of the church; and if in any exceptional emergency a bishop or local synod ventured on such an exercise of power, the act was always held to require the confirmation of a general council or of the pope. The view of this writer with respect to the conditions under which such power could be exercised are given under INDULGENCE, p. 835; but the following instances are deserving of note, as illustrating more precisely the gradual development of its exercise by the Roman pontiff.

The important part assigned to Melchiades (A.D. 311–14) in relation to the Donatist schism [CAECILIANUS, DICT. CHRIST. BIOG.] is cited by Catholic writers as one of the earliest and most important instances. Melchiades restricted his condemnation to the author of the schism, and permitted those Donatist bishops who had been ordained by Majorinus to re-enter the pale of communion, and to retain possession of their sees on declaration of their readiness to renounce their schismatical tenets. In cases where a Catholic bishop had been established, he endeavoured to provide another cure for the Donatist bishop, "ita ut quibuscumque locis duo essent episcopi, quos dissensio geminasset, eum confirmari vellet qui fuisset ordinatus prior, alteri autem eorum plebs alia regenda provideretur" (Augustine, Epist. 43; Migne, xxxiii. 167). This policy is warmly praised by Augustine as indicating the personal action of Melchiades; but it should be noted that he also speaks of him as enacting these measures at Rome "cum multis collegis suis." The instance is however unquestionable proof of the growing deference paid to the church of Rome and its bishop.

Other instances, cited by Thomassin and Phillips, as occurring in the times of Damasus and Siricius, are referred to under INDULGENCE, p. 835. In the time of Anastasius I. (A.D. 398–401) application was made to that pontiff by the African bishops to sanction a general dispensation to the Donatist clergy. It had previously been decreed, at a council held at Capua (A.D. 389), that no such dispensation should be granted unless under conditions that afforded a prospect of a complete suppression of the schism. The church of Africa accordingly deemed it necessary to gain the approval of the Roman see before it ventured to set the decision aside; but at the same time it is to be noted that they do not attribute autocratical authority to the bishop of Rome, but simply such pre-eminence as might be claimed by the representative of an apostolic see, "Placuit ut litterae mittantur ad fratres et coepiscopos nostros, et maxime ad sedem apostolicam in qua praesidet Anastasius" (Cod. Can. Eccl. Afric. c. 68).

Symmachus vindicates a similar exercise of the papal perogative on the part of his predecessor Anastasius II. (A.D. 496–8) in relation to certain of the Gallican churches, although admitting it to have been "praeter ecclesiae consuetudinem et antiqua praedecessorum nostrorum statuta;" he also in the same letter takes occasion to enunciate the general rules that may be supposed to regulate such exercise of supreme ecclesiastical authority, maintaining that "what is done contrary to the canon is not necessarily a breach of the canon, which is violated only by a wanton disregard for precedent," and that it would often be "cruel to insist upon a law when its observance was likely to be attended with detriment to the church, it being the design of all laws that they should benefit, not injure" (Thiel, Epist. Rom. Pont. p. 657).

The doctrine of expediency, as thus laid down, and depending on the discretion of the pontiff, is illustrated in the policy of Boniface I. (A.D. 418–22). On the one hand he refused to permit Patroclus, bishop of Arles, to assume the functions of a metropolitan in another diocese by ordaining a successor to a vacant bishopric "contra patrum regulas," quod nequaquam possumus ferre patienter, quia convenit nos paternarum sanctionum diligentes esse custodes" (Epist. 12); on the other, in the permission which he accorded to Perigenes to assume the bishopric of Corinth, he appears directly to have departed from adherence to canonical law (Constant, ed. Schoenemann, p. 723).

A certain dispensing authority is undoubtedly implied in the permission accorded by Celestine I. (A.D. 422) to the Nestorians, to be received again into the church (ib. pp. 871–6).

The language of Leo I. is distinctly that of one who assumes to be the censor of the whole church, and bound to interfere, "quoties aliqua contra instituta canonum et ecclesiasticam disciplinam praesumpta vel commissa cognoscimus" (Praef. in Decret.); and he asserts that compliance with the canonical discipline is an essential condition of communion (can. 5); yet, notwithstanding we have a conspicuous instance of the exercise of the dispensing power by this pontiff. In a letter to Flavianus, bishop of Constantinople (Mansi, v. 1365, 1406), he condemns the heresy of Eutyches, but at the same time enjoins that the latter should be restored to communion, and to the administration of his monastery, on abjuration of his errors, "sedis enim apostolicae moderatio hanc tempertantiam servat, ut et severius agat cum obduratis et veniam cupiat praestare correctis." In a letter to the emperor Marcianus he severely condemns the presumption of his rival Anatolius, bishop of Constantinople, in ordaining a bishop to the church of Antioch, "contra instituta canonum;" and says that his opposition to this measure has been withdrawn solely from a desire to restore the faith and from a love of peace, "quod nos amore reparandae fidei et pacis studio retractare cessavimus" (Epist. civ.; Migne, liv. 1153).

Thomassin considers that a yet earlier exercise of the dispensing power in the East is to be found in the action of Damasus in relation to Flavianus, bishop of Antioch. On this occasion Theophilus, of Alexandria, is represented by Socrates, the historian, as having sent a messenger to Damasus to suggest that it would be for the welfare of the church if, in order to bring about concord among the laity, he would condone the offence of Flavianus (Soc. H. E. v. 15)—λυσιτελεῖν εἰκὸν δι' ὁμόνοιαν τοῦ λαοῦ, παριδεῖν τὸ φθάσαν Φλαβιανοῦ πλημμέλημα (Migne, S. G. lxvii. 281).

In the time of Leo's successor, Hilary, the prevalence of grave irregularities in Spain, in the appointment of bishops to vacant sees, and in their removal from one diocese to another, rendered it advisable to appeal to Rome. Hilary granted a general dispensation with respect to appointments which had already taken place, but forbade similar disregard of the canons in future, "ut nihil deinceps contra praecepta beati Apostoli, nihil contra Nicaenorum canonum constitutum tententur" (Thiel, p. 168).

Gelasius, at the time when the Gothic invasion had deprived Italy of half its clergy, yielded to imperative necessity, and dispensed with the observance of the canonical periods with respect to ordination (Hardouin, Conc. ii. 897).

Up to this period, the evidence seems fairly in harmony with the view of Thomassin, that dispensations were presumed to be in conformity with the precept of Augustine, that the weal of the church, not the interest of individuals, should be consulted in the exercise of the dispensing power, the conditions being (1) that the matter in question should be of primary magnitude in relation to the church; (2) that the good accruing should be clearly discernible, either in the avoidance of some evil to which the observance of the canon might afford admission, or in the gain of benefits which might otherwise be lost; (3) that such dispensations should have effect only with respect to past irregularities, and not be construed into precedents in the future. In the language of pope Martin I., "Canones ecclesiasticos solvere non possumus qui defensores et custodes canonum sumus, non transgressores."

With the advance of the 7th century, however, and especially in the contact with Teutonism, we find the papal dispensation solicited and conferred in connexion with irregularities of a kind that afforded precedents for some of the worst abuses of mediaeval times—the appropriation of revenues of bishoprics, monasteries, and cures for secular purposes. The extent to which this abuse had grown under Charles Martel, in Frankland, rendered hopeless the efforts of Boniface towards obtaining satisfactory restitution, and he accordingly obtained from pope Zacharias permission to forego the duty of demanding full reparation to the churches and monasteries. The pontiff himself, indeed, appears to have partially condoned these spoliations, on the consideration that they had been made in behalf of the Christian state in its struggles against the pagan and the infidel—the Saxon and the Saracen (Epist. x.; Migne, lxxxix. 941).

Other facts relating to the same period seem to indicate that this prerogative had already grown into an abuse. We find, for example, a Frankish noble pleading the papal indulgence for an unlawful marriage, an irregularity differing in character from those of the kind which the instructions of Gregory the Great to Augustine might be held to condone, where the marriage tie had been contracted while the parties were still pagans, "in quibus se per ignorantiam ante lavacrum baptismatis astrinxerunt" (Epist. xi. 64; Migne, lxxvii. 1190). Certain of the clergy, again, alleged that notwithstanding that they led immoral lives they had received the papal licence to continue to perform their sacred functions, "revenientes ab apostolica sede dicunt se Romanum pontificem licentiam dedisse ministerium episcopale in ecclesia ministrare." Boniface appears to have treated these representations as mendacious, "quia Apostolicam sedem nequaquam contra decreta canonum audivimus judicasse" (Epist. 49; ib. lxxxix. 747); but the mere fact that they were alleged points to a wider and less defensible exercise of the dispensing power.

Boniface himself received from Zacharias permission to nominate his successor to the see of Mainta, but the concession was made with express limitation to his case, "praesentibus cunctis tibi successorum designa, ut hoc veniat ordinandus. Hoc nulli alii concedi patimur quod tibi charitate cogente largiri censuimus" (Migne, lxxxix. 920); the installation of his successor during his lifetime was peremptorily forbidden, as "contrary to every ecclesiastical rule."

It is worthy of note, that Zacharias was not willing to delegate any general dispensing powers to Boniface, "quaecunque repereris sacris canonibus deviare nulla ratione patiaris sacrum ministerium tractare" (ib. lxxxix. 928).

At the eighth oecumenical council it was declared in the most explicit terms that it was the legitimate function of the pope to exercise powers of this description for "the healing of the wounds of the catholic and apostolic church" (Hardouin, v. 730). And at the third council of Soissons, A.D. 866, the language of Herardus, archbishop of Tours, points to this function as one to which the Gallican clergy had frequent recourse in their appeals to Rome (Migne, cxxi. 777.)

(2.) To confer privileges.

(a) On monasteries, with respect to episcopal jurisdiction.—The exercise of this prerogative may certainly be traced farther back than the period assigned by Guizot and other writers as that of its earliest use (see BISHOP, p. 232; Guizot, Hist. de la Civ. en France, ii. 111), viz., the 8th century. Before the time of Gregory I., his predecessors appear to have warned members of the episcopal order that they had no canonical right to celebrate mass in the monasteries of their dioceses (Baxmann, Politik der Päpste, i. 101)—a theory of monastic privilege which would derive support from the original character of such societies as lay communities. The hard pressure of the "jugum clericorum" would appear indeed to have frequently induced these societies to place themselves under the protection of a bishop of a different diocese (see Gieseler, Kirchengesch. I. ii. 425). By degrees they began habitually to look to Rome as the quarter from whence they were likely to receive the most effectual protection; and in the pontificate of Gregory I. we have a well authenticated instance of a papal response to such appeals in a letter written by this pope to Luminosus, abbat of St. Thomas at Rimini, wherein he states that he has deprived Castorius, the bishop of the diocese, and his successors, "of all power of injuring the monastery" (Epist. ii. 42; Jaffé, Regesta Rom. Pont. p. 114). In the same year, at a Lateran synod (A.D. 595), it was enacted that the property and revenues of all monasteries should be free from episcopal control (Mansi, x. 485). Special privileges appear to have also been conferred by Gregory on several of the Frankish foundations, to protect them from the already conspicuous rapacity of the Gallican bishops (Epist. vii. 12; ix. 111; xiii. 8–10). In the year 628, Honorius I. conferred on the famous monastery at Bobbio, entire freedom from all ecclesiastical control save that of the Pope (Jaffé, p. 157). The abbey at Fulda, founded in 744 by Sturm, the disciple of St. Boniface, was similarly placed by Boniface, in whose diocese it was situated, directly under the papal protection, to the exclusion of the authority of the bishop of the diocese. Similar privileges were conferred in 750 on Monte Cassino by pope Zacharias. Engel (de Priv. et Jur. Monast.) enumerates no less than fifty distinct privileges, granted by papal authority to monastic foundations at a somewhat later period.

(β) On bishops, with respect to residence.—The earliest instance on record occurs nearly at the close of our period, when Charles the Great, at the council of Frankfort (A.D. 794), notified that he had received from pope Hadrian formal permission to retain archbishop Angilramn at his palace, "propter utilitates ecclesiasticas;" on the same occasion he announced a like permission with respect to bishop Hildebald, and solicited the assent of the council to these arrangements, which was unanimously granted (Sirmond, ii. 201). As Thomassin observes, these formalities clearly prove the importance attached, at that time, to such departures from canonical obligations.

(γ) With respect to minor details.—Among these may be named the right to open private chapels for public worship, to wear ecclesiastical dress of a particular kind (DALMATIC), and others, of which, however, the examples are doubtful and extremely rare before the 9th century.

ii. Claim to authority over all bishoprics and bishops.

As regards elections to the episcopal office, the outline of facts presented under BISHOP (pp. 216–219), and other evidence cited by Thomassin (II. ii. cc. 1–30), appear to render it probable that during the greater part of our period the canonical mode of election was maintained—such election, however, always depending on the confirmation of the metropolitan, and generally upon that of the king or emperor. That this mode of election was fully recognized by the see of Rome, is shewn by a letter addressed to the bishops of Tarraconensis to pope Hilary, in which, after complaining that Silvanus, bishop of Calagura, contrary to law and custom, had ordained a bishop in opposition to the popular wish—"postponens patrum regulas et vestra instituta despiciens, nullis petentibus populis, episcopum ordinavit"—they assert that they have recourse to the papal see, as "unicum remedium" (Thiel, Epist. R. P. p. 156). This last expression probably indicates the real character of the authority wielded by the see of Rome in the West, where as the one apostolic see, its decision was from time to time invited in relation to questions of an extraordinary and unusual character. On the other hand, the absence of all evidence of any claim on the part of the pope to exercise a veto in ordinary elections, seems conclusive against the existence of such a right. Canonists who maintain that it was both claimed and exercised, are compelled to resort to the singular hypothesis that the power of the metropolitan was held by him simply as the delegate of the bishop of Rome; and that the re-assumption of a direct discharge of such functions by the latter, was merely a changed method of administration rendered imperatively necessary by the inordinate p. tensions of patriarchs and metropolitans, the growth of heresy and schism, and the decline of discipline (Phillips, Kirchenrecht, v. 314–8; Roussel, Hist. Pontif. Juried. ii. 12; Zaccaria, Anti-Febronius, ii. 4).

The question will admit of being more concisely investigated, if considered as it presents itself in relation (1) to the East; (2), to the West; (3), to pagan communities.

(1.) In the East.—Even here it is alleged (Phillips, l.c. v. 319) that the papal authority in elections to bishoprics was recognized, and that the patriarchs of Antioch and Alexandria exercised merely delegated powers. In support of this view, Phillips quotes a letter from Damasus (A.D. 366–84) to Paulinus, bishop of Antioch. But the language of this letter (respecting the genuineness of which some doubt may be felt) implies, at most, only a general supremacy, of an honorary character, conceded to the bishop of Rome. If, indeed, we remember that the authority of Damasus was disputed in Rome itself by his brother bishops, it seems scarcely necessary to enquire whether it was recognized in the East. The evidence cited under II. (A) will serve in some measure to prove the unsoundness of such a theory; while in relation to the decree of Valentinian III. (A.D. 455) it is to be observed that after the political severance of the two divisions of the empire in A.D. 438, this could have had no legal force in the East, unless by the consent of the eastern emperor, which was never granted (Gibbon, v. 279; Greenwood, Cathedra Petri, i. 459).

A letter of Innocent I. (A.D. 402–17) to Alexander, bishop of Antioch, which may reasonably be accepted as genuine, seems, however, almost decisive.[p] Here, after distinctly interpreting the sixth canon of the council of Nicæa as recognizing the right of the bishop of Antioch to ordain metropolitans for the whole of the Eastern diocese, Innocent goes on to say: "Itaque arbitramur, frater carissime, ut sicut metropolitanos auctoritate ordines singulari, sic et cæteros non sine permissu conscientinque tua sinas episcopos procreari. In quibus hunc modum recte servabis, ut longe positos litteris datis ordinari censeas ab his, qui nunc eos suo tantum ordinant arbitratu; vicinos autem, si æstimas, ad manus impositionem tuæ gratiæ statuas pervenire" (Migne, Patrol. xx. 547–9). Of his own authority in relation to such ordinations, Innocent says nothing; but, as Thomassin (II. ii. 8, § 3) points out, after interpreting the language of the council of Nicæa in the sense above described, holds that as regards the bishops of the different provinces included in the Eastern diocese, those in the provinces nearer to Antioch were to be summoned to the metropolis to receive ordination at the hands of its bishop, while those in the more remote provinces were to receive ordination from their respective metropolitans, their elections being confirmed by the bishop of Antioch.

Finally, we have satisfactory proof with respect to the earliest consecration of an eastern bishop by the pope. Agapetus, in a letter to Peter, bishop of Jerusalem, after referring to his own consecration (Mar. 13, A.D. 536 of Mennas, patriarch of Constantinople (Liberatus, c. 21; Migne, lxviii. 1059), expressly states that "since the time of the apostle Peter, the Eastern church has never received a bishop at the hands of the pope" (Hardouin, ii. 236).

(2.) In the West.—Here the evidence, though conflicting, is such that it is not difficult to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion. The view of Thomassin, that the method above recognized by Innocent as the canonical mode of procedure in the East, may be supposed to have corresponded to that in force in the West, is in the highest degree probable. The claim already referred to (supra, p. 1659) as put forth by Innocent, of the original foundation of all the bishoprics of the West by St. Peter and his successors, points to a theoretical supremacy of Rome over the entire episcopate. With respect to the suburbicarian bishops (SUBURBICARII), their ordination was, of course, directly subject to the papal approval as to that of their supreme metropolitan. The papal sanction was also necessary throughout the Roman patriarchate. Of this a letter written by Celestine in A.D. 429, to the bishops of Calabria and Apulia, affords direct evidence. He here expresses his surprise that the churches of those districts, after electing laymen to the episcopal office, should venture to look for his confirmation of such elections—"de nobis pessime sentientes quos credunt hoc posse facere" (Migne, Patrol. l. 436).

In the theory above indicated by Thomassin (who appears, however, scarcely to have apprehended its full significance), we have the key to much of the subsequent history of the extension of the papal authority over the whole episcopate. Towards the close of the 4th century we are able, for the first time, to trace with any certainty the presence of metropolitan bishops in the West. The importance of this fact in relation to our whole enquiry is considerable; for, as will be seen, it compels those who assert that the papal prerogatives were admitted and exercised at a much earlier period, to have recourse to the singular hypothesis that during the time when the evidence for a general recognition of the authority of the bishop of Rome is especially defective, that authority was most directly exerted.

At the same time, it is not to be denied that the bishop of Rome claimed a certain nominal authority over all patriarchs and metropolitans, and their elections would appear to have been usually notified to the Roman see, not, however, in order to obtain the ratification necessary to validity, but as a spontaneous recognition of the honorary primacy of its bishop. Of this almost conclusive evidence is afforded in two letters addressed by Leo the Great (A.D. 444) to the bishops of Illyricum. Here, after claiming to have authority, derived from St. Peter, over all churches (supra, p. 1659), he formally appoints Anastasius, metropolitan of Thessalonica, his delegate to consecrate metropolitans in Illyricum, and to convene synods (Mansi, v. 1233). Illyricum, however, over which the jurisdiction of the metropolitan see of Thessalonica was thus extended, was included in the Roman patriarchate; it accordingly seems reasonable to infer with Thomassin that in other provinces, not included therein, the authority of the Roman pontiff was neither recognized nor asserted, either directly or by delegation,—"quid conjectandum restat de episcopis longinquioribus et qui ne Romani quidem patriarchatus finibus claudebantur" (Thomassin, II. ii. 8, § 11).

The earliest instance that points to a more general recognition of this authority, is perhaps that contained in the preamble of a letter addressed to Hilary by a synod of Barcelona (A.D. 465), soliciting his confirmation of the uncanonical translation of one Irenaeus from a neighbouring bishopric to that of Barcelona, and implying that their appeal is not simply dictated by a sense of the importance attached to the papal decisions, but is the course binding upon them as a matter of church discipline:—"Etiamsi nulla extaret necessitas ecclesiasticae disciplinae, expetendum revera nobis fuerat illud privilegium sedis vestrae" (Mansi, vii. 924). Inasmuch as, however, Hilary, in his reply, takes occasion to rebuke them for ordaining bishops to different sees without obtaining the sanction of Ascanius, their metropolitan, it is evident that in Spain a delegated authority was all that was at this time asserted by the pope (Thiel, Epist. Rom. Pont. i. 166). In support of this view we may refer to the language of Gregory the Great, at a yet later period, in certain instructions to his legate when the latter was about to set out for Spain. Here it is clearly implied that his jurisdiction did not ordinarily extend to bishops in that province, for in referring to a certain bishop named Stephen, Gregory says that "inasmuch as Stephen had neither a metropolitan nor a patriarch," a certain matter in dispute must consequently "belong to the apostolic chair, as the head of all the churches, and be decided by it" (Epist. xiii. 45; Migne, lxxvii. 1254).

Generally speaking, however, the evidence exhibits the authority of the pope as advancing from the time of Leo the Great, towards that of a universal metropolitan in the West; and again, at a period later than that which we are here called upon to treat, from that of a universal metropolitan to an immediate and ordinary jurisdiction over the whole episcopate. Among the means whereby this great extension of the papal power was brought about, the encouragement given to the practice of appealing to Rome [APPEAL] must be regarded as the most effectual. It will indeed be found that nearly all the precedents afforded by our period, which canonists are wont to cite in support of the Florentine canon (supra, p. 1652) represent, in reality, exceptional cases, which, viewed in their proper light, tend rather to an exactly opposite conclusion.

In no relation were appeals to Rome more frequent than in connexion with elections, and in these cases the pontiff nearly always appears as the defender of popular rights and of canonical discipline against laxity or tyranny on the part of the metropolitan. Leo himself asserts in the plainest language that the wishes of the laity and the concurrence of the electing bishops are essential to an ordination to a bishopric,—"Nulla ratio sinit ut inter episcopos habeantur qui nec a clericis sunt electi nec a plebibus sunt expetiti" (Epist. 167; Migne, liv. 1420). Thomassin (II. ii. 10, § 4) considers that among the distinguishing excellences of Gregory the Great's character his marked abstention from interference in episcopal elections, even within the Roman province, claims special notice. It would appear indeed to have been this pontiff's great aim to preserve to every church its rights and freedom on such occasions. When, for example, the church at Panormus, in Sicily, were in great perplexity with respect to the choice of a new bishop (owing to the want of a suitable candidate for the office) he desired them to send deputies to Rome who should elect a bishop there: "quod tamen nos non voluntate impulsi loquimur, sed necessitate compulsi; quia quantum est ad nostrae authoritatis judicium, de suis volumus ut debeant habere pastorem" (Epist. xiii. 15; Migne, lxxvii. 1229). Even when he vouchsafed advice to a church with respect to its choice (as in the case of Constantine of Milan) he abstained as much as possible from all appearance of dictation, "quia antiquae meae deliberationis intentio est, ad suscipienda pastoralis curae onera, pro nullius unquam misceri persona" (ib. iii. 29; ib. lxxvii. 644). At the same time the language of his biographer, Joannes Diaconus, proves that the selection of fit persons for the office in his own diocese was to Gregory a matter of the liveliest interest, "ab ipso suae consecrationis exordio per omnem diaecesin suam, episcopos undecunque meliores invenire potuit studiosissime ordinavit" (Vita, iii. 7; Migne, lxxv. 86).

But notwithstanding Gregory's genuine moderation, events in the political world contributed very powerfully during his pontificate to augment the authority of the Roman see. Of this we have undeniable evidence in the frequency with which the pallium [PALLIUM] was solicited at his hands. Instances of the bestowal of this vestment before his time are exceedingly rare; among the best authenticated being its presentation to Caesarius of Arles by Symmachus, in the year 513 (Jaffé, no. 477), to the metropolitan of Arles by Vigilius (A.D. 537–555), and to the same dignitary by Pelagius II. (A.D. 578–590). Gregory assigns the fact of its bestowal by his predecessor, as a reason for not subjecting "the bishop of Arles" to the authority of Augustine (Bede, E. H. i. 27). By Gregory it appears to have been bestowed[q] on the metropolitan of Hispalis (Mansi, x. 199), on the metropolitan of Arles (ib. ix. 1231), on the bishops of Augustodunum in Gaul (Migne, lxxvii. 1014), of Salona in Dalmatia (ib. ix. 1166), of Prima Justiniana in Illyricum (ib. ix. 1189), on Augustine as archbishop of Canterbury (ib. x. 394), on the metropolitan of Nicopolis in Epirus (ib. x. 6), on the bishops of Messana, Syracuse, and Panormus in Sicily (ib. x. 7, 13, 367), and on the metropolitan of Ravenna. Boniface IV. (A.D. 608–615) sends it to Florianus, metropolitan of Arles, and writing to Theodoric, king of the Franks, speaks of the act as "secundum antiquam consuetudinem" (Jaffé, Regest. Rom. Pont. p. 155). Honorius I. (A.D. 625–628) refuses to send it to Hypatius, bishop of Nicopolis, until the latter shall have purged himself from the accusation of having been accessory to a brother's death (Mansi, x. 581); he promises it to the bishop of Grada (Jaffé, p. 157); sends it to Honorius, archbishop of Canterbury, and to Paulinus, archbishop of York (Mansi, x. 580); and decrees that metropolitans using it in the streets or "in litaniis" shall be deprived of the right to wear it (ib. x. 585).

The theory that the acceptance of the pallium did not involve any special profession of allegiance to the pope of Rome (Thomassin, II. ii. 45, § 10; Greenwood, Cath. Petri. ii. 220), can hardly be looked upon as valid after the 7th century. Gregory himself, it is true, appears to have considered that its bestowal must be preceded by the express wish and personal application of the receiver, and also be sanctioned by the consent of the reigning prince (Migne, lxxvii. 781). So early however as the year 581, a canon of the first council of Mâcon forbids metropolitans to celebrate mass without it, "ut archiepiscopus sine pallio missas dicere non praesumat" (Sirmond, i. 371); and we find that its bestowal on Tilpin, archbishop of Rheims, in the year 772, was understood to entitle him to appeal to the pope from the authority of a local synod (Flodoard, Hist. Remens. bk. ii. c. 17).

(3.) The question of the significance to be attached to its bestowal will be further illustrated by the following evidence for the papal authority over bishops and bishoprics (3) in pagan lands. In this relation the evidence is far more plainly favourable to the theory of Roman supremacy. A bishop sent from Rome to evangelize a heathen community was directly accountable to the pope. He was known as "episcopus consecratus in sorte praedicationis," as Boniface was styled by Gregory II. (Epist. 5; Migne, lxxxix. 503), a relation compared by Phillips to that which Titus, when in Crete, bore to St. Paul,—and was empowered both to create new bishoprics as occasion might arise, and to ordain those who might be elected to fill them. When the district in which he laboured had been, to a certain extent, brought under ecclesiastical organization, if the distance precluded a special journey to Rome, his ordination was delegated to another bishop. Of this an instance occurs in connexion with the archbishoprics of York and Canterbury in the time of Honorius, who empowered the surviving archbishop to ordain a successor on a vacancy occurring in either see (Bede, H. E. ii. 18).

It would appear, however, to be beyond doubt that in pagan lands such powers were only delegated for a time by the Roman pontiff, and were resumable at pleasure. Of this, strong presumptive evidence is afforded in the 28th canon of the council of Chalcedon, already quoted (supra, p. 1664). The endeavour here made to claim for the see of Constantinople rights precisely corresponding (ἴσα πρεσβεῖα) to those of the see of Rome, involves the assertion of the right of the bishop of Constantinople to ordain, not merely the metropolitans of Pontus, Asia, and Thrace, but also the bishops "in sorte praedicationis" among the pagan communities still existing in those provinces, ἔτι δὲ καὶ τοὺς ἐν τοῖς βαρβαρικοῖς ἐπισκόπους τῶν προειρημένων διοικήσεων (Mansi, vii. 427). The proviso in this latter clause would seem to have been designed to complete the parallelism between the jurisdiction of the primate of Constantinople and that of the Roman pontiff, an attempt which was met by the indignant repudiation of Leo.

Among such communities themselves the theory that prevailed appears to have varied with the particular conditions and circumstances. At first, the papal claims would be received with ready assent, such as a sense of filial gratitude would naturally dictate. When, however, ecclesiastical power became associated with political power, there arose a spirit of greater independence, like that from time to time exhibited among those nations of the West whose conversion belonged to a much earlier period. We learn, for example, from Bede (H. E. iii. 29) that Wighard was sent to Rome to receive his consecration as archbishop of Canterbury at the hands of pope Deusdedit, "to the end that he might ordain catholic priests for the churches of the English nation throughout all Britain;" archbishop Theodore, again, was ordained at Rome by Vitalian (ib. iv. 1). Yet notwithstanding, only a few years after the ordination of Theodore, we find Alfrid, king of Northumbria, refusing to recognise the right of Wilfrid to the bishopric of York, though the election of the latter had twice been confirmed by popes Agatho and John V. "I will not," said the monarch, "alter one word of a sentence issued by myself, the archbishop, and all the dignitaries of the land, for a writing coming, as ye say, from the apostolic chair" (Milman, Lat. Christianity, bk. iv. c. 4).

Again the tone of English ecclesiasticism changes, and within little more than half a century Boniface, in Frankland, announces to Cuthbert, in terms already referred to (supra, p. 1660) a full recognition, on the part of the Frankish bishops and their metropolitans, of the supreme and final authority of the pope—"Decrevimus . . . subjectionem Romanae ecclesiae fine tenus vitae nostrae velle servare; sancto Petro et vicario ejus velle subjici; . . . metropolitanos pallia ab illa sede quaerere et per omnia praecepta sancti Petri canonice sequi desiderare, ut inter oves sibi commendatas numeremur" (Epist. 63; Migne, lxxxix. 763). But it is evident that this deferential spirit was succeeded by something approaching to insubordination; for, a few years after, Boniface writes to entreat the indulgence of pope Zachary for the non-fulfilment of the above engagements, especially "de palliis a Romana ecclesia petendis," "quia quod promiserunt tardantes non impleverunt, et adhuc differtur et ventilatur" (Epist. 75; Migne, lxxxix. 778). "How difficult it was to overcome the repugnance of the Teutonic prelates, is manifest in the fact that St. Lull, the especial disciple of St. Boniface, in whose favour the latter exercised the exceptional privilege accorded him of nominating a successor to the primatial see of Mainz, though appointed in 754, had not yet sought the pallium in 772, when Adrian I. wrote to Tilpin of Rheims, ordering him to investigate the doctrine and virtues of Lull, and, if the result was satisfactory, to give him a certificate, on the strength of which the pallium would be sent to him. It was evident that some additional inducements were necessary to overcome this aversion and to bind the hierarchy to the throne of St. Peter" (Lea, H. C. Studies in Church History, p. 138). Thomassin, indeed, is of opinion that the oath administered by Boniface was an entirely exceptional measure, justified, however, to a certain extent, by the neglected state into which ecclesiastical discipline had fallen in Frankland; and he maintains (II. ii. 44, §11; 45, §7) that throughout the reign of Charles the Great there is no trace of any oath of obedience taken either by Frankish metropolitans or bishops to the pope. This assertion can be accepted only in conjunction with his peculiar view, that the acceptance of the pallium did not involve any acknowledgment of submission to Rome, for both the bishops of Bourges and of Metz received that vestment at the hands of Hadrian I. (Mansi, xii. 834; xiii. 909). On the other hand, throughout Charles's reign it is evident that the papal pretensions in Frankland assumed a very modest guise, and were little more than honorary in character; the relations established between the papacy and the Frankish monarchy secured to the latter full powers over the church within its own dominions; and we find Leidradus, metropolitan of Lyons, when writing to Charles, implying that his appointment to his episcopal dignity had been due entirely to the monarch himself, "ad regimen ecclesiæ Lugdunensis destinare voluistis" (Migne, xcix. 871).

In the year 877, pope John VIII. at the synod of Ravenna, ordered that all metropolitans should be deprived of their sees who failed to apply for the pallium within three months of consecration—"a regulation," says Lea, "which met with little more respect than previous like attempts" (Studies in Church Hist. p. 87).

Resignations.—It is confirmatory of the negative conclusions to which the foregoing evidence points, that the resignation of the episcopal office seems never to have required the assent of the pope. Instances adduced to the contrary are of far too dubious a character, and too rare to be accepted as in any degree tending to invalidate this general fact. A letter, addressed by Leo I. in 458, to Rusticus, bishop of Narbonne, who has intimated his wish to seek "vacationem ab episcopatus laboribus," on account of his despondency at the religious condition of his diocese, proves nothing more than that Leo, on this occasion, assumed the part of a friendly adviser (Epist. clxvii.; Migne, liv. 1415). The same observation applies to another instance, the remonstrance of Martin I. (A.D. 649–55) with Amandus, bishop of Maestricht, under similar circumstances (ib. lxxxvii. 155).

Examples cited by Phillips, belonging to the 9th century, that of one Vilicarius applying for the papal license to resign his charge, when permission had been withheld by the provincial synod, and that of Wenilo, archbishop of Sens, soliciting the intervention of Nicholas I. to procure the deposition of Herimann, bishop of Nevers, who was incapacitated for the discharge of his duties by imbecility, undoubtedly carry more weight. But the evidence collected by Thomassin (ed. Bourassé, ii. 919–22) is far more convincing, as tending to establish the conclusion that, even in the 9th century, the authority of the pope was appealed to only as a last resource, and generally with the view of confirming the decision of a provincial council (see also Thomassin, Vetus et Nova Eccles. Discipl. II. ii. 53, §§ 1, 2, 3, and 11), but that usually such questions were held to be rightly within the cognizance and authority of the diocesan bishops.

iii. Claim to present to all benefices.

This claim on the part of the Roman pontiff, which Milman affirms to have been "unknown until the 12th century" (Lat. Christianity, bk. xiii. c. 10), is certainly not to be recognized within our period. The precedents cited by the canonists are, for the most part, taken from instances of the exertion of metropolitan authority within the Roman diocese, or are only to be looked upon as cases wherein the advice of the pope was sought and given, without any notion on either side that it partook of the nature of a command.

We find, for example, Innocent I. instructing Marcianus, bishop of Naissus, in Illyricum, to appoint to offices in the church the presbyters and deacons whom his predecessor, Bonosus, prior to his sentence and degradation, had consecrated to such offices—"eos recipiendos esse censemus" (Coustant, ed. Schoenemann, p. 573). It is to be observed, however, that the authority here exercised relates to matters within the province of Illyricum, over which, ever since the time of Damasus, Rome had asserted metropolitan jurisdiction [METROPOLITAN, ad fin.]; the instance consequently fails as proof of the more general application (see Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, ii. 7–9).

A more relevant instance is that of Celestine I. who, when writing in the year 430 to the clergy and laity of Constantinople, enjoins that all bishops or priests whom Nestorius had deposed or excommunicated shall be regarded as still possessing their benefices and privileges—"aperte sedis nostræ sanxit auctoritas, nullum sive episcopum, sive clericum, seu professione aliqua Christianum, qui a Nestorio vel ejus similibus . . . vel loco suo vel communione dejecti sunt, vel ejectum vel excommunicatum videri" (Coustant, pp. 816–829). Here, however, it is to be remembered that the interference of Rome had been invoked by the contending parties, and that its assertion in the Eastern capital represented an altogether abnormal condition of affairs. When Leo the Great, some years later, appears as intervening between Anatolius, bishop of Constantinople, and the archdeacon Aëtius, with the former had deprived of his office, his language—"quem tamen pietati vestræ commendare præsumo" (Migne, Patrol. liv. 1156), is of a very different character; and the argument of Phillips (Kirchenrecht, v. 490) that, to quote the language of John of Salisbury, "the requests of the pope are mandates," involves the anachronism of confusing the status of the papacy in the 5th and the 12th centuries.

Other instances, such as when Simplicius inflicts a penalty on Gaudentius, bishop of Aufinum, for ordaining priests, "contra statuta canonum ac nostra præcepta," and directs two other bishops to deprive him of the future exercise of such power, "totam penitus auferri præcipimus potestatem" (Thiel. Epist. Rom. Pont. p. 176); or when Gelasius issues stringent regulations to the bishops of Lucania, Bruttii, and Sicily, with respect to the ordination of the clergy and their appointment to cures (ib. pp. 360–379), are invalid as a general argument, from the fact that they occur within the Roman diocese, where, at this period, such authority was unquestionably wielded by the Roman pontiff.

In all but the last of the foregoing instances, it will be seen that the occasion for the papal interference arose out of an exceptional position of affairs, and thus turns very much upon the fundamental question of appellate jurisdiction [APPEAL, p. 130]. Other instances, cited by Phillips and Thomassin, belonging to the pontificate of Gregory the Great, exhibit again the following important qualifying conditions: (α) that they occur within the diocese over which the Roman pontiff claimed metropolitan rights; (β) that Gregory himself appears, where practicable, to have first consulted the bishop of the district; (γ) that they occur at a period when political circumstances might warrant an occasional extraordinary exertion of the papal influence. For example, when Gregory bestows the monastery of St. Theodorus at Messana on Paulinus, bishop of Taurinae. he first consulted with the metropolitan of the district, Felix, bishop of Messana, to whom he writes: "quod etiam te voluisse, jam ejus [sc. Paulini] relatione didicimus" (Epist. bk. i. 41; Migne, lxxvii. 528); while, when writing to Felix, a subdeacon, with reference to the same transaction, he says:—"quam rem venerabili Felici ejusdem civitatis episcopo nos significasse cognosce, ut praeter suam notitiam in diocesi sibi commissa, ordinatum quippiam contristetur" (Epist. i. 42; ib. lxxvii. 529). With reference to the ordination of Paulinus himself to the bishopric of Lipara, Gregory writes to Paulinus, to say that he has already expressed his wish in the matter to Maximianus, the metropolitan: "Maximiano fratri et coepiscopo scripsimus ut fraternitatem tuam ecclesiae Liparitanae ex nostra auctoritate praeesse constituat" (Epist. ii. 17; ib. lxxvii. 580). Similarly, when recommending a deacon as a proper recipient of a stipend, he writes to the same Maximianus: "sive ut officium diaconatus expleat, seu certe ut sola ejusdem officii pro sustentanda paupertate sua commoda consequatur, in tuae fraternitatis volumus hoc pendere judicio" (Epist. iv. 14; ib. lxxvii. 695).

But to whatever point we may assume the papal authority to have advanced in this respect, with the age of Gregory, it may be regarded as certain that it was not only held in check, but almost entirely set aside, by political events after his time. Neither in England, nor in Frankland under the Merovingian and Carolingian dynasties (save for a brief period following the arrival of Boniface), was there any disposition to admit the assertion of these claims; and it is not until nearly the close of the 12th century that the appearance of "epistolae monitoriae," "praeceptoriae," and "executoriae" indicate that such powers were asserted and enforced.

(iv.) Claim to temporal power.

(1) Patrimonium.—The foundation of the church of St. John Lateran by Constantine the Great, is probably the only foundation of the kind in Rome which can be attributed with much probability to that monarch. At the same time he bestowed upon the bishop of Rome for a residence, that portion of the Lateran palace [LATERAN] which was known as the "domus Faustae" (Gregorovius, Gesch. d. Stadt Rom, i. 87), and here the first Lateran synod was held, in the year 313. It was in the same reign that the church acquired the right of possessing estates, and receiving bequests of landed property from individuals. The revenues thus obtained were always supposed to be devoted to charitable purposes, a law of Constantine of the year 326 pronouncing it fit that "the poor should be sustained by the riches of the churches" (Cod. Theod. xii. i. 6). Under this plea the church at Rome soon acquired widespread possessions; and in the year 432 we find Celestine, the bishop, writing to Theodosius II., and entreating his protection for certain estates of the see in Asia, which a lady named Proba, the representative of an ancient house, had bequeathed for the maintenance of "the clergy, the poor, and certain monasteries" (Coustant, ed. Schoen. p. 879). Long before the time of Gregory the Great, the "patrimonium Petri," as it was termed, was represented by large estates in Southern Italy, Sicily, Corsica, Africa, and Dalmatia. "Ever since the extinction of the Western empire had emancipated the ecclesiastical potentate from secular control, the first and most abiding object of his schemes and prayers had been the acquisition of territorial wealth in the neighbourhood of his capital. He had, indeed, a sort of justification—for Rome, a city with neither trade nor industry, was crowded with poor, for whom it devolved on the bishop to provide" (Bryce, Holy Roman Empire, p. 42). In pursuance of this theory, we find Gregory himself speaking of such property as "res pauperum" (Migne, lxxvii. 834); his allusions to it are frequent. He refers, for instance, to lands in Gaul, "patrimoniolum ecclesiae nostrae quae illic constitutum est" (Letter to Brunichild, Migne, lxxvii. 836); in Sicily near Catana (ib. lxxvii. 593), but these latter appear to have been wrested from the church by Leo the Isaurian, A.D. 730 (Le Quien, i. 97); in Sardinia (Migne, lxxvii. 926), in the Cottian Alps, in Illyricum, and in the cities "of Otranto, Gallipoli, perhaps Norcia, Nepi, Cuma, Capua, Corsealano, Naples, Palermo, and Syracuse" (Milman, Lat. Christianity, ii. 115).

The "donatio patrimonii Alpium Cottiae," presented to the Roman see in 703, by Aripert, king of the Lombards, was wrested from its possession by Luitprand, who, however, moved by the remonstrances of Gregory II., again restored the territory (Anast. Greg. II.; Muratori, Script. III. i. 154). After this time no further reference to this patrimony is discoverable, and it appears to have been finally lost to Rome in the troubles that marked the second quarter of the 8th century.

(2) Political sovereignty. The commencement of the political authority of the Roman pontiff is perhaps to be discerned in the discharge of certain civic duties, with which, like the bishops of other important cities, he was entrusted on behalf of the imperial power (Phillips, Kirchenrecht, iii. 37). These functions date back as far as the 4th century. The supreme civil authority of the city appears, however, to have been wielded by the prefect, and at a later period by the "dux" or duke of Rome. The beginning of a really independent authority has been referred (Sugenheim, Entste ung und Ausbildung des Kirchenstaates, p. 9) to the occasion when Peter the "dux" having been driven from the city, in the pontificate of Gregory II., it is supposed that a kind of republic was formed, with the pope as chief administrator. This conjecture, however, is wanting in any real historical basis (Gregorovius, ii. 258), and the commencement of the "States of the Church" is more correctly referred to the year 727, when, according to Anastasius, Luitprand, after he had taken and plundered the town of Sutri, the possession of the emperor, offered it, at the request of Gregory II., as a gift to the apostles Peter and Paul (Muratori, Script. III. i. 157).

The real "donatio" dates from the year 754, when Pepin le Bref, at a council held at Quiercy, bestowed upon Stephen III. the territory which he had wrested from the Lombards, consisting of Ravenna and the Pentapolis, a tract of country to the east of the Apennines, stretching northwards from Ancona and the city of Comaclum. According to Anastasius, Desiderius, the vanquished Lombard monarch, had already vowed to present this territory to the Roman pontiff (ib. III. i. 171; Jaffé, Regest. R. Pont. 193–4).

The munificence of Pepin was rivalled by that of his son. When, in the year 774, Charles (who was then little more than thirty years of age) visited Rome, the donation of his father was made the ground for soliciting a yet larger grant. It is difficult to acquit Hadrian on this occasion of deliberate falsification of the deed conveying Pepin's grant, for when read by that pontiff to the monarch it was found to include territories before unheard of as part of the original gift. "Some of these," says Greenwood, "had never belonged to the exarchate of Ravenna, as it existed under the Greek dynasty, nor had ever been comprised within it at any time since the Lombard invasion of 568. Of this deed, as read by the pope, Charlemagne himself was entirely ignorant." The territory conceded by Charles, "per designationem confinium," was marked, according to Anastasius, by a line commencing at the port of Luna and taking in Corsica, then passing on to Surianum, Mons Bardonus, and Vercetum, from thence to Parma, Reggio, Mantua, Monselice, taking in the whole exarchate of Ravenna (sicut antiquitus erat), together with the provinces of Venetia and Histria, and the duchies of Spoleto and Beneventum (Muratori, Script. III. i. 186). "It should be observed," continues Greenwood, "that Spoleto and Beneventum had been in fact all along integral portions of the Lombard kingdom; moreover, it is known that Pippin did not dismember that kingdom in favour of the pope, and that those duchies were not comprised in the surrenders which Pippin extorted from Aistulph in pursuance of the treaties of Pontyon and Quiercy. . . . The donation executed by Charlemagne, at the request of Hadrian, was, in fact, an entirely new grant, comprising indeed much of the older claim, but extending it to at least double the area stipulated for in the prior donation" (Cath. Petri, ii. 414; Hefele, Conciliengesch. iii. 541).

Out of these successive donations arose the story of the "Donation of Constantine," first alleged as a fact in a letter of Hadrian to Constantine and Irene, 26th Oct. 785 (Mansi, xii. 1056; xiii. 527). According to this fabrication, Constantine the Great, on being cured of the leprosy by the intercession of pope Sylvester, determined, on the fourth day from his baptism to quit Rome and found a new capital on the Bosporus, in order that the supreme ecclesiastical power of the West might have free scope, and no longer be overshadowed by the presence of the imperial authority. He accordingly not only made over to Sylvester the Lateran palace, but also invested him with the diadem, the phrygium, the collar, and the purple cloak, "et omnia imperialia indutamenta." The clergy of Rome were to be attired in similar fashion. Finally, Rome itself, together with all the provinces of Italy and the West, were presented to Sylvester as "universal pope"—"ubi enim principatus sacerdotum et Christianae religionis caput ab imperatore coelesti constitutum est, justum non est ut illic imperator terrenus habeat potestatem" (Gratian, Corp. Juris Can. Dist. xcvi. cc. 13, 14).

This forgery (first challenged by Cusanus and Valla in the 15th century) having long been abandoned as spurious by the chief authorities in the Romish church itself (Döllinger, Papstfabeln, pp. 52–62), it will be unnecessary here to adduce the data for such a conclusion.

PORCH. [NARTHEX.]

PORCH [compare NARTHEX]. Dr. Neale (Eastern Ch. Introd. p. 215) says of Eastern churches that "the προαύλιον, or porch, is usually, where it exists at all, at the west end, and reaches from the north to the south of the narthex: it is sometimes a lean-to against the west end of the narthex, but oftener it forms with the narthex one lean-to against the west end of the nave . . . Occasionally . . the προαύλιον, though at the west end, is simply like an English porch; and sometimes there are north and south porches. . . . The north, south, and west sides are open between the piers on which the προαύλιον is supported; the east side . . is usually adorned with mosaics or frescoes, usually of infernal punishments. Commonly the προαύλιον opens with three doors into the narthex . . . Against the east side there is a seat of marble or stone, or—in poor churches—of wood." [C.]

PORTRAITS. It is probable that very many of the Oranti, or praying figures in the catacombs, both male and female, may be portraits or memorial figures of the dead. Such representations were quite in accordance with Roman family habits of sepulchral observance, and respect for ancestors passed away; and would be, in fact, a kind of Christian "Imagines." Those of Probus and Proba (see woodcut) are beautiful and pathetic in a high degree. Two medallion portraits, one of which, to judge by the engraving, must have been a marked likeness of considerable merit, occur in the cemetery of St. Priscilla (see Bottari, tavv. clx. clxi.). Both the medallions appear to be of military men, and Bottari mentions a conjecture that seventy-two soldiers martyred under Numerianus, with Claudius their tribune, may have been buried in that spot. They seem to be of the same rather early date, as their proportions are relatively good, and small loculi have been cut through the pictures into the wall.

Many figures in the mosaics are undoubtedly portraits, as those of Justinian and Theodora in the church of St. Vitale at Ravenna. (See Crowe and Cavalcaselle, Hist. of Painting in Italy, i. 27, and Gally Knight's Italian Architecture, where the colours of the mosaic are beautifully given; also Ricci's series of photographs, and the copies at South Kensington.) The marked countenances of many saints of the Eastern church in all mosaics, and, indeed, on many cups and glasses, can hardly be ideals. (See Buonarroti, Osservazione, &c., x.–xiii.) [R. St. J. POTTERY. The greater part of the objects made of clay, which bear Christian devices, symbols, or inscriptions, will be found under LAMPS; but there are also some others, for the description of which a few words may suffice. There is a class of small flat, circular, terra-cotta bottles, with two handles attached to the body a little below the neck, the short neck rising a little above them, which appear to have been designed for holding holy oil. On all of them, either on one side or on both, a standing figure is represented between two animals, sometimes very rudely modelled, but which appear in every case to have been intended for camels. Some of these, probably the greater number, are uninscribed; but a few bear the name of Menas, who died a martyr for the faith in the persecution under Galerius Maximinus or Maximianus at Alexandria (see Garrucci's remarks in Archaeologia, vol. xliv. p. 323, on the confusion of the two saints of the same name). To this saint, as it seems most probable, this whole class of ampullae or chrismaria belongs, which were in all likelihood made exclusively in Egypt as memorials of pilgrimage to his tomb (which was nine miles distant from Alexandria) and to hold oil brought from it. They are supposed by M. de Rossi to have been manufactured in the 6th and 7th centuries. They may be arranged chronologically as follows:—

(1) On one side the inscription ΕΥΛΟ ‖ ΓΙΑ ΤΟΥ ‖ ΑΓΙΟΥ Μ ‖ ΗΝΑ[a] in four lines on the body of the cruse, followed by a small rude cross of four nearly equal limbs: below in another line three pellets, all enclosed in a circle, and this again in a wreath. On the other side a draped figure with extended arms, an orante (details of drapery, &c., obscure); below each arm a very rudely designed animal, on each side of the head a cross as before, all inclosed in a circle, surrounded by a circle of beads, and that again inclosed in a circle. Height (when perfect) about 4 inches; diameter of body, 2⅝ inches. Figured and described from an example found at Arles, in De Rossi's Bullett. di Arch. Crist. for 1869, pp. 20, 31, 32. De Rossi (u. s.) notes that other specimens occur in museums (public or private) in Paris, Rome, London, and also in Montauban (found at Memphis) as well as Marseilles, Aix and Turin (also found in Egypt). Another in the Halles Museum at Brussels, of pale yellow clay, has ΤΟΥ ΑΓΙΟΥ ΜΗΝΑ only, as it would seem, but the description is defective (De Rossi, Bull. 1872, pp. 25–30).

(2) On both sides an orante as before, but with distinct circular nimbus (no crosses near the neck), dressed in military costume; the cloak (paludamentum) is buckled round the right shoulder, and the cuirass comes down nearly to the knees. A rude animal (a camel) is on either side his body. Across the body of the cruse, near the neck of the figure, ΟΑΓΙΟC ΜΗΝΑC (ΜΗΝ ligated) in one line. Diameter of body of cruse, nearly 4½ inches; the height must have been fully 6 inches. Figured and described by De Rossi, Bull. 1869, pp. 44, 46. Found at Alexandria. (In the Florence Museum.)

Clay Oil-cruse of St. Menas. (De Rossi.)

(3) A nimbed orante, nearly as in No. 2 (without crosses); very rude camels on either side, but in place of Greek inscription S. M. (i.e. S. Menas) on either side of the neck (the S is clear, the M is much blurred). The reverse has a Maltese cross inclosed in a circle or wreath of palm branches; this again is included in a circle in which three pellets alternate with one barleycorn, there being twelve pellets and four barleycorns. Of hard red clay; part of one handle missing. Height, 3¼ inches; diameter of body, 2½ inches. Found in Lower Egypt; formerly in the Allemant collection. (See below, under No. 4.)

(4) Uninscribed. On both sides an orante, as No. 1, with the same adjuncts. Three specimens from Alexandria in the Florence Museum (De Rossi, Bull. 1869, p. 46). Two others of soft pale yellowish clay, diameter of body about 3 inches, height nearly 4 inches; both from Lower Egypt (Allemant, Collect. d'Antiquités égypt. part of Nos. 520–531, p. 85, Lond. 1878; now in the collection of the writer, as well as the foregoing, forming part of the same lot). One said to have been found in the cemetery of St. Cyriaca in 1830, now in the Le Noirs collection, is figured in Perret, Catacombes, vol. iv. pl. xx. n. 6. The ampullae with full inscriptions would (as De Rossi observes) naturally be the most ancient, those with shorter inscriptions would come next, and those with no inscription would be latest of all, the type having then become known (Bull. 1872, p. 30).

(5) There remains another example of this class, which entirely resembles no. 3 on the side bearing the figure of Menas, except that it has two crosses in place of S. M.; but the reverse has a monogram plainly reading ΠΕΤΡΟΥ inclosed within a circle, and this again within a circle of scroll-work. Clay of a yellowish colour. Height, 3¼ inches; diameter of body, 2½ inches. Preserved in the College of the Barnabite Fathers in Moncalieri, near Turin (De Rossi, Bull. 1872, p. 26. tav. ii. nos. 4 and 5).

De Rossi, while fully admitting that this figure between camels must be Menas, thinks with great probability that the Peter of the reverse is St. Peter, bishop of Alexandria, also a martyr, who died in the persecutions of Diocletian. His cemetery near Alexandria is mentioned by the monk Epiphanius, a writer of the 11th century, in close connexion with the sepulchre of St. Menas (pp. 5, 6, ed. Dressel. Lips. 1843). It is just possible, however, that Peter may be the potter's name.[b]

[a] Eulogia, a word used primarily for the bread in the Eucharist, then for loaves distributed after it to the faithful, is also extended to 'other pledges of heavenly blessings' (De Rossi), and occurs not only on these ficile chrismaria, but on one of those metal ones preserved in Monza Cathedral, where we have ΕΥΛΟΓΙΑ ΚΥΡΙΟΥ ΤΩΝ ΑΓΙΩΝ (sic) ΤΟΠΩΝ, on which Kirchoff observes (in Böckh. C. I. G. n. 8977) that the sacred oil is so called 'ut pote Domino pro sacrificio oblatum,' and refers to Du Cange, Gloss. i. p. 44; see De Rossi, Bull. 1869, p. 31, and 1872, p. 7: also Eulogiae.

[b] Since most of the above was in type, Mr. Franks has kindly called the writer's attention to a paper in the Archaeologia, vol. xliv. by Mr. A. Nesbitt "On a Box of Carved Ivory of the Sixth Century," representing the Acts of St. Menas; at the conclusion (pp. 329, 330) is a description of the flasks of the same saint, which were in the British Museum in 1876. They are nineteen in number, and except one, which was found in Calymnos, were all found in Egypt; eleven are inscribed, eight are not so. They more or less resemble those which have been mentioned above; some, indeed, are exactly like no. 3 (above). Two of them have profile heads of St.

The camels, which are the invariable concomitants of Menas, were suggested by M. de Rossi to be reminiscences of the desert of Libya, of which Menas was governor during his life, and regarded as the protector after his death. But the Acts of St. Menas say that he, before undergoing martyrdom, ordered that his body should be placed after his death on camels, and that the beasts should be left free, and "that they would see the glory of God manifest," i.e. by their bearing it to the spot where God willed that his sanctuary should be erected (Garrucci, u. s.).

There are in the British Museum a few other flasks bearing different types and of different forms, which were probably used for the same purpose.

(1) Ampulla without handles. On one side three arcades with coronae hanging from them: cross and two branches above them; below (retrograde) ΚῩ ΕΛΕΗ CON; below the inscription a rude bird. On the other side the same types with a continuation of the inscription (also retrograde) TH CIONKET (i.e. Κύριε, ἐλέησον τὴν Σιονκέτ, a woman's name). Height between 3 and 4 inches. From Egypt.

The following small ampullae have two small perforated handles:

(2) Greek cross on both sides impressed with concentric circles; similar markings in the two upper compartments on both sides of the body; circles round the neck.

(3) Greek cross on both sides; rays between the limbs; extremities of limbs forked. Recently brought from Egypt by the Rev. G. J. Chester.

(4) Figure (of a saint) at full length, holding long cross in left hand, and grasping snake by the head with the other; the same types on both sides. This and the preceding are narrower in form than no. (2).

Other kinds of fictile vessels, bearing marks of Christianity, occur but rarely. There is an amphora, found in the cemetery of St. Cyriaca, now in the Lateran Museum, which is stamped in intaglio upon the neck with SPES | IN DEO (De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Crist. 1872, p. 12).[c]

A few Christian stamps on brick and tile are now to be mentioned. A fragment of brick found in Rome has ΧΜΓ ΚΑCCIOY stamped upon it in a circular form, and in the centre the usual chrisma (☧) rudely drawn within a circle. Cassius is doubtless the master of the brick-kiln. Χ.Μ.Γ, as De Rossi gives reasons for thinking, may stand for Χριστὸς, Μιχαὴλ, Γαβριὴλ (Bull. 1870, pp. 7–31, tav. iii. n. 2). A fragment of tile, found at Piacenza, has the same chrisma, also very rude, accompanied by some scarcely legible marks, which may perhaps form the word NIKA (De Rossi, u. s. p. 32, tav. ii. n. 2). A brick found in the Roman catacombs in 1849 has a stamp bearing two concentric circles. Within the outer circle is the word CLAVDIANA (the name of the owner of the manufactory); accompanied by an ivy-leaf: within the inner circle is the chrisma of the ordinary form (Perret, Catacombes, t. iv. pl. xx. n. 13, and t. vi. p. 119). But it is in Spain perhaps more especially that tiles and bricks stamped with Christian inscriptions have been found; they have been collected by Hübner (Inscr. Hisp. Christ. pp. 65, 66). Some are not altogether intelligible; the more remarkable of the others are as follows: (1) BRACARI VI | VAS CUM TVIS (in two lines); between them A ☧ ω (Hübner, n. 193, who mentions that many examples of this tile have been found in various parts of Hispania Baetica). (2) Chrisma with loop to left; followed by CHIONI VIVAS (retrograde) (n. 196). (3) Alpha and Omega (Ω), chrisma between them in one line in a line below FELIX ASELLA. This form of the Omega, if correctly given, is perhaps unique in this connexion (n. 197). Others have SPES IN DEO and the chrisma (n. 203, 6). Tiles of the same general character, some of early date, some of Ostrogothic times have been met with in Italy (De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Crist. 1872, p. 12). Fragments of tiles found in Strasbourg in a tomb were stamped with a label inclosing the inscription ARBOASTIS EPS FICET (fecit). He died about 679 A.D., and was evidently in possession of the manufacture of these tiles (Le Blant, Inscr. chrét. de la Gaule, n. 350, pl. 39, n. 233).

On a vase, probably a cup, of red clay, found between Saint-Léger-sur-Dheune and Chagny are scratched three Latin crosses, two of them with a rude heart-shaped figure at the base, and the third surrounded by a like figure; on the upper rim is inscribed in retrograde and inverted letters the potter's name PISTILLVS, which occurs on other examples of Gaulish pottery; also, both near it and near the crosses, the letters ZVV (in various combinations), which have not been explained. Supposed to belong "aux premiers temps du christianisme." Shape nearly cylindrical, slightly increasing above; no handles. Height said to be 0·138; breadth, 0·009 [0·039?]. (Le Blant, u. s. n. 6, pl. 1, n. 2.) Remains of tile and also of pottery have been found in Christian tombs in Gaul,[d] belonging in some cases to vases too large to have been placed there whole, Menas (?) with curly hair. The other variations need hardly be mentioned here. In the same paper (pp. 322, 323) are remarks relating to these flasks by Padre Garrucci in a letter to Mr. Nesbitt. One is figured in the Revue Archéologique, vol. i. (1844), p. 405, and others in a recent volume of the same work, not seen by the writer. The Museum has acquired other flasks of St. Menas since 1876; among them is a large example (from Egypt) which may possibly be intended for some other saint. It shews a naked figure with nimbus between two bulls and two other animals, perhaps meant for bears.

[c] A piece of a handle of a wine amphora found at Binchester, now preserved in the Museum at Newcastle, has the potter's name V R F | enclosed in an oblong label, a Greek cross (approaching the Maltese) being inserted between R and F. Dr. Bruce (Roman Wall, p. 411, 3rd ed.) is unwilling to recognise it as a Christian symbol, probably rightly.

[d] Perret (Catacombes de Rome, vol. iv. pl. iii. and pl. vi.) figures many pieces of pottery, which (as he justly remarks) would be of little interest, were they not found in the catacombs (the exact localities are not given): among them are jugs (two forms), open cups without handles (either plain or with protuberances), and others with loops for suspension; also long pointed amphorae, others with swelling bodies and flat bottoms. Described in vol. vi. pp. 109, 110. As they are the ordinary Roman pottery of the period no more need be said about them. See also Guenebault, Dict. Iconogr. s. v. "Vases."

on which are scratched the proper names of the persons buried,* accompanied sometimes by the cross or chrisma, or the symbols occur alone. (See Le Blant, u. s. pl. 17, 18, 19, 20.) One which M. Le Blant supposes to be of the 4th century (n. 155) has VIVAS IN DEO, followed by a palm scratched on a piece of glazed red pottery of classic times (Samian ware); and the Louvre has similar fragments with Greek Christian inscriptions drawn with the point. A terracotta weight (n. 160) has VIBAS, with palm and chrisma engraved on its sides.

It may be added that on fragments of Egyptian pottery a few Greek Christian inscriptions are written in ink, containing verses from the Gospels and from the hymn trisagion, which were perhaps used as charms. They are probably of the 7th or 8th century. (Böckh, C. I. G. Nos. 9060–9063). [C. B.]

POVERTY, VOWS OF. In order to arrive at a correct and philosophical view of this wide subject, it must be remembered that the self-imposition of poverty is not exclusively, is not (it might be said) even principally Christian.

As an example of it in Greek paganism it will be enough to cite the case of Crates, the wealthy Theban, casting away a mass of gold when he went to live the life of philosophy at Athens.

In the ancient religion of India it is generally understood that voluntary poverty occurs; but to remove all vagueness and doubt upon the subject, one or two authorities may be conveniently presented here.

In the code of Menu, then, which is of supreme obligation, we find this direction laid down for the man who would make progress in religion:—"From devout Brahmins let him receive alms to support life" (Institutes of Menu, ch. vi. 27, Calcutta, 1794). At a later period we meet with the same ideas in a still more precise form in the Institutes of Akbar, where one of the five subdivisions of the state called Jowg Sumpergeyat is Appergerreh, "not holding any worldly possessions, but considering them as the cause of every kind of unhappiness." (Institutes of Akber, translated from the Persian by F. Gladwin, Calcutta, 1786, vol. iii. p. 140.) And finally, in our own century, the devout Hindu who professes penance is thus described by Mill:—"Repairing to a forest . . . and leaving all property and all worldly duties behind him, he is there directed to live on pure food, on certain herbs, roots, and fruit, which he may collect in the forest, to wear a black antelope's hide, or a vesture of bark, to suffer the hairs of his head, his beard, and his nails to grow continually" (History of British India, bk. 2, ch. 6). It will be observed that these are phrases which might be exactly applied to the life of many a Christian hermit.

In the history of monasticism the vow of poverty is one factor of the famous triplet which constituted profession (religionis professio)—obedience, poverty, and chastity, (continentia, castitas). The vow is divided by canonists into two classes: (1) simplex, (2) solenne. The solemn vow is that made with certain approved formalities in a religious body; when these formalities are absent the vow is termed simple. It was probably under a vow of this latter kind (if under any at all) that the early ascetae practised poverty. It is mostly under a vow of the solemn kind that the religious Orders have in subsequent times undertaken that life. (See Aquinas, Summa. Secundæ Secundae, q. 88, and Cajetan's Comment.) Aquinas argues that even if a monk becomes a bishop he is not absolved from his vow of poverty. He ought to have nothing of his own, but ought to be, as it were, the dispenser of common property (ib. q. 88 xi.).

We can, however, trace the fact of a self-inflicted poverty, long before we have any satisfactory evidence of a vow to undergo it. There is no occasion to seek the prototype of such a life in that disdain of material things which is in one degree or another a characteristic of most forms of religious thought, and which, as we have seen above, found expression in the Brahmanism of ancient India, and the polytheism of ancient Greece, as well as in modern Christianity. The ultimate motive of the system is to be found, no doubt, in the infirmities of man himself; but when we are considering it as a feature in the asceticism which is specifically Christian, it is enough to notice that the germ of it was ready from the first, both in the life our Lord Himself and in certain texts of the New Testament. Just as there were words in Scripture which seemed to demand, and in some cases actually produced, the sacrifice of self-mutilation, so there were words which seemed to imply that possession was, if not a sin, at least a hindrance to Christian life. It was inevitable that "Go and sell all that thou hast" should be taken in the full severity of the letter.

Whatever be the solution of the vexed question as to the origin and name of the early Ebionites, it seems certain that they made a profession of poverty, esteeming the world, and all its allurements, as the property of Satan (see Mr. Soames' learned note on Mosheim, Hist. bk. i. cent. 2, part ii. ch. v. s. 2).

In the middle of the first century of the Christian era we learn from Philo (quoted by Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. ii. 17) that the Therapeutae divested themselves of their property before withdrawing into the wilderness. The Greek historian suggests that this was probably intended as an imitation of the practice of the first Christians in the Acts, who sold their lands and laid the price at the Apostles' feet. The spirit of voluntary poverty in early days is well illustrated in the life of St. Spyridion, bishop of Trimython in Cyprus, in the 4th century, who was so far a devotee of poverty that he lent his money without interest (Sozom. Eccl. Hist. i. xi.). But the life of poverty, says the Greek historian just now quoted, was carried to "the summit of exactness and perfection" by Antony, the great monk (ὁ μέγας μοναχός). Many other instances of the same form of asceticism in the 4th century are recorded in the first book of Sozomen's Ecclesiastical History.

In the following century we reach the time of St. Benedict of Nursia, the founder of the celebrated monastic rule that bears his name. The formal vow of poverty was one of the three vows that were exacted of all postulants for the order, the other two vows being those of chastity and obedience.

It is important to notice that we can find no trace of the formal vow of poverty earlier[a] than the Benedictine rule. It appears from the Novellae of Justinian that in his times the profession of religious life was not accompanied by any particular solemnity. Even in the monasteries of earlier days, such as St. Antony's for example, there was no formula of profession. It is obvious, however, that poverty is an essential feature of the monastic life. And this perhaps may be some explanation of a fact which might otherwise occasion some surprise—that in the formula of profession St. Benedict makes no express mention of the poverty. The novice is indeed asked three questions, which no doubt, are meant severally to correspond with the poverty, the chastity, and the obedience; but the stern demand of absolute poverty is at least very mildly phrased; it is in fact simply the question that is put throughout Christendom to every candidate for baptism, "Vultis abrenuntiare saeculo huic, et pompis ejus?" (Martene de Monach. Rit. v. 4, vol. iv. p. 223, fol. 1764). The rule, however (cap. 33), describes the condition with great minuteness of detail—no property, not even book, nor paper, nor pen, nothing at all, was the professed to have.

Precautions were always taken against inconsiderate entrance into the monastic life. And it was the concern of princes as well as of pastors to secure the existence of proper safeguards against hasty renunciation of all title to possession. We are not therefore surprised to find that simultaneously with the very rise of formal profession the emperor Justinian regulates admission by a decree (Nov. 5). Laymen were to make a novitiate of three years. [NOVICE.]

We find St. Gregory distinctly enjoining poverty on Augustine of Canterbury: "But because you, my brother, having been instructed in the rules of the monastery, ought not to live apart from your clergy in the church of the English, which by the aid of God was but lately brought to the faith, you ought to institute that conversation which was our fathers' in the beginning of the early church; among whom none of them said that anything was his own of those things which they possessed, but all things were common to them" (Bede's Eccl. Hist. i. 27; Gidley's transl. p. 65).

Amongst the examples of the life of poverty we may cite some famous names. St. Anthony, whose life was written by St. Athanasius, has perhaps the right to stand first. St. Olympia had the distinction of being under the guidance of St. Chrysostom (see Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. viii. 9). There are the pupils and friends of St. Jerome—Fabiola, Paula, Eustochium, and others. A little later we have John the patriarch of Alexandria (A.D. 616), surnamed Eleemosynarius. Other examples collected by Zoeckler (Kritische Geschichte der Askese, 1863) are more or less grotesque: Bisarion the abbot, who covered a corpse with his cloak, gave his coat to a beggar and went stark naked himself; Eleemon, who sold every one of his books, and himself performed the office of a midwife to a poor woman in the vestibule of a church; Macarius, who was so indifferent to worldly possessions that he helped the thief to complete the plunder of his dwelling; Pambo, who at once distributed amongst the poor the three hundred pounds of silver with which a lady presented him; and Agatho, who so dreaded possession that he would not even receive the solitary piece of gold that was offered him for distribution to the poor. [H. T. A.]

[a] The so-called rule of Caesarius of Arles, who is slightly earlier than St. Benedict, is ascribed by Cave to Tetradius, whom he makes exactly contemporary with St. Benedict (Hist. Lit. i. p. 513).

PRAEBENDA. A word probably derived from the daily rations issued to soldiers (Thomassin, Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. iii. 2, c. 18, § 1), and signifying the portions of food, raiment, or money, allowed to a monk or cleric. Gregory the Great, writing to Paschasius, bishop of Naples (Ep. ix. 9), speaks of a hundred solidi which were to be paid to the clergy. These allowances were distinct from the benefice [PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH]. A Capitulary of Charles the Great (Addit. iii. c. 112) provides that canons who have benefices should not claim a share in the allowances allotted to their poorer brethren, "stipendia fratrum unde pauperiores vitam sustinent nequaquam assumant." Those who offended against this statute were to be deprived of both prebend and benefice, "utrisque careant et beneficio et praebenda," and to forfeit any ecclesiastical preferment they might happen to hold. The same monarch (Sirmondi, Conc. Gall. iii. p. 637) complains that certain of the clergy neglected their parishes in order to hold a prebend in the monastery of Monte Falco. The development of the prebendal system belongs to a period beyond our present limits. [P. O.]

PRAECENTOR. [PRECENTOR.]

PRAECO. As it was the duty of the deacon at certain points of the liturgy to proclaim to the people the subjects to be prayed for, and generally to direct them by his voice in the performance of their acts of worship, he sometimes received the name of κήρυξ, or praeco, the herald or proclaimer [DEACON, p. 529 f.] Synesius (Epist. 67, p. 209, Migne) calls the deacons ἱεροκήρυκες; and the word κηρύττειν is used of the deacon's proclamations, as "κηρυττέτω, μή τις τῶν ἀνίσων" (Constit. Apost. viii. 5). [PROSPHONESIS.] (Bingham's Antiq. II. xx. 10.) [P. O.]

PRAYER. It is unnecessary to say that the importance of prayer as a means of spiritual growth is everywhere insisted on by Christian teachers, especially in the well-known tracts on Prayer by Tertullian and Origen, and in that on the Lord's Prayer by Cyprian. Cyprian in particular (De Orat. Dom. c. 4) warns us that we should endeavour not to offend the eye of God either in our postures or the tones of our voice; that God will have us worship Him in secret, as well as in the assembly of the brethren. Origen, too (De Orat. c. 31), insists that the outward accompaniments of prayer are not indifferent, for the gestures are expressive as well as the voice. And again (c. Celsum, vii. 39 and 44; De Orat. c. 20), he describes how the Christian in his prayer closes, so far as may be, the avenues of sense, and abstracts himself from earthly things. He prays in a low voice, for the heart and not the lungs is powerful with God (Tertullian de Orat. c. 13). See further on Prayer as an ascetic exercise, ROSARY, HOURS OF PRAYER. On forms of prayer, see LITURGICAL BOOKS.

Christian teachers, from the apostles onward, insist constantly on the necessity of common prayer. When ye assemble frequently, the power of Satan is broken (Ignat. ad Ephes. c. 13). If the prayer of one or two has so much power, much more has that of the bishop and the whole church (Ib. c. 5). The Teacher of peace and unity did not prescribe mere individual, but common, prayer. I am not to pray to "my Father," but our Father; not for my daily bread, but our daily bread (Cyprian de Orat. Dom. 8). When the feeling of community in prayer was so strong, it follows that frequent attendance on divine service was insisted on. "Before all things," says the writer of the Clementine Homilies (Hom. iii. c. 69), "assemble yourselves together more constantly. I would it were hourly, at any rate on the accustomed days of assembling; for while ye do this ye are within the walls of inviolability (ἀσυλίας)." It was from the conception of prayer as a duty that public prayer itself came to be called officium (Tert. de Orat. c. 14). Especially was attendance required at the Sunday services (Apost. Constt. vii. 30). But daily attendance at church, morning and evening, was enjoined on clergy and laity alike (Ib. ii. 59). Origen (in Genes. Hom. 10, c. 3) reproves those who came to the house of the Lord only on festival days, as if all days were not holy to the Lord. The Arabic canons which bear the name of Hippolytus (c. 21, p. 79, quoted by Probst, Kirchl. Disciplin, p. 362) desire the priests, sub-deacons, and readers, and the whole people to assemble together in the church at cock-crow, and give themselves to prayer, the saying of psalms, and the reading of Scripture. Even for the sick the true medicine is to attend at church and enjoy the prayers, except indeed those who are dangerously ill. The Greek Διατάξεις τῶν ἁγιῶν ἀποστόλων (c. 22, in Hippolyti Opera, ed. Lagarde, p. 83 = Apost. Constt. viii. 34) desire prayer to be made at dawn, at the third, sixth, and ninth hour, at evening, and at cock-crow. And if it be impossible by reason of unbelievers to approach the church, the bishop is desired to hold meetings for worship (συνάξεις) in his own house; for it is not the place that sanctifies the man, but the man the place. But if even this be impossible, every man is enjoined to say psalms, read Scripture, and pray by himself, or by two or three together. The injunction is added, that one of the faithful is not to pray with a catechumen even in private. When such provision was made even for a time of persecution, it is easy to see how strong was felt to be the obligation to prayer, and especially to public prayer. And the acts of martyrs frequently shew the same thing. The martyrs Saturninus and Felix, for instance, avowed in the midst of tortures that they had held assemblies for worship (collectas), and gloried in their obedience to the law of God (cc. 10 and 12, in Ruinart, pp. 386–7).

And as attendance at Catholic worship was earnestly enjoined, so was attendance on non-Catholic worship earnestly forbidden. One who joined in the worship of Jews or heretics was excommunicated (Can. Apo .. 64). If any one despises the church of God, and turns aside to the abominations of the heathen, or to a meeting of Jews or heretics, how shall he give account to God in the day of judgment? (Apost. Constt. ii. 61, § 2).

For the general arrangement of the place of worship see CHURCH, p. 378. To this may be added that the space nearest to the presbytery was occupied by the virgins, widows, and presbyteresses (πρεσβύτιδες) of the church, standing or sitting (Apost. Constt. ii. 57, § 8; cf. Tertullian de Exhort. Cast. c. 11). With these were probably the ascetics. The sexes were separated [SEXES, SEPARATION OF] probably from about the 3rd century (Ap. Constt. ii. 57, § 4). The Apostolical Constitutions inform us that the younger part of the congregation, if the seats were not sufficient for all, had to stand; children stood beside their parents; women not yet purified after childbirth took their place among the catechumens.

Men and women were desired to go to church in seemly dress, with simple and unaffected mien, pure in body and in heart, fit to pray to God (Clem. Alex. Paedag. iii. 11, p. 300, Potter). The women covered their heads in church, according to the apostolic precept (1 Cor. xi. 5); the men bared their heads, as bondsmen of Christ, while in Judaism and heathendom alike men prayed with covered head, as a sign of freedom. [HEAD, COVERING OF.] Devotional quiet was maintained during the service; the deacon was to prevent whispering, or sleeping, or laughing, or beckoning (Apost. Constt. ii. 57, § 8). And this direction was not, it appears, superfluous; for Origen (In Exod. hom. 12, § 2) complains that there were some who, while scripture was read, withdrew into corners and amused themselves with worldly conversation, even turning their backs upon the reader. Strangers who brought commendatory letters from another diocese were conducted by the deacon to their proper place; a foreign presbyter sat among the presbyters, a foreign deacon among the deacons; a bishop was received with honour by the bishop of the place (Ap. Constt. ii. 58).

The hours of prayer, afterwards observed only by the clergy, were originally intended to be observed so far as practicable by the laity also. There is nothing in the passage above quoted from the Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 34) to limit the observance of the hours to the clergy; and even at a later period efforts were made to induce the laity to attend at the hours of prayer, as well as at the Eucharistic service, at least on festivals. Thus a capitulare of the year 801 (quoted by Van Espen de Horis Can. pt. i. c. iii. § 2) says: "It was ordered not merely that clerics should perform the offices at meet times, but also that they should ring bells to rouse the people to pray." And Theodulph of Orleans (Capit. ad Presb. 23, 24) begs those who can do no more ... least to pray twice a day, morning and evening, in the church, if a church is near, if not, wherever they may chance to be when the time comes. On the sabbath (Saturday) he enjoins all Christians to come to church with lights [for the service of the eve], to come to the vigils or matin office, and again with their oblations to the mass [on Sunday]. See HOURS OF PRAYER; LITURGICAL BOOKS; LITURGY; OFFICE, THE DIVINE. [C.]

Postures of Prayer.—It was the custom in the earliest times of Christianity to pray standing, with the hands extended and slightly raised towards heaven, and with the face turned towards the east. Exceptions may no doubt be cited even from the New Testament, but that this was the most common attitude is evident from the testimony of primitive monuments. Frescoes, sarcophagi, sepulchral monuments, ancient glass, mosaics in the earliest basilicas, above all the Roman catacombs, exhibit the faithful, more especially women, praying in this attitude [ORANTI]. Many of these female figures are richly dressed, and, as though wearied with the length of their prayers, have their arms supported on either side by men, who to judge from their dress were servants; a probable allusion to the support which Moses received from Aaron and Hur, and a possible hint not of their weariness, but of their lengthened devotions. The presence of serving men may, like the rich dress, also indicate the position in life of the deceased, though the rich dress may also have had a religious significance [PARADISE]. Tertullian (Apologet. xxx.) explicitly declares this to have been the Christian attitude of prayer—"illuc suspicientes (in coelum) Christiani manibus expansis quia innocuis, capite nudo quia non erubescimus"—though this description does not exclude kneeling nor involve turning to the east, while it adds the bare head to the previous description.

There is abundant evidence from ancient art and ancient literature to shew that the raising the hands toward heaven was an ordinary attitude of prayer among the Egyptians, Etruscans, and Romans; but Tertullian (de Orat. xi.) attaches a different motive to the Christian elevation of the hands to say that could have entered into the mind of a pagan. Contrasting the mere elevation with the expansion of the hands he says: "nos vero non attollimus tantum sed expandimus, e dominica passione modulantes." The same desire to imitate the position of our Lord upon the cross is related in Ruinart (Acta Martyr. Sinc. p. 235) of Montanus, and in Usuard (Martyrol. xii. Kal. Feb.) of Fructuosus, Augurius, and Eulogius. Pagan may readily be distinguished from Christian orante on ancient monuments, the pagan figures raising the hands vertically with the elbow forming a right angle, the Christian extending the arms horizontally, expressing, according to Tertullian (de Orat. xiii.) more humility and self-control; "ne ipsis quidem manibus sublimius elatis, sed temperate ac prope elatis." In the early church the catechumens as well as the faithful prayed standing, but whereas the latter raised the eyes to heaven, the former bent them towards the earth, to indicate that they had not yet acquired by baptism the right of sons to raise their eyes to the Father in heaven.

For the prevalence of the attitude of kneeling in the early church, see GENUFLEXION. (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v. Prière, Attitudes de.) [E. C. H.]

PRAYER, THE LORD'S. [LORD'S PRAYER.]

PREACHING. κήρυγμα, praedicatio; διδασκαλία, doctrina, instructio, institutio. Sermons were known as ὁμιλίαι, tractatus, homilies; λόγοι, sermones, sermons. Preachers were διδάσκαλοι, tractatores, doctors, or expositors. [HOMILY and HOMILIARIUM.]

I. In the first place we find our Lord applying to Himself the prophecy of Is. lxi. 1, "He hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor" (Luke iv. 18); and giving an express commission to preach to the Twelve (St. Luke ix. 2), and it would seem to the Seventy (St. Luke x. 9). To the former it was repeated with great solemnity immediately before the Ascension (St. Mark xvi. 15); and we find St. Paul (1 Cor. i. 17) claiming with considerable emphasis this function of preaching (Οὐ γὰρ ἀπέστειλέ με Χριστὸς βαπτίζειν, ἀλλ' εὐαγγελίζεσθαι) as peculiarly belonging to him. Very naturally, therefore, and for an obvious reason, the preaching of the Apostles is described by the term, εὐαγγελίζεσθαι; and εὐαγγέλιον (in the singular) means not only the record of the life and teaching of Christ, but also the communication by preaching of the knowledge of the Incarnation. See St. Luke iii. 18, iv. 18; Acts v. 42; Gal. i. 11. This usage is generally confined to the preaching of our Lord and His apostles, and it is generally true of them; but there is apparently one exception at least in Acts viii. 4, even in the very first period of the spread of the gospel.

II. At a somewhat later stage of the primitive church, when congregations had been formed in various places, we learn from the epistles of St. Paul that those to whom extraordinary spiritual gifts had been committed, were in the habit of preaching and expounding in the public assemblies of Christians. See 1 Cor. xiv. 31 (where, however, it is to be noticed that the word εὐαγγελίζω is not employed). Certain rules are laid down there for these "preachings." It does not, however, appear under what further limits or restrictions this custom of general ministration was permitted; and as these extraordinary endowments died out in or shortly after the apostolic age, this "ministry of gifts" was speedily replaced by one devolving on the natural depositaries, the clergy. Hilary's comment on the Epistles (in the works of St. Ambrose) states this definitely, but it is not clear whether upon any kind of authority, or as a mere theory: Ut cresceret plebs et multiplicaretur, omnibus inter initia concessum et evangelizare et baptizare, et Scripturas in ecclesiâ explanare. At ubi autem omnia loca circumplexa est ecclesia, conventicula constituta sunt, et rectores et caetera officia in ecclesiis sunt ordinata, ut nullus de clero auderet, qui ordinatus non esset, praesumere officium, quod sciret non sibi creditum vel concessum" (Com. in Ephes. iv.).

III. Women, however, were never permitted in the church to assume the character of public preachers; neither in the apostolic age, as we learn from 1 Cor. xiv. 34, 35; 1 Tim. ii. 11, 12; nor afterwards was this ever permitted in any case. The fourth council of Carthage (can. 99) expressly declares this: "Mulier quamvis docta et sancta, viros in conventu docere non praesumat." To the same effect the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. iii. cap. 9). The allowing of women to preach was, however, a mark of many heretical sects. Thus Tertullian: "Ipsae mulieres haereticae quam procaces, quae audeant docere" (De Praescript. cap. 41). And the Montanists even made this a leading principle of their sect, and its two prophetesses, Priscilla and Maximilla, were quite as prominent in the teaching of their followers as Montanus himself.

IV. Among the Catholics, however, preaching was in the earliest age especially the duty of the bishop. Justin Martyr (Apol. i. c. 67) describes the presiding brother (προεστώς) as exhorting the assembly. St. Chrysostom, commenting on the phrase used by St. Paul, "A bishop must be apt to teach" (διδακτικόν), refers to this as especially required of the bishop (Hom. x. in 1 Tim. iii.), and declares in another place that "he who was without the power of preaching ought to be far from the throne of teaching" (πάρρω ἔστω θρόνου διδασκαλικοῦ). Similarly Cyril of Alexandria speaks of the episcopal office as ἄξίωμα διδασκαλικὸν (Ep. ad Monach. in Conc. Ephes.). The same phrase was used by the sixth general council in degrading Macarius, bishop of Antioch, for heresy. It was understood that a bishop undertook to preach as one of the distinctive duties of his office; and St. Ambrose complains that he, although unlearned in theology and unprepared, was obliged to undertake it: "Cum jam effugere non possimus officium docendi, quod nobis refugientibus imposuit sacerdotii necessitudo .... Ego raptus de tribunalibus atque administrationis infulis ad sacerdotium, docere vos coepi quod ipse non didici. Itaque factum est, ut prius docere inciperem, quam discere. Discendum est igitur mihi simul et docendum, quoniam non vacavi ante discere" (De Offic. Minist. i 1). And St. Chrysostom developes the same idea at length, and with great beauty, in the fourth book of his treatise De Sacerdotio. St. Augustine, when he writes to blame the custom of the auditors standing throughout the sermon, which he says, by fatigue of the body, takes away the attention of the mind, so that they should rather sit, says, "Antistites sedentes loquuntur ad populum" (De Rud. Catech. c. 19). The passage is interesting on another ground, since we learn from it that in the province of Africa the custom was for the preacher to sit and the people to stand: whilst in some other churches both preachers and people used to sit.

In the African churches it would seem, from this and other passages, that the duty of preaching was reserved wholly to the bishop; and to this fact we must refer the frequent use of such phrases as me tractante and tractante Episcopo in the Epistles of St. Cyprian (Epp. 52, 56, 83). It was for centuries altogether unknown in these churches that any but bishops should preach; and Possidius, in his Life of St. Augustine, relates that when Valerius, the bishop of the diocese, was induced by Augustine's remarkable powers to allow him to preach frequently before him, he introduced a marked departure from the customs of the province: (Vit. Aug. cap. 5). But the example once given was afterwards followed, and it became more usual for presbyters to preach by licence from the bishop, "postea bono praecedente exemplo, accepta ab episcopis potestate, presbyteri nonnulli coram episcopis populo tractare coeperunt verbum Dei" (ibid.). But in the Eastern Churches presbyters were more generally permitted to preach; for the same author intimates that it was from their example Valerius derived the idea, and disregarded accordingly the outcry made against him. St. Jerome was so jealous of the rights of presbyters, that we need not be surprised to find him stigmatizing the refusing to them the privilege to preach in the presence of bishops as "a very bad custom in certain churches." The ecclesiastical historians have some scattered notices upon the subject. Socrates (lib. v. c. 22) asserts that at Alexandria presbyters were not permitted to preach; and that this restriction began from the time when (the presbyter) Arius troubled the church by his novel speculations respecting the Incarnation; which has somewhat the air of a theory invented ex post facto to account for the custom. But he records in another place (vii. 2) in his notices of Atticus, bishop of Constantinople, that the latter constantly preached while yet a presbyter. And almost the entire career as a preacher of St. John Chrysostom is comprised in the sixteen years which intervened between his ordination as deacon and his elevation to the episcopal throne of Constantinople. To this period, amongst many other of his works, must be referred the orations on the martyr Babylas. The sermon that he preached before the bishop and a large congregation on the occasion of his ordination as presbyter is still extant; and it needs only to mention the celebrated orations On the Statues, as falling likewise within the time of his presbyterate.

Similar instances from other churches might easily be adduced; and there is nothing to shew that they were in any respect exceptions. The power and the duty of preaching were primarily in the bishop; but he might and usually did authorize presbyters who were capable of discharging it to do so.

A case is recorded by Paulinus in his Carmen de Vitâ Felicis of this Felix being appointed by Quintus, as the newly-elected bishop of Nola, to preach there: "Ergo sub hoc coram Felice antistite vixit Presbytero, et crevit meritis, qui crescere sede noluit [he had refused to be himself chosen bishop]. Ipse illum tanquam minor omnia Quintus observabat, et os linguam Felicis habebat. Ille gregem officio, Felix sermone regebat."

V. The case was somewhat different with regard to deacons. The power of preaching was not, in the earliest times, committed to them; and where the terms κηρύσσειν and κήρυγμα are applied to them, and the deacon is called κήρυξ (or PRAECO), it is to be understood of his calling the congregation to prayer, giving notice of the various stages of the service and such like. It was noted as a thing unusual even among the Arians that Leontius, the (Arian) bishop of Antioch, permitted Aetius, a deacon, to preach publicly in the church (Philostorg. Hist. lib. iii. c. 17). Yet great numbers of sermons and similar discourses are extant from the pen of Ephrem Syrus of Edessa (d. A.D. 399), who was never more than a deacon; and we must apparently conclude that these were preached, and that we have here another exception to the ordinary rule. The Com. in Ephes. already quoted, asserts positively "nunc neque diaconi in populo praedicant." At a later period in the West, the council of Vaison (A.D. 529) gave permission in a canon to deacons to read "the homilies of the holy fathers," when the priest was prevented by sickness from preaching (can. 2). And it is said of Caesarius of Arles in his Life that when himself unable to preach through sickness and age, he appointed not only presbyters but also deacons to do so. But the context shews (cap. 28) that they were merely to read discourses or homilies "Ambrosii, Augustini, seu parvitatis meae vel quorumcunque Doctorum Catholicorum."

It may, however, safely be said that deacons were as a rule confined to reading, and were not suffered to preach; and that this rule was not broken through except in rare and unfrequent instances.

VI. It would seem that monks or other laymen were sometimes permitted to preach. Eusebius (Hist. lib. vi. c. 19) relates the well-known case of Origen, who, while a layman, was requested by Alexander, bishop of Jerusalem, to preach before him; and Alexander defended this, when challenged, as a well-known practice when a layman was well qualified to preach. In doing so, he quotes the instances, otherwise unknown to us, of Euelpis at Larandae, bidden to preach by the bishop Neon; of Paulinus at Iconium, and of Theodorus at Synnada. This freedom does not appear, however, to have existed in the West. We find pope Leo, in an epistle to Maximus, bishop of Antioch, telling him that monks or other laymen, however learned, should not be allowed to usurp the right of teaching or preaching, but only the priests of the Lord (Ep. 60 or 62). But the very caution would seem to shew the existence of such a practice; and doubtless monks at all events, who were capable of preaching and expounding Scripture, would habitually do so in their own communities. With respect to this practice, nevertheless, St. Jerome writes: "Monachus non docentis, sed plangentis, habet officium" (Ep. 55 ad Ripar.), and in the epistle to Heliodorus, "Alia monachorum est causa, alia clericorum: clerici pascunt oves, ego pascor."

VII. It was not at all uncommon in large churches having many clergy, or at times when bishops were assembled, to have several sermons preached one after another, in the same assembly; the bishop, if there were one present, or the person of greatest dignity, coming last. We find in the so-called Apostolical Constitutions the following rule, which no doubt represents the practice of the period when it was written: "When the gospel is read, let the presbyters one by one, but not all, speak the word of exhortation to the people, and last of all the bishop, who is the governor or pilot of the ship" (lib. ii. c. 57). And it is clear from various allusions in the discourses of St. John Chrysostom, preached by him at Antioch while still a presbyter, that the bishop was to preach after him, as when he says: "It is now time for me to keep silence, that our master may have time to speak" (Hom. 2, de Verbis Esai. tom. iii). St. Jerome, writing to Pammachius, mentions an instance when two bishops, Epiphanius and John, bishop of Jerusalem, had preached one after the other in the church at Jerusalem (Ep. 61, cap. 4).

There are many decrees of ancient councils enforcing the duty of frequent preaching, and directing when and how often sermons should be preached. The eleventh council at Toledo recommended to bishops diligently to fit themselves by reading and study for the discharge of this duty: "ut qui officium praedicationis suscepimus, nullis curis a divinâ lectione privemur. Isidore, bishop of Seville (d. 636 A.D.), in his work on "Ecclesiastical Offices," lays down that to a bishop the knowledge of Scripture is necessary because he has to labour in preaching. The Trullan synod enjoined upon bishops "to preach in their churches every day, or at least on Sundays, teaching all the clergy and people with pious and orthodox discourse, collecting out of the divine Scriptures knowledge and right judgments. And if controversy should arise about the Scripture, they should interpret it no otherwise than as the lights and doctors of the church have expounded it in their writings" (can. 19). A letter from St. Boniface, archbishop of Mentz (d. 754 A.D.), not long after explains sufficiently his idea of the importance of preaching as a duty of the clergy: "Lullum constituere faciatis Praedicatorem et doctorem Presbyterorum et Populorum. Spero quod in illo habeant Presbyteri Magistrum, et Monachi regularem doctorem, et populi Christiani fidelem Praedicatorem et Pastorem." Still more emphatic is the second canon of the sixth council of Arles (A.D. 813): let priests learn the holy Scriptures and the canons, and let their whole business consist in preaching and teaching, and let them build up others as well in the knowledge of faith, as in the practice of good works." A council of Mentz in the same year exhorts "bishops not to fail to preach in person or by a deputy, on Sundays and festivals" (can. 25). The second at Rheims repeats this order with the additional direction, that the bishop's sermon shall be in the vernacular tongue, in order that he may be understood (can. 14, 15). And the third of Tours in a very similar canon goes so far as to require that he shall be careful to translate his discourse "in rusticam Romanam linguam aut Theotiscam" for the same reason (can. 19). As in other parts of the duty of the clergy, so with this, the emperors thought it their duty from time to time to supplement and support ecclesiastical regulations by the enactments of their own secular law. The title of one of the laws in the Theodosian code issued by the three emperors, Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius, is de munere seu officio episcoporum in praedicando verbo Dei. The same law was inserted into the code of Justinian (lib. ix. tit. 29, de Crimine Sacrilegii, Leg. 1). It would be long to quote other provisions to the same effect, and we close this list with the remark that this subject was naturally not overlooked in the multifarious legislation of Charlemagne, and of his successors. These capitularies contain many provisions very similar to those already quoted. A collection of "tractatus atque sermones et omelias diversorum Catholicorum patrum," for the various Sundays of the ecclesiastical year is still extant, which was compiled by Paulus Diconus at the command of that sovereign. [HOMILY, p. 782.]

VIII. As to the days when it was usual that sermons should be preached, the Lord's day or Sunday was the principal occasion for this, and it is thought that it was at first the only appointed day. For Justin Martyr (Apol. c. 87) seems to exclude any other days by the description he gives of the Christian worship "On the day which is called Sunday." The report of Pliny to the emperor Trajan speaks of the Christians being accustomed to meet on a stated day, "stato die ante lucem convenire" (lib. x.; Ep. 97. This would be about A.D. 105). We may perhaps then conclude that the celebration of the Eucharist and with it the preaching of the sermon were invariably held on Sundays; not that they were never held at other times. And, in fact, we learn from Tertullian not many years later, that Wednesday and Friday, the "stationary days" or days of special meeting, were observed in a similar manner with celebration of the Holy Communion, and no doubt therefore with sermon, which, as we have seen, was a usual part of the Eucharistic service (De Orat. cap. 14). [STATIONS.] The natalitia or anniversaries of the martyrs were also times of abundant preaching. St. Chrysostom, in his homily on the martyrs (Hom. 65) remarks upon this, and mentions that the whole city went forth to celebrate their memory at their tombs.

Likewise the great festivals and fasts of the Christian year were naturally the occasion for the delivery of sermons. In Lent it was customary to have sermons every day. The homilies of St. Chrysostom upon the book of Genesis compose a Lenten course of this kind; and the homilies "On the Statues" were similarly preached upon every day in Lent. Pamphilus says of Origen that he was accustomed to address the people almost every day (Apol. pro Orig. tom. i.). The Apostolical Constitutions also have an order directing public prayers and preaching to be held on every Saturday also, excepting that preceding Easter day or on the Lord's day (lib. ii. c. 59). [SABBATH.] It would seem that it was the practice in the Egyptian monasteries, where there were constant services every day, for a sermon to be preached daily after this was usually in the afternoon, "post horam nonam" according to St. Jerome (Ep. 22, ad Eustoch. cap. 15).

It was in fact a general custom to have evening preaching as well as morning upon occasions of particular devotion [compare VIGIL]. In several of Chrysostom's discourses he plainly alludes to their being preached in the afternoon: e. g. Hom. 10, ad Popul. Antioch. St. Augustine makes it clear that he preached sometimes in the afternoon as well as in the morning, by expressions which he uses: e.g. in his second sermon on Psalm lxxxviii., where he says, "Ad reliqua Psalmi, de quo in matutino locuti sumus, animum intendite et pium debitum exigite." And Gaudentius, bishop of Brescia (d. A.D. 427), refers in his Tractatus to his having preached twice on the vigil of Easter (Tract. 4). Some of the discourses of St. Basil on the Hexaemeron, or six days of creation, were likewise preached in the evening (Hom. 2, 7, 9). It is, perhaps, needless to multiply instances of a practice widely spread in all the churches, and naturally to be expected.

A remarkable statement is made by Sozomen (Hist. lib. vii. c. 19), that at Rome neither the bishop nor any other were known to preach publicly to the people up to his time (A.D. 440). This declaration is repeated by Cassiodorus in his Historia Tripartita, and without hinting that it is incorrect. Valesius, in his note on this passage, observes, in corroboration of Sozomen, that no sermons by any bishop of Rome are extant before those of Leo the Great. His pontificate commenced only in A.D. 440—i. e. in the same year in which Sozomen's History breaks off. There is indeed an oration delivered by pope Liberius in St. Peter's church on the Feast of the Nativity, upon the occasion of a profession of virginity by Marcellina, sister of St. Ambrose, and other ladies. But he argues (1) that this oration was not properly an ὁμιλία, or sermon, but an address and exhortation to Marcellina; and (2) that it was an exception to ordinary rule, probably to do honour to a person of high rank. Bingham's suggestion is that the homilies of famous writers might be read in place of a sermon. Perhaps, however, all that Sozomen's statement need be taken to mean is that it was not the habit to preach constantly, as in other churches; or that instead of formal sermons there were merely familiar and unstudied addresses for which the title of Sermon was not arrogated; and that the Roman church had produced no great preachers, such as Origen, Athanasius, or Chrysostom, in the East. And when we remember how few of the clergy were in the habit of preaching during the Middle Ages, and in the centuries preceding the Reformation, the statement is credible enough. Bingham's argument, from the expressions of Justin Martyr in his Apology, does not seem to be of much weight, since Justin was essentially Greek by birth, long residence, culture, and experience; and it is by no means certain that in the passage in question he is describing the services of the Roman church.

IX. Sermons were commonly written, but occasionally preached ex tempore. Origen was a distinguished instance of the latter practice. Eusebius (Hist. lib. vi. c. 36) relates, however, that it was not until he was sixty years of age that he ventured to preach unwritten sermons in the churches; and these were taken down by ταχυγράφοι, or shorthand writers. It is related by Sozomen concerning St. Chrysostom upon his return from banishment, that he was obliged by the people to go into the great church, and deliver to them an extemporal discourse, "καὶ σχέδιόν τινα διεξῆλθε λόγον" (Hist. lib. viii. 18). And in many of his sermons still extant, we have allusions to incidents taking place during the delivery of them, sufficient to prove that the prepared sermon had been embroidered by the preacher's ready eloquence with these spontaneous additions. The historian Socrates (H. E. vii. 2) relates of Atticus, afterwards bishop of Constantinople, that though, whilst he was in the order of presbyters, he used to preach from memory discourses which he had previously prepared, yet afterwards, having acquired confidence by industry and practice, he began a course of extempore (ἐξ αὐτοσχεδίου) and more popular preaching. Ruffinus says in his History (lib. ii. cap. 9) of Gregory Nazianzen and St. Basil, that there were noble monuments of their ability extant in the sermons which they spoke ex tempore in the churches; but it is doubtful whether he means anything more than memoriter. This remark cannot, however, apply to that passage in a letter of Sidonius Apollinaris (died A.D. 482) to Faustus, bishop of Reggio, in which he refers to "praedicationes tuas, nunc repentinas, nunc cum ratio poposcerit elucubratas," where the distinction between the two classes of sermons is clearly expressed. It is evident that to preach in this unpremeditated manner was a matter of frequent occurrence with St. Augustine. In one of his sermons on the Psalms (Hom. Ps. lxxxvi.) he intimates that it had been prescribed to him by the bishop then present in church. In his book De Doctrina Christiana he gives such detailed directions for the practice of sacred oratory as to make it abundantly clear that he contemplated a habit of preaching similar to that common in modern times, viz. the careful preparation beforehand of a discourse, followed by oral and unassisted delivery of it. In his treatise De Catechizandis Rudibus he gives two sermons of different lengths as models for the inexperienced preacher. Yet, however careful had been the preparation, they were wont to depend somewhat on the inspiration of the moment, and in this they considered they were depending upon the help of the Holy Spirit, promised by our Lord in the Gospel (St. Matt. x. 19, 20. There is an exquisite prayer for "a humble wisdom which may build up, and a most gentle and wise eloquence, which knows not how to be puffed up," preserved in the works of St. Ambrose (Orat. apud Ferrar. de Conc. lib. i. cap. 8), which he is said to have habitually used before preaching; but it does not appear whether privately or not. But these quotations might be increased to any number, for the habit of commencing the sermon with a prayer was a constant one among the later fathers.

Another preface to the sermon which was commonly used was known as the Pax, "Peace be unto you," to which the congregation would reply, "And with thy spirit." This was called in Greek πρόσρησις, the address or salutation: but St. Chrysostom speaks of it as the Peace, Ἀντιδόντες τῷ διδόντι τὴν εἰρήνην (Hom. iii. in Coloss.).

It was not uncommon to use a short prayer before the sermon, but there does not appear to have been any prescribed form for this. It was a matter of individual choice; and from the various specimens of such prayers which are now extant, they would seem to be very similar to those which are frequently embodied by modern preachers in the exordium of the sermon. Thus in the commencement of one of St. Augustine's homilies upon the Psalms, we find "attendite ad Psalmum; det nobis Dominus aperire mysteria quae hic continentur" (in Psal. xci.). A similar but longer one occurs in Psalm cxxxix. "Adjuvet [Dominus] orationibus vestris, ut ea dicam quae oportet me dicere et vos audire (Comp. also De Catechizandis Rudibus, cap. 4 and Hom. in Psal. cxlvii.). St. Chrysostom also says, "First prayers and then the word, Πρότερον εὐχὴ καὶ τότε λόγος, Hom. xxviii.; but is here probably referring to the general prayers, perhaps of the Ante-Communion office, which, at all events, usually and preferably preceded the sermon (Constit. lib. viii. cap. 5).

X. The text was always taken out of some part of the Scriptures; but it appears from some homilies of St. Chrysostom that preachers would sometimes dispense altogether with a text. The subjects, however, were always of a serious and religious nature. St. Gregory Nazianzen, in his first Orat. Apol. de Fugâ, gives a list of these, which includes the chief doctrines of the Christian faith; and St. Chrysostom gives a not dissimilar one (Hom. 24, de Bapt. Christ. tom. i.).

XI. From the facts here presented it will be tolerably evident what was the method of preaching generally adopted in the earliest ages of the church. There was little scope for the rhetorical arts of the orator in the earliest Christian assemblies; and probably Thomassin is very right when he concludes: "et Apostolos, et Episcopos, et Presbyteros qui prioribus his saeculis concionabantur, sermones effudisse extemporaneos, inornatos, ex abundantiâ cordis, et plenitudine intima charitatis" (Vet. et Nova Descrip. Eccles. part ii. book iii. c. 83). At a later period, when a great burden of doctrinal teaching and polemical discussion was thrown upon a far more cultured and leisurely class of clergy, the typical discourses of the age became much more elaborate and literary in their character, even while, no doubt, the great bulk of the popular preaching remained comparatively unchanged. Of this period Origen, Tertullian, Athanasius, and Jerome, may be taken as representatives. By the end of the 4th century, however, the rhetoric of the schools has completely made its way into the pulpit; and in the brilliant group of Christian orators who flourished at that period, St. John Chrysostom, the two Gregories, of Nazianzus and of Nyssa, and St. Basil, we have the typical examples of a greatly altered style of Christian preaching. About this time it became usual to preach sitting in the ambo instead of in the more distant cathedra, in order to be better heard. The custom of applauding the preacher by clapping the hands and stamping the feet (κρότος) extended itself by degrees into the church, and shewed the great change which had passed over the habits of Christians. St. Chrysostom is said to have inveighed against this objectionable custom in an eloquent sermon, which was loudly applauded. Rhetoric, in fact, speedily passed into mere unreal and factitious artifice in that luxurious age, and the sermon seems to have in some places sunk to be little higher than an intellectual exercise. Accordingly, in Constantinople and other great cities, popular preachers were loaded with rewards, with fame, and it would seem with recompense of a more substantial kind. The historian Socrates (Hist. lib. vi. cap. 11) tells a story of a certain bishop from Ptolemais, Antiochus by name, who was very famous for his eloquence, and having come to Constantinople and preached in a great many churches there, obtained by so doing a large sum of money, and then returned home. Possibly this prevalent secularity of tone into which the practice of preaching had fallen, may not be unconnected with the disuse of it in the Roman church, and it would seem throughout great part of Western Europe, where at this time a much greater simplicity of manners and even ignorance prevailed. Here, however, Hilary, bishop of Arles (d. A.D. 449), was renowned for his preaching, which seems to have been in some respects a return to a higher and purer type of pastoral address. It is, nevertheless, too much like the inflated compliment of the previous century, when we are told by a contemporary: "Si Augustinus post Hilarium fuisset, judicaretur inferior." The writer of his life gives the following account of his preaching:—"Temporalis vero ejus praedicatio, quantum flumen eloquentiae habuerit, quas sententiarum gemmas sculpserit, aurum supernorum sensuum repererit, argentum splendentis eloquii abundaverit, descriptionum varias picturas, et rhetoricos colores expresserit, ferrum spiritalis gladii acumen in truncandis haereticorum venenatis erroribus exercuerit, non dicam dicere, sed ne cogitare me posse protestor; sedilibus praeparatis in jejunio ab hora diei septima usque in ejus decimam epulis plebem spiritalibus saginabat, pascendo esurire cogebat, esurientes nequaquam pascere desistebat. Si peritorum turba defuisset, simplici sermone rusticorum corda nutriebat, at ubi instructos super venisse vidisset, sermone, vultu pariter in quadam gratia insolita excitabatur, seipso celsior apparebat; ut ejusdem praeclari doctores temporis, qui suis scriptis meriti summi claruere, Silvius Eusebius, Donnolas, admiratione succensi in hac verba proruperint, Non doctrinam, non eloquentiam, sed nescio quid super homines consecutum."

XII. When we come to the 8th century, and the beginning of the 9th century, we must conclude, if we may judge from the few specimens that remain, that there was but little preaching, and that what existed shews a singular mixture of piety and dense ignorance. It would probably be correct to say that there was little or no popular or public preaching at all; the written compositions that remain to us from that age emanated almost in every case from the monastic institutions, and were intended for use within their own walls and for their own members. On the one hand, they display considerable knowledge of the letter of Scripture, care and acuteness in reasoning upon it, and ardent, if simple, piety. On the other, the temper of the age was utterly uncritical, and accepted indiscriminately historical truth, and the most crude and incredible legends. The Homilies which are extant under the name of Aelfric (whether written by him or not, they are apparently a work of that age) afford numerous examples of this characteristic. And on the other hand, they have many passages of considerable spiritual insight and remarkable earnestness and beauty. [S. J. E.]

PREBEND. [PRAEBENDA.]

an agreement, lease, or charter (Ducange, Gloss.), by which a life interest in church property was created, 1, in return for the conveyance of an estate to the church in fee simple; 2, at a fixed quit-rent, in return for feudal services.

I. In the first case the property appears sometimes to have been given over with a bare reservation of the life interest. Thus Augustine (Sermo 356, Migne, Patrol. t. v. page 1572), speaking of one Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, tells a story of a man who, not expecting to have children, conveyed his whole property to the church, retaining merely a life interest (retento sibi usufructu); when children were born to him, the bishop, contrary to his expectation, restored the property to him. In most cases, however, the arrangement evidently partook largely of the nature of a bargain. Thus the third council of Tours, A.D. 813 (c. 51), replies to the complaints made by certain heirs, who alleged that they had been unfairly disinherited, because the property to which they had a rightful claim had been conveyed to the church under the title of "precariae," that no one ever conveyed property to the church without receiving either as much as he had given, or twice or thrice as much in the shape of life interest (usu fructuario), and that, if the donor made it a condition, his children or relations were allowed to hold the property on the same terms that had been agreed on with himself. It is added that even relations who had no legal claim were habitually permitted, as a matter of grace, to hold the property which had been conveyed away from them (de quâ illi jam erant per legem exclusi) if they were willing to hold it as a fief (in beneficium) from the church. This they allege to be the invariable custom and method of the church. It is probable, however, that complaints continued to be made by heirs who considered themselves unjustly deprived of their inheritance, and that such assertions were not altogether without reason may be gathered from the fact that the council of Meaux, A.D. 845 (c. 21), found it necessary to declare in the most positive terms that no one should dare to accept "precariae," except on condition that the owner should retain a life interest in the property, and receive an annuity of twice the amount from the property of the church (si res proprias et ecclesiasticas usufructuario tenere voluerit). In case, however, the owner preferred to convey the property at once (ad praesens demiserit) he was to receive a life interest to the amount of three times the value from church property, but only for his own life.

II. The second class of "precariae" consisted of lands held from the church by military tenure, on condition of rendering certain feudal services, and paying a certain fixed quit-rent. The occasion of the foundation of these precariae is found in the proceedings of the council of Leptina, A.D. 743 (c. 2), where an edict is recited of Carloman the Elder, providing that, on account of the cruel wars then prevailing, and the necessities of the state from the invasions of surrounding nations, the church should allot some estates for the assistance of the army, to be held on lease and at an annual rent (precario et censu), on condition that the tenants should pay a rent of twelve denarii for every farm building (casatâ) to the church to which the property belonged. It was carefully provided that the estate should revert to the church at the death of the original holder, but if the necessity of the case required, or the sovereign willed it, the lease should be renewed or regranted. These leases might also be revoked even before the death of the holder, in case the church or monastery to which they belonged was in actual need.

A capitulary of Charles the Great (A.D. 779, c. 13) provides for the renewal of "precariae" already subsisting, and the granting of them in cases where they did not exist. From the wording of the capitulary it appears that there were two classes of these leases, some dependent directly on the church, and others in which the sovereign was concerned, for it directs that a distinction should be made (sit discretio) between the precariae founded by the will of the sovereign (de verbo nostro factas) and those granted by the free will of the church from its own property. Another edict (Addit. iv. § 32) further provides that those who refuse to pay their quit-rent, their tenths, and nones, or defer to seek a renewal of their leases, shall forfeit their fiefs, which shall return in absolute and perpetual possession to the church to which they belong. See also Capit. v. c. 198.

As might have been expected, the holders of these leases were engaged in a continual effort to assert hereditary rights over the estates so held, and indeed to claim them as their absolute property, on payment of the fixed quit-rent. Such claims were absolutely negatived by imperial decrees. A capitulary of Charles the Great (Capit. vii. c. 104), after reciting the evils that had fallen upon states in consequence of seizing the property of the church, expressly provides that no one shall hold church lands except as "precariae"; that, on the death of the holder, they shall be delivered up to the church, and that the bishops shall elect either to receive them or to regrant them on the same conditions. It is emphatically added that the property shall be delivered to the bishops of the particular church to which it belonged, and dealt with them according to the law (canonice).

The mistrust of the bishops indicated in the careful wording of the latter provision does not seem to have been altogether unfounded. There are traces, even in the slender notices of precariae which are found in the records of councils, not only that the sovereign occasionally found them a convenient method of appropriating, with a colour of legality, the estates of the church, but that bishops sometimes used them, as leases of church property have been used in later days, to further their individual interests. Thus the council of Meaux, A.D. 845 (c. 22), apparently referring to the precariae mentioned in the capitulary of Charles the Great, above quoted, protests that the sovereign has no power to issue precepts concerning precariae created by the church (praecepta regalia super precariis ecclesiasticis fieri), and also (c. 21) decrees that certain "precariae" which had been granted by bishops who were in illegal occupation of sees which were really vacant, should be resumed, and granted, if desirable, by proper ecclesiastical or civil authority (cum authoritate ecclesiastica vel civili). The latter expression seeming to indicate that the state had some power of granting "precariae" out of the estates of the church. The same council decrees (c. 22) that "precariae," according to ancient rule and custom, should be renewed every five years.

It was evident from these decrees that the system of "precariae" was never altogether free from unfairness and dishonesty, though there is no express mention of the abuses which it fostered in times later than our present limits. That donors of property regarded the system with at least suspicion may be inferred from the fact that gifts were sometimes made subject to the special provision that they should not be granted as precariae. Thus the second council of Vermez, A.D. 853 (c. 2), revoked the concession as a "precariae" of a certain monastery belonging to the abbey of St. Dionysius, because the donor of the property in question had made it a condition that it never should be granted as a fief or "precariae" (nec beneficiario nec precario jure distrahendum). [P. O.]

PRECENTOR, the leader of the singers in the chanting of the psalms and the other musical portions of the church service, "qui vocem praemittit in cantu" (Isidor. Origg. lib. vii. c. 11); "qui cantando voce et manu incitat, ut servus qui boves stimulo minans dulci voce bobus jubilet" (Honorius Augustod. Gemma Animae, i. 17). Other names were ὑποβολεύς, (a prompter); φωνασκός, monitor, suggestor, psalmi pronuntiator or praenuntiator, archicantor. We find no distinct mention of this office before the 4th century. We then have abundant evidence of the custom of dividing the psalms and canticles between one leader, who recited the first half of the verse, and the people who took it up and sang the latter half, "praecinebant cantores, populus vero succinebat" (Coteler. in Constit. Apostol. note 34, p. 260). At Caesarea, we learn from Basil's letter to the Neocaesareans (Epist. 207 [63], § 3), the psalmody was sometimes antiphonal; sometimes one began the strain, and the rest responded (οἱ λοιποὶ ὑπηχοῦσι). We see that the same custom was adopted at Alexandria from Athanasius's narrative of his escape from the soldiers who were sent to apprehend him. When the church was beset with the military force, he directed the deacon to commence the 137th Psalm, and the people to respond at the close of each verse "For His mercy endureth for ever," and then quietly to disperse (Athanas. de Fug. § 34, p. 717). The custom at Antioch was the same, as we learn from Chrysostom, "He who chants, chants alone, and, though all utter the response, the voice is wafted as from one mouth" (Homil. xxvi. in 1 Cor. xiv. § 9). A similar direction is given in the Apostolical Constitutions—"Let some person sing the hymns of David, and let the people join at the conclusion of the verses" (τὰ ἀκροστίχια ὑποψαλλέτω) (lib. ii. c. 57). Sidonius Apollinaris is evidence of the same custom in the Gallican church in the 5th century—"Psalmorum hic modulator et phonascus" (lib. iv. Ep. 11). These leaders of the chant formed a distinct class, called ὑποβολεῖς (Socr. H.E. v. 22), originally belonging to the order of "lectores" (Martene de Ant. Eccl. Discipl. c. iii. § 89), of whom, in Justinian's time, there were as many as twenty-six attached to the church of Constantinople (Justin. Novell. iii. c. 1). They were forbidden to wear an orarium (Can. Laodic. 23; Labbe, i. 1500), as being a too distinctly clerical symbol, and, on the other hand, were prohibited from singing in a secular dress (Canon 11, Bracar. II.; Labbe, v. 841). In process of time, the name praecentor became restricted in the Western church to a single person, or sometimes two persons—the Gemma Animae, speaks of those "qui chorum utrimque regunt" (i. 74)—who had the chief regulation of the musical portion of the service, and conducted it himself, per baculum, beating time with a baton, and proclaimed from the ambo the title of the psalm (Cassiodor. Praef. in Ps. c. 2). The narrative of Beda makes us acquainted with several persons bearing this title of office, such as James, the chanter, who—"magister ecclesiasticae cantionis juxta morem Romanum"—nobly remained in Northumbria when Paulinus fled after Penda's victory at Hatfield (Beda, Eccl. Hist. ii. 20). Stephen Eddi (Haedde), the biographer of Wilfrid, after James, "primus cantandi magister Nordanhymbrorum ecclesiis" (ibid. iv. 2). Putta, afterwards bishop of Rochester, whose special skill in chanting had been derived from the disciples of pope Gregory (ibid.). Maban, the chanter of Hexham (ibid. v. 20), and, above all, John, the praecentor, archicantator of St. Peter's at Rome, sent by pope Agatho, at Benedict Biscop's request, A.D. 680, to teach the monks of Wearmouth the Roman style of singing and reading, and to arrange the yearly cycle (ibid. iv. 18), "which, in its results, affected the whole church of England" (Bright, Early English Church History, p. 314). [E. V.]

PRECES. I. While always capable of a more general meaning, this word was largely used to denote a series of short petitions, especially such as were dictated to the people by the ministers of common prayer. In this usage there was a distinction between orationes and preces, orationes being longer forms of prayer, complete in themselves, as collects. We observe the restricted use of "preces" in St. Cyprian, 253: "Fratres nostros . . . . in meutem habeatis in orationibus vestris, et eis vicem boni operis in sacrificiis et precibus repraesentetis" (Epist. 62 ad Januar.). Here preces = the eucharistic litany, in connexion with which the names of benefactors were given out [LITANY, NAMES, OBLATION OF]. St. Augustine, after speaking of the several petitions of the Lord's Prayer, says, "Preces istas Jurisperitus coeli dictavit" (Serm. 114, § 5).

The preces of the West were at first always bidden or dictated by the deacon, like those of the East (thence called "diaconica"), from which they were derived. Thus, Germanus of Paris, 555, speaks of the "Levites singing the preces for the people" (Expos. Brev. Lit. Gall. c. De Prece). So Isidore of Seville, about 610: "Ad ipsum (diaconum) quoque pertinet officium precum" (Epist. ad Leudefr. 8). But at Rome, as we infer from the language of Pseudo-Innocent, the litany was already said by the priest before the beginning of the 6th century: "De nominibus vero recitandis, antequam preces sacerdos faciat," &c. (Epist. ad Decent. c. 2.)

II. The preces were peculiarly the prayer of the people, and even of their children, as St. Chrysostom expressly tells them (Hom. 71 or 72 in S. Matt. Ev. § 4), and naturally dropped out of common use in the liturgy when the people no longer understood the language in which they were required to respond. Vestiges of them, however, remain in the ancient sacramentaries. There are two metrical litanies given for use on Easter eve in the Besançon sacramentary, found by Mabillon at Bobio, and assigned by him to the 7th century. They are preceded by the rubric, "Incipit Precis (sic) de eodem Die" (Mus. Ital. i. 319). See Notitia Eucharistica, p. 304, ed. 2. These "preces" contain seven verses each. The same sacramentary gives, in a part for general use, three collects headed Oratio post Precem (282), one of which refers very distinctly to the litany which originally preceded it. Two similar prayers in the Gothico-Gallican Missal retain the old headings, "Collectio post Precem" (Liturg. Gall. 190), and "Post Prec." (251). Both pray that the people may be heard, thus implying that they had been praying. There are two similar prayers, with the heading "Post Precem" in the Frankish Missal of the 7th century (ibid. 324–5). In two Gallican liturgies (Miss. Goth. in Lit. Gall. 243; Miss. Gall. Vet. 359) we find for use on Easter eve sets of twelve or thirteen short intercessory prayers, each introduced by a request [PREFACE (II.)] from the priest to the people that they would pray for some object or class of persons, as for those then and there keeping Easter, those in exile and unable to keep it; for the clergy; for devoted virgins; givers of alms, &c. In a third we find only the requests—"bedes" in the stricter sense—the prayer being left to the silent devotion of the people, except that the priest says a general "Collectio" at the end (Sacram. Gallic. (the Besançon) in Mus. Ital. i. 320). In the last these bedes follow immediately the metrical litany cited above. It is obvious that the form of this office is derived from a litany as bidden piece-meal by the deacon according to the practice of the East, and of the churches of Gaul and Spain. They were probably also a substitute for such a litany. That which had been the common eucharistic litany was retained on Easter eve, after its disuse at other times (Sacram. Gelas. u. s. i. 564; Ord. Rom. i. Mus. Ital. ii. 26, 35); but it had become little more than the repetition of Kyries, and the recitals of a long string of saints' names (see examples, Miss. Moz. Leslie, 187; Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. i. 18, Ordd. 6, 21). At this stage, I would suggest, the want of the intercessions in the old litanies was felt; and the churches in Gaul sought to restore them in another form by introducing the prefaces and collects above described.

The Hispano-Gothic preces came between the PROPHECY and the epistle; and those for the first five Sundays in Lent were retained in that place to the last, and are still so used in the liturgy as celebrated in the parish churches of St. Justa and St. Mark at Toledo (Miss. Mozar. Leslie, 94, 105, 117, 128, 139). The Ambrosian Missal still retains two sets of preces for alternate use on the second and three following Sundays in Lent. They are said by the deacon after the introit. Traces of the eucharistic preces are also found in the earlier Roman sacramentary. The heading to Missae, "Orationes et Preces," is of frequent occurrence, though the latter had disappeared (Lit. Rom. Vet. Murat. i. 349, Leon.; 493, 504, &c., Gelas.). The later Gregorian corrects this by the omission of et Preces. See the various codices: Mur. ii. 7, 10, &c.; Pamel. ibid. ii. 187, 196, &c.; Ménard, Opp. S. Greg. ed. Ben. iii. 82, 36, &c.; Rocca, Opp. S. Greg. ed. Autv. 1615, v. 68, 73, &c. Allusions to the preces of the people, similar to those of the Gallican collects cited above, are frequent in the Roman. Thus: "Exaudi, Domine, supplicum preces" (Sacr. Leon. ib. i. 517); "Suscipe, Domine, preces populi Tui" (Gelas. 572); "Preces populi Tui . . . . exaudi" (686), &c. Nor were these expressions rejected by the Gregorian reviser, as they were easily understood of the whole office when the proper "preces populi" had fallen out. They occur, of course, here in the collect for the day, which in the Roman rite followed the litany. See examples, Sacr. Greg. Mur. ii. 19, 26, 27, 31, 34, &c. Several of our own collects preserve this allusion to the preces. The following are among the more obvious examples: Coll. for Septuagesima (comp. Sacr. Greg. u. s. 26), tenth Sunday after Trinity (S. Gr. 169), and twenty-third after Trinity (ibid. 175).

III. The petitions dictated by the deacons for the catechumens and penitents before their dismissal were also called "preces." Germanus (u. s.) tells us, in the dialect of his day, that after the lessons "deprecarent pro illos Levitae, diceret sacerdos collecta; post prece exirent posteà foris qui digni non erant stare dum inferebatur oblatio." The Hispano-Gothic preces for penitents in Lent are extant (Miss. Mozar. Leslie, 99–147).

IV. At Rome the canon in the liturgy was sometimes called Prex. Thus Vigilius, 538, after speaking of the general "Ordo precum in solemnitate missarum," says to a correspondent, Profuturus of Braga, "Ipsius canonicae precis textum direximus subter adjectum, quem Deo propitio ex Apostolica traditione suscepimus" (Nova Collect. Conc. 1470, Par. 1683, § 5; in Labb. and Hard. "ad Eutherium"). Gregory I. in 598: "Orationem vero Dominicam idcirco post precem dicimus, quia mos Apostolum fuit ut ad ipsam solummodo orationem oblationem hostiae consecrarent" (Epist. ad Joan. Syrac. vii. 64). He had been blamed, "quia orationem Dominicam mox post canonem dici statuistis" (ibid.) [W. E. S.]

PREFACE (I.). A form in every liturgy serving as an introduction to the anaphora or missa fidelium.

The Benediction.—In most offices the preface began, after the first liturgic period, with a benediction by the priest, derived from 2 Cor. xiii. 14, to which the people responded, or with the ordinary mutual salutation of the priest and people. This part of the preface cannot claim an apostolic origin, for it is not mentioned by Cyril of Jerusalem in his close account of the liturgy of his church, A.D. 350 (Catech. Myst. v. 2, 3), nor in the West do we find it in the Gelasian sacramentary (Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 695), nor attached to the canon as borrowed from Rome by the Franks in the 8th century (Lit. Gall. Mabill. 326), nor have I met with any reason for supposing that it had a place in any purely Gallican liturgy. Yet the benediction is very ancient in the East. St. Chrysostom, 398, alludes to it; the priest "does not touch the offering without first praying that the grace from the Lord may be on you" (Hom. i. in Pentec. 4). Theodoret, A.D. 423, thought it universal, for he calls it "the commencement of the mystical liturgy in all the churches" (Epist. 146, ad Joan. Oecon.). In the liturgy of St. James, used at Jerusalem, it appears in this form: "The love of the Lord and Father, the grace of the Son and God, and the fellowship and gift of the Holy Ghost be with you all" (Codex Liturg. Assem. v. 32). Similar expansions or variations of the apostolic benediction are found in all the Syrian liturgies (Renaudot, Collect. Lit. Orient. ii. 21, 30, 126, 134, &c.), in the Egyptian rites of St. Gregory, Coptic and Greek (ibid. i. 27, 98), in the Armenian (Neale, Hist. East. Ch. Intro. 830), and the Clementine (Constit. Apost. viii. 12). The Nestorian liturgies, which in their [illegible] parts represent those of Constantinople, Jerusalem before the schism, are more faithful to the text of Scripture, but they read "us" for "you" at the end, and add "Now and for ever, world without end" (Ren. u. s. ii. 589, 617, 626; Missa Malabar. Raulin, 312). St. Basil and St. Chrysostom differ from St. Paul only by giving in the second clause "the love of the God and Father" (Euchologion, Goar, 165, 75). A few Eastern liturgies do not use this benediction. St. Mark and the Greek Alexandrine of St. Basil have instead, "The Lord be with you all" (Ren. i. 144, 64), the Coptic SS. Basil and Cyril, "The Lord be with you" (ibid. 13, 40).

The Mozarabic is the only Western liturgy which follows here (with its own variations) the more common oriental form: "The grace of God the Father Almighty, the peace and love of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost be with us all evermore" (Miss. Moz. Leslie, 4). The Milanese has, "The Lord be with you" (Ritual. SS. PP. Pamel. i. 300); and this (probably borrowed from Milan) is found in all the extant copies of the Roman Gregorian (Pamel. ii. 178; Rocca, Opp. Greg. v. 63, ed. 1615; Murat ii. 1; Ménard. Opp. Greg. ed. Ben. iii. 1; Gerbert, Monum. Eccl Aleman. 232; &c.).

The common response to both benedictions is, "And with thy spirit." This is recognised by St. Chrysostom (u. s.): "And ye respond to him, 'And with thy spirit.'" In a few liturgies, as the Nestorian (u. s. 589, 626), and the Syro-Jacobite of Eustathius of Antioch (ibid. 235) and Jacobus Baradatus (347), the people answer, Amen. The Mozarabic is peculiar: "And with men of good will." Several versicles and responses with the kiss of peace follow before the Sursum Corda is said (Miss. Mozar. Leslie, 4, 227).

Theodoret evidently regarded this benediction as the opening of the Missa Fidelium, and we should infer from St. Chrysostom that it was a part of it, and near the beginning. In the liturgy of Milan (u. s.) it is preceded by the rubric, Praefatio in Canonem, and in some Oriental rites (the Coptic St. Basil and St. Cyril, Ren. i. 13, 40) by the title ANAPHORA, or by the rubric, "The priest says the canon" (Lit. Nestor. ibid. ii. 589, 617). It is nevertheless not improbable that originally it was the close of the former and less sacred part of the liturgy, as suggested by Mr. Trollope (Lit. of St. James, 67). This opinion derives countenance from the facts, that in the Mozarabic the peace is given (Leslie, 4); in the Armenian, the deacon utters his cry of "The doors, the doors" (Neale, u. s.); in the Nestorian, the gifts are signed (Ren. ii. 589, 617, 626); between the salutation and the Sursum Corda; and also from the response, Amen, to the former in the very ancient rite of Nestorius (626).

Sursum Corda.—The next member of the preface is Sursum Corda, "Lift up your hearts," as it is commonly given. In one form or another this is found in every perfect liturgy, whence it is reasonably inferred to be apostolic. The earliest Greek writer who quotes it, Cyril of Jerusalem, 350, has Ἄνω τὰς καρδίας (Catech. Myst. v. 3), which evinces its superior antiquity both by its simplicity and its exact correspondence to the common and earlier Latin form, Sursum Corda. To the latter, St. Cyprian, 252, is the earliest witness: "Sacerdos, ante orationem praefatione praemissa, parat fratrum mentes dicendo, Sursum Corda" (de Orat. Domin. 152, ed. 1690). St. Augustine: "Si in terra obruis cor tuum, erubescè; quia mentiris cum respondes quando audis, Sursum Cor." (Serm. 346, § 4). The singular cor for the corda of St. Cyprian is so frequent in St. Augustine (see also Serm. 25, § 7; 53, § 14; 86, § 1; Enarr. ii. in Psalm. 31, § 21; &c.) as to indicate a difference between the liturgies of Carthage and Hippo. A later writer, compiling a sermon from St. Augustine (Serm. 261, § 1), changes his cor into corda (Serm. 177, § 2, in App. iv. ad Opp. Aug.). Caesarius of Arles, 502 has the plural: "Dicente Sacerdote Sursum Corda" (Serm. 40, § 4). Germanus of Paris, 555: "Sursum corda ideo sacerdos habere admonet, ut nulla cogitatio terrena maneat in pectoribus nostris" (Expos. Brev. Lit. Gall. Migne, lxxii. 94).

The liturgies of Rome and Milan have Sursum Corda (u. s.). So, as we have learnt from Caesarius and Germanus above, had the Gallican; so has the Mozarabic (u. s.), but in that it is preceded by the versicle and response: "Aures ad Dominum. R. Chorus. Habemus ad Dominum." It is singular that no Greek liturgy preserves the exact words cited by St. Cyril. St. Clement (u. s.) has, Ἄνω τὸν νοῦν; St. James (u. s.), Ἄνω σχῶμεν τὸν νοῦν καὶ τὰς καρδίας, which latter is the form cited by St. Chrysostom (Hom. ix. de Poenit. ii. 349), and by Anastasius Sinaïta (Orat. de Sacra Synaxi, Gretseri, Opp. xi. 454). The Greek St. Basil and St. Chrysostom give, Ἄνω σχῶμεν τὰς καρδίας; as do also the Greek liturgies of Alexandria (Ren. i. 64, 99). And this also is cited in the same passage by Anastasius, as if he were familiar with both forms. St. Mark (u. s. 144), gives, Ἄνω ὑμῶν τὰς καρδίας. The Nestorian Liturgy of the Blessed Apostles preserves the simple form, "Lift up your minds" (Ren. ii. 589); but it is greatly enlarged and paraphrased in those ascribed to Nestorius and Theodore: "Above in the height of the highest, and in the awful place of praise, where the fluttering of the wings of the cherubims ceases not, neither is there any intermission to their hallelujahs, or to the song of Holy, Holy, Holy, of the seraphim, thither lift up your hearts" (Badger's Nestorians, 223; Ren. ii. 617, 626). One Ordo Communis of the Syrian Melchites and Jacobites is also marked by the verbosity of the nation: "Above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God the Father, be lifted the minds and understandings and hearts of us all" (Ren. ii. 21); but with one exception (Xystus, 135) all the other Syrian forms in which it is expressed, including the common St. James, give, "Lift up your hearts" (ibid. 32, 127, 146, 155, &c.). In two only the salutation and its sequel is represented by the beginning, "The love," &c. (ii. 256, 513), wher the rest, including the Sursum, is doubtless to be taken from the Ordo Communis. The Coptic liturgies as translated give, "Lift up your hearts" (Ren. i. 13; Neale, 532), and "Sursum Corda" (Greg. Cyr. Ren. 28, 40), but the original Greek which here is still employed in the service ("ex antiquitatis reverentia," Ren. i. 226, 227; ii. 641) is, Ἄνω ἠμῶν τὰς καρδίας (i. 13). The clause before us has dropped out of the very corrupt Liturgia Communis or Canon Universalis of the Abyssinian church (Ren. i. 513), but, from the statement of Renaudot, appears to be in all their other liturgies (226). In the Armenian it is said by the deacon: "Lift up your minds on high with the fear of God" (Neale, 530).

The response, "We lift them up unto the Lord," is noticed among the Greeks by Cyril of Jerusalem (u. s.): "Then ye answer, Ἔχομεν πρὸς τὸν κύριον." Yet it does not appear in the liturgy of Jerusalem, though found in some form or other in every other. St. Chrysostom (Hom. ix. de Poen.) cites it in the same words as does also Anastasius Sinaita (u. s. 455, 456), and this is the common reading in the Greek liturgies—in St. Clement, St. Mark, and the Greek Alexandrines, in St. Basil and St. Chrysostom. Renaudot renders the Syrian Ordo Communis (ii. 21), "Sunt ad Dominum;" and so Masius, the Syrian St. Basil (586); but the former gives the "Habemus ad Dominum" in every other Syrian liturgy, except that of Xystus, where we read, "Habemus ad Te, Domine" (135). The Nestorian liturgies: "Sunt ad [apud Malab. u. s. 312] Te, Deus Abraham, Isaac, et Israel, rex gloriae (Bent. Apost. gloriose, Nest. pergloriose, Mal.); but Theodore (u. s.) simply, "Sunt apud Te, Deus." The Armenian (u. s.) has, "We have lifted them up to Thee, Father Almighty."

Among the Latins, St. Cyprian (de Or. Dom. u. s.), St. Augustine (Serm. 227, 345, § 4, &c.), Caesarius (Serm. 40, § 4), and others, quote from their liturgies "Habemus ad Dominum." According to St. Augustine, "quotidie per universum orbem humanum genus una paene voce respondet, Sursum corda se habere ad Dominum" (De Ver. Relig. 3, § 5). The Roman and Ambrosian liturgies give this formula, which the testimony of Caesarius proves to have been used in Gaul. The Mozarabic only has, "Levemus ad Dominum" (Leslie, 4, 227).

Eucharistia.—Another versicle is then said, properly, as in most liturgies, by the priest, but in the Armenian by the deacon. St. Cyril of Jerusalem gives it thus, Εὐχαριστήσωμεν τῷ κυρίῳ (Catech. Myst. v. 4); but it is not found in the liturgy of his church (St. James). It occurs in the same words in St. Clement (Const. Ap. viii. 12), in St. Basil, in St. Chrysostom (Goar, 75, 165), and in the Greek Alexandrine of St. Basil and of St. Gregory (Renaud. i. 64, 99), but St. Mark has, Εὐχαριστῶμεν τ. κ. (144). The Armenian adds, "With all our hearts" (Neale, 530). The Coptic rites have the same as the Greek, "Let us give thanks unto the Lord" (εὐχαριστῶμεν, 13, 28, 40). There are frequent variations in the Syrian. The Ordo Communis adds, "with fear" (Ren. ii. 21), to which Xystus adds, "and worship Him with trembling" (135). St. Basil: "Let us reverently," &c. (586; corr. 550); others: "Let us give thanks" (126, 170); but most resemble the Greek, "Let us give thanks unto the Lord" (146, 177, 187, 203, &c.); while St. James, which is used both by orthodox and heretics, agrees with the more common Western form, "Let us give thanks unto our Lord God" (31, 163). The Nestorian liturgies are peculiar. The Blessed Apostles (ibid. 589) and the Malabar (Raulin, 312): "An oblation is offered unto God, the Lord of all," which Theodore (Ren. ii. 617) and Nestorius (626) expand by long interpolations.

St. Augustine, in the Latin church, quotes the clause thus: "Gratias agamus Domino Deo nostro" (Serm. 68, § 5; similarly, Serm. 227; Epist. 187 ad Dard. § 21). This agrees with the Roman sacramentaries (Murat. Pamel. &c. u. s.). The Milanese (Pamel. i. 300) omits "Domino." The Mozarabic: "Deo, ac Domino nostro Jesu Christo, filio Dei, qui est in coelis, dignas laudes dignasque gratias referamus" (Leslie, 4). When the Gallican churches adopted the Roman canon, they took its preface with its several parts (see Miss. Franc. in Liturg. Gall. 327). Before that the Sursum Corda, &c. were not written in their liturgies, nor do they even appear before the contestatio in the oldest sacramentary in which the Roman canon was inserted, viz. that of Besançon (Mus. Ital. i. 279), though we learn from Germanus (u. s.) that they were not omitted. They were probably still said from memory until the suppression of the Gallican rites in the 8th century.

The response to which St. Chrysostom refers is found in nearly every liturgy. St. Cyril (Cat. u. s.) gives Ἄξιον καὶ δίκαιον. It is the same in the Greek St. James, St. Clement, the Alexandrine Basil and Cyril (all as above), and in the Coptic (Ren. i. 13, marg.). The common Greek St. Chrysostom and St. Basil enlarge it (u. s.) by a reference to the creed which in turn precedes the Sursum Corda: "It is meet and right to worship the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, the consubstantial and undivided Trinity"; but copies are extant of the 9th and 10th century that retain the brief original (Goar, 99; Bunsen, Analecta Ante-Nicaena, iii. 215). The Syrians have not changed it; but the Ordo Communis (u. s.) adds a distinct clause: "O God, have mercy on us." It is preserved in all the Nestorian liturgies (u. s.); but in that of Nestorius it is followed by an exhortation from the deacon to remember the mercy of God in the redemption of man, and by the words (also said by him), "Peace be with us all." In the rest he only says after it, "Peace be with us."

St. Augustine bears witness to the practice of Latin Africa: "Et vos attestamini 'Dignum et justum est" dicentes, ut ei gratias agamus qui nos fecit sursum ad nostrum caput habere cor" (Serm. 227; comp. de Don. Persev. 13, § 33; de Bono Viduit. 16, § 20). This is to a letter the response of the people in the Roman, Milanese, and Hispano-Gothic liturgies (u. s.). In the Gallican it is written at the beginning of many of the contestations, without any rubrics to distinguish the parts of the priest and people, viz. "Immolatio Missae. Dignum et justum est. Verè dignum et justum est nos Tibi gratias agere," &c. (Lit. Gall. 188, 197, &c.; 330, 371)

The Contestation.—The next part of the preface is strictly and properly, according to St. Chrysostom as quoted above, the commencement of the Eucharist. It is often itself called the Preface, partly perhaps for that reason, but more certainly because, being variable, it is the only part which appears under that title in the collections of proper prayers. The Goths of Spain called it the Illatio, either because this word, used by them in the sense of oblatio, was like the Greek anaphora, the name of the office that followed, or because it originally denoted the "illation of the gifts" (Conc. Valent. 524, can. 1) = the great entrance of the Greeks, which took place at this part of the service. "Quinta" [oratio], says Isidore of Seville, "infertur Illatio in consecratione oblationis, in qua etiam et ad Dei laudem de constitutione creaturarum virtutumque coelestium universitas provocatur" (De Off. i. 15, § 24). The word is once used as equivalent to preface in a collection of Roman prefaces at the end of the Vatican MS. from which Muratori prints the Sacr. Gregor. viz. in the rubric, "In Exaltatione S. Crucis eadem inlatio dicenda, quae et in inventione S. Crucis" (ii. 334). The Gallican churches often called this prayer immolatio, because it began the more sacrificial part of the liturgy. This may be illustrated by the rubrics, Ἀρχὴ τῆς προσκομιδῆς (Lit. S. Bas. Alex. Ren. i. 64; S. Greg. A. 99), and Ὁ ἱερεὺς ἄρχεται τῆς ἀναφορᾶς (S. Marci. 144), in some Eastern liturgies. "Immolatio" occurs in the Gregorian sacramentary (Mus. Ital. i. 345), in the Gothico-Gallican (Lit. Gall. Mabill. 188, 191, 202, &c.), and in the Missale Gallicanum Vetus of Thomasius, &c. (ibid. 334, 368, 370, &c.). In the Gallican liturgies it is also called the "contestatio" for an obvious reason, viz. because the celebrant in its first words joins his testimony with that of the people to the fitness and justice of giving thanks unto God.

The Roman words of contestation are, "Vere dignum et justum est, aequum et salutare, nos tibi semper et ubique gratias agere, Domine Sancte, Pater Omnipotens, aeterne Deus, per Christum Dominum nostrum" (Murat. Pamel. &c. u. s.); the Milanese, "Verè quia dignum et justum est," &c. (Pam. u. s.). The Mozarabic varies: "Dignum et justum est, nos tibi gratias agere," &c. (Leslie, 5, 17, &c.); "D. et j., vere aequum et salutare est, Domini nostri Jesu Christi adventum in mirabilibus praedicare," &c. (for Advent, 9); "D. et j., verè dignum et honorificum est," &c. (12); and so on, the clause which follows also varying. The Gallican varied also: "Verè dignum et justum est [aequum et salutare, Lit. Gall. 191] nos tibi semper, hic et ubique (269) gratias agere [et gloriari in operibus tuis, 269] Domine," &c. (188); "Vere aequum et justum est nos tibi gratias agere, vota persolvere," &c. (197). The Franks early adopted the constant Roman formulae with the canon, and indicated it by the same symbol ℣ (Lit. Gall. 317–319, &c.; comp. Sacram. Gelas. Mur. i. 494–496, &c.).

There is the same similarity amid variety in the Greek and Oriental rites. In the Alexandrine St. Basil the priest repeats the words Ἅγιος ἅγιος ἅγιος, and then makes a direct address to God, which begins like that of the Greek St. Basil. The more ancient Syrian rites (as St. James, St. Basil, &c. u. s.) are faithful to their Greek originals; but many of the later have no express contestation. In the liturgy of Nestorius (ib. 627), and in the Nestorian Blessed Apostles (589), the priest prays for himself between the response and the contestation.

The celebrant next, in every liturgy, declares the reason why God should be thus glorified; in some, as in the Clementine, in the Nestorian Theodore and Nestorius, in St. Mark and St. Basil, Greek and Syrian, and some other Syrian forms, at great length. St. Chrysostom and the Armenian are here shorter than St. Basil, but longer than St. James, the original of all three. The following is one of the shorter Oriental forms: O Thou who art, Master, Lord, the God of Truth, existing from eternity, and reigning to eternity, who dwellest in the highest for ever, and lookest down on lowly things, who hast made the heaven and the earth and the sea, and all things that are therein; the Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, by whom Thou hast made all things visible and invisible, who sittest on the throne of the holy glory of Thy kingdom, who art adored by every heavenly power" (Lit. Bas. Gr. Alex. in Renaud. i. 64). St. Cyril (Catech. Myst. v. 6) refers to this part of the liturgy of Jerusalem at sufficient length to show that it resembled very closely, and may even have been identical with, the preface as it now stands in St. James. The Eastern rites have no changing or "proper" prefaces.

The common Western prefaces are here much shorter than any of the original Eastern, the reason of the eucharistia being expressed in a few epithets only: "Domine, sancte, Pater Omnipotens, aeterne Deus" (Rom. Ambr.). But all the Western missals admitted many proper prefaces; and in the Mozarabic and Gallican liturgies the whole ground of the doxology is stated in the addition proper to the day, which sometimes begins with the foregoing Roman formula, but very often not. Ex. "Dignum et justum est te auctorem et sanctificatorem jejunii conlaudare, per quod nos liberas a nostrorum debitis peccatorum. Ergo suscipe clemens jejunantium preces," &c. (Missa Jejunii in Miss. Goth. No. 24, u. s.).

Proper Prefaces.—Though proper prefaces cannot be traced to the East, they were nevertheless very early in the West. In one for Christmas Day in the Mozarabic rite we read: "Post multa tempora in hac die, ante non multa tempora . . . nobis natus est Christus" (Leslie, 39). A "contestatio" in the Gallican fragment discovered by Mone is thought both by him and the English editors to have been written during the persecution at Vienne and Lyons in 177. This is suggested by the apparent age and the matter of the prayer, and by a comparison of it with the epistle from the Christians of those cities to their brethren in Asia and Phrygia (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 1). See Gallican Liturgies, Neale and Forbes, Miss. 5, p. 12.

The Milanese missal has above 120 proper prefaces, one for every missa. They are yet more numerous in the Mozarabic, and they appear to have varied in the several Gallican rites, whenever the other prayers varied. Hence, in the Besançon and Gothico-Gallican sacramentaries, we find above seventy. They were equally numerous at Rome in the 6th century, for Vigilius, 538, tells us that on saints' days, as well as at Easter, the Ascension, and Epiphany, "they added proper chapters adapted to the days" (Nova Collect. Concil. 1470); that is, they had a proper missa for every such day, and a missa was not complete without its preface. The so-called Leonian sacramentary, or Veronese Gelasian, must have contained more than 300; but the rule for their use is not very certain. The later Gelasian limited this profusion to Easter, Ascension-tide, and Pentecost (Murat. u. s. i. 572–606), while the Gregorian reduced the number to eight, of which two were said on Christmas Day, that at the second celebration being for St. Anastasia, and the others severally at the Epiphany, Easter, on Ascension Day, at Whitsuntide, and on the feasts of St. Peter and St. Andrew (ibid. ii. 8, 9, 16, 66, 85, 101, 131).

There were also in some rites proper prefaces for special services; as for the benediction of oil and chrism [see MISSA, x. (2)] (Sacr. Gelas. Mur. u. s. i. 555, 556, 557; Sacr. Greg. ii. 55); of the paschal light (Missale Goth. Mab. u. s. 241; Miss. Gall. Vet. 857; Miss. Moz. Leslie, 177; Miss. Ambros. Pamel. i. 345; Sacr. Greg. Mur. ii. 143); at baptism (Miss. Goth. u. s. 247; Miss. Gall. Vet. "Contestatio Fontis," 363; not in the Roman, Milanese, or Mozarabic); at marriage (Sacr. Gel. u. s. i. 721; Greg. ii. 245); at ordination (Sacr. Greg. 244, 427, 439).

The variable part of the canon "Communicantes," &c. is headed by the title Praefatio in the mass for Maundy Thursday (Sacr. Greg. u. s. 54), but this is by error.

The Reference to the Angelic Hosts.—In every liturgy the eucharistic preface leads up to the angelic hymn, after a reference, which is nearly universal, to the heavenly spirits by whom it was first sung. They are claimed as fellow-worshippers. "This divine saying handed down to us, which proceeded from the seraphim we repeat, that we may have communion in our hymnody with the supramundane hosts" (Cyr. Hier. Cat. Myst. v. 5). Most of the Greek liturgies here enumerate the orders of the angels. Thus St. James (who associates with them "the spirits of the just and of the prophets, the souls of the martyrs and the apostles"): "Angels, archangels, thrones, dominions, principalities, and authorities, and awful powers (see Col. i. 16), and the cherubim with many eyes, and the seraphim with six wings, who with two wings cover their faces, and with two their feet, and flying with two, shout one to another with mouths never resting, with doxologies never silent (ecphonesis), chanting with clear voice the triumphal hymn of Thy exalted glory, crying aloud, giving glory, shouting, and saying, Holy, Holy," &c. (Assem. v. 33). Compare the Clementine (Const. Apost. viii. 12), St. Mark (Renaud. i. 134), St. Basil (Goar, 165), St. Chrysostom (ib. 75), the Greek Alexandrine Basil and Gregory (Ren. i. 65, 99). See also the Coptic Basil, Gregory, Cyril (ib. 13, 28, 46). Similarly, the early Syrian liturgies, St. James (Ren. ii. 31), St. Basil (586), &c. St. Chrysostom, however (Goar, 76), only names the angels, archangels, cherubim and seraphim, while the Armenian is yet more simple: "He . . . hath granted us to form part, with the heavenly host, of a spiritual company, and with cherubim and seraphim boldly to sing sacred songs, to cry, to call, and say, Holy," &c. (Neale, Introd. 534). Nor are the several orders, as in Col. i. 16, mentioned in the Nestorian liturgies (Ren. ii. 589, 617, 628; Malab. Raul. 312); though this part of the preface is long in them; but we cannot infer from these facts that they were not named in the apostolic originals; for the passage above cited from St. James is fully recognised in St. Cyril's quotations from the liturgy of Jerusalem (u. s.).

The prefaces of St. Mark and the Coptic St. Cyril, which is derived from it, are strangely interrupted by very long forms of intercession and by the reading of the diptychs, which are introduced immediately before the reference to the angelic hosts now under consideration (Ren. i. 41, 146).

In the West this part of the preface is variable. There were four forms of it in the Roman liturgy, of which the most common is as follows: "Et ideo cum angelis et archangelis, cum thronis et dominationibus, cumque omni militia caelestis exercitus hymnum tuae gloriae canimus, sine fine dicentes, Sanctus," &c. (Murat. Sacr. Leon. i. 312, 314, &c.; Gelas. 501, 503, &c.; Greg. ii. 8, 9, 10, &c.). For the others, see Sacr. Gel. i. 494, 575, &c., Greg. ii. 322 (Quem laudant); Leon. i. 315, Gel. 517, 554, &c.; Greg. ii. 2, 192, &c. (Per quem Te, or Per quem majestatem); Gel. i. 572; Greg. ii. 90 (Sed et supernae virtutes). These forms are found in the Gallican and Ambrosian liturgies, but often varied, and with several others; e.g.—"Ante cujus sacratissimam sedem stant angeli atque archangeli, et sine cessatione proclamant, dicentes, Sanctus," &c. (Miss. Goth. in Lit. Gall. 198); "Congratuletur innumerabilis multitudo angelorum exercitus, cum quibus innumerabilem gloriam tuam canimus, sine fine dicentes, Sanctus," &c. (Miss. Ambr. Pamel. i. 300). In the Mozarabic rite no preface seems in this part to follow any other. Some are very ambitious, while others are as simple. Ex. "Cum angelis atque archangelis laudantibus atque ita dicentibus, Sanctus," &c. (Leslie, 15).

The Hosanna.—Even the hosanna which followed the sanctus is included by Isidore (de Off. i. 15, § 3) in the illation ("in qua etiam et ad Dei laudem terrestrium creaturarum virtutumque coelestium universitas provocatur et osanna in excelsis cantatur"); but this will be more properly noticed in a separate article on the SANCTUS itself.

(II.) A short address in which the people are taught the intention of the prayer or office which follows. The word is chiefly so used in the liturgies of Gaul. In a complete Gallican missa a preface follows the "Collectio post Precem." The collect which it precedes and explains is usually headed Collectio sequitur, but often merely Collectio [MISSA, X. (3) (c)]. It begins the Missa Fidelium, and corresponds exactly to the "Missa" of the Goths in Spain [MISSA, V.]

In certain intercessions said on Easter Eve in the churches of Gaul [PRECES, § ii.] the several prayers are preceded by short addresses which are called prefaces in the Missale Gothicum. E.g. "Oratio pro Infirmis. Pruefatio. Let us beseech the God of all health, and Lord of all power for our brethren and sisters, who are afflicted in the flesh by various kinds of sickness, that the Lord will grant unto them the heavenly gift of His medicine; through," &c. "Oratio sequitur. O Lord, to whom it is an easy thing to raise the dead to life, restore to the sick their former health," &c. (Lit. Gall. 245). The Missale Gothicum has twelve such prefaces, the Gallicanum Vetus (ib. 359) thirteen, each followed by the prayer for the object announced in it.

The Ambrosian missal has a Praefatio chrismatis, in which the bishop on Maundy Thursday invites the people to pray for the benediction of the chrism (Rituale SS. PP. Pamel. i. 341). In the Gelasian sacramentary (Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 621) the bishop begs the prayers of the congregation for those whom he is about to bless or ordain in forms entitled "Praefatio Ostiarii, Lectoris, Exorcistae," &c., and the phrase is retained in the Gregorian pontifical (ib. 405, 406, &c.). [W. E. S.]

PRESANCTIFIED, MASS OR LITURGY OF. Any communion of the reserved elements might be so called; but in practice these phrases were applied only to those public communions in Lent for which the elements had been expressly consecrated on a previous day. In the East, consecrations were forbidden from an early period throughout Lent, except on Saturdays and Sundays; in the church of Rome they were equally forbidden on Good Friday and Easter Eve; in Italy, i.e. in the province of Milan, on every Friday in Lent. Hence those who wished to communicate on those days received of the presanctified, i.e. of the previously consecrated gifts.

The East.—The foundation of the rite was laid early in the East. The council of Laodicea, probably about 365, says, "It is not lawful to offer bread in Lent, except on the Sabbath and the Lord's Day alone" (can. 49); which appears rather to state and confirm an old custom than to establish a new. In an age when communions were valued, and RESERVATION for whatever reason practised, the final result would soon develop itself; but we have no decree respecting it earlier than that of Constantinople in 691: "Let the sacred liturgy of the presanctified [gifts] be performed on all the days of the fast of the holy Forty Days, except the Sabbath and the Lord's Day, and the holy day of the Annunciation" (can. 52). The Greek liturgy of the presanctified (which see in the Euchologion, Goar, 190) was probably compiled by Germanus of Constantinople some twenty-four years after the date of the council there (Goar, 210).

Only the Greeks celebrate a proper liturgy of the presanctified. The Maronites do not even reserve on the liturgic days of Lent (Abraham Ecchellensis, Epist. ad B. Nihusium in Leon. Allat. de Eccl. Occid. et Orient. Consens. ad calc. 1663). They celebrated every day in Lent, except on Saturday; but the exception was only a part of their Jewish observance of that day.

The West.—Probably the earliest notice of a restriction on celebrations in the West occurs in the epistle of Pseudo-Innocent to Decentius: "It is an established fact that the apostles were in grief during those two days (Good Friday and Easter Eve), and also that they hid themselves from fear of the Jews. Nor, indeed, is it doubtful that during the said two days they fasted to such a degree that the tradition of the church holds that the sacraments of the church should not be celebrated at all during those two days" (§ 4; Hard. Conc. i. 997). The writer is stating, of course, the rule of Rome. It is probable that Easter Eve was not long thus a dies clausus; but the history of the rite is very obscure. The present rule, which only prescribes reservation on Maundy Thursday for the communion on Good Friday, was probably introduced in the 7th century. A monastic rule of that age, which appears to be in great part a translation from the Greek, says, "Let the sacraments of the altar be consecrated [on the Thursday] in a large glass paten, that when the Jews shall seek Christ for the passion on the sixth day [of holy week], He may on that day be hid in our minds" (through reception of the sacrament; Regula Magistri, 53; Holsten. Cod. Reg. ii. 406). The Gelasian sacramentary, the MS. of which is of the 8th century, directs that, after certain prayers proper to Good Friday, "the deacons go into the sacrarium, and come forth with the body and blood of the Lord, left from the preceding day, and set them on the altar." The Lord's Prayer with its preface and embolis having been then said, as before other communions, "all adore the holy cross and communicate" (Liturg. Rom. Vet. Murat. i. 562). This procedure is recognized by the Roman Order of a Pontifical Mass, compiled (it is thought) about 730. The bishop, "when they have said Amen (after the 'Libera nos'), takes of the SANCTA, and puts it into the cup, saying nothing; and they all communicate in silence" (Ordo R. i. 35, in Mus. Ital. ii. 23). Similarly, in a monastic ordo, seemingly of about the same age: "Let the deacon take the body and blood of the Lord, which was left previously on the day of Coena Domini, and was consecrated, and put it on the altar, and let all partake of the body and blood of the Lord in silence" (Breviar. Eccl. Ord. in Thesaur. Nov. Anecd. Mart. et Dur. v. 108). The Gelasian rubric is found copied into the rites of Noyons, Rheims, Riès, and Gellone, all preserved in MSS. of the 9th century (Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. iv. 23, § 27).

It was from Rome that the Gallican church thus received the rite; for it is not found in her earlier books. The remains of the Gothico-Gallican missal (Liturg. Gall. Mabill. 237–239), the Gallicanum Vetus (ibid. 349–354), the Besançon sacramentary (Mus. Ital. i. 315–318), and the Gallican lectionary (Lit. Gall. 128–133), give proper prayers and lessons for Maundy Thursday and Good Friday, but there is no allusion in them to the mass of the presanctified. Nor do we find any in the writings of Germanus, or in any other Gallican authority.

Nor do we discover any trace of it in the original office of Gothic Spain. It is not mentioned by St. Isidore (de Offic.), nor by any of the Spanish councils. On the other hand, the council of Toledo, 633, complains that "throughout some churches the doors of the basilicas were closed on the 6th feria of our Lord's passion (i.e. on Good Friday), and neither was office celebrated nor the passion of the Lord preached." The council therefore ordered—not that a mass of the presanctified should be celebrated—but that the mystery of the cross should be preached on that day, "and that all the people should in a loud voice implore the pardon of their sins"; that by this means they might be prepared for their communion on Easter Day (can. 7). The service for Good Friday, now found in the Mozarabic missal, is of a late date: "missa præsanctificatorum adjecta videtur" (Mabillon, Comm. in Ord. Rom. 11; Mus. Ital. ii. LXXV.).

We have no evidence of the practice of Roman Africa later than that of St. Augustine, who refers more than once to the service for Good Friday ("solemniter legitur passio, solemniter celebratur," Serm. 218; so again 232), but gives no hint of the peculiar rite in question.

The Communion.—The mass of the presanctified originated in the desire to communicate on Good Friday, or on other days when consecration was prohibited. On Good Friday (Parasceve), says Amalarius, "the body of the Lord is not consecrated. It is necessary that they who have the wish to communicate have the sacrifice from the preceding day" (de Eccl. Off. i. 12). This was at first a general communion, "ut populus qui reficiendus erat haberet in fundamentum Corpus Domini" (ibid. iv. 20). So according to the Gelasian rubric, the Ordo Romanus, and the Breviarium, quoted above, "all commu[illegible]." Amalarius (about 820) went to Rome, and found this custom already obsolete there: "in that station in which the apostolical salutes the cross, no one there communicates" (u. s. i. 15).

PRESBYTER. [PRIEST.]

PRESBYTERESS. 1. Presbytera (rarely, and apparently later, presbyterissa) is sometimes found in ecclesiastical Latin from the 6th century and onwards for the wife of a presbyter, especially for a wife who had come under the rule which, in some parts of the Western church, made married continence compulsory. Conc. Turon. A.D. 567, c. 19, and Conc. Autissiodor. A.D. 578? c. 20, forbid a presbyter from associating with his presbytera; S. Greg. M. Epist. 9, 7, implies that in such cases the wife went to a monastery, where, however, she did not become a monacha or adopt the monastic dress. Rather later the word is found for the widow of a presbyter (=the earlier "vidua," or "relicta, presbyteri." 1 Conc. Tolet. c. 18, Conc. Epaon. c. 33, 1 Conc. Aurel. c. 13), viz. in Roman councils under Gregory II. in A.D. 721, c. i. and under Zachary in 743, c. 5, both of which anathematize any one who marries either a presbytera or a diacona.

2. For the use of πρεσβῦτις, presbytera, and presbyterissa in the sense of a church officer, see WIDOWS AND VIRGINS. [E. H.]

PRESBYTERY (1). The part of the church occupied by priests (βῆμα, θυσιαστήριον, ἅβατον, ἅβατα, Πρεσβυτερεῖον) (Sic in Suidas) Presbyterium, Sacrarium, Sanctuarium, Altarium. (Secretarium in second council of Arles, can. 15, acc. to Martene).

According to the most ancient arrangement of churches, the presbytery was the part behind the altar which contained seats for the bishop and priests. It was early described in the West as follows: ". . . loco, ubi sacerdotes, reliquique clerici consistunt, quod presbyterium nuncupatur . . ." (Synodus Romana sub Eugenio (824), ap. Ducange. Quoted as Clemens Papa in Labbe, vol. i. 116).

. The presbytery was divided from the rest of the building by rails (κίγκλιδες, cancelli), which were meant to render it inaccessible to all but clergy (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. x. 4). That it was separated by rails "à reliquâ aede" appears in the Roman synod under Leo IV. The first council of Bracara (can. 31) prescribes that it is "not lawful for laymen to enter the sacrarium to communicate, but only for the clerics." A Roman synod, under Leo IV., in the 9th (qu.) century, forbids those who are not in orders to enter it. [CANCELLI; CHANCEL; CHOIR.]

In later times some ambiguity has crept in as to the use of the term presbytery, the doubt being whether it applies to a space before the altar or behind it, and whether the presbytery forms, strictly speaking, any part of the choir of a great church, or is to be carefully distinguished and architecturally separated from it. These later uses it does not belong to the present volume to discuss at length; but with regard to the precise latitude of the term in early centuries this much may be said, that no ancient passage has been found where presbytery does not mean the part of the church which contained the altar. In later times the usage of the word is certainly twofold, it being sometimes identical with choir,[a] and sometimes pointedly distinguished from it. [H. T. A.]

(2) Presbyterium, πρεσβυτέριον (πρεσβυτερεῖον), are sometimes used to denote the body of presbyters taken collectively that is, as equivalent to τὸ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων συνέδριον. This use is found in the New Testament in reference to both Jewish (St. Luke xxii. 66; Acts xxii. 5) and Christian (1 Tim. iv. 14) presbyters. Other early instances are, in Greek, S. Ignat. ad Ephes. c. 2, 4; Clem. Alex. Strom. 6, 13, p. 793, ed. Pott.; Origen, Hom. xi. in Hierem. c. 3, vol. iii. p. 189, ed. Delarue; S. Basil. Epist. 81 (319) ad Innocent. vol. iv. p. 174; and, in Latin, S. Cyprian. Epist. 48 (45, ed. Hartel, p. 610); Collat. Carthag. c. 130, Migne, P. L. vol. xi. 1298. For the functions of the presbyters acting collectively see PRIEST.

(3) The same words are also used to denote the office of a presbyter. Early instances of this are, in Greek, Origen. Hom. in Matt. XV. c. 28, vol. iii. p. 690, ed. Delarue; S. Athanas. Apol. c. Arian. c. 47, vol. i. p. 131; S. Epiphan. c. Haeres, 68, 2, p. 717; and in Latin, S. Cyprian. Epist. 49 (52, ed. Hartel, p. 619), 34 (39, ed. Hartel, p. 584); Pont. Diacon. Vit. S. Cyprian. c. 3; S. Siric. Epist. i. c. 13; S. Innocent. I. Epist. 38 ad Maxim. et Sever.; 2 Conc. Hispal. c. 5. [E. H.]

Al. Strom. 6, p. 793, ed. (2) Ἱερεύς, sacerdos: the early instances of the use of these terms in reference to the officers who were commonly called presbyters are open to much dispute; it has sometimes been questioned whether Cyprian does not reserve them exclusively for the episcopate, but Epist. 35, vol. ii. p. 325, Epist. 40. 3, vol. ii. p. 334, clearly refer to presbyters, cf. id. Epist. 14, 3, vol. ii. p. 263, where (as in Optatus, i. 13, p. 14), even deacons are included, "presbyteris et diaconibus non defuit sacerdotii vigor"; from the 5th century onwards, there is no doubt of their common application to presbyters, e.g. Socrat. H. E. i. 27; Const. Apost. 2, 25; 8, 46 (where presbyters are ἱερεῖς, bishops ἀρχιερεῖς); 1 Conc. Turon. A.D. 461, c. 1, 4 Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 3, 4, 10; S. Greg. Byzant. vol. i. p. 55, ed. Venet. τῶν βαρβάρων ἔχων ἱερέα ὃν οἱ Χριστιανοὶ καλοῦσι πρεσβύτερον. In course of time, however, the inclusion of both for bishops and presbyters under a single term was found inconvenient, and presbyters were sometimes specially designated as secundi sacerdotes (law of Theodosius and Valentinian, probably A.D. 430 ap. Haenel, Corpus Legum ante Justinianum Latarum, No. 1183, p. 241, who quotes as his authority a Corbey MS. given by Sirmond in his Append. Cod. Theodos. c. 20, and his own paper in the Act. Soc. Reg. Saxon. Lips. 1852, 8, p. 81), or secundi ordinis sacerdotes (S. Leon. M. Serm. 48 [47], c. 1, vol. i. p. 181, Sidon. Apollin. Epist. 5, 25, p. 126), or minoris ordinis sacerdotes (S. Greg. M. Hom. in Ezech. lib. ii. Hom. 10, c. 13, where, however, deacons may be included, as they probably are, in Statt. Eccles. Antiq. c. 27, "inferioris gradus sacerdotes")—or simply ordo secundus (Fredegodi, Vit. S. Wilfrid, c. 8, Migne, P. L. vol. cxxxiii. 987), or οἱ ἐκ τοῦ δευτέρου θρόνου (Epist. Constant. M. ap. Euseb. H. E. 10, 5); so "presbyteros in secundo sacerdotio constitutos," Optat. de Schism. Donat. 1, 13, p. 14; so in the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals Epist. Anaclet. 3, c. 28. "secundum ordo bipertitus est, S. Innocent I. Epist. ad Decent. c. 3, "presbyteri licet sint sacerdotes pontificatus tamen apicem non habent."

The English word "priest" is the later form of the Anglo-Saxon "preost" (Cotton MS. Augustus, ii. 79, A.D. 805-831, a Kentish charter, printed in Ancient Charters in the British Museum, vol. i.) or "preost" (frequently found, e.g. Conc. Bergh. c. 7 ap. Wilkins, Councils, vol. i. p. 60; Leg. Aelfr. ibid. p. 193), the derivation of which from "presbyter" is probable, but by no means certain: in the A.-S. Chronicle, an. 661, id. Thorpe, p. 54, the MS. of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, has "maesse preost," the Bodleian MS. "preost," but Cotton MSS. Tiberius A. 6 and B. 1, have the abbreviation "prb." The A. S. "sacerd"="sacerdos" has not survived in modern English.

II. Nature of the Priesthood, and its Relations to Bishops and Deacons.—In one of the two passages in which the word ἐκκλησία is placed by the Evangelists on the lips of our Lord, it is mentioned not merely as an assembly, but as one to which disputes could be referred, and whose decision in relation to such disputes ought to be respected. The ἐκκλησία was conceived, in short, as a court of discipline. As such it continued among Christians the functions which had come to be fulfilled by the synagogue among Jews; nor was it separated from the synagogue even in name, ἐκκλησία and συναγωγή being convertible terms not only in the LXX, but also in most early Christian writers. (See Harnack's elaborate note in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie for 1876, p. 104; and also Bickell, Geschichte des Kirchenrechts, Bd. ii. p. 1[illegible].) But the Jewish synagogue only possessed disciplinary powers by virtue of its practical amalgamation with the συνέδριον, that is, by virtue of the presence in it, though properly distinct from it, of a body of πρεσβύτεροι—a corporation or college of elders, who formed the local court for administrative as well as judicial purposes. It is therefore natural to suppose that when the Jews who became Christians met in assemblies and formed communities which bore the accustomed names, they continued in these assemblies and communities the main features of the accustomed organization. And this is in fact the case. Presbyters are found from the first in the Judaeo-Christian community at Jerusalem (Acts xi. 30; xv. 2, 4, 6, 22, 23; xvi. 4; xx. 17), at Ephesus (Acts xx. 17), in the churches of Asia Minor which were organized by Barnabas and Saul (Acts xiv. 23), and in the churches which are addressed by those of the apostles who were most conservative of Jewish usages, St. Peter and St. James (James v. 14; 1 Pet. v. 1). (It must be noted as a significant fact that they are not once mentioned by St. Paul, except in the Pastoral Epistles.) It is a fair inference that officers who bore the same name in analogous communities had analogous functions, and that the Christian, like the Jewish, presbyters were officers primarily not of worship but of discipline. This inference is corroborated by the fact that all the references to them which exist in both the canonical and the extra-canonical writings of the apostolic and sub-apostolic age refer to discipline. (1) In the canonical writings, excluding of course those passages in which the reference is not to organization but to the possession of χαρίσματα, every passage in which church officers are mentioned speaks of either the exercise of authority or of the practice of its correlative, obedience. In 1 Thess. v. 12, τοὺς προϊσταμένους are spoken of as νουθετοῦντας; in Heb. xiii. 17, obedience is enjoined to the leaders of the community as being those who "watch for your souls;" in 1 Peter v. 1, the presbyters are regarded as shepherds, and are exhorted to exercise control, μὴ ἀναγκαστῶς ἀλλ' ἑκουσίως, not as masters over slaves (κατακυριεύοντες), but as being themselves examples of the qualities which they require in others; in the Acts of the Apostles it is on questions of church discipline that the apostles and elders meet in the council of Jerusalem (c. xv.), and afterwards at the end of St. Paul's second missionary journey (xxi. 18, 25); in the Pastoral Epistles, among the qualities which are enumerated as desirable in bishops and presbyters fitness for teaching (διδακτικός) and soundness in the faith (ἀντεχόμενον τοῦ κατὰ τὴν διδαχὴν πιστοῦ λόγου) are altogether subordinated to the possession of the moral qualities which are necessary in a moral governor, and which in the Apostolical Constitutions are expressly taken as correlative to the exercise of discipline. (2) In the extra-canonical writings of the Apostolic and sub-Apostolic age the same position is held by the presbyters, and obedience to them is similarly enjoined—e.g. Clem. R. i. 57; Ignat. ad Trall. 3, ad Magnes. 2; Polycarp, ad Philipp. 5; and the Ebionites appear to have kept up the original distinction, which had apparently become in most cases obliterated among the Jews themselves between the ἀρχισυνάγωγοι, or proper officers of the synagogue, and the πρεσβύτεροι, or proper officers of the συνέδριον (S. Epiphan. adv. Haeres. xxx. 18).

Whether the institution of presbyters existed in the first instance outside the limits of the Judaeo-Christian communities is doubtful. There is no evidence that it did so; the presumption is that it did not, for when St. Paul, writing to churches which were presumably non-Jewish in their character, recognizes the existence of church officers, he designates them by other names—προϊσταμένοι (1 Thess. v. 12), ἐπίσκοποι (Phil. i. 1).

(i.) Relations of Presbyters to Bishops.—What were the primitive relations of presbyters to bishops is a question which cannot be overlooked, and yet to which, with the evidence at present available, only a tentative answer can be given. Most probably, as the former were of Jewish, so the latter were of Gentile origin, and as the former presided over Jewish, so the latter, in the first instance, presided over Gentile communities. Hence, when the distinction between Jewish and Gentile communities began to fade away, the two sets of officers, fulfilling, as they did, analogous functions, were regarded as having equivalent rank. This point must be taken as having been conceded by almost all important writers upon the subject in both ancient and modern times—e.g. in ancient times, S. Hieron. Comm. in Ep. ad Tit. c. i. id.; Ep. 148 (85) ad Evang.; Theodoret, Interp. Ep. ad Philipp. c. i. v. 1; Ep. i. ad Timoth. c. iii. v. 1; Ep. ad Tit. c. i. v. 7; S. Isidor. Hispal. de Eccles. Off. lib. ii. c. 7; Hrabanus Maurus de Clericorum Instit. lib. i. c. 6; and in modern times, to take only writers whose tendencies are strongly hierarchical, Probst (Sacraments, p. 215); Döllinger (First Age of the Church (E. T.), vol. ii. p. 111). (The evidence upon which this opinion is based will be found in a convenient form in Bp. Lightfoot's edition of The Epistle to the Philippians, pp. 189 sqq., and in Gebhardt and Harnack's edition of Clement of Rome, ed. altera, p. 5, and of the Shepherd of Hermas, p. 25: see also Baur, Kirch. Gesch. 3te Aufl. i. p. 270. It must, however, be noted that there is a tendency in many writers to press the evidence too far, and to infer an original identity of bishops and presbyters, whereas all that can be legitimately inferred is, as stated above, an equivalence of rank.) As inter-communion increased between Judaeo-Christian and Gentile communities, those who passed from one to the other tended to use the names bishop and presbyter as interchangeable; but how the two offices came to co-exist as distinct offices in the same community is the most difficult point in the whole complex question; nor does it seem possible upon existing evidence to give any other than the general answer that there was a fusion of the Judaeo-Christian and the Gentile organizations, and that this fusion was a gradual one. But whether this or some other be the true explanation of the co-existence of the two offices, the fact of such co-existence must be admitted, although its universality may be denied. Out of that fact two other questions spring: (1) How was it that the relative rank of the two offices changed from one of equivalence to one of subordination; (2) and how was it that the title ἐπίσκοπος rather than any other attached itself permanently to the head of the ecclesiastical organization.

(1) To the first question many answers have been given in both ancient and modern times: when, as early as the end of the 4th century, Aerius appealed to St. Paul's language as evidence that bishops and presbyters were μία τάξις, μία τιμὴ, καὶ ἓν ἀξίωμα, Epiphanius, though admitting that the difference between the two orders lay only in the power of ordination (this is expressed by the contrast between πατέρας γεννᾶν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ = to ordain, and τέκνα γεννᾶν τῇ ἐκκλ. = to baptize), propounded the theory that in some cases bishops had been appointed and not presbyters, and in others presbyters, but not bishops. In either case, however, deacons were necessary, and hence St. Paul speaks sometimes of deacons and bishops, sometimes of deacons and presbyters. Assuming that Timothy was (1) a bishop, (2) a bishop in the later sense, he regards the command, "Rebuke not an elder" (1 Tim. v. 1), as conclusive proof of the superiority of the one order to the other (S. Epiphan. adv. Haeres. lxxv. 3–6, p. 906). Almost contemporary with this was the theory of Jerome, that the episcopate rose out of the presbyterate as a safeguard against schism. At first there were several presbyters in one church, but afterwards one was elected to preside over the rest: "quod postea unus electus est qui ceteris praeponeretur in schismatis remedium factum est, ne unusquisque ad se trahens Christi ecclesiam rumperet" (Hieron. Ep. 146 [85] ad Evangel.). So also in his Comment. in Ep. ad Tit. c. i. "idem est ergo presbyter qui et episcopus et antequam, diaboli instinctu, studia in religione parent et diceretur in populis, Ego sum Pauli, ego Apollo, ego autem Cephae, communi presbyterorum consilio ecclesiae gubernabantur"). Later theories on the subject are so numerous as to make the discussion of them an almost endless task; and it must be sufficient here to refer to the more important of those which have been advanced during the present century, viz. those of Rothe, Die Anfänge der christlichen Kirche u. ihrer Verfassung, 1837 (which is adopted in effect by Döllinger, First Age of the Church (E. T.), vol. ii. p. 112); Baur (1) über der Ursprung des Episcopats, 1838 (which is mainly a criticism of Rothe's theory), and (2) Kirch. Geschichte, 3te Auflage, Bd. i. pp. 272 sqq.; Ritschl, Die Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche, pp. 399 sqq.; Herzog über die Abfassungszeit der Pastoralbriefe, 1872; Hackenschmidt, Die Anfänge des katholischen Kirchenbegriffs, 1874.

Without here adding another complete theory to those which have been advanced already, or treading unnecessarily upon debatable ground, it may be useful to point out that in all probability the question does not admit of a single answer, and that the relations of presbyters to bishops varied widely in the several groups into which the churches of the first two centuries may be arranged. (a) The case of Jerusalem stands on a peculiar footing. The Acts of the Apostles preserve the tradition, which is confirmed by later authorities, that James had a kind of presidency over the Judaeo-Christian community which existed there. The nature of that presidency is uncertain. The Clementines speak of him as "episcopus" (Recogn. i. 66), or "archiepiscopus" (ibid. i. 73; so also in later times, e.g. Conc. Ephes. c. 30); but there is no contemporary evidence of his having possessed the designation, nor, even if the tradition of the 2nd century be admitted as to the possession of the designation, is there any such evidence to shew how far the relation in which he stood to the other apostles, or to the "elders," was analogous to that which existed between the bishops and presbyters of later times. The most probable conjecture is that in this case the conception of a visible head of the church arose from the belief in the nearness of the Second Advent (Gfrörer, Allgem. kirch. Gesch. i. p. 271); James, as the Lord's brother, was regarded as occupying His place until He came. It is also probable that, as Gfrörer thinks, after the fall of Jerusalem, men's thoughts turned to Rome as the centre of the Christian organization, and that the Pseudo-Petrine literature of the 2nd century, which originated at Rome, had for its chief object to impress the hierarchical ideas, of which it is full, upon the Roman mind. Even in the earlier books of the Apostolical Constitutions, which probably reflect the ideas of the 3rd century, the bishop is not only ἄρχων καὶ ἡγούμενος, but ἐπίγειος Θεὸς μετὰ Θεόν (Const. Apost. ii. 26). (b) In the larger communities, such as Rome or Ephesus, in which the influence of a single apostle had for some years dominated, it was natural that the monarchical idea should tend to prevail after the apostle himself had passed away. The existence of such a dominance is here assumed. The clearest and most recent summary of the controversy will be found in A. Hilgenfeld's article, Noch einmal Petrus in Rom und Johannes in Kleinasien, in the Zeitschrift f. Wissensch. Theologie, 1877). In such communities, therefore, there is strong historical evidence to shew that from early times there was a recognized and permanent president. But here also there is no evidence to shew the precise relation in which such a president stood to the presbyterate. It is, however, a significant fact that Irenaeus speaks of the early heads of the Roman church as presbyters (in the letter to Victor of Rome in Euseb. H. E. v. 24; so of Polycarp, in the letter to Florinus, in Euseb. H. E. v. 20). (c) In the case of the churches of other cities, in which, it must be borne in mind, there is no evidence of the existence of a president or bishop until the middle of the 2nd century, it appears to be sufficient to point to the general analogy of the contemporary communities, after which in so many respects the early churches were modelled. Democratical as those communities were in the main, they still had a president. We find such a president (a) in the Greek associations, under several titles —e.g. ἀρχεφαναστής, at Rhodes, C. I. Gr. No. 2525 b. Foucart, No. 46, and at Syros, Ross, Inscr. Gr. Ined. No. 107, Foucart, No. 44; ἐρανάρχης, Diog. Laert. vi. 63; ἀρχέφανος at Amorgos, Foucart, No. 45; ἀρχιθιασίτης, at Delos, C. I. Gr. No. 2271, Foucart, No. 43; ἀρχισυνάγωγος (of a college of priests), C. I. Gr. 2007 f.; so also among the ἔφηβοι, γυμνασιάρχης, C. I. Gr. Nos. 274, 2885, cf. Le Bas et Wadd. No. 223; (b) in the Roman Collegia, very frequently, and under various titles, e.g. "Magister," at Rome, Orelli-Henzen, Inscr. Lat. Nos. 6010, 6011, Mommsen, C. I. Lat. vol. iii. No. 1339, id. de Coll. et Sodal. Rom. p. 106; "praefectus," at Perusia, C. I. Lat. iii. No. 3432, at Salona, i. Vid. No. 502; "patronus" (= Greek προστάτης, Plut. i. 25, which may be compared with the Christian προϊστάμενοι), e.g. C. I. Lat. iii. Nos. 975, 984, 1209.

These special circumstances of particular churches, and the general analogy of contemporary communities, seem adequate to account for the fact that towards the middle of the 2nd century, if not earlier, there was a tendency to place a single officer at the head of the ecclesiastical organization. But the question still remains, nor has it hitherto been answered, except upon purely speculative grounds, why, assuming the existence of this tendency, should this single officer have been called ἐπίσκοπος. The key to the problem, which is afforded by inscriptions which have only come to light in recent times, is one of the most important contributions of epigraphical science to early Christian antiquities. (1) At Salkhad, in the Hauran are several inscriptions which contain the word ἐπίσκοποι (Le Bas et Waddington, No. 1990, cf. No. 1990, 2298, 2412e; Wetzstein, Ausgewählte Gr. u. Lat. Inschriften, No. 47, in Abhandl. der Berl. Akad. 1863; Transactions of the Royal Society of Literature, 2 series, vol. v. part 2, p. 259). It appears from these that the officers so designated had the charge of the funds of the temple (τὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ), and that out of these they had erected the building of which the most important inscription formed part. (2) In entire harmony with this is an inscription which was found at Thera. (Ross. Inscr. Gr. Ined. fasc. No. 2, 198; Rhangabé, Antiquités helléniques, vol. ii. No. 764; but in a more exact form Wescher, Revue archéologique, vol. xiii. (for 1866), pp. 245 sqq.):—

"It has been decreed (sc. by the community that the ἐπίσκοποι (Dio and Meleippus) shall accept the money and place it at interest . . ." This seems to shew that the ἐπίσκοποι of the Greek associations were their officers of finance. Such also were in all probability the ἐπίσκοποι of the early Christian churches. One of the most important features of those churches was that they were charitable societies. In an age which, like our own, was marked by great extremes of wealth and poverty, and under circumstances which cut off many of their members from the ordinary pursuits of life, they tended to gather round them more and more every year the poor and the dependent. They dispensed hospitality to travelling brethren, they tended the sick, and, what was probably the weightiest burden, they supported the widows and orphans of those who had died in poverty, or by martyrdom. All this required not only funds, but a dispenser of funds. It was not possible to distribute a common fund satisfactorily by means of a number of officers with equal powers, not necessarily acting in concert. A presiding officer became indispensable, and the officer so appointed was known by the title which was in current use to designate the financial officer of a community. This function of the Christian bishop continued to be a primary one, even after many other functions had clustered round his office. It is not sound to reason from the functions of bishops in the 3rd and 4th centuries to their functions in the first; but at the same time, the fact that the bishops were the custodians and dispensers of church funds in the later period corroborates the inference which is drawn from other data that they were so also in the earlier. (As the point is only incidental to the subject of the present article, the evidence in favour of the view which is here stated cannot be fully given; it must be sufficient to refer to the stress which is laid in the Pastoral Epistles upon the necessity of a bishop being ἀφιλάργυρος and φιλόξενος; to the fact that in Hermas (Sim. 9, 27) the bishops, who are distinguished from the ἀπόστολοι καὶ διδάσκαλοι of c. 25, are regarded chiefly as ministers of hospitality; to the fact mentioned in Justin (Apol. i. 67) that the collections of the faithful were deposited in the president (προεστώς, the title ἐπίσκοπος is not given), and that he had the care of widows and orphans and prisoners and strangers; and to the long series of ecclesiastical canons and imperial edicts which regard the bishop specially in the light of trustee of church property. The union of financial and disciplinary character in the same person has a close parallel in the curatores = λογισταί of the Roman municipalities under the later empire. For the authorities as to the functions of these important officers see Marquardt, Röm. Staatsverwaltung, pp. 487–490. It is a coincidence which is worth mentioning that the curator had the title of pater civitatis.

It is not difficult to see that such an officer in such communities must, from the mere nature of his position, have had considerable power. But several collateral as well as several derivative causes were at work to increase that power, and to account for the altered status of the presbyterate at the end of the 2nd century as compared with the end of the first.

1. The custodian of the church funds was also the custodian of the list of persons among whom those funds were to be divided. He kept the κανών or κατάλογος. [MATRICULA.] Like the corresponding lists of contemporary communities (which, however, were rather lists of contributories than of recipients), this list was probably arranged in classes, the presbyters, the deacons, the "widows," and the "virgins," being severally ranked together. Hence, like the Roman censors, the custodians of this list seemed to have assumed the function of determining upon the right of particular persons to be admitted to or excluded from the several classes. Hence also the bishop, as custodian of the list, was the proper officer for giving certificates of membership. When a Christian claimed the hospitality of a foreign church in his travels, or when he passed permanently from one church to another, and claimed a place on the roll of a new community, such a certificate was indispensable. The jealous care with which the right of giving it was guarded (Conc. Antioch. c. 7) shews the importance which was attached to it, and supports the inference that it played no inconsiderable part in the exaltation of the episcopate in relation to the presbyterate.

2. The presbyterate also lost ground in the 2nd century through the large development within the churches of opinions which were at variance with the general currents of apostolic doctrine. The authority of apostolic doctrine was generally admitted, and the appeal to it was not made only on the Catholic side. Gnostics, Ebionites, and Ophites, the followers of Carpocrates, of Basilides, and of Valentinus, all traced back their opinions to an apostolic source, and maintained that they were the inheritors of an unwritten apostolic tradition (cf. Iren. i. 25, 5; 30, 14; Clem. Al. Strom. 7, 13, p. 882; 7, 17, p. 900, ed. Pott.). It became necessary to distinguish the true from the false tradition, and the former was found not merely in the tradition of apostolic as distinguished from non-apostolic churches (Tertull. *Adv. Tertull. de Praescript. Haeret. c. 32, 26). Hence, in other churches also the chief officer was the depositary and conservator of the faith. It was safer in the hands of a single person than if it were shared by a number of persons. Thus the bishop, who had by this time begun to be prominent above the presbyters, was regarded as a sort of incarnate tradition, the pure and uncorrupted spring of apostolic truth (cf. Clem. Recogn. 3, 65, ab ipso" [sc. from the bishop] suscipite doctrinam fidei, cf. ib. 3, 61, Hom. 3, 60, 66; Ignat. ad Ephes. 3; so also in the following century, Cyprian, Epist. 69, 5, vol. ii. 402, "inde enim schismata et haereses obortae sunt et oriantur dum episcopus qui unus est et ecclesiae praeest . . . contemnitur"). The coherence of this function of the episcopate with that which was mentioned in the preceding paragraph is strongly marked by Tertullian (de Praescr. Haeret. c. 20), "Communicatio pacis et appellatio fraternitatis et contesseratio hospitalitatis, quae jura non alia ratio regit quam ejusdem sacramenti una traditio."

These causes operated with different degrees of force in different communities; and it is by no means certain when the subordination of the ordo of presbyters to a single officer first became general. The evidence, whether for the existence of bishops or for their superior authority, cannot be pressed farther than the facts warrant. (a) It may be admitted, for example, that Hegesippus is a trustworthy witness, and that a presiding officer existed from the first at Jerusalem without also admitting that such an officer had the attributes which in later times attached themselves to the episcopate. (2) It may be admitted that assuming the genuineness, or approximate genuineness, of the shorter letter of Ignatius to the Romans (cf. Renan, Ignace d'Antioch, a review of Zahn and Pfleiderer in the Journal des Savants, 1874, p. 45), bishops existed as chief officers of certain churches in Asia Minor early in the 2nd century, without also admitting that they existed in Egypt or in Gaul. (3) It may be admitted that bishops existed as church officers without also admitting that they occupied in relation to the presbyterate the same position which they occupied afterwards. Irenaeus, for example, was cognizant of the distinction, but (a) in using "successiones presbyterorum," 3, 2, 2, and "successiones episcoporum," 3, 3, 2, as convertible terms; (b) in speaking of the office of "presbyteri" as "episcopatus," 4, 26, 2; (c) in applying the τοὺς ἐπισκόπους of Isaiah, 60, 17, to πρεσβυτέρους, 4, 26, 5, he clearly implies that there was no essential difference of function between them. (This conclusion cannot be avoided by the assumption which Döllinger makes that Irenaeus uses the word "presbyteri" in an unusual sense, Hippolytus and Callistus, E. T. p. 313.)

But by the beginning of the 3rd century the organization of almost all churches had begun to conform to a single type, bishop, presbyters, and deacons. In some places the older organization lingered on, and here are many indications that the presbyters did not allow their privileges to be curtailed without a struggle. That struggle came to a head in Montanism, and the triumph of the episcopate over the presbyterate was by no means secure until Montanism was crushed (cf. Ritschl, Altkath. Kirche, pp. 519 sqq.). Even so stern a disciplinarian as Cyprian found some rebels against his rule (cf. e.g. Epist. 9, 11); and his quarrel with Novatus was based to a great extent upon the fact that the latter, though only a presbyter, had ignored Cyprian's claims as bishop by ordaining Felicissimus as deacon, Ep. 49 (52); Felicissimum satellitem suum diaconum nec permittente me nec sciente sua factione et ambitione constituit.

When this type was once established, several circumstances combined to render the subordination of the presbyterate more complete. The original causes of both the rise and the aggrandizement of the episcopate still remained, but new causes became more active. Of these new causes the most important were (1) the institution of synods, (2) the assimilation to the organization of the empire, (3) the rise of the parochial system" [for which see ORDERS, HOLY, III.; PARISH].

But even after these influences had begun to operate, the difference between the two orders was rather a difference of rank than of function.

The bishop was "primus inter pares" (cf. Ambrosiast. Comm. in Epist. I. ad. Timoth. c. 3, 7, ap. S. Ambros. Op. vol. ii. p. 295, "episcopi et presbyteri una ordinatio est; uterque enim sacerdos est, sed episcopus primus est"); there was no function which he discharged which might not also, save only as a question of order, be discharged by a presbyter; even in his proper field of finance he was not an absolute monarch, but the executive officer, at first of the community, and afterwards of the presbyteral college; (of this there are indications even so late as Statt. Eccles. Antiq. c. 23, ut episcopus nullam causam audiat absque praesentia clericorum suorum; alioquin irrita erit sententia episcopi nisi clericorum praesentia confirmetur; id. c. 32, irrita erit donatio episcoporum vel venditio vel commutatio rei ecclesiasticae absque conniventia et subscriptione clericorum). The one function which Epiphanius and Chrysostom claim as peculiar to bishops is that of ordination (S. Epiphan. adv. Haer. lib. 3, tom. i., Haer. 74, 3, p. 906; S. Chrysost. Hom. 2 in Ep. I. ad. Timoth. c. 3, Migne, ii. p. 553); but we have elsewhere stated the grounds which exist for believing that this was an acquired and not a primary function of bishops, and if so, it could not have been part of the original difference between them and presbyters [see ORDINATION]. In the course of the 5th and 6th centuries the subordination became more complete; but as the decrees of councils enable us to trace it step by step, its progress will be sufficiently clear from the following section on the functions of presbyters. It will, however, be convenient to give, by way of contrast to the statements of Epiphanius and Chrysostom, the elaborate canon in which the second council of Seville summed up the differences of function which had come to be recognized at the beginning of the 7th century; the canon is more important than most local canons, because the president of the council was the learned antiquarian Isidore, who is not likely to have expressed merely local customs as general rules; it may be added as an indication, that the tendencies of the council were not ultra-episcopal; that the preceding canon had restored to his office a presbyter who had been deprived by the sole authority of his bishop "sine concilii examine . . . . Episcopus enim sacerdotibus ac ministris solus honorem dare potest, auferre solus non potest." The canon in question begins by disallowing the action of Agapius, bishop of Cordova, who had frequently commissioned presbyters in his absence to erect altars and consecrate churches: it then proceeds to state in detail (1) what presbyters could not do under any circumstances, (2) what they could not do either in the presence of a bishop or without his commission; "nam quamvis cum episcopis plurima illis [sc. presbyteris] ministeriorum communis sit dispensatio quaedam novellis et ecclesiasticis regulis sibi prohibita noverint; sicut presbyterorum et diaconorum ac virginum consecratio; sicut consecratio altaris, benedictio vel unctio; siquidem nec licere eis ecclesiam vel altarium consecrare nec per impositionem manus fidelibus baptizatis vel controversis ex haeresi paracletum Spiritum tradere; nec chrisma conficere nec chrismate baptizatorum frontem signare; sed nec publice quidem in missa quenquam poenitentium reconciliare nec formatas cuilibet epistolas mittere. Haec enim omnia illicita esse presbyteris quia pontificatus apicem non habent quem solis deberi episcopis auctoritate canonum praecipitur; ut per hoc et discretio graduum et dignitatis fastigium summi pontificis demonstretur; sed neque coram episcopo licere presbyteris in baptisterium introire nec praesente antistite infantem tingere aut signare, nec poenitentes sine praecepto episcopi reconciliare, nec eo praesente sacramentum corporis et sanguinis Christi conficere, nec eo coram posito populum docere vel benedicere aut salutare nec plebem utique exhortari" (2 Conc. Hispal. A.D. 619, c. 7).

(ii.) Relations of Presbyters to Deacons.—The primitive relations of presbyters to deacons are hardly less obscure than their relations to bishops; but one point at least is clear, that it was a relation of superiors to inferiors in rank. Deacons appear to have been mainly out-door relieving officers, whose function was to find out and to report the circumstances of worthy recipients of church funds. They were thus brought into intimate connexion with the bishops, who were the custodians and dispensers of church funds. With the growth of the supremacy of the bishops, and also with the extension of the eleemosynary system, there was a corresponding increase in the importance of deacons. Of this there is abundant evidence in the Apostolical Constitutions, which perhaps from this point of view may be treated as a "Tendenz-schrift." For example, Const. Apost. 2, 26, the bishop sits as it were in the place of God, the deacons stand by him as the heavenly powers stand by the side of God; ibid. 2, 28; the laity are to make their requests known to the bishop through the deacons, even as we approach God through the Lord; ibid. 2, 30, as the Son is the messenger and prophet of the Father, so the deacons are the messengers and prophets of the bishop. So also in the place which deacons and presbyters respectively occupied in the ritual, the presbyters, who were only coadjutors of and concelebrant with (σύμμυσται, Διατ. Κλήμ. 17 [20]) the bishop, tended to be crushed out. In the "Pontifical High Mass" of those days the bishop and the deacons seemed to share the service between them. The presbyters might take the bishop's place, but when he was present they appeared to have little share in the liturgy. Even down to modern times the gospeller and the epistoler are regarded as deacon and sub-deacon respectively. It is therefore natural to find in early councils traces of a struggle for supremacy between presbyters and deacons. It is clear from 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 15, and 1 Conc. Nicaen. c. 18, that the deacons had begun to assume to themselves the place in the liturgy which was afterwards reserved exclusively for priests, i.e. bishops and presbyters (the obvious meaning of these two canons has been obscured by the interpretations of those who have viewed them only by the light of later usage, e.g. Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, Bd. i. p. 360; Hefele, Councils, E. T. vol. i. p. 429). But upon these assumptions these councils put an effectual check, and a few years afterwards the council of Laodicaea (c. 20) made the further regulation in support of the presbyterate that a deacon must not sit in the presence of a presbyter except with the presbyter's permission (cf. SS. Apostolorum Epitimia, ii. 7, ap. Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Gr. vol. i. p. 105, which, although Pitra speaks of the canons in general as an instance of "protervam illam byzantinorum mentiendi pruriginem," is supported by Statt. Eccles. Antiq. c. 39). The rise of the sacerdotal theory, which made the same distinction between presbyters and deacons which had existed in the Mosaic legislation between priests and Levites, settled the question in the East, nor are any other conciliar regulations respecting it found until Conc. Trull. c. 7, which so far modifies the earlier rule as to allow a deacon to take precedence of presbyters when he is acting as the deputy of a metropolitan or patriarch. In the West it is clear from Jerome that the struggle was even stronger and more lasting since he is at the trouble formally to refute those who thought that a deacon was superior to a presbyter (S. Hieron. Epist. 146 [85] ad Evangel.); and although the canon of the council of Arles, and the growth of the sacerdotal theory, which have been mentioned above, prevented any revival of the claim to what were considered to be sacerdotal functions (unless account be taken of 2 Conc. Arelat. c. 15), the claim for precedence was continued, as is seen from Conc. Andegav. A.D. 453, c. 2; ? Barcinon, A.D. 578 (?), c. 4; 4 Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 39; Statt. Eccles. Antiq. c. 37. It may be added that in the strenuous effort which was made by Novatian to uphold the authority of the presbyterate against the episcopate, he seems also to have endeavoured to dispense with the diaconate (cf. Coustant's interpretation of his letter, ap. Routh, Reliquiae Sacrae, vol. iii. pp. 21, 78).

(iii.) Functions of Presbyters.—The sketch which has been given of the origin of the presbyterate, and of its early relations to the episcopate, has to some extent covered the ground of the present section; it has at the same time shewn, from the great variations which took place in those relations, the difficulty of framing any statements on the subject which will hold good for more than a particular period, or a particular group of churches.

The functions of the presbyterate may be mainly grouped according as they relate (1) to discipline, (2) to the sacraments, (3) to teaching, (4) to benediction. The functions of presbyters in regard to ordination will be gathered from the special article on that subject. [ORDINATION, V. Minister of Ordination.]

(1) Discipline.—It has been mentioned above that the original conception of the presbyterate, as gathered both from the analogy of the corresponding office among the Jews, and from the words of early Christian writers, was that it had the general control of the morals of the churches, and constituted a court of discipline. The same function continued, though its relative importance decreased, even after the episcopate had attained its final supremacy, and after the officers of the church had become officers rather of worship than of government. The most significant indications of this are found in the Ordinals of the Western church; the tenor of both the addresses to the people and the prayers shews this to have been the leading element in the conception of a presbyter's functions at the time when those Ordinals were framed. Presbyters are said to be appointed to help bishops in the government of the people as the seventy were appointed to help Moses. The prayer is that they may exhibit in their own lives the virtues which they require in others. In the earliest ordinal of the later type (Missale Francorum, ap. Muratori, Liturg. Rom. Vet. vol. iii. p. 450) there is only a slight reference to any other functions, but all the later Ordinals have added a prayer, or prayers, that the presbyter may "offer acceptable victims for the sins and offences of the people," and the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals (Epist. Fabrian. 2, c. 17; Hinschius, p. 163, make sacrificing the prominent function. The question of the general bearings of this function of discipline upon Christian morals is too intricate to be properly discussed here; it will be sufficient for the present purpose to treat briefly of its judicial or quasi-judicial exercise. In that respect an important distinction must be drawn between the functions of the Ordo Presbyterorum in a church acting in concert and the functions of an individual presbyter acting alone; it is the more necessary to bear this distinction in mind, as the ignoring of it underlies much of the confusion which exists in many of the discussions to which the subject of the presbyterate has given rise.

There are good grounds for thinking that in the earliest period of church history the presbyters were little more than the presidents and executive officers of the community, liable to be overruled by its voice, and bound to carry out its decisions. The most pertinent proof is the account of the judicial process in a Christian community in Tertull. Apolog. c. 39 (judicatur magno cum pondere et apud certos de Dei conspectu, summumque futuri judicii praejudicium est si quis deliquerit ut a communicatione orationis et conventus et omnis saluti commercii relegetur. Praesident probati quique seniores, honorem istum non pretio sed testimonio adepti"). But there can be no question that in time, though there may be a doubt as to the particular time, the ordo of a church (1) assumed an authority apart from the community, (2) came to consist of two elements, the presbyters and the bishop [the discussion as to the place of deacons in relation to the ordo must, for brevity's sake, be here omitted].

(a) The presbyters and bishop, acting together, formed the court to which offences against morals or church order were referred, and by which the affairs of the church generally were administered. In this capacity they formed a συνέδριον (Ignat. Epist. ad Trall. c. 3), and are designated as such even so late as the 4th and 5th centuries, e.g. by S. Greg. Nazianz. Orat. 42, 11, p. 756; S. Basil. Epist. 81 [319], p. 174; S. Sixti III. Epist. 2 ad Cyrill. Alex.; Synesius, Epist. 67, p. 208. Hence, in terms which are borrowed from similar courts under the empire, they are also spoken of as σύμβουλοι τοῦ ἐπισκόπου, βουλὴ τῆς ἐκκλησίας, e.g. Const. Apost. 2, 28, and in Latin as a "consilium" (Statt. Eccles. Ant. c. 22). And since the smallest number of persons who could form a συνέδριον among the Jews was three, one of the earliest documents which refers to ecclesiastical organization requires each bishop to appoint two presbyters, presumably to form such a court, Διατ. Κλήμ. c. 20, Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Gr. vol. i. p. 83; Bickell, Gesch. des Kirchenrechts, vol. ii. p. 122.

(b) The bishop, as head of this body, was an integral and essential part of it. His consent was ordinarily necessary to the validity of its acts. He was the officer by whom sentences were pronounced, and by whom the restoration of penitents to church privileges was effected. It is probable also that in emergencies in which immmediate action was necessary he had a discretionary and quasi-independent power. But without such an emergency even Cyprian declined to act alone. He will not judge the case of the sub-deacons Philomenus and Fortunatus, and the acolyte Favorinus, since many of the clergy are absent, though in the meantime, in his capacity of finance-officer, he orders that the accused persons shall not receive their monthly allowance (Epist. 28 [34], c. 3).

(c) Individual presbyters sometimes claimed for themselves a similar discretionary power: "audio tamen quosdam de presbyteris nec evangelii memores, nec quid ad nos martyres scripserint cogitantes, nec episcopo honorem sacerdotii sui et cathedrae reservantes, jam cum lapsis communicare coepisse et offerre pro illis et eucharistiam dare, quando oportet ad haec per ordinem perveniri (St. Cyprian. Epist. 11 [17], c. 2). But the claim was disallowed. In the East the general rule was laid down that individual presbyters must not act without the bishop's consent (Conc. Laod. c. 57, ἄνευ γνώμης τοῦ ἐπισκόπου; so Can. Apost. c. 39, where Balsamon limits the rule to the administration of church funds, but Zonaras understands it of excommunication); but the penitentiaries who were appointed at Constantinople after the Novatian schism were presbyters (Socrat. H. E. 5, 19), and much later archbishop Theodore, who must be taken as an authority for at any rate contemporary usage, expressly states that "among the Greeks a presbyter may, if there is necessity, reconcile a penitent" (Poenit. Theodor. 2, 3, 8, ed. Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, &c., vol. iii.).

In the West their powers in this respect were limited by many conciliar enactments, the repetition of which, however, shews that they were not unfrequently struggled against. The earliest canon is that of Elvira (Conc. Illib. A.D. 306, c. 32), the main purport of which appears to be that a presbyter (or deacon) must not readmit a penitent even in peril of death without consulting his bishop; but the text of the canon is somewhat uncertain, and has given rise to some controversy (cf. the notes of Aubespine on the canon, printed as an appendix to his edition of Optatus, Paris, 1631; F. de Mendoza, Dissert. de Can. Conc. Illib. ap. Mansi, ii. p. 243; Petavius de Poenit. et Reconcil. Vet. Ecclesiae Moribus Recepta, c. 2, 4). There is a similar variety in the African canons on the same subject; 2 Conc. Carth. c. 4, coincides with the version of the canon of Elvira which is given above (the text as given in Mansi, iii. 694, is slightly different from id. iii. 86-7, but the purport is the same); but the African code allows a presbyter to act in similar cases without consulting his bishop (Cod. Can. Afric. c. 43). The Gallican canons agree with the latter rule; 1 Conc. Araus. A.D. 441 (under S. Hilary of Arles), c. 1. specially of heretics; so totidem verbis, 2 Arelat. c. 26; so also Conc. Epaon, A.D. 517, c. 20. Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 44, 2 Conc. Hisp. A.D. 619, c. 7, lay down the converse rule that a presbyter must not readmit a penitent publicly in church; and the latter of the two councils prohibits such an action even upon the delegation of a bishop; but archbishop Theodore expresses the opinion that such a delegation was permissible (Poenit. Theod. 1, 13, 3, ed. Haddan and Stubbs), leaning herein, as in other points, rather to the Eastern than to the Western use. It may be noted as an indication of the drift of opinion and usage that the Jumièges Pontifical of the end of the 8th century (Pontif. Gemmeticense, Martene, ordo iii.) treats the receiving of penitents as an ordinary function of bishops and presbyters in distinction from deacons. The Apostolical Constitutions (8, 27) deny the right of individual presbyters to depose (καθαιρεῖν) inferior clerks, but allow them to suspend (ἀφορίζειν) such as, being subject to their authority, deserve suspension; (the Coptic version, as translated by Tattam, c. 73, makes the distinction to lie in their having power to put out, but not power to anathematize). Whether a single presbyter had power to excommunicate in early times is doubtful: the earliest mention of such a power is probably in the Judicium Clementis, which gives summary power in certain cases of misbehaviour in church to a bishop, presbyter, or any clerk (Judic. Clem. c. 20, ap. Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 226, from Kunstmann Pönitent. Bücher der Angelsachs. p. 176).

(2) The Sacraments; (i.) The Eucharist.—In the earliest period it is probable that in the Eucharist, as in the administration of discipline and church funds, the bishops and presbyters acted together (this practice of "concelebration" survived at Rome long after it appears to have ceased elsewhere; it is mentioned by Amalarius of Metz in the 9th century, de Eccles. Offi. i. 12, three centuries later by Innocent III., de Myst. Miss. iv. c. 25, and by many mediaeval writers). They jointly offered or blessed the offerings, and jointly distributed them to the people. In the absence of the bishop the presbyters could perform these functions without him; the power to offer or bless the Eucharistic offerings, and to give them to the people, was probably regarded as inherent in the office of a presbyter; and it may be inferred from the fact of its being the function of which an erring presbyter was first deprived Conc. Neocaes. c. 9, that it was regarded as the chief independent function of his office. Outside the city church in which the bishop and his presbyters ordinarily thus acted together, a single presbyter seems to have exercised this power without question; he might "break bread" with confessors in their prison, or as in apostolic days "from house to house." At Rome the presbyters of the several tituli, which were practically equivalent to the urban parishes of later times, were restrained from consecrating the Eucharist themselves, and used instead that which the bishops sent them; but the words of the earliest enactment respecting this, state expressly that the practice was merely designed as a mark of unity of communion, and admit that presbyters have ordinarily the right of consecration (S. Innocent I. Epist. ad Decent. c. 5). But elsewhere there does not appear to have been any restriction whatever, except those which were imposed by the general rules of seniority and precedence, e.g. Conc. Neocaes. c. 13. In time, however, there came to be restrictions of place. 2 Conc. Carth. A.D. 390 (?) c. 9, forbids a presbyter from performing his office "in quolibet loco" without the permission of his bishop. The requirement that the altar upon which he offers should previously have been consecrated by a bishop, is probably of much later date; the first positive enactments are in the Liber Pontificalis (Vit. S. Siric. c. 2), and in the Carolingian capitularies, Karoli M. Capit. General, A.D. 769, c. 14, Pertz, vol. i. p. 32; the fact that it is so elaborately vindicated by the Pseudo-Isidore (Decret. Felicis IV. ad Omnes Episcopos, Hinschius, p. 700) and also the fact that it occurs as a positive enactment, not based upon early canonical authority, so late as the 10th century, e.g. in the capitularies of Atto II. of Vercelli, circ. A.D. 950, c. 7, ap. D'Achery Spicil. vol. i. p. 403, are significant indications of its late date. In the absence of such a consecrated altar, fixed or portable, Archbishop Theodore allows a presbyter to perform mass provided that he holds the elements in his hands (Poenit. Theodor. 2, 2, 2, ed. Haddan and Stubbs).

(ii.) Baptism.—The admission of a new member into the community was in early times the work of the whole church. In the most solemn form of the ceremony bishop, presbyters, deacons, and laity, ἡ πᾶσα ἱερὰ διακόσμησις, and πάντα τὰ τῆς ἐκκλησίας πληρώματα (S. Dionys. Areop. de Eccles. Hierarch. 2, 4, where a comparison with 3, 14 shews that Pachymeres is wrong in understanding the expressions of the κλῆρος only) had each their appropriate part. In the less solemn forms of the ceremony the Eastern Church seems to have allowed either a bishop or a presbyter to preside (Const. Apost. 7, 22; so ibid. 3, 20, βαπτίζειν is a distinct and proper function of a presbyter); but in the Western Church the function of a presbyter in this respect seems always to have been regarded as delegated and not original; on this point the statements of Tertullian and Jerome leave no room for reasonable doubt; the former says, de Baptismo, c. 17, "dandi [se baptismum] quidem habet jus summus sacerdos qui est episcopus. Dehinc presbyteri et diaconi, non tamen sine episcopi auctoritate propter ecclesiæ honorem;" the latter says, Dial. c. Lucif. c. 9, Op. ed. Migne, vol. ii. 164, "inde [sc. from the necessity for unity in the church] venit ut sine chrismate et episcopi jussione neque presbyter neque diaconus jus habeant baptizandi." In both East and West when the full ceremonial took place, there was a division of labour; the best account of the part of each order of clergy in the East is to be found in the treatise of St. Dionysius Areopagite quoted above: the earliest complete account of Western usage is to be found in Mabillon's Ordo Romanus, i. c. 43, id. vii. c. 11. In both of these a distinction is drawn between the immersion in water, which might be performed by deacons and even by acolytes, and the other ceremonies, of which the chief were the anointing with the chrism and the imposition of hands, which were shared between the presbyters and the bishops. If the bishops were absent, the Eastern church allowed a presbyter to do all that, if present, the bishop would have done; but although there was for some time a variety of usage in the West (as is shewn, e.g., by the fact that Gregory the Great [Epist. 4, 9, vol. ii. p. 689] reserves the final anointing on the forehead for bishops, whereas in Epist. 4, 26, vol. ii. p. 705, he allows it to presbyters), it ultimately came to be the Western rule that a presbyter might anoint with the chrism, provided that he used chrism which had previously been consecrated by a bishop, and also that he did not anoint on the forehead (S. Innocent, Epist. ad Decent. c. 3, ap. Hinschius, p. 528), but that he must not in any case impose hands (Theodulph. Aurelian. de Ordine Baptismi, c. 17, Migne, P. L. cv. 235). In other words a presbyter might baptize, but a bishop must confirm; (it is important to note that when Photius objected to this Western usage, and asked "Whence came the law that presbyters should not confirm?" Epist. i. 13 (2), ap. Migne, P. G. vol. cii. 726, the Latins were not able to give any better authority than the Decretals and the Liber Pontificalis, see e.g. the arguments of Aeneas of Paris ap. D'Achery, Spicileg. vol. i. p. 141). When the later system of dioceses and parishes began to prevail, there was some variety of usage. (a) Sometimes there was only one baptistery in a diocese, and to it all candidates for baptism had to come. (b) But more frequently the parochial presbyter had the right of baptizing in his own parish, and such baptism by a parochial presbyter did not confer the full status of church membership until it had been followed by "confirmation." Jerome thought that the baptism was spiritually valid without such confirmation (S. Hieron. Dial. c. Lucif. c. 9), but the later view doubted this (see e.g. Poenit. Theodore, 2, 4, 4, ed. Haddan and Stubbs; Joann. Diac. Epist. ad Senar. c. 14, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. lix. 406; Isaac Lingon., can. 11, 8, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. cxxiv.), and out of this doubt probably sprang the revival of the chorepiscopate in France in the 8th and 9th centuries (Hraban. Maur. de Instit. Cler. i. 5, "ordinati sunt chorepiscopi propter pauperum curam qui in agris et villis consistunt ne eis solatium confirmationis deesset:" on the other hand, in the vigorous polemic against the chorepiscopate which is made by the author of the false decretals, this privilege is denied to them, e.g. Leonis Papae de Privilegio Chorepiscoporum, Hinschius, p. 628, Damasi Papae de Chorepiscopis, ibid. p. 514). (c) The parochial presbyter had the delegated right of using, but not the right of consecrating the baptismal chrism. This was the African rule, 2 Conc. Carth. c. 3 = Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 6 (but it appears from John the Deacon that in his time, i.e. in the 9th century, African presbyters had the right of consecrating the chrism, Epist. ad Senar. c. 8, Migne, P. L. vol. lix. 404; Mabillon, Mus. Ital. i. 2, 74), and 1 Conc. Tolet, c. 20, enacted that it should henceforth be the Spanish rule; as such it was conformed by 2 Conc. Brac. A.D. 563, c. 19, 2 Conc. Hisp. A.D. 619, c. 7; but it is rather implied than directly stated by the Gallican councils, e.g. conc. Vas. A.D. 442, c. 3, and probably did not exist in the East (cf. Poenit. Theod. 2, 3, 8, ed. Haddan and Stubbs). Where the rule existed, the parochial presbyters were bound to obtain the chrism from the bishop once a year, usually just before Easter; so Statt. Eccles. Antiq. c. 36; 1 Conc. Tolet. c. 20; Conc. Vas. c. 3; Conc. Emerit. A.D. 666, c. 9, further enacts that he who is charged by the bishop to convey the chrism to presbyters is not to exact pay for it. (d) The right of baptizing except in emergencies was apparently not personal to the parochial presbyter, but had to be exercised in an authorized place; the Trullan council (c. 31) will not allow it to be exercised in private chapels without the bishop's authority, and the Frankish and Carolingian capitularies appear to deny the title of even parish churches to be baptisteries, unless they are expressly constituted such by the bishop; "ut publicum baptisterium in ulla parochia [i.e. diocese] esse non debeat nisi ibi ubi episcopus constituerit cujus parrochia est" (Pippini Capit. Vernense, A.D. 755, c. 7, Pertz, Legum 1, p. 24 = Conc. Vern. ap. Mansi, xii. 577; so also Capit. Ticinense, A.D. 801, c. 16, Pertz, i. p. 85).

(3) Preaching and Teaching. — The Jewish presbyters were not, as such, teachers; and since (1 Tim. v. 17) by making special mention of those who labour in the Word and doctrine" implies that some presbyters did not so labour, it may be inferred that teaching was not an inherent function of the Christian presbyterate. The Διαταγαὶ Κλήμεντος (c. 16) contemplate the case of an unlettered presbyter, and the earliest list of presbyteral functions (Polyc. Epist. ad Philipp. c. 6) treats a presbyter, wholly as a disciplinary officer; nor is there any mention of presbyters in connexion with teaching in either Clement or Ignatius. The Clementines also indicate that, whereas the bishops had to do with the doctrine, the presbyters had to do with the morals of the members of the church (Recogn. 3, 65). But the function of teaching, although not inherent in the presbyterate, was not incompatible with it. There were "presbyteri doctores" (S. Cyprian, Epist. 24, vol. i. p. 287; Acta Perpetuæ et Felicitatis, ap. Ruinart, c. 13); preaching (ὁμιλεῖν) was a function from which a lapsed presbyter was deposed (Conc. Ancyr. A.D. 313, c. 1); and it is clear that the Alexandrian usage of excluding presbyters from preaching was either temporary or local (Socrat. H. E. 5, 22). It was, in short, a delegated function; it was committed to the "wiser" presbyters (S. Chrys. Hom. 3 in Epist. i. ad Corinth. Op. ed. Migne, vol. x. p. 26), and therefore, in some churches, could not be exercised in the presence of a bishop (S. Hieron. Epist. 52 [2] ad Nepot. c. 7, who objects to this exclusion; 2 Conc. Hisp. A.D. 619, c. 7). But after the establishment of the parochial system, the privileges of presbyters in parishes became extended in this and in other respects; and the Western church seems to have thenceforth counted preaching as an ordinary function of a parish presbyter (3 Conc. Vas. A.D. 529, c. 2; Conc. Cloves. A.D. 747, c. 9); so the ninth-century writers on church institutions, e. g. Hraban. Maur. de Instit. Cleric. i. 6; cf. Quesnel, Dissert. xi. in S. Leon. M. Op. c. 12).

(4) Benediction.—The Christian churches continued the Jewish practice of blessing both persons and things, and since the blessing of persons assumed a superiority in the person who gave the benediction over the person who received it (cf. Heb. vii. 7), in the Christian, as in the Jewish, assemblies, it was a function of the president. Ordinarily it was thus a function of the bishop; but, in the absence of the bishop, a presbyter might bless, whether publicly in church or privately elsewhere (Const. Apost. 3, 20; 8, 27; S. Basil. Epist. 2 ad Amphiloch. c. 27, where suspension from this function is the punishment of a presbyter who has contracted an unlawful marriage). But in the West the rights of presbyters in this respect became much restricted. In the 5th century, Conc. Regiens, c. 5, allows presbyters to give the benediction in private houses and in the country, but not in church; and early in the following century Conc. Agath. c. 44 expressly forbids a presbyter to give it in church; but 2 Conc. Hispal. (A.D. 619, c. 7) narrows the prohibition to cases in which the bishop is present, and this has continued to be the Western rule.

PRILIDANUS, martyr with Urbanus and Epolonus, three youths, who suffered with bishop Babylas at Antioch; commemorated Jan. 24. (Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart. PRILIDANIUS; Florus ap. Bed. Mart. PARILIDANUS, under Numerian; Mart. Rom. PRILIDIANUS.) [C. H.]

PRIMATE. The word primate ("primas") seems to have come, like some other ecclesiastical terms, from the civil law. From its first use, in which it was applied generally to the chief men of a community, it came to be used in an official sense (a) of the presidents of the Jewish communities, after the title "patriarch" had ceased, Cod. Theodos. 16, 8, 8, 29; (b) of the "decuriones" of a municipality, Cod. Theodos. 7, 18, 13; 12, 1, 4; (c) of the heads of the bureau of a provincial governor, Cod. Theodos. 9, 40, 16; 12, 6, 3, cf. Bethmann-Hollweg, Der Römische Civil-prozess, Bd. iii. p. 142. It is a probable inference from the Pseudo-Isidorian Epist. Anacleti, ii. c. 26, that it was also applied in the post-Imperial organization of the West to officers who had judicial functions corresponding to those of ecclesiastical primates; out of the existence of such officers no direct trace can be found. (For the Carolingian "primates palatii," see Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte, Bd. iv. 277.)

In its ecclesiastical use it is found in three senses. (The use of its Greek equivalent ὁ πρωτεύων, which is found in several Syrian inscriptions, one of which bears the date A.D. 514, Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum, Nos. 8627, 8630, 8631, is here omitted, because there is no clue to its precise signification.)

(1) Its earliest sense seems to be that of seniority, whether in respect of age or of office. Leo the Great uses "primatus" of seniority among presbyters (Epist. 19 (18) ad Dorum Benevent. vol. i. p. 735). Pope Hilary (Epist. 8, ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. lviii. 25) transfers the power of ordaining bishops from Hermes, metropolitan of Narbonne, to Constantius, bishop of Usez, as being "aevo honoris primas;" just as in a similar case Leo the Great (Epist. 10, vol. i. p. 641) transfers the functions of metropolitan from Hilary of Arles to Leontius, expressly on the ground of his seniority. The word was consequently used in Africa to denote the senior bishop of the province, who there held the place which in most other parts of the Christian world was held by the bishop of the civil metropolis. The exact title of this bishop was "primae sedis episcopus," and 3 Conc. Carth. c. 26 = Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 39 enacts that he is not to take the appellations "summus sacerdos," or "princeps sacerdotum;" but the word "primas" is used, apparently with the same meaning, in 2 Conc. Carth. c. 12; 3 Conc. Carth. 28 (in 3 Conc. Carth. c. 7 = Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 19, there is an important variety of reading between "primatem" and "primates"); to this African usage Gregory the Great, Epist. i. 74, vol. ii. p. 559, expresses strong objections.

(2) The word is occasionally used in reference to the office or status of a metropolitan: e. g. in the dispute between the bishops of Vienne and Arles, which was settled by Conc. Taurin. A.D. 401, c. 2; in 1 Conc. Brac. A.D. 563, c. 6; so also sometimes in the Latin translations of the Greek canons, e.g. in Dionysius Exiguus Can. Apost. 35 ap. Sirmond; Codex Can. Vet. Eccles. Roman., in Ferrandus, Breviatio Canonum, c. 4, ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. lxvii. 950, "metropolitani vel primatis;" in Martin of Braga, Capit. c. 4, ap. Mansi, ix. 849; and in S. Leon. M. Epist. 108 (83) ad Theodor. Forojuliens. vol. i. p. 1173 (in the plural).

(3) The title was not in ordinary use until the 9th century, and it was then applied to a new distinction which was created among bishops, chiefly by the influence of the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals. In the Eastern divisions of the empire the church had closely followed the gradations of civil rank. The provinces (ἐπαρχίαι), each of which had its civil praeses or consularis, and its ecclesiastical metropolitan, were grouped into dioeceses, each of which had its civil vicarius, comes, or praefectus, and its ecclesiastical exarch or patriarch [PATRIARCH (2)]. But in the West each province was in almost all respects a separate ecclesiastical unit; there was no officer corresponding to the civil vicarius: there was no appeal from the provincial synod and the provincial metropoktan, except the appeal, which was oftener claimed than allowed, to the bishop of Rome. The earlier policy of the Roman see was to support the authority of metropolitans; e.g. S. Leo M. Epist. 108 (83) ad Theodor. Forojul. vol. i. p. 1173, objects to direct appeal from a bishop to Rome. But its later policy was the reverse of this: and from the 6th to the 8th centuries the influence of metropolitans visibly declined, so that Pippin consulted pope Zachary as to the best means of reviving it (S. Zachar. pap. Epist. ad Pippin, ap. Mansi, vol. xii. 326). It was accordingly revived under the Carolingians (Pippin, Capit. Verm. Duplex, A.D. 755, c. 2; Caroli Magn. Capit. A.D. 779, c. 1), and the revived office played an important part in political as well as in ecclesiastical affairs (see Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte, vol. iii. p. 351 sqq.). But both the suffragan bishops and the Roman see found the metropolitans inconvenient: the former preferred a remote to a near superior, the latter disliked the exercise of ecclesiastical discipline by judges who, if supported, as they seemed likely to be, by the influence of the temporal power, might weaken its direct control over the Western churches. In addition to this there appear to have been, in the troubled times which followed the death of Charles the Great, several cases in which bishops had met with severe, if not unjust, treatment at the hands of metropolitans. The author of the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals consequently introduced into the West the Eastern distinction between metropolitans and exarchs, to the latter of whom he confined the word primate, which had hitherto been occasionally used for any metropolitan, and which he identified with the earlier Eastern equivalent of exarch, viz. patriarch, Epist. Annic. c. 3, "nulli archiepiscopi primates vocentur nisi illi qui primas tenent civitates quarum episcopos et successores eorum regulariter patriarchas vel primates esse constituerunt, nisi aliqua gens deinceps ad fidem convertatur, cui necesse sit propter multitudinem episcoporum primatem constitui. Reliqui vero qui alias metropolitanas sedes adepti sunt non primates sed metropolitani nominentur:" so Anaclet. Epist. ii. c. 26; Zepherin. Epist. c. 2; Felic. i. Epist. c. 4; Steph. Epist. ii. c. 10; Julii Decret. c. 12: so also Benedict. Levit. Capit. iv. 439, ap. Pertz, Legum, vol. ii. pars 2, p. 130; Capit. Angilramni, c. 22, ap. Hinschius, Decret. Pseudo-Isidor. p. 762. The letter of pope Hormisdas which Hincmar of Reims quotes in his controversy with Hincmar of Laon as giving a primacy to the see of Reims, with a reservation of the rights of metropolitans, resembles the false decretals too closely to be treated as genuine (Hincmar Remens. Opusc. in Causa Hincmar. Laudun. c. 16, ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. cxxvi. 338). After this date the title was in frequent use, especially in reference to the metropolitans to whom the bishops of Rome entrusted in their respective districts the powers of the Roman see.

The functions of primates in the later sense of the term, so far as they differ from the ordinary functions of metropolitans, are almost wholly judicial. In the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals, which are the foundation of all subsequent canon law on the subject, an accused bishop who suspects the impartiality of his metropolitan and comprovincials, may claim to be tried by the primate, Clement. Epist. i. c. 29; Anaclet. ii. c. 26; Felic. i. c. 4; Zepherin. c. 2; Jul. c. 12: so also Capit. Angilram. c. 5; a primate has also an immediate jurisdiction in the case of a metropolitan who oppresses his suffragans or otherwise exceeds the limits of his authority, Annic. 3, 4; Vict. 6; and also in all "majores ecclesiarum negotia," Clement. i. c. 29; Anaclet. ii. c. 26; Steph. ii. c. 10. But while in some passages the decretals make this jurisdiction of the metropolitan alternative with an appeal to Rome, Vict. 6, Jul. 12, in other passages they make the validity of the sentence of the primate contingent on its confirmation by the Roman see, Zeph. 2, Damas. 8, elsewhere they appear to give a final authority to the primate and his synod, Pelag. II. ad universos episcopos, and elsewhere on the contrary they ignore primates, and give an immediate appeal from the metropolitan to Rome, Felic. ii. c. 20.

(The best account of primates in the later sense of the word will be found in P. de Marca, Dissertatio de Primatu Lugdunensi et ceteris Primatibus, first published in 1644, and edited by Baluze in 1659.) [E. H.]

PRIMICERIUS. The name of these officials ["primus in ceram relatus" (Ducange Gloss.), the first entered on the wax tablet, or roll, of the clergy] sufficiently indicates their office as the head or leader of an ecclesiastical corporation. The word appears to be identical with the "primicerius," or head of the inferior clergy, of the Spanish church. (Conc. Emerit. cc. 10, 14.)

1. The office is frequently mentioned in connexion with the ecclesiastical notaries. In the council of Chalcedon frequent mention is made of Aetius, the primicerius of the notaries. In the council of Ephesus (act. 1) the task of reciting the edict of the emperor Theodosius was allotted to Peter, a presbyter of Alexandria and primicerius of the notaries. Anastasius the librarian, in his life of pope Julius, says that he caused all the records (monumenta) belonging to the church to be placed in the care of the primicerius of the notaries. In the postscript to the works of Aratus (Bibl. Patrum, t. vi. p. 700) it is said that Vigilius gave the poems in charge to the "primicerius" of the school of notaries. Gregory the Great, writing to Antoninus, a sub-deacon of Salonica, during the vacancy of the see (Epist. iii. 22), directs him to take an inventory of the property belonging to the see, and hand it over for safe keeping to Respectus the deacon, and Stephen the primicerius of the notaries.

2. A letter from Remigius of Rheims (Sirmondi Conc. Gall. i. p. 205) mentions a primicerius of the lectors, "primicerium scholae clarissimae militiaeque lectorum."

3. Chrodegang, in his rules for the chapter of Metz (last chapter), speaks of a primicerius of the MATRICULARII, who was to exercise a general supervision over them, and to whom, with the archdeacon, was entrusted the distribution of their allowances.

4. They were also members of the cathedral body, with authority, apparently as the deputy of the archdeacon, over the inferior clergy. The council of Merida, A.D. 666 (c. 10), orders that every cathedral should have an archpresbyter an archdeacon, and a primicerius; and (c. 14) divides the offerings into three parts—one belonging to the bishop, another to the presbyters and deacons to be divided among themselves, and the third to be handed over to the primicerius, and by him allotted at his discretion to the subdeacons and inferior clergy, according as he knows them zealous and diligent in their duties. Isidore of Seville, in his epistle to Ludifred, bishop of Cordova (Isidori Op. p. 413), states that the primicerius has charge of the acolytes, the exorcists, the psalmistae, and the lectors. In the Ordo Romanus (tit. 25) the primicerius is said to occupy a position like that of the archpresbyter under the archdeacon, and to have special charge of the teaching and discipline of the deacons and the other inferior clergy. [CHAPTER, p. 349.]

It is certain that this office, though subordinate to that of the archdeacon, was reckoned one of trust and honour. In a letter of Pope Martin (Ep. 15) the duty of presiding over the see of Rome, in the absence of the pope, is allotted to the archdeacon, the archpresbyter, and the primicerius. A letter of John IV. to the church of England (Baronius A.D. 639, 6, 7) is signed by John himself, the archpresbyter, the primicerius, and the consiliarius, the primicerius taking precedence of the consiliarius. PRINCEPS. The bishops, as the chief officers in the Christian church, were honoured at an early period with this and synonymous designations. [BISHOP.] But according to the different idea which moulded the development of the Celtic ecclesiastical polity in the British Isles, and framed it after a monastic rather than a diocesan or purely episcopal model, these terms received a corresponding destination. The ecclesiastical unit in the early Irish church was the monastery, whose head was the abbat, the praesul, primarius, or princeps of the monastic family. Hence in the Annals of Ulster (O'Conor, Rer. Hib. Scrip. iv.) the abbat is called abbas or princeps concurrently from A.D. 681, until in the 10th century the princeps has all but superseded the abbas in the list of obits. During the 9th and 10th centuries the princeps is found occasionally as a secular prince (A.D. 808, 809, 835), but very much more frequently he is evidently the monastic head, and appears at times also as bishop (A.D. 825, 857, 873, &c.), Ferleighinn (A.D. 878) and tanist abbat at one monastery and princeps or abbat of another (A.D. 895–6, "proximus abbati Cluanne mac nois et princeps Damhinisensis"). Dengabair is "dominatrix Princeps Troeit moir," i.e. at Drogheda (A.D. 792). But the princeps seems also at other times to have been subject, though only second to the abbat, and as exercising a certain authority in the monastery as either successor or Erenach (Reeves, S. Adamnan, 364). In the continental monasteries the princeps was usually a subordinate, as is probably intended in the Rule of S. Pachomius, "Vestimenta . . . accipient, qui huic rei praepositi sunt, et inferentur in repositorio, et erunt in potestate Principis monasterii" (Du Cange, Gloss. t. v. 447 a). In Wales Gwengad, prince of Penaly, and Sadwrn, prince of the city of Taff, sign charters as clerical witnesses in the 6th century (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 141, 292–293), while Gwonocadwy, prince of Penaly, and Sadoc, presbyter, sign after king Morgan among the laity, though both probably clerics (Ib. 143, 395).

The monastic praepositus was of a lower rank as "habens potestatem ordinandi, abbate absente, omnia, quae abbas praesens facit" (Du Cange, Gloss. t. v. 405 a), as head of an affiliated house, under the direction of the parent house and its abbat (Reeves, S. Adamnan, 59, 60, 65, 78, 86, 127, 339); or oeconomus to the monastery (Ib. 339, 365) having charge of its secular affairs ("praepositus domus"), as the episcopal oeconomus was "praepositus ecclesiae." They thus as oeconomi or erenachs might come by violent deaths probably in the discharge of their secular duties to the monastery (Ann. Ult. A.D. 604, 731, 813, 817, &c.). Their office was praepositatus or praepositura, and the prioress was Praeposita, sometimes Praepositissa. (Du Cange, Gloss. t. v. 404 sq.) [J. G.]

PRINCES, ALLEGIANCE TO (Hominium, Homagium, Hominatus, Sacramentum fidelitatis). It is almost superfluous to say that the general duty of obedience to the temporal sovereign was recognized by the primitive Christians as resting upon the precepts of the New Testament itself. The very remonstrances indeed which are there addressed to Christians—"Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God"—may be thought to be indicative of a spirit of resistance amongst certain individuals of the body; but the general mind and practice of the early church are no doubt correctly sketched in the boast of Tertullian (Ad Scapulam, cap. iv.), "The Christian is the enemy of no man, much less of the emperor."

But besides this general allegiance which Christians were so ready to acknowledge as due from them to the secular power, there was a submission of a more special and technical character, which was professed on the assumption of ecclesiastical office. It was not, however, until bishops so grew in temporal importance as to be formidable opponents or themselves possible rivals of a sovereign, that a formal profession of fealty could have had much significance. Hence we must not expect to find such professions recorded amongst quite the earliest annals of Christianity. In process of time a recognition of general allegiance occurs in the inscription of episcopal acts, as when Cyrus, patriarch of Alexandria, is spoken of (Conc. Trull. act. 13) as holding his position by the mercy of God and the will of the emperor. It may, however, be doubted whether this allegiance ever rested upon an oath in the East; for it was specially enacted by the emperor Justinian (Cod. lib. 1, de Ep.) that bishops should never be made to swear, their simple promise being as inviolable as the most solemn oaths.

It is indeed not in the East, but in the West, and specifically in Spain, that the first beginnings of the oath of fidelity are to be sought. The Spanish monarchy, says Thomassin, was elective, and ecclesiastics were sometimes tempted to transfer to a fresh aspirant the allegiance which they had promised to the existing ruler. Hence arose the solemn oath of fidelity by which laics and ecclesiastics alike were bound to their princes. The seventh council of Toledo (cent. vii.) speaks of the oath as an accepted usage, and brands its violation as "perjurium." By the tenth council of Toledo in the same century the penalty was decreed to be deposition, without power of restoration, except by the will of the prince himself. The penalty was actually carried into effect in the case of Sisbert, metropolitan of Toledo at the close of the 7th century (Conc. Tol. xvi. can. 6).

The oath of allegiance to the temporal sovereign was not confined to bishops on their taking office. The second canon of the tenth council of Toledo (cent. vii.) enacts penalties against any ecclesiastic (religiosus), from a bishop down to a clerk of the very lowest order or a monk, who with profane intention violates his "generalia juramenta in salutem Regiam gentisque aut patriae data." By this term "generalia juramenta" it is not to be understood, as Thomassin justly remarks, that every humble clerk or monk took an oath of allegiance before the sovereign, but that at the coronation or in the senate or at the councils the bishops and superiors took the oath in their own name and in that of their inferiors. In England, however, it is impossible to forget that an oath of allegiance personally and individually administered may form one of the preliminaries of admission into holy orders.

The form of the oath is given in the fourth council of Toledo (A.D. 633), "Whosoever of us, or of the peoples of the whole of Spain, shall, by any conspiracy or purpose, violate his oath of fidelity which he promised for the condition of his country and the race of the Goths, or for the preservation of the king's health," &c. This formula was reiterated, and response was made by the whole clergy or people. "Qui contra hanc vestram definitionem praesumpserit, Anathema, Maranatha," &c. (can. 75). The fifth council of Toledo determined (can. 7) that this general decree for the preservation of the kings and the kingdom should be renewed in all the councils of Spain. In some subsequent councils the renewal actually took place. On the other hand, the relation thus sketched has been sometimes reversed. It is laid down by Bellarmine (de Offic. Princ. Christ. cap. 5) that "the bishop is the father and pastor and doctor as well of the prince as of the rest of the people; and in accordance with these names the prince ought to be subject to the bishop, not the bishop to the prince."

The form of the oath of allegiance under Charlemagne was this: "Promitto partibus Domini mei Caroli Regis et filiorum ejus quia fidelis sum et ero diebus vitae meae sine fraude et malo ingenio." It may be added on the authority of Hofmann (l.c. s. v. Fideles) that laymen only took the oath, bishops being bound to a simple promise.

In early times we find traces only of a promise, rather than an oath, of fidelity. St. Leger, bishop of Autun, on being pressed to recognize Clovis III. as king, replied that he would sacrifice life rather than the fidelity which he promised before the Lord to Theodoric (Thomassin, pt. ii. Liv. ii. c. 38). About the same period St. Eloi, bishop of Noyon, on being pressed to swear fidelity to the king over the relics of the saints, excused himself till the king at length desisted, at the same time assuring him that he should henceforth have more confidence in him for having avoided the oath than he should have had if he had sworn.

In the African church we do not find any objection to an oath of fidelity in general, but only to an oath with whose terms the bishops were imperfectly acquainted. Huneric, king of the Vandals, required that the Catholic bishops should swear to the contents of a paper unknown to them. They suspected treachery, and refused. They were not "irrational animals," they pleaded that they should swear lightly and inconsiderately without knowing what the paper contained. We may infer from these expressions that they did not object to an oath altogether, but only to an oath blindly and thoughtlessly taken. It was afterwards declared to them that it was a kind of oath of fidelity, expressing their desire that Huneric should be succeeded by his son Hilderic. Some at length took the oath, while the rest persistently refused. But one and all the bishops were in evil case. For those who took it were banished for having transgressed the prohibition of the Gospel, "Swear not at all;" while the non-jurors were equally banished, as being unwilling that the son of the king should reign after him.

In the East the early bishops resented the attempt to impose upon them an oath of any kind. The attempt of Theodosius the younger to exact an oath of the bishops drew from Basil of Seleucia the vigorous protest, "Hitherto we know not that an oath was presented to bishops"

(Conc. Chalc. Act. 1). In the same council we find a similar objection to oaths of any kind felt by a presbyter: "Five and twenty years," cries Cassian, "I have been in communion, in business (as a barrister) at Constantinople, and God knows I never swore to any man: and now when I am a presbyter, will you force me to swear?" The solemn affirmation upon the Gospels was in those days felt to constitute the strongest possible obligation upon a Christian in matters of every kind.

A gradual relaxation, however, took place in the stiffness of their ideas; so that by the time of the Trullan council (A.D. 680) we find George the deacon, who was what we should call chancellor and librarian of the church of Constantinople, taking an oath on the book of the Gospels, "By those holy Scriptures and by Him who spake in them."

The ceremonies practised at the profession of fidelity have been different in different countries. The subject was required to extend his hands between those of his lord. A remnant of this may perhaps be seen when a degree is conferred in Cambridge. This was known as Homagium Manuale. In Spain the subject kissed the hand of his lord. Compare the practice when a modern English bishop "does homage." The subject knelt on both knees before a prince, while the prince himself was seated.

PRINCES [illegible]NT OF. The privileges conferred up[illegible] clergy [IMMUNITIES AND PRIVILEGES OF THE CLERGY] appear to have had the effect of inducing men of wealth to accept ecclesiastical offices in order to escape from their duties and obligations as citizens. This disposition was kept in check by a long series of imperial decrees, all enunciating the same principle, that the liability of all property to render certain services to the state, must not, under any circumstances, be evaded. A law of Constantine (Cod. Theodos. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 3) provides that no decurion, or son of a decurion, or anyone liable to public duties by possession of property, should escape his obligation by enrolling himself among the clergy (ad clericorum nomen et obsequium confugiat), and that in future no one should be permitted to be ordained but those who were of small fortune, and not liable to civic duties. The clergy who had been ordained after the issue of this decree, and in defiance of its provisions, were to be again enrolled in their curiae, and made to discharge their public duties, but those who had been ordained before the passing of the law were not to be molested. Another edict of the same emperor (ibid. leg. 6) provides that the clergy should be chosen from those who were liable to no civic duties, nor of sufficient fortune to discharge public offices, for, it is added, it is reasonable that the rich should provide for the necessity of the state, and the poor be provided for from the wealth of the church.

The principle of these laws was somewhat modified in later edicts, which more distinctly laid the obligation to render public services on the estate itself rather than on the donor, and in cases of disobedience substituted a forfeiture of property for a recalling to personal service. PRINCIPPUS, martyr with Agathonicus and others under Maximinus; commemorated Aug. 22 (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

PRIOR, MONASTIC. 1. Title. 2. Prior Claustralis: (α) His status; (β) mode of election; (γ) duties; (δ) priors different from deans. 3. Prior Conventualis. 4. Small priories. 5. Prioresses. The title "Prior" for a monastic official is much later in date than the office itself. According to Du Cange the word was not so used before the time of pope Celestine V., towards the end of the 13th century (Du Cange, Glossar. Lat. s. v.). But the office so designated is as old probably as the beginning of monasticism, certainly as the first attempts to organize the coenobitic life; "praepositus" and "praelatus" being the words used in the early days (Martene, Commentar. in Reg. S. Benedicti, c. 65; cf. Greg. Magn. Dialog. I. cc. 2, 7). In one passage where Benedict of Casino enjoins on the younger monks the duty of being reverent to their "priors" ("priores suos nonnos appellent juniores"), it is supposed with reason that he means their elders or superiors in the monastery (Bened. Reg. c. 63). Ménard contends that wherever in the rule of Benedict the term "prior" is used in the singular number and absolutely, not relatively, it signifies the abbat himself, and quotes, in support of his argument, a passage from Caesarius of Arles (Ménard, Comment. in Bened. Anian. Concordia Regularum, c. 47; cf. Caesarii, Regula ad Virgines, c. 3). Where Benedict in his rule orders that if any monk has an urgent question to ask during the hours of silence, he must ask it of the "prior," Ménard, with other commentators, explains the word to mean the abbat or some monk senior in standing, or higher in official position than the others present (Bened. Reg. c. 6. Comment.). Similarly in the chapter of the rule about the reader for the week, the "prior" only is allowed to interrupt the reader, if necessary, and to interpose a remark; here Ménard understands the abbat to be intended, Boherius, the monk, at the head of the table (Ib. c. 38). Again, on the quantity of liquor permissible, the "prior" to whose discretion it is left to order in extraordinary cases a larger quantity than the hemina or pint, is supposed by Boherius to be the father-abbat himself. Martene cites Haeften to shew that the deans (decani) in a monastery were sometimes called priors, the first dean being the prior, the second the sub-prior, and so forth (Martene, u.s. c. 21). But this was not usual.

There is a distinction to be observed between the prior of the cloister ("prior claustralis"), a subordinate officer of the abbat, and the prior of the convent ("prior conventualis") who exercised supreme authority within a monastery of his own (Alteserrae Asceticon, ii. 8). In the latter sense the Greek equivalent of prior is HEGUMENOS, according to Alteserra, who quotes a canon of the second council of Nicaea which speaks of the abbat or the Hegumenos; but perhaps this is a mere tautology (ib. cf. ii. Conc. Nicaen. A.D. 787, c. 14). Alteserra quotes also a passage from Evagrius, equally precarious is its application, where Cyril is called Hegumenos of the "sleepless monks" (ἡγούμενος τῶν Ἀκοιμήτων) (Evagr. Hist. Eccl. iii. 19). Later Latin writers, according to Alteserra, in their affectation of Greek fashions, were fond of styling priors Hegumeni; but the instances which he cites from Paulus Diaconus relate to monks in the Eastern empire (Alteserra, u. s.).

The prior of the cloister ranked next in the monastery to the abbat, and, subject to the abbat's veto, exercised similar authority (Bened. Reg. c. 65; cf. Concil. Aquisgran. A.D. 817, c. 55). He was the abbat's lieutenant (secundus domus), acting in the name of his superior officer (Ménard, Commentar. in Bened. Anianens. Concord. Regul. c. 27), doing nothing on his own independent responsibility, but always as subject to the approval of the abbat—head of the abbat's executive, but in theory nothing more (Fruct. Reg. c. 20). Practically an ambitious prior was apt to usurp the abbat's functions, especially if his abbat were of less energetic temperament. According to the ancient Egyptian rule ascribed to Pachomius, the monks might complain to the abbat of the prior's behaviour (Pachom. Reg. 127–8). The prior was inspector and controller of the deans (Ib. c. 12), the first in order of whom took precedence in the monastery next after the prior (Conc. Aquisgr. u. s.).

By primitive custom in the West the prior was appointed by the abbat alone (Bened. Reg. c. 65). A rule, calling itself the Rule of the East ("Regula Orientalis"), but probably compiled by Vigilius Diaconus in France during the 5th century (Ménard, ad Codex Regularum Benedicti Anianensis), says that the prior is to be appointed by the abbat, with the concurrence of the brethren (cum consilio et voluntate fratrum). Gregory the Great seems to have appointed priors and abbats on his own authority by letter (e.g. Gregor. M. Ep. vii. 42; ix. 42). It was the rule for the prior to be elected from among the inmates of the monastery; in other words, the election was to be "gremial" (Martene, Commentar. Bened. Regula, c. 65; cf. Conc. Aquisgr. A.D. 817, c. 31). Priors often, as was to be expected, were selected for the office of abbat; deans in the same way were often promoted to be priors.

The tenure of the office of prior was for life, conditionally always on good conduct. A faulty prior rendered himself liable to public correction after four admonitions, which were to be administered to him, according to Martene, by the abbat in private. In the case of an ordinary monk the warning was to be given twice, in the case of a dean thrice, before proceeding to punish. The several degrees or stages of punishment, according to Hildemarus, quoted by Martene, were public rebuke, excommunication, extra fasting, flagellation if necessary, deposition, expulsion from the monastery (Martene, Commentar. ad Bened. Reg. cc. 21, 45). Recourse was requisite occasionally even to the last and severest penalty (e.g., Ardo, Vita S. Benedicti Anianens. n. 24). Gregory the Great is quoted by Martene as specifying profligacy, insubordination, or wastefulness as valid reasons for deposing a prior (Martene, u. s.).

The prior's first and especial duty was to look closely after the discipline of the monastery, and to report any breach of discipline to the abbat (Pachom. Reg. 152, 154; Bened. Reg. cc. 63, 65; Reg. Tarnatensis, c. 23; Fruct. Reg. c. 11; Concil. Moguut. I. A.D. 813, c. 11). He was to watch over the conduct of his brethren day and night, in the refectory, in the dormitory, and elsewhere (Hieron. Ep. ad Eustochium; Augustine, De Moribus Ecclesiæ, c. 31). In the sleeping-chamber the prior was to be the first to rise in the morning, the last to go to his bed; he was to remain standing in the middle of the room, till all the rest were asleep, to guard against any irregularity; at midnight, after the appointed lection, the prior was to expound (Fruct. Reg. c. 5; Concil. [illegible] m. c. 31). He was to lead the brethren out to their labours in the field, and to superintend their noonday repose afield in the heat of summer (Pachom. Reg. c. 58; Stephani Reg. c. 55). He was empowered to enforce discipline by the lesser excommunication (Fruct. Reg. c. 11; Reg. Turnat. c. 6). It is related by Bede how St. Cuthbert was transferred by his abbat from Melrose to Lindisfarne, as prior, to keep order among the monks on the island (Bed. Hist. Eccles. iv. 27). It was another part of the prior's office, in order that the abbat might have more leisure for spiritual concerns, to look after the temporal possessions of the monastery, a responsibility which increased with the increasing wealth of monasteries, but which he shared with steward or oeconomus. On him also devolved, together with the care of the monastic property, the charge of the litigations in which the brotherhood might be engaged (Isidori Hispal. Reg. c. 20). He was also to superintend the food and clothing provided for the monks severally, not excluding the abbat's portion, rendering his account duly from time to time to his superior (Fruct. Reg. c. 11). To discharge rightly these various and important duties the prior was required to be diligent, obedient, trustworthy; grave and sedate in character, but not too advanced in years to be still active (Pachom. Reg. 128; Ferreol. Reg. c. 17; Reg. Cujusdam).

It is easy to see that the prior, holding so important a position in the monastery, might become a rival to the abbat rather than an assistant. He presided in the abbat's absence (Basilii Regula, c. 45), and it was hardly to be expected that an ambitious man, after once tasting the sweetness of authority, should abdicate cheerfully. In case of any slackness or delinquency on the part of the abbat, the prior was to set matters right (Gregor. M. Epist. iv. 4); after once reproving his superior, he was scarcely likely to receive orders from him submissively; in short, though intended to be a comfort and support to his commanding officer (Ferreol. Reg. c. 17; Fruct. Reg. c. 11), he proved too often a thorn in his side. All this Benedict anticipated with his shrewd, statesmanlike instinct. He was jealous of anything like a divided allegiance; he was afraid of insubordination and dissension from what might practically come to be two abbats in the same monastery. The prior would fancy himself a second abbat; he would make a party among the brethren; he would play the part of Absalom to David, seducing the subjects from their loyalty to their ruler. Benedict much preferred deans to a prior as the abbat's executive; they would be more amenable to control, less factious and
